

Manuale di Teologia Sistemica

PREFACE.

It is proper for me to state that this Manual is intended, first of all, for the use of students under my instruction; and that the brief treatment which is here given to many topics is only meant to prepare the way for ample discussion in the class-room.

This primary design of the book is also my apology for quoting several Latin sentences without translation; for re-translating a few passages of the New Testament; for giving in some instances the Greek original of an important word or clause; for referring to theological works in foreign languages; and for calling attention to published articles or minor treatises of my own, which exhibit a little more fully than does this Manual, the considerations that favor some of the views here presented.

The same circumstance has had more or less influence upon the manner in which certain difficult questions are treated; since my aim in teaching is to secure candid and thorough study on the part of those under my care, rather than to give them, in a dogmatic spirit, the results of my own investigation.

Whether a Manual of Theology and Ethics, prepared in this way, will be of any service to ministers of the gospel, teachers of Bible-classes, or other thoughtful Christians, must depend in a great measure upon the care with which they examine the biblical passages referred to in the volume. For, if the work has any merit, this merit will be found in its orderly statement of the evidence which goes to prove that the Scriptures are a trustworthy revelation of the divine will; and in its orderly presentation of the blessed truths which are taught by the Scriptures. In other words, the treatment of nearly every topic is biblical, rather than philosophical, and will be found useful in proportion to the care with which the Bible is consulted.

INDEX.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

	PAGES.
INTRODUCTION,	9-26
Definitions, 9-11; Assumptions, 12-13; Cautions, 13-14; Qualifications, 14-15; Benefits, 15-16; Topics, 17-18; Writers, 18-26.
THE EXISTENCE OF GOD,	27-42
Preliminary Observations, 27-28; Ten Propositions Stated and Defended, 28-40; Theistic Arguments in the Usual Form, 40-42.
THE BIBLE FROM GOD,	43-87
Preliminary Considerations, 43-45; The New Testament History Credible, 45-53; Christ Jesus Infallible, 53-67; Promise of Inspiration to the Apostles, 67-73; The Old Testament Endorsed by Christ and his Apostles, 73-77; The Inspiration of the Sacred Writers Different from that of Ordinary Christians, 78-79; It made them Infallible Teachers, 79-81; Nature of their Inspiration, 81; Sources of their Knowledge, 82-83; Objections to this Doctrine Considered, 83-87.
THE PERFECTION OF GOD,	88-117
Modes of God's Existence, 88-92; Attributes of God, 92-96; Purpose of God, 96-99; Creation by God through the Word, 99-101; Preservation by God through the Word, 101-102; Providence of God in Christ, 102-104; Angels and their Service, 105-117.

THE DOCTRINE OF MAN, 118-170

The Unity of Mankind, 118-119; The Essential Elements of Human Nature, 120-123; The Endless Existence of Man, 123-125; The Moral Constitution of Man, 125-133; The Reality of Sin in Mankind, 133-136; The Nature of Sin in Mankind, 136-140; The Extent of Sin in Mankind, 140-143; The Degree of Sin in Mankind, 143-144; The Accountability of Men for their Sinfulness, 144-151; The Penalty of Sin, 151-168; The Results of Sin, 168-170.

THE DOCTRINE OF SALVATION, 171-299

The Person of Christ:—The Deity of Christ, 171-190; The Humanity of Christ, 190-192; The Personal Oneness of Christ, 192-194; Effect of the Incarnation on the Higher Nature of Christ, 194-204; Effect of the Incarnation on the Lower Nature of Christ, 204-207; The Work of Christ:—Propitiation by Jesus Christ, 207-230; Revelation by Christ, 231-234; Government by Christ, 234; The Person of the Holy Spirit:—Deity of the Holy Spirit, 235; Personality of the Holy Spirit, 235-240; Identity of the Holy Spirit and the Spirit of God, 240-241; Work of the Holy Spirit, 241-242; Doctrine of Redemption:—The Nature of Regeneration, 242-246; The Author of Regeneration, 246-247; Relation of Christian Truth to Regeneration, 247-252; The Error of Baptismal Regeneration, 252-256; Antecedents on the Part of Man to Regeneration, 256-258; The Doctrine of Election, 258-261; First Fruits of Regeneration in Experience, 261-263; The Nature of Justification, 264-266; The Author of Justification, 266-267; The Ground of Justification, 267-268; The Condition of Justification, 268-269; Reasonableness of this Doctrine, 269-272; Sanctification, 273-274; The Nature of Sanctification, 274; The Author of Sanctification, 274-276; The Means of Sanctification: A. Providential Discipline, 276-278; B. Religious Truth, 278-279; C. Christian Action, 279-285; D. Church Life, 286-288; E. The Lord's Day, 288-292; The Period of Sanctification, 292-295; The Certainty of Sanctification, 295-299.

CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND ORDINANCES, 300-344

Christian Churches, 300-312; Christian Ordinances: Baptism, 312-333; The External Rite, 313-320; The Significance of the Rite, 320-323; The Subjects of the Rite, 323-326; Infant Baptism Unscriptural, 326-330; Relation of the Rite to John's Baptism, 330-333; The Lord's Supper, 333-344; The External Rite, 334-335; The Import of the Ordinance, 335-337; The Proper Communicants, 337-344.

DOCTRINE OF THE LAST THINGS, 345-364

Natural Death, 345; The Intermediate State, 345-349; The Second Advent of Christ, 349-351; The Resurrection of the Dead, 351-354; The Last Judgment, 354-358; The Final State of Unbelievers, 358-362; The Final State of Believers, 362-364.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

	PAGES.
INTRODUCTION,	365-372
Definition and Position of the Science, 365; Ground of Right, 365-369; Rule of Right, 369-371; Imperfection of Man's Ethical Knowledge, 371; Consequences of this Imperfection, 371-372.
CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO GOD, . .	373-376
Supreme Love to God, 373; His Honor the Highest Motive to Action, 373-374; Unceasing Worship or Prayer, 374; The Conduct of Public Worship, 374-375; Especially Prayer, 375-376.
CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO ONE'S SELF, 376-381 .
Inference from the Second Command, Love to Man, 376; Moral Nature of Man, or Conscience, 376-377; Culture of Conscience, 377-378; Culture of Devout Affections, 379; Culture of Mental Powers, 379-380; Of the Senses and Sensibilities, 380; Of the Bodily Powers, 380-381.
CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO OTHER MEN, 381-416
Examination of the Golden Rule, 381-383; Christian Conduct in Church Relations, 383-389; In Domestic Relations, 389-393; Duties of Masters to Servants, 393-399; And of Servants to Masters, 399-400; In Social Relations, 401-403; In Business Relations, 403-406; Appendix on the Use of Money, 406-410; And in Civil Relations, 410-411; As Subjects of Government, 411-412; As Supporters of Government, 412; As Officers of Government, 412-415; As Reformers of Government, 415-416.

MANUAL OF SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

INTRODUCTION.

I. DEFINITIONS.

IN its primary and strict sense, Theology is the science of God; that is, an orderly exposition of the evidences of the existence and perfection of God. Used in this sense, it is the name of one Division of Systematic Theology, and is often called Theology Proper. But the term is also used as a substitute for the expression, Systematic Theology, and will be so employed in this Manual.¹

*Systematic Theology is a scientific exposition of the various doctrines of the Christian religion, showing their true character, their proper foundations, and their mutual inter-dependence.*²

It pre-supposes a knowledge of Biblical Theology; it includes Theology Proper and Apologetic Theology in part; and it provides materials for both Polemical and Comparative Theology.

Religion, equivalent to religio, from relegere or religare, is, first, piety, or a reverent and dutiful spirit towards God, manifested in conduct; and, secondly, the means by which this spirit is originated, sustained, and expressed, or the facts, principles, rites, and duties which are believed, observed, or performed by him who has this spirit. In the definition of systematic theology, given above, it has of course the second meaning.¹

¹ Suicer's "Thesaurus," sub voce Σεολογία; Turretin (F.) "Theologia," &c. I. l. i. q. i.; Gerhard (J.) "Loci Theologici," I. Proem.; Fleming (W.) "Vocabulary of Philosophy," s. v. Theology; Herzog "Real-Encyklopädie," s. v. "Theologie;" Thomas Aquinas, "Summa," Pt. I. q. i. art. 2. "A Deo docetur, Deum docet, et ad Deum ducit."

² "Bib. Sac." I. 178-217, 332-367, 552-578, 726-735; "Am. Bib. Repos." for 1845, 457 sq.; "Chr. Rev." xx. 492-506; xxi. 66-82; Hagenbach (K. R.) "Theologische Encyklopädie;" Herzog "Real-Encyklopädie," s. v. "Dogmatik."

Biblical Theology is used to signify a critical exposition of the religious doctrines taught by the successive writers of the Bible, or, in other words, a history of the development of religious doctrine among the Jews. It does not assume the inspiration of the Scriptures, nor the substantial unity of their teaching.²

Apologetic Theology is a scientific exposition of the evidences of Christianity. It pre-supposes a good knowledge of the Bible, and of the History of the Christian religion, if not of systematic theology. But it may be included in systematic theology, as defined above, since the "foundations" of belief in the doctrines of the Christian religion are to be examined in systematic theology.³

Polemical Theology is distinguished from Apologetic, by being, on the one hand, more aggressive, and, on the other, more denominational. It is not a defence of the Christian religion as a whole, but rather an attack upon certain alleged perversions of it.⁴

Comparative Theology is an exposition of the points of agreement and of difference between the great systems of religious belief and worship which prevail among men, with a

¹ Cicero (M. T.) "De Nat. Deor." ii. 28; Lactantius (F.) "Inst. Div." iv. 28; Müller (J. G.) in "Studien und Kritiken" for 1835; Herzog "Real-Encyklopädie," s. v. "Religion;" Bib. Sac. ix. 374-417; "Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie und Kirche," viii. S. 715 ff.; x. S. 718 ff.; xi. S. 254 ff.; Redslob (G. M.) "Zur Etymologie des Wortes Religio," in St. u. Kr. 1841, 43.

² Herzog "Real-Encyk." s. v. ii. S. 219 sq.; Reuss (E.) "History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age;" Schmid (C. F.) "Theology of the N. T.;" Messner (H.) "Die Lehre der Apostel;" Weiss (B.) "Theologie des N. T.;" Oehler (G. F.) "Theology of the Old Test.;" Schultz (H.) "Alttestamentliche Theologie;" "Presby. Quarterly, and Princeton Rev." for 1877, 5 sq.

³ Ebrard (J. H. A.) "Apologetik, oder Wissenschaftliche Rechtfertigung des Christenthums;" and works noticed in Part Second.

⁴ All controversial works of Roman Catholics against Protestants, Pedobaptists against Baptists, Unitarians against Trinitarians, and vice versa, are embraced in this great branch of theology.

view to ascertaining their origin, credibility, and influence. This science is yet in its infancy.¹

In this treatise, all the doctrines of the Christian religion are supposed to be drawn from the Scriptures, and set forth in their logical order, so that they may stand before the mind as a system of religious truth. Yet many facts here put together are revealed but in part, and therefore their agreement with one another can be seen but in part. A perfect system presupposes perfect knowledge in him who describes it.

By limiting the doctrines of Christian Theology to those which are either plainly taught, or implied, by the Scriptures, we (a) pay suitable respect to the Word of God; (b) guard ourselves from the danger of interpreting that Word into harmony with our independent speculations; (c) habituate our minds to a method of discussing Christian doctrines, safe in itself and adapted to the pulpit; (d) obtain the clearest and deepest views of religious truth; and (e) derive the greatest spiritual benefit from our studies.

The possibility of showing the mutual consistency and inter-dependence of the doctrines of the Christian religion may be said to depend, still further, (a) upon their truth, for truth is always self-consistent; (b) upon the proportion of the revealed to the unrevealed doctrines of the system; (c) upon the clearness with which the connection between different parts of the system is revealed; and (d) upon the kind of affinity which exists between natural and revealed religion.

Some degree of prominence must be given to the special theological questions of the day, though it is necessary to guard against the mistake of supposing that the leading questions of to-day will be such to the end of time. One is more apt to lay undue stress upon that which now agitates society than to withhold from it fit attention.

¹ Clarke (J. F.) "The Ten Great Religions;" Moffat (J. C.) "A Comparative History of Religions;" Hardwick (C.) "Christ and other Masters;" Müller (Max) "Chips from a German Workshop;" Legge (J.) "The Chinese Classics;" Bigandet (P.) "The Life or Legend of Gaudama;" Johnson (S.) "Oriental Religions."

II. ASSUMPTIONS.

The normal action of the mind must be trusted. For a denial of the general veracity of our mental action nullifies itself; because we indorse the action by accepting the denial, since the denial itself is a mental act.¹

Evidence is that which tends to produce belief in the mind to which it is offered; unless it would be better to say, it is that which tends to produce knowledge or belief in the mind.

The value of evidence is always, therefore, to be measured by the power which it has to originate knowledge, or to produce belief in the mind of man. There is no other standard of its value known to mortals. Even God approaches men as those who can and must judge for themselves. He never demands faith without sufficient evidence.

Evidence may be divided into several classes, as that which is afforded (a) by primitive beliefs, judgments, and intuitions; (b) by distinct perception or recollection; and (c) by testimony or analogy.²

Probable evidence rests upon testimony or analogy. Some persons reduce these to one, namely, Analogy. But this is scarcely correct; for the human mind seems to be naturally pre-disposed to accept the testimony of a fellow-man.³

Probable evidence may be indubitable, satisfactory, or weak. Its force is determined by its effect on the mind, and is found to be of every degree, from just above zero to moral demonstration.

¹ Compare the remarks of Hamilton (W.) in "Philosophy of Common Sense," p. 21 sq. (Edition by Wight.)

² McCosh (J.) "Intuitions of the Human Mind." He speaks of Primitive Cognitions, as of Body, Spirit, Substance, Power; of Prim. Beliefs, as of Space, Time, The Infinite; and of Prim. Judgments, as to Identity or Difference, the Whole and its Parts, &c.

³ Gambier (J. E.) "Guide to the Study of Moral Evidence;" Butler (J.) "Analogy," Pt. II. 67 sq.; Hopkins (M.) "Lowell Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," 23 sq.; Greenleaf (S.) "A Treatise on the Law of Evidence," Pt. I. cc. I., III., IV.; Jahrbücher, 1867, 583 sq.; Chlebes (W.) "Über das Verhältniss von Glauben und Wissen," in St. a. Kr. 1846, S. 905 ff.

As the judgment goes with the stronger probable evidence, so the conduct should obey the judgment and honor the evidence. Probability is the guide of life; and the soundest mind is the one that can best perceive the force of probable evidence.

III. CAUTIONS.

Human reason is finite, and therefore unable to comprehend what is infinite. Indeed, it is unable to comprehend in full many objects that are strictly finite, as, for example, the ocean.¹

Yet it can know, in part, that which is truly infinite as well as that which is indefinitely great. For a reality which is, in some respects, infinite and indefinable may be, in other respects, definable. Thus, an infinite mind may be known as mind; that is, as intelligent, voluntary, benevolent, &c., but not directly as infinite. It can be classified as mind, but not comprehended as unlimited in power, knowledge, benevolence.

Moreover, human reason may have convincing evidence that something infinite exists, though it has never comprehended the infinite; just as it may have convincing evidence that many things exist which, though not strictly infinite, are known to transcend human knowledge.

There is need of special caution in treating of the relations of the infinite and the finite; for one of the terms is never fully known. Consider, for example, the fact that two points in space, though but an inch apart, may be made to approach each other forever without meeting. Here finite distance is matched with infinite motion in time, and seems to be its equal. So, too, finite wills seem to act freely, and even capriciously, under an infinite will, yet without obstructing its action.

¹ Mansel (H. L.) "Limits of Religious Thought," and "Philosophy of the Conditioned;" Spencer (H.) "First Principles of a New System of Philosophy," Pt. I.; McCosh (J.) "The Intuitions of the Human Mind;" Young (J.) "The Province of Reason;" Rogers (H.) "Reason and Faith," "The Eclipse of Faith," "Defence of the Eclipse of Faith;" Calderwood (H.) "Philosophy of the Infinite;" "Bib. Sac." VI. p. 673 sq.; "Am. Theol. Rev." for 1860, p. 1 sq. — both articles by Prof. H. B. Smith; "Am. Presb. Rev." for 1870, p. 1 sq., by Prof. H. N. Day; Boyle (R.) "On Things Above Reason," and "On the Veneration which Man's Intellect owes to God;" Hamilton (W.) "Philosophical Testimonies to the Limitation of our Knowledge from the Limitation of our Faculties" in "Phil. Discussions," p. 591 sq.

The study of theology is, throughout, a study of the relations of finite beings to an infinite Being; and therefore great caution is necessary. Better leave many blanks in the system than go beyond the warrant of facts.

IV. QUALIFICATIONS.

Mental: soundness of judgment and power of systematic thought. For the questions to be considered are numerous and difficult; the evidence to be weighed is manifold and easily perverted; and a mistake at one point is sure to bring in darkness or error at other points. Good sense, rather than genius, is needed in the study of theology.¹

Moral: fairness of mind and deep reverence for truth. The doctrines of the Bible should be examined with perfect candor. Indifference is impossible; but docility and a love of truth that overcomes prejudice are within the reach of every honest student. "Non pigebit me, sicubi haesito, quærere; nec pudebit, sicubi erro, discere. Quisque audit hoc vel legit, ubi pariter certus est, pergat mecum; ubi pariter hæsitat, quærat mecum; ubi errorem suum cognoscit, redeat ad me; ubi meum, revocet me." (Aug. De Trin. 1, 2.)

Religious: faith, love, humility, docility, fruits of the presence of the Spirit of God in the soul. The importance of these is admitted by nearly all theologians. "The Scriptures," says Andrew Fuller, "exhibit a beauty and a life utterly incomprehensible to an unholy mind." "We must love divine things in order to know them," says Pascal. Says Bernard of Clairvaux, "Tantum Deus cognoscitur quantum

¹ Goddard (C.) "The Mental Condition necessary to due Inquiry into Religious Evidence;" "Duties of a Theologian," in "Bib. Repos." for 1839, p. 347 sq.

diligitur; orando facilius quam disputando et dignius Deus cognoscitur et invenitur;" and Anselm, "Credo ut intelligam" (cf. "Cur Deus Homo?" c. 25). See JOHN vii. 17; 1 COR. ii. 15; Ps. xxv. 9; cxix. 18.¹

Educational: knowledge of biblical interpretation and acquaintance with mental philosophy, with physical science, and with the history of religious thought. The first of these, interpretation, is far more important than either of the others. Hollaz mentions these conditions as pre-requisite to sound interpretation: (a) "Invocatio Dei, patris luminum; (b) Notitia idiomatis quo sacra Scriptura legitur; (c) Attenta consideratio phrasium, scopi, antecedentium et consequentium; (d) Depulsio præconceptorum opinionum et pravorum affectuum."

V. BENEFITS.

The study of theology ought to improve and satisfy the mind of the student. For the mind was made for the apprehension of truth as evidently as the lungs were made for the reception of air. Moreover, related truths belong to a system; they stand together and support each other. Hence a knowledge of their relations is required by the mind.²

Says Lücke: "I am of the opinion that the scientific interest which calls for systematic theology is for the most part different from that which calls for historical or critical theology. It is the systematic interest, and not the subordinate interest in the organic arrangement of given historical material, the interest in so representing the doctrines of Christian faith and action in their absolute truth that all doubt and contradiction and internal incoherence of Christian thinking may vanish away."¹

¹ Edwards (B. B.) "Influence of Eminent Piety on the Intellectual Powers," in "Christian Rev." for 1840, p. 1 sq.; Luthardt (C. E.) "Die Lehre vom freien Willen," S. 388 sq.; Augustini (A.) Opera, Vol. II. p. 453, ep. 120, ed. J. P. Migne; Anselm "Cur Deus Homo," I. 2; Leathes (S.) "The Witness of the Old Test. to Christ," p. 140; Müller (J.) "The Christian Doctrine of Sin," I. p. 178 9.

² Shedd (W. G. T.) "The Method and Influence of Theological Studies," "Discourses and Essays," p. 7 sq.; Sears (B.) "An Educated Ministry," in "Chr. Rev.," Vol. XVIII. p. 567 sq.; Robinson (E. G.) "Doctrine and Life," in "Chr. Rev." for 1859, p. 161 sq.; Hovey (A.) "The Study of Doctrinal Theology Useful to Pastors," in "Chr. Rev." 1863, p. 646 sq.; "The Christian Pastor; his Work, and the Needful Preparation;" Chalmers (T.) "Institutes of Theology," I. p. 353 sq.; Bonifas "The Relative Value of Christian Doctrine," in "Theological Eclectic" for 1870; Wayland (F.) "The Apostolic Ministry."

It should also purify and protect the conscience. For the doctrines of Christianity are sacred: perversion of them is a great sin; and therefore no teacher can innocently neglect the best knowledge of them within his reach. To teach them positively, and so effectively, without doing violence to conscience, he must study them thoroughly, with the best helps within his reach.

It should, at the same time, deepen, as well as test, his religious life. Some of the truths, plainly taught in the Scriptures, and claiming the attention of a student of theology, are fitted to try his faith and humility severely. But, if he bears the trial, a great blessing follows. "Light is sown for the righteous." Christian knowledge is favorable to deep piety. Ignorance is not the mother of real devotion.

It should make his preaching more truthful and comprehensive. A man should preach what he intelligently believes. Beyond that he cannot go with safety to himself or to others. Not only in reaching the impenitent, but also and especially in edifying Christians, does a knowledge of theology serve a minister of the gospel.

It should both augment and improve his influence over others for their good. A minister's success is equal to the balance of good over evil in his influence, whether that influence be direct or indirect. A right, as well as a deep impression is to be made.²

¹ Nitzsch (C. I.) "Praktische Theologie," III. I. S. 90 sq.

² "Sunt qui scire volunt eo tantum fine ut sciant, et turpis curiositas est; et sunt qui scire volunt ut sciantur ipsi, et turpis vanitas est; et sunt item qui scire volunt ut scientiam suam vendant, verbi causâ, pro pecuniâ, pro honoribus, et turpis quæstus est. Sed sunt quoque qui scire volunt ut ædificent, et charitas est; et item qui scire volunt ut ædificentur, et prudentia est." Again: "Ut legeret intelligendi fecit cupiditas; ut intelligeret oratio impetravit; ut impetraret vitæ sanctitas promeruit. Sic cupiat, sic oret, sic vivat qui se proficere velit." St. Bernard, Sermo XXXVI. super Cant. p. 604.

VI. TOPICS.

- I. THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.
- II. THE BIBLE FROM GOD.
- III. THE PERFECTION OF GOD.
- IV. THE DOCTRINE OF MAN.
- V. THE DOCTRINE OF SALVATION.
- VI. CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND ORDINANCES.
- VII. THE DOCTRINE OF THE LAST THINGS.

Whether this arrangement of topics is the best possible must be left for the present undecided. Against it, one objection may be raised, to wit, that the first and third topics belong naturally together; but, in response, it may be said, that the second topic is in its place, because it pre-supposes the first, and is pre-supposed by the third.

The arrangement of topics given above is practically followed by nearly all theologians, and is adopted formally by many; for example, Turretin, Hodge, Müller, Wardlaw, and others.

Calvin, Marheinecke, Martensen, and others, regard all Christian truth as embraced in the Doctrines of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The baptismal formula, and the early creeds may have suggested this view; but it gives no suitable and sufficient place to Anthropology.

Liebner, Thomasius, Fuller, and others, would have the person and work of Christ embrace all Christian truth. This view, however, tends to subordinate unduly the work of the Father and of the Holy Spirit, and to make the incarnation of the Word indispensable, even apart from sin.

Oosterzee and, partly, Augustine, make the Kingdom of God the ruling idea of all theological truth. I. God: The King. II. Man: The Subject. III. Christ: The Founder of the Kingdom. IV. Redemption: The Character of the Kingdom. V. The Way of Salvation: The Law of the Kingdom. VI. The Church: Its Training School. VII. The Completion of the Kingdom.

Hase, in "Hutterus Redivivus," makes Reconciliation, through Christ, the regulative idea. I. The Sources: Bible (and Nature). II. The Object: God. III. The Subject: Man. IV. The Means: Christ, &c. V. The Result: Reconciliation.

VII. WRITERS ON SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

The following contains the names of a few men who discussed particular doctrines only; but most of those mentioned treated in their works of all the doctrines which they included in theology.

1. ATHANASIUS was born in Alexandria about A.D. 300, and died there in A.D. 373.

His doctrinal writings are the following: 1. A Discourse respecting the Incarnation and the Logos. 2. An Exposition of his Faith in the Trinity. 3. A Letter on the Decrees of the Nicene Council. 4. A Letter on the Doctrine of Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria. 5. Four Orations against the Arians. 6. A Letter to Serapion. 7. Another to Epictetus; and 8. A Treatise, in two books, against Apollinaris. All these works relate to the Divinity of Christ, or to the doctrine of the Trinity, in some of its aspects. Athanasius is a clear, logical, and earnest writer. No one of the Greek fathers is worthy of so careful study as a theologian.

2. AUGUSTINE was born Nov. 13, 353, and died Aug. 26, 430. His doctrinal works are very numerous; and, apart from his De Civitate Dei, a work even more comprehensive and doctrinal than Edwards's "History of Redemption," may be arranged in three classes. 1. Those which relate to the Trinity, in opposition to the Arians and Manichæans. 2. Those which relate to Anthropology, in opposition to the Pelagians; and, 3. Those which relate to the polity and purity of the Church in opposition to the Donatists.

These works evince fair scholarship, great depth and acuteness of thought, a vigorous imagination, and oftentimes fervid piety.

3. JOHN of DAMASCUS was born somewhat prior to A.D. 700, at Damascus. The time of his death is unknown; but it was between A.D. 754 and 787.

His principal Treatise was entitled, "An Exposition of the Orthodox Faith." It is the earliest work on systematic theology, but not strictly original. It is composed largely of quotations from the fathers of the Church, with connecting and explanatory remarks.

4. ANSELM of CANTERBURY was born in A.D. 1033, at Aosta, of Piedmont, and died A.D. 1109.

His theological writings were as follows: 1. Monologium de Divinitatis essentia. 2. Proslogion de Dei existentia.¹ 3. De fide Trinitatis et de incarnatione Verbi. 4. *Cur Deus Homo?*² The second contains his famous a priori demonstration of the existence of God, and the fourth is the earliest elaborate statement of the commercial theory of the Atonement.

5. PETER of LOMBARDY was born near Novara, in Lombardy, about A.D. 1100, and died, according to some authorities, in A.D. 1160; according to others, in A.D. 1164. His great work in theology was entitled Sententiarum Libri Quatuor. It resembles somewhat the Treatise of John of Damascus, but evinces much greater acuteness. It quotes from the fathers, and attempts to reconcile their conflicting views.

"The Sentences" was for a long time used as a text-book on theology in Catholic universities. Teachers lectured upon it, as they did on the works of Aristotle.

6. THOMAS AQUINAS was born in A.D. 1227, at Aquino, in Campania, and died in A.D. 1274. His principal work was entitled Summa Theologica, and divided into three parts. In Part First, he treats of the Being and Attributes of God, of Predestination, Providence, and the Trinity; of Angels; of the Creation of our World; and of Man,—his nature, primitive state, the origin of evil, free will, the penalty of sin, &c.

¹ Translated in the "Bib. Sacra," Vol. VIII.

² Translated in the "Bib. Sacra," Vol. XI, XII.

In Part Second, he treats of the powers of the human soul, the nature and extent of moral law, and indeed of all questions in Christian Ethics. In Part Third, he treats of the Person and Work of Christ, and of the Sacraments. Aquinas belonged to the Augustinian school of theologians.

7. MELANCTHON (P.) was born at Brettin, in Baden, Feb. 16, 1497; spent most of his life at Wittenberg, as professor in the University, and died April 19, 1560. His chief theological work was entitled Loci Communes. It grew out of lectures on the Epistle to the Romans; and passing lightly over the doctrines of God, the Trinity, the Creation, and the Person of Christ,—doctrines which had hitherto occupied the principal place in systematic theology,—he gave the body of his work to the doctrine of Redemption. Depravity, the will, regeneration, justification, and similar themes, were fully discussed. In the first edition, he reproduced the Augustinian system; but he afterwards adopted a substantially Arminian view.

8. CALVIN (J.) was born in Picardy, at Noyon, July 10, 1509, and died in Geneva, May 19, 1564.

His commentaries are theological as well as exegetical. But he also wrote a treatise on Christian Doctrine, entitled Institutio Christianæ Religionis. The great features of his system are well understood.

9. HUTTER (L.) was born in January, 1563, at Nellingen, near Ulm, and died at Wittenberg, Oct. 23, 1616.

His theological works are the following: 1. Libri Christianæ Concordiæ Explicatio. 2. Compendium locorum Theologicorum, to take the place of Melancthon's Loci Communes, on account of the "crypto-Calvinism" of the latter.¹ Loci Communes Theologici, more copious than the preceding. All these are Lutheran authorities.

10. GERHARD (J.) was born at Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582, and died at Jena, Aug. 20, 1637.

His theological works are: 1. Doctrina Catholica et Evan- gelica, 3 vols. 2. Loci Communes Theologici, 9 vols. This work may be considered a thesaurus of Lutheran theology.

¹ Reproduced by Hase, "Hutterus Redivivus," translated into English, and published in Philadelphia, 1868.

11. GROTIUS (H.) was born at Delft, in Holland, in 1553, passed most of his life in Holland and France, was a very distinguished scholar and writer, and died Aug. 29, 1645.

Two of his works deserve notice. 1. His treatise, De veritate Religionis Christianæ, a comprehensive and learned treatise on the truth of Christianity; and, 2, his Defensio fidei Catholicæ de satisfactione Christi adversus F. Socinum. The Grotian theory of the Atonement is nearly equivalent to what is now called the Rectoral view. Grotius was a decided Arminian.

12. EPISCOPIUS (S.) was born at Amsterdam, in January, 1583, where also he died in 1643.

His theological works were: 1. Confessio seu declaratio sententiæ pastorum Remonstrantium. 2. Institutiones Theologicæ, — lectures at Amsterdam, to his students. 3. Responsio ad quæstiones Theologicas, 64. Episcopus hesitated as to the divinity of Christ, and esteemed the doctrine of his supernatural birth of no consequence.

13. QUENSTEDT (J. A.) was born at Quedlinburg, in the year 1617, and died at Wittenberg, May 22, 1688.

His chief work was entitled, Theologia Didactico-polemica, sive systema Theologicum, in 2 vols. It is learned, comprehensive, logical, though less attractive in style than the work of Turretin.

14. TURRETIN (F.) was born in Geneva, Oct. 17, 1623, where also he died, Sept. 28, 1687.

His chief work is entitled, Institutio Theologiæ Elencticæ. The first two volumes are very able, and for the most part correct.

15. BUDDEUS (J. F.) was born at Anclam, June 25, 1667, and died at Jena, Nov. 19, 1729.

Of his writings we mention the following: 1. Institutiones Theologiæ Moralis. 2. Theses de Atheismo et Superstitione. 3. Institutiones Theologiæ Dogmaticæ, — a valuable treatise.

16. STAFFER (J. F.) was born at Brougg, in 1708, and died at Diesbach, of Berne, in 1775.

His theological works were: 1. Institutiones Theologiæ Polemicæ, five volumes. The first volume of this work is a masterpiece of its kind. 2. "Grounds of the True Religion," twelve volumes. 3. "Christian Ethics," six volumes. Some of these works are diffuse, but they all evince logical power.

17. MOSHEIM (J. L.) was born at Lubec, Oct. 9, 1694, and died at Göttingen, Sept. 9, 1755.

He is chiefly remembered as an Ecclesiastical historian; but he wrote also on systematic theology. 1. His "Ethics of the Holy Scriptures," in five volumes; and, 2, "Elements of Dogmatic Theology." The style of this latter work is remarkably perspicuous; and one who has but a slight knowledge of Latin can read it without difficulty.

18. MELCHIOR CANUS was born at Tarraco, Spain, about A.D. 1500, and died in 1560.

His chief theological work was entitled, Loci Theologici, in twelve books. It treats of the sources of Christian doctrines, namely, Scripture and Tradition, the Arrangement of these doctrines, and the proper Method of discussion.

19. BELLARMIN (R.) was born in Tuscany, Oct. 4, 1542, and died at Rome, Sept. 27, 1621.

His work, entitled, Disputationes de Controversiis Christianæ fidei adv. hujus temporis hæreticos, discusses all points then in debate between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. It is not intentionally unjust to the Protestants; and it lays open the papal system without disguise.

20. JANSENIUS (O.) was born, Oct. 28, 1585, at Accoy, near Leerdam, North Holland, and died May 6, 1638.

His principal work was entitled, Augustinus seu doctrina St. Augustini de humanæ naturæ sanitate, ægritudine, medicina, adversus Pelagianos, &c. It is a work of great ability, and sets forth the Augustinian theology with precision and vigor. He is said to have read the writings of Augustine against the Pelagians twenty times, and the rest of his writings ten times through.

21. BUNYAN (J.) was born in 1628, at Elstow, near Bedford, and died Aug. 31, 1688.

Of his writings, the following may be mentioned as theological in substance, if not in form: 1. "Justification by an Imputed Righteousness." 2. "The Work of Christ as an Advocate." 3. "Saved by Grace." 4. "The Law and Grace unfolded." 5. "Some Gospel Truths opened; Divine and Human Nature of Christ." 6. "Defence of the Doctrine of Justification by Faith." 7. "Election and Reprobation."

22. GILL (J.) was born at Kettering, Nov. 23, 1697, and died at Horsleydown, Oct. 14, 1771. He is chiefly known as a commentator, and was very familiar with Rabbinical works. His "Body of Divinity" is a highly Calvinistic work, evincing considerable ability.

23. FULLER (A.) was born Feb. 6, 1754, at Wicken, and died at Kettering, May, 7, 1815.

His works, like those of Bunyan, are for the most part theological. The following, however, may be specified: 1. "Letters on Systematic Divinity." 2. "The Gospel its own Witness." 3. "The Gospel worthy of all Acceptation." 4. "The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems compared." 5. "Dialogues, &c., between Crispus and Gaius." 6. "Conversations between Peter, James, and John." The writings of Fuller are remarkably clear, discriminating, and sound.

24. DAGG (J. L.) "Manual of Theology and of Church Polity," a sound and useful work. The second part is especially valuable.

25. RIDGELY, THOMAS, was born in London, about A.D. 1667, and died March 27, 1734.

His chief work is entitled, "A Body of Divinity," &c., and consists of Lectures on the Assembly's Larger Catechism. It is carefully written, and evinces much ability and piety.

26. DICK (J.) was born in Aberdeen, Oct. 10, 1764, and died Jan. 25, 1833.

His "Theology" is a work of considerable value.

27. CHALMERS, THOMAS, was born in East Anstruther, a village of Fife, March 17, 1780, and died at Edinburgh, May 31, 1847.

Of his works, we may specify: 1. "Christian Revelation."

2. "Institutes of Theology." This latter work gives the matured views of Chalmers on theology.

28. EDWARDS (J.) was born at East Windsor, Ct., Oct. 5, 1703, and died at Princeton, N. J., March 22, 1758.

Of his numerous writings, we mention the following: 1. "Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will." 2. "The Great Doctrine of Original Sin defended." 3. "The History of Redemption." 4. "Nature of True Virtue." 5. "Concerning Religious Affections." 6. "Qualifications for Full Communion in the Visible Church." Edwards is a very powerful writer; acute, exhaustive, spiritual.

29. BELLAMY, JOSEPH, was born at New Cheshire, Ct., in 1719, and died at Bethlehem, Ct., March 6, 1790.

Of his works, the following deserve special notice: 1. "True Religion Delineated." 2. "The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin" (four sermons). 3. "Theron, Paulinus, and Aspasio, on Love, Faith, Assurance," &c. Bellamy was a powerful preacher, a vigorous writer, and a sound theologian.

30. HOPKINS (S.) was born at Waterbury, Ct., Sept. 19, 1721, and died in Newport, R. I., Dec. 20, 1803.

His theological views are contained in a work entitled, "A System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation," &c. He was a clear thinker and able writer, though not an attractive preacher. Hopkinsianism.

31. WOODS (L.) His theological works are distinguished for good sense, great caution for the most part, and perspicuity of style.

32. FINNEY (C. G.) "Lectures on Systematic Theology," valuable for the view which they give of their author's opinions; but somewhat logical, dry, and wanting in references to Scripture.

33. TAYLOR (N. W.) 1. "Lectures on Moral Government." 2. "Revealed Theology." These volumes give, of course, a definite statement of Dr. Taylor's system. They are ably, though somewhat diffusely written.

34. BRECKINRIDGE (R. J.) "Christianity Objectively Considered, and Christianity Subjectively Considered." Old School; verbose, but not without vigor.

35. HODGE (A. A.) "Outlines of Theology," a compact exhibition of the Princeton theology.

36. BAIRD (E. J.) "The Elohim Revealed in the Creation and Redemption of Man." Augustinian.

37. WESLEY (J.) was born at Epworth, June 17, 1703, and died March 2, 1791.

The following works deserve examination: 1. "Predestination calmly Considered." 2. "Thoughts on Imputed Righteousness." 3. "What is an Arminian?" 4. "Serious Thoughts on the Perseverance of the Saints." 5. "Plain Account of Christian Perfection." 6. "A Treatise on Baptism." 7. "Doctrine of Original Sin."

The following may also be noted; some of them are of great ability:—

38. HODGE (C.) "Systematic Theology;" a comprehensive and able discussion of nearly all the topics belonging to Systematic Theology.

39. WARDLAW (R.) "Systematic Theology;" also an able and valuable work, distinguished for its reverent use of the Scriptures.

40. STORR and FLATT. "An Elementary Course of Biblical Theology."

41. VAN OOSTERZEE (J. J.) "Christian Dogmatics;" comprehensive and evangelical.

42. MARTENSEN (H.) "Christian Dogmatics;" fresh and interesting.

43. REUSS (E.) "History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age."

44. SCHMID (C. F.) "Biblical Theology of the New Testament."

45. WEISS (B.) "Lehrbuch der Biblischen Theologie des Nuen Testaments." Very useful.

46. MESSNER (H.) "Die Lehre der Apostel." Valuable.

47. OEHLER (G. F.) "Theology of the Old Testament."

48. SCHULTZ (H.) "Alttestamentliche Theologie."

49. THOMASIIUS (G.) "Christi Person und Werk."
50. PHILIPPI (F. A.) "Kirchliche Glaubenslehre."
51. SCHLEIERMACHER (F.) "Der Christliche Glaube."
52. EBRARD (J. H. A.) "Christliche Dogmatik." Reformed.
53. HEPPE (H.) "Die Dogmatik der Evangelisch-reformirten Kirche." Reformed.
54. LUTHARDT (C. E.) "Kompendium der Dogmatik." Brief and clear.
55. SCHENKEL (D.) "Die Christliche Dogmatik vom Standpunkte des Gewissens aus dargestellt."
56. BIEDERMANN (A. E.) "Christliche Dogmatik." Skeptical.
57. KAHNIS (K. A.) "Lutherische Dogmatik." Historical and Systematic.
58. HOFMANN (J. C. K.) "Der Schriftbeweis." Original.
59. PERRONE (J.) "Prælectiones Theologicæ." Catholic.
60. HEINRICH (J. B.) "Dogmatische Theologie," Catholic.
61. WINER (G. B.) "A Comparative View of the Doctrines and Confessions of the Various Communities of Christendom."
62. NIEMEYER (H. A.) Collectio Confessionum in Ecclesiis Reformatis publicatarum.
63. HASE (C. A.) Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ.
64. RICHTER (A. L.) Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini.
65. MÖHLER (J. A.) "Symbolism;" that is, of the Doctrines in controversy between Roman Catholics and Protestants.
66. GUERICKE (H. E. F.) "Allgemeine Christliche Symbolik," &c.
67. HOFMANN (R.) "Symbolik," &c.
68. DENZINGER (H.) Encheiridion Symbolorum et Definitionum quæ de Rebus Fidei et Morum a Conciliis Occumenicis et Summis Pontificibus emanarunt.

PART FIRST.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

THE word, God, is now used to denote a supreme Being, or Mind, — a Mind on which all other beings and things are dependent. The Perfection of this Being will be considered in Part Third, where the testimony of Scripture can be adduced with more effect. It is wiser to question Nature as to the existence of a supreme Being than as to the existence of a God who is absolutely perfect; for it is possible that Nature may not reveal to us the infinitely holy and benevolent God of the Bible as clearly as it does a supreme Mind; and it is certainly better to prove less than we might than to attempt proving more than we can.

Before considering the reasons which justify our belief in the existence of a supreme Being, it may be well to mention some of the leading forms of belief which are entertained by men who deny the existence of a personal God. It will not, however, be necessary to refute the arguments which they bring forward in support of their opinions; for this will be virtually done in stating the reasons for theism.¹

(1.) Materialism. To state the doctrine of materialism as its advocates would do at the present time may be difficult; but the following is an attempt: Matter is self-existent and the source of all things. Through the law of "natural selection," or of the "survival of the fittest," molecules that are centres of force, acting and reacting upon one another through the ages of eternity, have built the cosmos. Order, life, sensation, instinct, reason, conscience, devotion, are the products of atoms originally without life, order, or intelligence. Behold creatures infinitely wiser than their Creator!

¹ Hodge (C.) "Sys. Theol." pp. 245-334; Buchanan (J.) "On Atheism;" Laudenbach (F. C.) "Eine liberale Polemik gegen Atheismus;" Dabney (R. L.) "The Sensualistic Philosophy of the Nineteenth Century;" "Boston Lectures," 1870: "Christianity and Skepticism;" Rogers (H.) "The Eclipse of Faith;" "Defence of the Eclipse of Faith;" "Reason and Faith and Essays."

(2.) Pantheism. If this word be interpreted strictly, it means that "the universe is God, and God is the universe." But this general statement has been explained by three distinct theories: (a) That of Materialistic Pantheism, which has been sufficiently described above. (b) That of Idealistic Pantheism, which supposes the all-including Entity to be spiritual. And (c) that of Dualistic Pantheism, which ascribes to the One and All both thought and extension.

With these theories in mind we proceed to consider the reasons which justify our belief in the existence of a supreme Mind, the cause of all other existence. For we believe with Christlieb, that "the idea of God develops itself (along with those of our own personality and the Cosmos) through contact with the outer world of necessity, from the inward predisposition of our mental and moral constitution."

The reasons which may be alleged in support of theism may be set forth in various ways; and the following propositions are given as one of these ways, and one that is suggested by the habits of scientific men at the present time:—

1. It is more reasonable to suppose that there is but one original and self-existent Being or Force, than to suppose that there are more than one.

In support of this statement it may be remarked, (a) that the tendency of scientific speculation is towards unity of source for all things. Many students of Nature believe that source to be matter, including force; others believe it to be spirit, or intelligent force; and others still believe it to be something which possesses the properties of both matter and spirit. Prof. Huxley intimates that "the existing world lay potentially in the cosmic vapor; and that a sufficient intelligence could, from a knowledge of the properties of the molecules of that vapor, have predicted, say the state of the Fauna of Britain in 1869, with as much certainty as one can say what will happen to the vapor of the breath in a cold winter's day." ¹ Mr. Wallace (A. R.) holds that "the whole universe is not merely dependent on, but actually is, the Will of higher intelligences, or one supreme Intelligence." ² And Stuart (B.) says, "The one substance, with two sets of properties,—two sides, the physical and the mental, a double-faced unity,—would appear to comply with all the exigencies of the case, not confounding the persons nor dividing the substance." ³

(b) That the tendency of philosophical and religious thought is also towards unity of source for all things. All pantheistic theories illustrate this tendency, that of Spinoza in particular. Says Romanes (G. J.), "Just as we are by the laws of thought compelled to lodge the attribute of self-existence somewhere, so we are by the same laws precluded from lodging it in more than one substance." ⁴ Even Dr. Hickok, in his "Rational Cosmology," seems on the verge of Pantheism, so completely does he resolve everything into force, and force into the action of God. Still, it would be unjust not to add, that he is positively a theist instead of a pantheist. And Herbert Spencer uses the following language: "We are no more able to form a circumscribed idea of Cause than of Space or Time; and we are consequently obliged to think of the Cause which transcends the limits of our thought, as positive though indefinite. Just in the same manner that, in conceiving any bounded space, there arises the nascent consciousness of space outside the bounds; so, when we think of any definite cause, there arises a nascent consciousness of a cause behind it; and in the one case, as in the other, this nascent consciousness is in substance like that which suggests it, though without form. The momentum of thought inevitably carries us beyond conditioned ex-

¹ Hodge (C.) "Syst. Theol." I. p. 281.

² Wallace (A. R.) "Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection," p. 368.

³ This language ought perhaps to be accredited to Prof. Bain, though it is adopted by Stuart.

⁴ "Christian Prayer and General Laws," p. 113.

istence to unconditioned existence; and this ever persists in us, as the body of a thought to which we can give no shape." ("First Principles," p. 93, cf. JOB, iv. 12 sq).

2. It is more reasonable to suppose that Matter is a product of Mind than to suppose that Mind is a product of Matter.

For (a) mind is known to be a self-acting force, while matter is not. Mind can be said to originate motion, while matter can only receive and transmit it.¹ We admit that mind is not known by consciousness to be, in the strict sense of the word, creative; but it is known to be active: and primary action is a sort of creation,—it is something originated.

(b) It is easier to believe that a higher principle originates a lower one than to believe that a lower principle or power originates a higher one. A free cause may produce what is less than itself; but it is difficult to think that any cause can originate what is greater than itself. A self-acting force may be supposed to put forth only a part of its energy, but not to put forth more energy than it actually possesses.

(c) To suppose matter, the one original and originating power, is to suppose an infinite series of changes in finite and dependent objects; and this is a supposition wholly unsatisfactory to reason. Says Prof. Whewell, "On the hypothesis of an infinite series, we pass from effect to cause, and from that to a higher cause, in search of something on which the mind can rest; but, if we do nothing but repeat this process, there is no use in it. Our question is not answered, but evaded. The mind cannot acquiesce in the destiny thus presented to it, of being referred from event to event along an interminable vista of causation and time: it takes refuge in the assumption of a First Cause, from an employment inconsistent with its own nature." (See Bib. Sac. VI. 613 sq.; VII. 613 sq.)

Moreover, the development hypothesis leads to another difficulty. If we suppose the universe to be uncreated and eternal in substance, and to be passing, by a constant process, however slow, from inanimate nature to animate, and from the lower forms of animal life to the higher, why has it not made greater progress? Or, if further progress is impossible, why was not the present stage reached æons before it was reached? The movement has been in a line, not in a circle; and each stage of it has required but a limited period of time, however long that limited period may have been. Hence, the periods requisite to bring the universe to its present stage of development must have been repeated a countless number of times in the eternity past; and we must have existed æons ago, as well as now.

¹ Ulrich (B.) "Gott und die Natur," S. 506 sq.; Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, "Cause and Effect," p. 694 sq.

3. *It is more reasonable to suppose that the wonderful order of the material universe is due to the action of a Supreme Mind than to suppose it due to the action of forces coöperating together without purpose.*¹

For (a) such order is what might be expected from the action of a supreme mind; since all that is known of mind leads us to think of it as able and likely to produce a cosmos, if it produced a universe at all. Any expansion or proof of this statement would be superfluous; for it is supported by the best of all evidence, that of consciousness; by the clearest of all knowledge, that of one's own mental action in one's most rational moments.

(b) The same cannot be said of matter. For it is not known to think or foresee or plan. It appears to be blind, unconscious, and without freedom, exercising its force with no reference to an order which it cannot appreciate, a beauty which it cannot admire, or a moral excellence which it cannot love. If, therefore, its properties sometimes tend to order, instead of confusion, we spontaneously ask: How came it to have these properties, together with the motion necessary to secure their working toward a desirable end? In other words, so far as it is known to us, matter is not rational, and cannot be supposed to obey the laws of reason, unless it is under the control of an agent distinct from itself.

¹ Ulrici (B.) "Gott und die Natur," S. 505 sq.; Whewell (W.) "Astronomy and General Physics treated in Reference to Natural Theology;" Buckland (W.) "Geology and Mineralogy considered in Reference to Natural Theology;" Prout (W.) "Chemistry, Mineralogy, and the Function of Digestion considered in Reference to Natural Theology;" Babbage (C.) "The Ninth Bridgewater Treatise;" Trendelenburg (A.) "Logische Untersuchungen," Bd. II. "Der Zweck;" Spencer (H.) "First Principles of a New System of Philosophy;" Burr (E. F.) "Ecce Cælum" and "Pater Mundi;" Cooke (J. P.) "Religion and Chemistry;" Liefchild (J. R.) "The Higher Ministry of Nature viewed in the Light of Modern Science."

Hence, it is not surprising that the writers of Genesis, of Job, of the nineteenth Psalm, and of the Epistle to the Romans, attributed the order of the cosmos to a supreme Being. Many pagan philosophers did the same. Says Thomas Aquinas, "We see that some things without knowledge, to wit, natural bodies, work toward an end; for either always or generally, they operate in the same way to secure that which is best. And from this it is evident that they come to that end, not by accident, but by intention. But things without knowledge do not tend towards an end, unless they are directed by some one who has knowledge, as an arrow by the archer. There is, then, some intelligent being by whom all natural objects are arranged with a view to some end; and this being we call God." Trendelenburg remarks, "that, so far as design is realized in the world, thought, as its ground, has preceded it."¹ The same view is defended by Sir William Hamilton, who maintains, that, in the order of nature, final causes precede efficient causes.

But against it an objection has been raised, namely, that there are some things in the cosmos which appear to work evil, rather than good; and these are best accounted for by supposing the universe to be a result of the action or interaction of blind forces.

In reply to this, it may be said, 1, That, on the whole, a maximum of good with a minimum of evil, is secured by the order which prevails in the cosmos. 2. That many things which at first sight appear to result in evil are found, upon further examination, to bring to pass more good than evil.

¹ "Summa," I. 2; "Logische Untersuchungen," II. 28.

3. That the known sinfulness of man is to be taken into account as a modifying circumstance, not only as working evil, but as calling for punishment. And, 4, that, as human intelligence increases, the adaptation of all things in Nature to some good end is likely to be regarded as more and more probable.

4. *It is more reasonable to suppose that the vegetable world is a product of Mind, organizing Matter, than to suppose it a product of Matter organizing itself.*¹

It is admitted by all, that the existence of vegetables was preceded by that of inorganic matter, and that the appearance of the former constituted an era in the history of the world. But how was this new and higher kind of being originated?

If the cosmos was created by a Supreme Intelligence, there is no difficulty in accounting for the introduction of mundane Flora as soon as the world was in a condition to perpetuate the same. But if protoplasm is a result of chemical action; if the phenomena of vegetable structure and growth are due to fortuitous combinations of lifeless molecules, it is surprising that these combinations happened to take place at the very juncture which called for them.

Should one suggest that they may have taken place before, but had perished for want of a suitable habitat, we reply that they appear to have a suitable habitat now, yet there is no evidence of their taking place. In fact, spontaneous generation has never been proved, and the best physicists do not think that it ever will be proved.

Matter, it has been said, is measured by weight; energy by work; and intelligence by adaptation. But neither weight nor work is sufficient to account for the vegetable world:

¹ Roget (P. M.) "Animal and Vegetable Physiology considered in Reference to Natural Theology;" McCosh and Dickie, "Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation;" Beale (I. S.) "Protoplasm; or, Life, Matter, and Mind;" also, "Theories of Life: their Influence on Religious Thought;" Sterling (J. H.) "As Regards Protoplasm in Relation to Prof. Huxley's "Essay on the Physical Basis of Life."

for in it are to be seen evidences of exquisite adaptation. Mind accounts for this adaptation; matter does not.

Three points are worthy of particular attention, namely: (a) The amazing difference between the phenomena of vegetable life and those of chemical action. (b) The fact, admitted by nearly all naturalists, that living organism is never born of that which is lifeless. And (c) that adaptation is manifest, not only in the time when vegetable life was originated, but also in the endlessly diversified forms which it displays.

5. *It is more reasonable to suppose that the animal world is a product of Mind imparting a higher organizing principle to vegetable elements, than to suppose it a product of vegetable forces acting alone.*¹

The transition from vegetable to animal life seems to us less marked than that from inorganic Nature to organic. Yet animal life must be pronounced different in kind from vegetable life. It affords indications of conscious feeling, if not of consecutive thought. In many of the nobler animals, a certain kind of intelligence is manifested; very different, indeed, from that possessed by man, yet worthy of admiration as compared with floral life. Taken as a whole, the Fauna which inhabit this earth have an existence far richer and more varied than that of vegetables,—so much higher, it may be truly said, that we can pronounce the latter to be related to the former as means are related to ends.

The argument for design in Nature can be studied with great advantage in the structure of the numberless varieties of animals that fill the earth. For (a) the particular organs of every animal are adapted to one another; so that from a single bone of an unknown animal its entire construction and habits of life may sometimes be inferred. (b) The whole structure of an animal is adapted to the climate, soil, and products of the region to which it belongs. (c) The means of self-defence, self-preservation, and reproduction are adapted to the place where an animal is expected to live. Thus "the whole vegetable and animal world has been constructed on one comprehensive plan. As there is a relation of one organ of a given plant or animal to all others and to the whole, so the whole race of plants and the whole race of animals are related."¹

¹ Agassiz (L.) "Essay on Classification," &c.; Kirby (W.) "The Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as manifested in the Creation of Animals;" Miller (H.) "Footprints of the Creator;" Durkheim (H.) "Théologie de la Nature;" Beale (L. S.) "Bioplasm: An Introduction to the Study of Physiology and Medicine," p. 207; Ragg (T.) "Creation's Testimony to its God;" Bib. Sac. XXXIII. pp. 448-493 "The Divine Method of Producing Living Species."

With reference to the evidences of design in the animal world, Prof. Agassiz says, "I know those who hold it to be very unscientific to believe that thinking is not something inherent in matter, and that there is an essential difference between inorganic and living and thinking beings. I shall not be prevented by any such pretensions of a false philosophy from expressing my conviction that, as long as it cannot be shown that matter or physical forces do actually reason, I shall consider any manifestation of thought as evidence of the existence of a thinking Being as the author of such thought, and shall look upon an intelligent and intelligible connection between the facts of Nature as direct proof of the existence of a thinking God, as certainly as man exhibits the power of thinking when he recognizes their natural relation."²

*6. It is more reasonable to suppose that man as a rational being is a product of Mind, giving a higher principle of life to animal being, than to suppose him a product of mere vital forces acting without reason.*³

¹ Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," I. p. 222.

² "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States," p. 10.

³ Hill (T.) Bib. Sac. XXXI. pp. 593-614; XXXII. 1-18; 303-319; Wright (G. F.) XXXIII. 657-694, "Objections to Darwinism and the Rejoinders of its Advocates;" Darwin (C.) "On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection," 6th ed.; "The Variation of Plants and Animals under Domestication;" "Descent of Man," 2d ed.; Lyell (C.) "Principles of Geology," 11th ed.; Dana (J. D.) "Manual of Geology," 2d ed.; Agassiz (L.) "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States," Vol. I.; Argyll (Duke of) "The Reign of Law;" "Primeval Man;" Art. in Contemporary Rev. Vol. XXVI. pp. 352-376;

No one can expect to set forth in words the whole difference between reason and instinct ;¹ but this, at least, may be said, that reason is master of principles, of general concepts, and of language,—her most noble servant ; while instinct is a stranger to all these : that reason is reflective, inventive, inquisitive, and ever growing ; while instinct is perceptive, executive, and artistic, in a high degree, but within narrow limits : that reason seeks to explore the universe, and look into eternity in search of causes and motives ; while instinct gives no sign of interest in anything much beyond the range of experience through sensation. Human reason may need the counsel which Raphael is represented as giving to Adam,—

"Solicit not thy thoughts with matters hid;
Leave them to God above; Him serve and fear!
. . . . Heaven is for thee too high
To know what passes there. Be lowly wise;
Think only what concerns thee and thy being;

¹ Chadbourne (I. A.) "Instinct in Animals and Men;" Paine (M.) "The Soul and Instinct;" Bascom (J.) "Instinct," in the "Bib. Sacra" for 1871, p. 654 sq.

Dream not of other worlds, — what creatures there
Live, in what state, condition, or degree;
Contented that thus far hath been revealed
Not of earth only, but of highest heaven;"¹

but instinct is in no danger of rash excursions in pursuit of knowledge without limits. Indeed, the interval which separates man from the lower animals appears to be almost as wide as that which separates the living vegetable from the lifeless stone. Any satisfactory explanation of the appearance of man on earth must include the action of a Supreme Mind as the cause of his rational nature.²

7. It is more reasonable to suppose that man, as a moral being, is a product of a Supreme Mind, itself moral, than to suppose him a product of vital forces that have no moral insight.

For it is to be observed, (a) that man, by his constitution, is a moral being. His power to recognize in action a moral quality is not a result of education, but an original endowment or possession, for it is universal and indestructible. It may be perverted, but it cannot be annihilated; for if it were, man would be no longer man. (b) That the cognition of right or wrong in action is not resolvable into any other function of the mind. This is admitted by the ablest writers on moral science, and is as certain as any other fact of mental analysis. See the various works on Moral Philosophy. (c) That this cognition cannot be accounted for as the effect, or product of any action possible to merely vital forces. The weakest part of Darwin's work on the "Descent of Man," is that in which he attempts to explain the origin of conscience or moral judgment, and it is surprising that any careful student of nature or of mind should be satisfied with it.

¹ "Paradise Lost," VIII. C. 167. sq.

² Said Tyndall (J.) in 1868: "The passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable;" See Bell (C.) "The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments, as evincing Design;" Murphy (J. J.) "Habit and Intelligence in their Connection with the Laws of Matter and Force;" Bain (A.) "Mind and Body;" Mivart (St. G.) "On the Genesis of Species;" Potter (A.) "Nature, Man, and the Bible, witnessing to God and to Religious Truth."

It may be added, 1, that the consciousness of moral obligation involves a belief in a law outside of ourselves to which our conduct ought to be adjusted. 2. That with this consciousness of obligation, and belief in a moral law, is connected an instinctive and profound conviction that there is, back of that law, a "Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness." And, 3, that this Power cannot be regarded as destitute of reason and moral character: it must be a Supreme Mind, to whom all created beings are accountable.

This argument for the existence of God was recognized as conclusive by Immanuel Kant and by Sir Wm. Hamilton. The former relied upon it solely, while the latter associated with it the mental law by which motive is seen to precede action, or final causes to go before efficient causes. In other words, by the normal action of reason and conscience, man is constrained to believe in the existence of God. "Conscience," says Ullman, "in its deepest nature, i.e., considered as an original power in man which can never be entirely destroyed, is not so much productive as receptive; not origina-tive so much as acquiescent; not commanding, but rather acting in obedience to a law higher than itself. This truth is attested by the common consciousness of all men: it finds its expression in the fact that the dictates of conscience have, at all times, been acknowledged to be the voice of a Lawgiver and a Judge who is above man." [Sinlessness of Christ, p. 32.]

8. *It is more reasonable to believe that man, as a religious being, is a product of a Supreme Mind, than to believe him a product of mere vital forces.*¹

As it is impossible to imagine a moral being who is not also rational, since moral judgment is itself an act of the highest intelligence, so, likewise, it is impossible to imagine a religious being who is not at the same time moral, since homage to the Supreme Ruler is the first duty, as well as the greatest privilege, of such a being. In considering the religious nature of man, it is, therefore, proper to bear in mind:—

¹ Gould (S. B.) "Origin and Development of Religious Belief"; Max Müller, "Science of Religion"; Hardwick (C.) "Christ and other Masters"; Leathes, (S.) "The Religion of the Christ," Lec. 1.

(a) That he has a deep feeling of dependence. Schleiermacher regarded this sense of dependence as the distinctively religious element or action of man's nature. This may have been due to his strong leaning to Pantheism; certainly, it was a very imperfect estimate of what belongs to the religious nature of man; yet it contained a part of the truth.

(b) That he has a vague but inextinguishable sense of accountability. This is often conceded by men who reject the authority of God; and a simple assertion of this truth, by one who believes it, has a wonderful power over the consciences of evil men. They feel that there ought to be, and that there must be, a holy Sovereign who will punish sin.

(c) That he has a tendency to worship, and a certain longing for communion with a Supreme Being. This appears in all branches of the human race. The rudest and the most cultivated manifest the same tendency. They feel the need of God, and if they do not worship the true God, they are quite likely to bow down in superstitious fear before a false god. If, like Comte, they deny the Lord that made them, their religious nature is apt to avenge its wrongs by leading them to worship a creature, instead of the Creator.

"With the first development of consciousness," says Mansel (p. 120), "there grows up as part of it the innate feeling that our life, natural and spiritual, is not in our own power to sustain or prolong; that there is One above us on whom we are dependent, whose existence we learn and whose presence we realize by the same instinct of prayer." This sense of dependence, it may be added, is supposed by many German theologians to be the specifically religious element of human nature, and to be in itself an adequate proof of the existence of God.

If, then, we can trust the action of our own souls, there is reason to believe in the existence of God.

9. It is more reasonable to suppose that the Biblical writers were enlightened, as they claim to have been, by a Supreme Mind, than to suppose that they were either deceivers or self-deceived.

Yet these are the only hypotheses conceivable. The first meets all the conditions of the problem, and fairly accounts for the existence of the Scriptures; but neither of the others can be said to do this. For the writings themselves bear witness, in a remarkable manner, to the general good sense and clear rationality of their authors. Considering the period when they were written, the people for whom they were first written, the number and training of the probable writers, and the substance of religious and historical teaching which they contain, they must be considered preëminently reasonable, and it is absurd to look upon their authors as self-deceived. Nor is it less absurd to look upon them as deceivers. If deceivers, they were the worst of men; but these writings could not have been produced by such men.

10. It is more reasonable to suppose that a Supreme Being, the Creator of religious beings, would give them a spiritual constitution that could be satisfied forever with Him as an object of worship, than to suppose that he would give them a spiritual nature that could not be satisfied thus.

Hence, if the nature of man requires perfection in the object of worship, it is reasonable to suppose that the Supreme Being is perfect. It is only by considering this demand of man's religious nature that one can infer the absolute and infinite being of God from the things that he has made. For the created universe cannot be proved to be infinite; nor can a finite effect, considered merely as a product of force, be said to prove the existence of an infinite cause.

But the arguments for the existence of God have generally been brought under the following heads:—

(1) The a priori argument. This is founded upon certain necessary conceptions or beliefs of the mind, and is supposed by some to be demonstrative, though it is not.

(a) Anselm says, that "God, as we believe, is something than which nothing greater can be thought. When the fool hears this he understands it; and whatever is understood is in the intellect. But surely that, than which nothing greater can be thought, cannot be in the intellect alone; for if it is in the intellect alone, it can be thought to be also in reality, which is greater." Subtle, but inconclusive; for by it the idea of a thing is confounded with a belief in its existence.¹

(b) Des Cartes says, "a perfect being is possible; otherwise it belongs to the nature of being to be imperfect, and the perfection of being would consist in its imperfection; which is absurd. But if a perfect being is possible, it is actual; for any being hereafter brought into existence would not be perfect." No more conclusive than the foregoing; for that which is abstractly or conceptually possible, is confounded with that which is practically possible.²

(c) Dr. Samuel Clarke says, that "the ideas of eternity and infinity are necessary to the mind; but eternity and infinity are attributes or modes of existence; hence they must inhere in some being who is eternal and infinite." Unsatisfactory, — because we do not conceive of eternity and infinity as being, necessarily, attributes of a real being.³

(d) Cousin teaches, that "truth, beauty, and goodness are attributes, not substances. But attributes belong to a subject; hence absolute truth, beauty, and goodness, of which we necessarily have a conception, must belong to an Absolute Being."⁴ Inconclusive, — because our minds do not affirm the necessary existence of absolute truth, beauty, and goodness, though the conception of them may be necessary. For "the sphere of thought is far wider (as well as narrower) than the sphere of reality; and no inference is valid from the correctest thinking of an object to its actual existence."

That the à priori argument has been satisfactory to so many able thinkers shows that a belief in the existence of God is congenial to the human mind.

(2) The Cosmological Argument. The substance of this

¹ Anselm, "Proslogion" c. II; Thomas Aquinas, Pars I. Quæstio 2;

² "Bib. Sac." VIII. p. 532; also p. 529.

³ Clarke (S.) "Discourse on the Being and Attributes of God," p. 16; Cudworth (R.) "Intellectual System of the Universe," II. p. 141; Waterland (D.) Works, III. p. 323.

⁴ Cousin "Lectures on The True, The Beautiful, and The Good," p. 359.

may be thus given. Something must be self-existent and eternal, to wit,—either God or the world. But the world, as it is, is evidently mutable and dependent. It must, therefore, be the last link thus far in an infinite series of dependent worlds, which is absurd, since the series would depend on nothing; or it must be dependent on God, which is reasonable. Hence there is a God. This argument is by no means demonstrative; yet some force may be conceded to it, as showing the existence of God to be probable.

(3) The Teleological Argument. It may be thus stated: Indications or evidences of design point back to a designer; an end sought, to a mind seeking it. The world affords inconceivably numerous evidences of design or adaptation, and, therefore, justifies our belief in the existence of a wise author and ruler. This argument is simple, comprehensive, and valid. The marks of order and adaptation which appear on every hand, and fill with delight the most careful observer, cannot be rationally attributed to any other source than a Supreme Mind.

(4) The Anthropological Argument. This embraces three particulars: (a) the sense of dependence; (b) the sense of accountability; and (c) the tendency to worship. This, also, appears to justify a belief in the existence of God, and indeed, as has been shown, of a God absolutely perfect.

(5) The Christological Argument. This rests upon the following pillars: (a) the Bible as an existing phenomenon which must be accounted for; (b) the fulfilment of Prophecy in so many instances; (c) the evidence of well attested miracles; (d) the evidence of the supernatural Person of Christ; and (e) the influence of the Christian religion in the world.¹

¹ Besides the works already referred to, the following may be named as worthy of being consulted. Cudworth (R.) "Intellectual System of the Universe," II. p. 141 sq.; Stillingfleet (E.) "Origines Sacrae," b. III. ch. I.; Dodge (E.) "Evidences of Christianity," Introduction; Nitzsch (C. I.) s. v. "Gott" in Herzog Real-Encyklopädie; Peabody (A. P.) "Christianity the Religion of Nature"; Chadbourne (P. A.) "Natural Theology"; Duke of Argyll, "The Reign of Law," and the "Primeval Man"; Princeton Review, 1870, p. 55 sq. A Review of "The Reign of Law"; and a great number of works on Natural Theology in the English and other languages.

PART SECOND.

THE BIBLE FROM GOD.

Before looking at the various reasons, which go to prove that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament were written by men divinely inspired, and have, therefore, divine authority, it is proper to show that a supernatural revelation of God's will is neither impossible, incredible, nor improbable.¹

(a) It is not impossible: for the Creator of nature and of man must be able, if he please, to act upon the nature which he made, whether it be matter or spirit, and to secure thereby new effects in the same. If there is a personal Creator, it is surely absurd to deny that he can deal in a sovereign way with his creation.

(b) It is not incredible: for if God is able to make a revelation of his will to men, by some means additional to the forces and laws of nature, it is surely possible, from a moral point of view, that he should do this. It would require superhuman knowledge to justify any one in saying, that no circumstances would warrant such a revelation.

And, (c), It is not improbable: for

1. Thoughtful men feel their need of a supernatural revelation. Without it, their spiritual wants seem to be overlooked in comparison with those of the body. They are conscious of needing clearer light than nature affords, especially in view of their sinful state.

2. Most men are predisposed to believe in the reality of revelations from God. And as this predisposition exists in the best as well as in the worst of mankind, it should be regarded as constitutional and therefore indicative of the probability of a supernatural revelation.

¹ Krauss (A. E.), "Die Lehre von der Offenbarung;" Butler (J.), "The Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature," Part Second.

3. All men need such a revelation in order to accomplish the design of their moral and religious nature. For whatever may be said of the knowledge within their reach, they will not avail themselves of it in their actual condition without the addition of supernatural light and grace. If then there is any reason to believe that God is merciful, and not simply just, there is reason to believe that he has made, or will make, a special disclosure of his will.

Assuming, then, that a supernatural revelation of religious truth is not antecedently improbable, it may be remarked that such a revelation may be made, either by a direct communication of the needed truth to every person of our race, or by a communication, properly authenticated, for the use of all. The latter method is believed to have been chosen by the Most High.

But against this method three objections have been raised, —

(a) That it does not treat all men alike. For some have the revelation, and others have it not. If the revelation is needed by any, it is needed by all, and should be given to all alike. But this objection, reduced to its principle, assumes that God is under some kind of obligation to do as much for one sinner as he does for another. And, if this principle is correct, men in all lands, and in all times, should have the same or equivalent privileges. But no one can make it even probable that they do have them.¹

(b) That it does not afford the means of salvation to all. For knowledge of the truth is a means of salvation, and it is plainly incompatible with the goodness of God to make salvation depend on knowledge that is not given to all. But to this it may be replied, — 1, that there would be no wrong done to sinners if they were left to suffer the just penalty for their sins; 2, that grace, or undeserved favor to one, does not originate a claim to it on the part of another; and,

¹ Says Augustine: "Cur non omnes docet Deus? Quia omnes quos docet, misericordiâ docet: quos autem non docet, iudicio non docet," De Predest. Sancto. c. 8; Butler (J.) "Analogy," Part II. ch. 3 and 6.

3, that salvation does not depend absolutely on a knowledge of truth supernaturally revealed,—the light of nature is sufficient, if sinners would use it.

(c) That it necessitates miracles as the only sufficient vouchers for the truth of the revelation. And miracles are antecedently improbable. God cannot be supposed to work them, unless it be for a great moral end, otherwise unattainable. But in answer to this it may be said, — 1, that, for aught we know, the other method would require something of a miraculous nature to certify the truth in question to every separate mind; and, 2, that a supernatural event in the world of sense is entirely congruous with such an event in the world of mind, and therefore not, in the case supposed, improbable.

I. THE NEW TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES ARE WORTHY OF FULL CONFIDENCE AS HISTORICAL RECORDS.

This statement is meant to affirm the general correctness of the New Testament writings, but not the absence of all minor inaccuracies. They are perfectly credible, as compared with the best works of history, though it is not now affirmed that they are wholly free from unintentional errors. Whether the latter be also true, will be considered in the sequel.

The trustworthiness of primary, historical records mainly depends, (a) on the opportunities which the writers had to learn the truth; (b) on their disposition to learn and declare the truth; and (c) on their powers of observation and of memory.

To what extent were these conditions fulfilled in the writers of the New Testament? Had they suitable opportunities to learn the truth? Had they good powers of observation and recollection? Had they a disposition to learn and to make known the truth?

In answer to these questions it can be shown, —

I. That as a historical religion Christianity took its rise with the public ministry of Jesus Christ in Palestine near the end of the third decade of our era.

For, in the first place, there are no traces whatever of the existence of this religion before that date, and in the second place, one hundred years later, it had already spread itself over large provinces of the Roman Empire. And by the testimony of Pliny the Younger,¹ in Pontus A. D. 103, we learn, that some had abandoned Christianity as long as twenty years before, that is, in A. D. 83; while Tacitus² asserts that Christ suffered death in Judea under Pontius Pilate, who was procurator ten years,—from about A. D. 26 to A. D. 36.³ Moreover, all the early Christian writers, who speak of this point, agree in testifying that Christ was crucified at that time.

II. *That the several books of the New Testament were written before the close of the first century.*⁴

Indeed, most of them were written between A. D. 50 and A. D. 80; that is, within fifty years after the death of Christ. For—

(1) The testimony of early Christian writers places the origin of these books in the first century. In this respect they all agree. There is not, within my knowledge, a single passage in any Christian writer of the second, third, or fourth centuries after Christ, which puts the date of any book of the New Testament after the year of our Lord 100. This is strong evidence.

(2) Christian writers of the second century quote from a

¹ Epist. X. 97, cf. X. 98.

² Annals XV. 44, cf. Sueton. Vit. Neron. § 16, and Vit. Claud. § 25; also Juven. Sat. I. 155, 157, and Euseb. H. E. IV. 9.

³ “Ergo abolendo rumori Nero subdidit reos, quæsitissimis pœnis, adfecit, quos, per flagitia invisos, vulgus Christianos adpellabat. Auctor nominis ejus Christus, Tiberio imperitante, per Procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio adfectus erat; repressaque in præsens exitiabilis superstitio rursus erumpebat, non modo per Judæam, originem ejus mali, sed per urbem etiam, quo cuncta undique atrocia aut pudenda confluunt celebranturque.”

⁴ Lardner (N.) “Credibility of the Gospel History”; Norton (A.) “On the Genuineness of the Four Gospels”; Tischendorf (C.) “When were our Four Gospels Written?”; Tregelles (S. P.) “Canon Muritorianus,” etc.; Westcott (B. F.) “History of the Canon of the New Test.”; “Introduction to the Study of the Four Gospels”; Gaussen (L.) “The Canon of the Scriptures”; Olshausen (F.) “Die Echtheit der vier Canon. Evangelien”; Sanday (W.) “The Gospels in the second Century”; Horne (T. H.) “Introduction to the Critical study of the Scriptures,” last edition; Rawlinson (G.) “Historical Evidences,” Lects. VI., VII., VIII.

large part of these books as authoritative. This, they would be unlikely to do, if the books were written in their own time; and this, they do not do, in the case of books which are known to have been produced in the second century.¹

(3) These writers of the second century show in their style the formative influence of the New Testament. The influence of the Septuagint alone is hardly sufficient to account for their style, though it must be borne in mind when weighing the present argument.

(4) The early adversaries of Christianity, heretical and heathen, appealed to the New Testament writings as authoritative. The investigations of the last twenty years have added much to the value of this kind of evidence, and it cannot now be overlooked by those who seem most ready to reject the New Testament.

(5) They purport to have been written before the close of the first century. Their writers speak, as eye-witnesses, of the ministry of Christ, or as those who were personally acquainted with such witnesses. The only portions which may be esteemed totally silent as to their date, are the Second and Third Epistles of John; and these must have been written by the beloved disciple, or by one who purposely and skilfully copied his style. They do therefore, also, in a certain sense, claim to have been written before A.D. 100.

(6) The style of the New Testament Scriptures indicates their origin in the first century of our era. Christianity made its appearance in Judea during the fourth decade of that century. It came with new and mighty power, breathing fresh life into the people. And the New Testament writings must have been originated in just such a creative epoch. There is an air of freshness, freedom, and reality about their language, which forbids us to think of them as the fruit of critical research.

¹ See the writers named in the preceding note, and the following :—

Gieseler (J. C. L.) "Historisch, kritische Versuch über die Entstehung, . . . der schriftlichen Evangelien"; Thiersch (M. J.) "Versuch zur Herstellung des historischen Standpunktes"; Bleek (F.) "Einleitung in das N. T."; Guericke (H. E. F.) "Gesamtgeschichte des N. T."; Reuss (E.) "Histoire du Canon des Saintes Ecritures dans l'Eglise Chretienne"; Hug (J. L.) "Introduction to the N. T."; Credner (K. A.) "Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Canon."

(7) The references to persons and events of that age prove them to have been written in the first century. These references are singularly numerous, natural, incautious, and yet accurate. No writer of the second century could have made them, except by inspiration; and no inspired man would have made his writings appear to be of an earlier date than they were.

These reasons are believed to be perfectly conclusive.

There is abundant evidence in the New Testament itself, that its writers were familiar with Palestine in the time of Christ. This evidence will be confirmed by all that is to be given in support of the next statement.

III. That the books of the New Testament were written either by apostles of Christ, or by associates of apostles.

For:—(1) The early Christian writers affirm this. Their testimony is positive and unanimous as to the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, thirteen Epistles of Paul, one of Peter, and one of John, comprising eight-ninths of the New Testament; and, in the main, though with some hesitation on the part of certain writers, they bear witness to the same fact respecting the other books of the New Testament.

We cannot exhibit the evidence in detail, but must refer to works on the canon of the New Testament, and introductions to its various books. See the writers cited above.

(2) Many of the New Testament Scriptures claim, either directly or indirectly, to have been written by apostles or their associates. This is true of the third and fourth Gospels, of the Acts, of thirteen Epistles of Paul; of the Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude; and of the Apocalypse; while the First Epistle of John purports to have been written by one who had been an eye-witness of our Saviour's ministry, and who could speak with apostolic authority. Such evidence is not to be rejected without careful scrutiny. Nothing short of statements in the writings which could not have been made by the pretended authors, or statements of those who first received the writings, is sufficient to nullify this testimony. But such statements do not exist.

(3) The contents and style of the New Testament books prove that they were written by apostles or their associates. In support of this statement we appeal (a) to the simplicity, vividness, particularity, and objectiveness of the narrative parts; for these qualities point to writers who were under the extraordinary personal influence of Christ. (b) To the freshness and power of thought which characterize these writings, — qualities which may be accounted for by their writers' acquaintance with Christ, and in no other way so well, if at all. (c) To the silence of history in respect to any other men able to produce them. The authors of these books could hardly have passed away, without leaving other traces of their influence. For they were many, — not one, — and remarkable, not common men; and they wrote with comparative independence of one another.

It is simply absurd to suppose the New Testament Scriptures written by certain unknown men outside of the apostolic circle, — by persons in the first or second century, who have left no other traces of their existence. These writers, if not apostles, must have been peers of the apostles in influence. Where did they live and labor that their names were never known to the ages that followed? The four great letters ascribed to Paul must, as even Baur admits, have been written by him.¹ But if these were written by Paul, the other nine must have been also. No man who could have produced them can be supposed capable of ascribing them falsely to the apostles; nor, indeed, can any one else be reasonably supposed to have come so near the apostle in thought and style.

Of modern opponents ² to this view of the authorship of the New Testament, two persons may be named as most

¹ Compare Farrar (F. W.) "The Witness of History to Christ," p. 76.

² Of their writings, the following may be mentioned: Riggenbach (C. J.) "Zeugnisse für das Evangelium Johannis"; Hilgenfeld (A.) "Der Kanon und die Kritik des N. T."; Davidson (S.) "Introduction to the New Test." last conspicuous, viz.: D. F. Strauss and F. C. Baur. The former attempted to resolve the gospel narratives into popular "myths" or legends; and the latter, to find their origin in the "spirit of the age." Both were pantheists, denying the possibility of miracles. And both have been answered by such scholars as Neander, Ullmann, Ebrard, Schaff, Meyer, Godet, Fisher, Pressensé, Luthardt,¹ and others, too numerous to mention.

After the severest scrutiny, the evidence will be found ample and conclusive as to nearly all the New Testament writings; and were those of a slightly doubtful origin set aside, the theological system would itself remain unchanged. But there is no adequate reason for believing that any book of the New Testament is unworthy of its place in the canon.

IV. *That these writers were manifestly competent, upright, and, therefore, trustworthy.*²

(a) They were competent. For (1) They were men of good judgment. They do not write like enthusiasts or fanatics, but like men of sound sense and practical aim. (2) They were men of more than average intelligence. This is evident from their writings, which are greatly superior in freshness, force of thought, and perspicuity of style, to any similar productions of that age. (3) The facts which they relate are, for the most part, such as could be fairly attested by the edition; De Wette (W. M. L.) "An Historical Critical Introduction to the Canonical Books of the N. T." in many respects valuable, translated by F. Frothingham.

¹ Neander (A.) "Life of Christ," and "Planting and Training of the Ap. Church"; Ullmann (C.) "Historisch oder Mythisch?" Ebrard (J. H. A.) "Kritik der Evangelischen Geschichte"; Fisher (G. P.) "Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity"; Luthardt (C. E.) "Authorship of the Fourth Gospel"; Sears (E. H.) "The Fourth Gospel, the Heart of Christ"; Sanday (W.) "The Fourth Gospel: Was John its Author?" Alexander (W. L.) "Christ and Christianity."

² Greenleaf (S.) "Harmony of the Gospels; Introductory Essay"; West (G.) "On the Resurrection of Christ"; Macpherson (R.) "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ," etc.; Lyttleton (L.) "On the Conversion of the Apostle Paul"; Paley (W.) "Horæ Paulinæ"; Smith (J.) "The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul," etc.; Paley (W.) "A View of the Evidences of Christianity;" See also Blunt (J. J.) "Undesigned Coincidences in the writings of both the Old and New Testaments"; Birks (T. R.) "Horæ Evangelicæ"; "Horæ Apostolicæ."

senses. They could be seen or heard, or verified by taste or smell. Scientific training, or philosophical, was not needed to qualify men to bear witness to such events as are related by the evangelists.

(b) They were upright. This may be inferred 1, From the tone of sincerity and earnestness which pervades all their writings. 2, From the spirituality of the religious doctrines which are inculcated. 3, From the character of the motives which are appealed to. 4, From the purity and perfection of the moral principles which are taught. 5, From the style of narrative which is employed,—a style which is distinguished, (a) For simplicity: It seems to be a completely natural, unadorned expression of what was believed to be true. If the composition of the Gospels is a work of art, it is art so perfect as to seem like nature. (b) For positiveness: The writers keep to the facts like men under oath, making almost no inferences or conjectures. This is strikingly manifest in the first three Gospels and in the Acts of the Apostles. (c) For frankness: Nothing seems to be kept back because it was of doubtful wisdom. The hard sayings of Christ, the apparent contradictions of his language, the sins and errors of his disciples,—all appear in the record without preface or apology.¹ (d) For minuteness: The narratives are particular, circumstantial, life-like, giving names of persons, places, diseases, and the like, as would be natural in the account of an eye-witness. (e) For objectiveness: The writers go through their work as if they had taken no part in it, and had nothing at stake in the matter. One could scarcely infer from their language that they had forsaken all for Christ, and were ready to lay down their lives for his sake. They never eulogize his character, and rarely his teaching. They scarcely allude to many questions which awaken the utmost curiosity in men addicted to religious speculation. "In its grand, childlike, and holy simplicity, the narrative passes by such questions of the intellect, just as a child moves among the riddles of nature and of life, as if they existed not." 6, From the perfection of Christ's character, — a character which must have been real. For so unique and perfect, so truly human and yet manifestly divine is this character, that we cannot suppose it to be an ideal creation. The four distinct records are diverse, yet harmonious. So marked are the differences, even in relating the same events, that some have rashly inferred contradiction; yet so deep and pervading is the harmony, that others have inferred transcription. It is impossible to suppose the life and character of Christ an ideal originated by one of the Evangelists, since this view would not account for the freedom and diversity in the narratives; and it is equally impossible to suppose the ideal originated by more than one of them, since the unity of impression would not be accounted for. But if there was such a person as Jesus Christ, whose history the Gospels contain, we have no difficulty whatever in accounting for the wonderful harmony in diversity which they exhibit; since we have, as it were, four portraits of the same original, though taken by different artists and from different points of view. All this will be yet more evident, if our four canonical Gospels be compared with the Apocryphal Gospels, referred to above.¹

¹ Compare Farrar (F. W.) "The Witness of History to Christ," p. 76; a striking passage.

7, From the lack of motive to write as they did, if they were dishonest. Well may Dryden ask concerning the sacred writers, and especially those of the New Testament,

"How, or why,
Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?
Unasked their pains, ungrateful their advice,
Starving their gains, and martyrdom their price."

There are many good remarks on this topic in Lord Lyttleton's treatise on "The Conversion of St. Paul." If the writers of the New Testament bore false witness in respect to the life and teachings of Christ, they did it with no prospect of personal gain in this life, or in that which is to come.

¹ Da Costa (I.) "The Four Witnesses"; Westcott (B. F.) "Introduction to the Study of the Four Gospels"; Neander (A.) "Life of Christ"; Ellicott (C. J.) "Life of Christ"; Andrews (S. J.) "The Life of our Lord upon the Earth"; Young (J.) "The Christ of History"; Lange (J. P.) "Life of Jesus"; Farrar (F. W.) "Life of Christ"; Seeley (J. R.) "Ecce Homo"; Parker (J.) "Ecce Deus"; Alexander (W. L.) "Christ and Christianity"; Keim (T.) "The History of Jesus of Nazara."

(c) They were trustworthy. This follows from their competency and uprightness. As competent, they were able to utter the truth; as upright, they were sure to do it.

But we cannot, it is said, determine the character of witnesses, without subjecting them to cross-examination. Says Greenleaf on Evidence, i. 138, "It is found indispensable, as a test of truth, and to the proper administration of justice, that every living witness should, if possible, be subjected to the ordeal of a cross-examination, that it may appear what were his powers of perception; his opportunities for observation; his attentiveness in observing; the strength of his recollection; and his disposition to speak the truth."

This is doubtless a correct statement, in respect to living witnesses. But the comment of J. H. Newman is also correct: "It has been said, that no testimony can fairly be trusted, which has not passed the ordeal of a legal examination. Yet, calculated as that mode of examination undoubtedly is, to elicit truth, surely truth may be elicited by other ways also. Independent and circumstantial writers may confirm a fact as satisfactorily as witnesses in court. They may be questioned and cross-questioned, and, moreover, brought up for re-examination in any succeeding age."¹

Our examination of the New Testament records has been of this nature; and the result is plain, — a conviction of their historical trustworthiness. They are entitled to full credence, when stating clearly matters of fact; and a discovery now and then of minor, unintentional errors would not invalidate this conclusion. The result now reached may appear small, and the process of reaching it slow; but it is all-important for the investigation which is to follow.

II. THESE WRITINGS PROVE THAT JESUS CHRIST WAS AN INFALLIBLE TEACHER.

By an "infallible teacher" is meant one who teaches truth without any mixture of error; or one whose instruction, in whatever form it may be given, will prove, if rightly apprehended, to be wholly correct. Such a teacher need not be strictly omniscient; but if he is not omniscient, he must clearly perceive the limits of his knowledge, and confine his teaching within those limits. The teaching of prophets and apostles could only be infallible by restricting it to what the Holy Spirit moved them to say.

¹ "Essays on Miracles," p. 74.

A teacher from God may be presumed to know the work entrusted to him. If he defines his work, it will be safe to make his definition the basis of study in attempting to ascertain the nature of that work. And it would plainly be unsafe to ascribe to him any attribute or authority which he disclaims. Our discussion of the point now in question may, therefore, begin with a survey of the claims put forth by Jesus Christ as a Teacher. Taking his own words for our guide, What did he know, and how did he teach?

1 What did he claim to know?

(a) He claimed to know heavenly things directly. — John viii. 38; iii. 11–13.

(b) He claimed to know the Father fully and exclusively. — Matt. xi. 27; John vii. 28–29; viii. 55; vi. 46; x. 15; xvii. 25–26.

(c) He claimed to be one with the Father. — John x. 30–38; xvii. 10–22. And, by claiming this unity, he virtually declared his teaching divine.

(d) He claimed that his words were his Father's words. — John vii. 16; viii. 28; xii. 49; xiv. 10–24; xvii. 8.

(e) He claimed that his words were immutably true. — Mark xiii. 31; John xiv. 6.

This, in brief, was the claim of Christ; and it amounts to a claim of infallibility, or entire correctness in his teaching. Did his manner correspond with this verbal claim?

2. How did he teach?

(a) He spoke almost always in the first person singular, with language of great authority. There are but two or three exceptions to the former part of this statement on record.

(b) He spoke as if he were the final and perfect Teacher. — Matt. v. 17 sq.; xix. 8, 9.

(c) He represented salvation as depending on the treatment of his words. — Mark viii. 38; Luke ix. 26; John xii. 47; xiv. 23; xv. 7.

(d) He always spoke as one perfectly master of his theme and of the occasion, — never confessing that he was mistaken on any point, and never seeming to work his way up from a lower to a higher view. He always looked down upon his subject.¹

This, in brief, was the manner of Christ; and, on any fair interpretation of it, it was in perfect harmony with his claim to infallibility. It may, therefore, be said that his whole spirit and bearing as a teacher support, in a measure, his definite claim. Or, if any one prefer another form of statement, the two were in such perfect accord as to constitute a double claim to infallibility. They make it almost certain that his sense of perfect knowledge as to all that he taught was constant, natural, and controlling.

And the following circumstances justify our assent to the correctness of this claim.

I. His immediate disciples were convinced of its rightfulness. They were intimately associated with him for a period of nearly three years. They did not always understand his words, nor were they always satisfied with his course of action. Some of them appear to have been critical and unsympathetic. Yet, (1) They ascribe to him perfect knowledge. — Matt. ix. 4: "And Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said," etc., (cf. Mark ii. 8; John ii. 24, 25; Acts i. 24; Rev. ii. 23; John xvi. 30; xxi. 17; vi. 64; xviii. 4). (2) They declare him to be full of truth, and the source of truth. — John i. 14: "And dwelt among us full of grace and truth," (cf. i. 16). (3) They preach his doctrine as pre-eminently the truth. — 2 Cor. iv. 2 sq.: "By manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God," (cf.

¹ See Parker (J.) "The Paraclete," p. 63 sq., for a similar thought.

Gal. ii. 5; Eph. iv. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 15). And certainly the fact that Jesus Christ convinced his most intimate friends of the rightfulness of his claims is some confirmation of them. Yet they might be mistaken; and their belief is not therefore of itself decisive.

II. *His moral character appears to have been perfect.*¹ In support of this statement we appeal:—

(a) To his estimate of himself, (1) As meek and lowly in heart.—Matt. xi. 29; (cf. xxvi. 42; John v. 30; vi. 38; iv. 34; vii. 18). (2) As doing always his Father's will.—John viii. 29–46; xv. 10.

(b) To his disciples' estimate of him.—1 Pet. ii. 22; "Who did no sin."—Ro. xv. 3; Phil. ii. 8; 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. iv. 15; vii. 26; 1 John ii. 29; iii. 7; Acts. iii. 14; vii. 52; xxii. 14; 1 Cor. i. 2; John v. 23; and the like. And his disciples were not likely to mistake the character of Christ in this respect. Had he been proud or unsubmitive, he would have betrayed this spirit to his followers; they would have felt its presence, and would not have been able to think of him as without sin.

(c) To the total impression made by the record of his life. The value of this as evidence cannot easily be over-rated. It does not depend on minute points of criticism which only a scholar can understand. It depends upon the broader features and general tone of the narratives, and can be appreciated by every upright mind. The eye of an unlearned but thoughtful reader is almost sure to take in the great features of the picture, and judge them correctly.²

Reference may also be made, at this point, to the impression which his bearing made upon Judas, Pilate, and the wife of Pilate, all of whom appear to have been assured of the moral integrity of Jesus.—Matt. xxvii. 4; 24, 19.

¹ Ullmann (C.) "The Sinlessness of Jesus an Evidence for Christianity" Bushnell (H.) "The Character of Jesus forbidding his possible classification with Men"; Schaff (P.) "The Person of Christ"; Dörner (J. A.) "The Sinless Perfection of Christ" in Am. Presby. and Theol. Rev. for 1863; Seeley (J. R.) "Ecce Homo"; Parker (J.) "Ecce Deus"; Hovey (A.) "Madison Avenue Lectures," p. 12 sq.; Row (C. A.) "The Jesus of the Evangelists."

² Leathes (S.) "Witness of the Old Test. to Christ," pp. 172–173.

It may also be remarked that the evangelists do not appear to have chosen their materials with any special view to proving the moral perfection of Christ.—See Matt. xix. 17; viii. 28–34; Mark xi. 12–14; Luke xxiv. 28.

III. *His doctrines agree with his claim to infallibility.*¹

(1) In their simplicity. A child can understand them. What he says of God's care and love, of man's duty and happiness, is perfectly direct and intelligible. To love God with all the heart; to forsake all for Christ; to be watchful, prayerful, obedient, humble; to love one's neighbor as one's self, even if that neighbor be a stranger or a foe; to be loyal subjects, faithful husbands, bountiful givers; in a word, to be like Christ himself in love to God and man,—all this is set forth in the clearest speech imaginable. The chief thought, the essential doctrine, is placed before the mind in its naked verity and beauty.

(2) In their self-consistency. This is no less remarkable. Every man knows how hard it is to state one truth of a system correctly, without putting it in connection with several others. The human mind is not many-sided and comprehensive enough to hold all the relations, and see all the phases, of a truth at once, so that a wrong statement of it would be next to impossible. But the mind of Christ did this. His various teachings are in deepest harmony with one another. His views of God and of man, of piety and of morality, of life here and judgment hereafter, are always self-consistent.

(3) In their moral purity. This is absolute. A higher standard cannot even be conceived. There is no real virtue which they do not inculcate in its best form, and no vice which they do not condemn in its earliest germ. Says Dr. Peabody, of the ethical teaching of Jesus, "Who can add to it? Who can take from it? What imaginable case of obligation does it not meet? In what imaginable case is departure from it safe? We can conceive of no other principles than those which it embodies."

¹ Erskine (R.) "Internal Evidence of the Truth of Christianity"; Jenyns (S.) "On the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion"; Harris (S.) "The Demands of Infidelity satisfied by Christianity," Bib. Sac. XIII. pp. 272–314; Peabody (A. P.) "Immutable Morality," Address at Brown University; Bayne (P.) "The Testimony of Christ to Christianity."

(4) In their comprehensiveness. This is wonderful. The precepts of Christ are principles. They apply to innumerable instances. They expand as we study them. Sometimes one of them is seen to comprise all duty. Such, for example, is the golden rule, properly understood; and the same may be said of the first commandment of the law.

(5) In their practicalness. They were uttered for the purpose of leading men to God and duty; not as theoretical views interesting to the philosopher and student, but as precepts of life, for the good of the suffering and the guilty. Jesus was not a philosopher, but a Saviour; and all the principles which he taught had a direct bearing upon the salvation of men.

(6) In their good influence. This was marked even during his life; but it has increased with the lapse of years, and is now probably greater than ever before. A large part of the intelligence and virtue, not to say piety, which now blesses mankind, is due to the religion of Christ; and no small part of the power of his religion for good may be traced to the doctrines which he taught. In a sense, all of it may be traced to them.

IV. Many predictions made by him have been fulfilled. Not every one who utters a true prophecy is infallible in all his speech: but a knowledge of future events, concealed from human view, is good evidence that God is with him who possesses it; and a permanent possession of such knowledge is evidence of the permanent presence of God with the possessor.

Now (1) Christ predicted his own death.—Matt. xii. 40: "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the fish, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (cf. xvi. 21–23; xvii. 22, 23; xx. 17–19, 22, 23; xxvi. 1, 2; Mark x. 38, 39; Luke ix. 44; xii. 50; xiii. 33; xvii. 22, 25; John ii. 19–22; xii. 7, 23, 32–34).

(2) He predicted his disciples' conduct. — Mark xiv. 18–21: “One of you that eateth with me will betray me,” sq. (cf. John xiii. 11, 18–26; Matt. xxvi. 31–34; Mark xiv. 72.)

(3) He predicted other events affecting them. — John xxi. 18: “But when thou art old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and shall carry thee whither thou wouldst not” (cf. Matt. xx. 23; Mark xiv. 13–16; Matt. x. 17–22; John xv. 20).

(4) He also foretold the destruction of Jerusalem. — Matt. xxiv. 2: “Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down” (cf. xxiv. 4, 5, 23–26; Mark xiii. 14; Luke xxi. 12, 16, 20, sq.).

Now, in view of all the circumstances, the exact fulfilment of these predictions is a good reason for believing that all his teaching was true.

To this it is objected by some, that one of his predictions has failed; for he foretold his own return to earth before the generation then living had passed away. — Matt. xxiv. 34. In reply to this objection, it may be remarked, (1) That the word γενεά may possibly be equivalent to γένος, and signify a particular race or kind of men. This is maintained by Dörner, Storr, Auberlen, Alford, and others.¹ (2) That the reference is not to a visible return of Christ, but to the destruction of Jerusalem, — a type of the final overthrow of the wicked. — Bengel, Robinson, and others.

V. GREAT MIRACLES WERE WROUGHT BY HIM. Miracles are changes in nature, which must be ascribed to supernatural agency; or events in the world of sense, which, according to sound principles of reason, should be ascribed to extraordinary action on the part of God.²

¹ Grimm (C. L. W.) “Lexicon Græco Latinum in Libros N. T.” s. v. γενεά 2. “b. translate; genus hominum ingenii, studiis, moribus sibi simillimorum, et quidem malo sensu perversum genus; Matt. xvii. 17; Mark ix. 19; Luke ix. 41; xvi. 8.” See Bib. Sac. VII. pp. 452–478; IX. pp. 329–354, 449–467; Dörner (J. A.) “De Oratione Christi eschatologica, Matt. xxiv. 1–36, asseverata”; Robinson (E.) “The Coming of Christ as announced in Matt. xxiv. 29–31.” Bib. Sac. 1834.

² Hume (D.) “Of Miracles,” vol. II. of “Essays”; Powell (B.) “On the Study of the Evidences of Christianity,” in “Essays and Reviews”; Farmer (H.) “On

A supernatural revelation is, therefore, a miraculous revelation. But the revelation, if made to one person for the benefit of others, needs attestation or ratification; and this ratification must be (1) something addressed to other men, and (2) something which must in reason be referred to the source of the revelation. Healing the paralytic, in proof of authority to forgive his sins, is a case in point.

The miracles of Christ served a double purpose, (1) to reveal his character and spirit, in which light they are part of his teaching; and (2) to attest the truth of his claims, in which light they are equivalent to the seal or signature of God, indorsing his authority. — Ex. iv. 1-9; 2 Kings i. 10; Matt. xi. 3-5; Mark ii. 10, 11; John ii. 23; iii. 2; v. 36, 37; ix. 16, 30-33; x. 25, 38; xi. 4, 40, 42; xii. 30; xiv. 10, 11; xx. 30, 31; Acts ii. 22; x. 37-43; Heb. ii. 3, 4. In the former respect, as well as in the latter, they were superhuman, divine, and so confirmatory of his teaching. Thus, doctrine confirms miracle, and miracle, doctrine. Indeed, doctrine, miracle, life, resurrection, and the effect of all on the world, support one another.¹

But against the occurrence of miracles many objections have been pressed, of which the following deserve particular attention:—

Miracles"; Campbell (G.) "Treatise on Miracles"; Douglass (J.) "A Letter on the Criterion of Miracles"; Wardlaw (R.) "On Miracles"; Mozley (J. B.) "On Miracles"; Cumming (J.) "On our Lord's Miracles"; Warrington (G.) "Can we believe in Miracles?" Hovey (A.) "The Miracles of Christ"; Westcott (B. F.) "Characteristics of the Gospel Miracles"; Bushnell (H.) "Nature and the Supernatural"; McCosh (J.) "The Supernatural in the Natural"; Mansel (H. L.) "On Miracles as Evidences of Christianity," in "Aids to Faith"; Heurtley (C. A.) "Miracles," in "Replies to Essays and Reviews"; Skinner (T. H.) "Miracles the Proof of Christianity" in Am. Presb. and Theol. Rev. for 1863, p. 177 sq.

¹ Steinmeyer (F. L.) "Die Wunderthaten des Herrn"; Westcott (B. F.) "Characteristics of the Gospel Miracles"; Trench (R. C.) "On Miracles"; Fisher (G. P.) "On the Christian Miracles" in "Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity"; Fitzgerald (W.) "Miracles" in "Smith's Dict. of the Bible," Am. ed.; Seelye (J. H.) "Miracles," in "Boston Lectures, Christianity and Skepticism"; Müller (J.) "Disputatio de Miraculorum Jesu Christi natura," etc.; Köstlin (J.) "De Miraculorum quæ Jesus et primi ejus discipuli fecerunt natura et ratione."

1. Human testimony for miracles is nullified by man's predisposition to believe in them. Says Lecky: "It is, however, the fundamental error of most writers on miracles, that they confine their attention to two points,—the possibility of the fact, and the nature of the evidence. There is a third element, which, in these questions, is of practical importance,—the predisposition of men in certain stages of society towards the miraculous, which is so strong, that miraculous stories are invariably circulated and credited, and which makes an amount of evidence that would be quite sufficient to establish a natural fact altogether inadequate to establish a supernatural one." The same thought is emphasized by David Hume in his famous attack upon the evidence for miracles, though with special reference to miracles which are said to have been wrought for religious ends.

But the tendency of mankind referred to has a double bearing. For it is not limited to men "in certain stages of society," but is almost universal. Indeed, the frequency with which persons who reject the testimony for the miracles of Christ accept the evidence which is offered for spiritual manifestations, and the like, has shown that skepticism and credulity often dwell together in the same mind. And the predisposition insisted upon by Hume and Lecky is, in reality, both an argument for caution in accepting the claim of any event to a supernatural character, and a reason for believing that miracles are included in God's plan of governing the human race.

For, speaking generally, the spurious presupposes the genuine; the counterfeit imitates the true. If God has inclined us, by a secret and well-nigh ineradicable tendency of our religious nature, to almost expect miracles in certain emergencies of human history, the ready assent given by multitudes to pretended miracles is at once explained; for nothing is more characteristic of man, in his present condition, than the habit of following blindly a constitutional bias of his nature. Yet nothing is more certain than the fact that every normal bias points first in the direction of truth, and, if followed wisely and cautiously, will lead to truth.¹

2. The observed uniformity of nature is incompatible with the occurrence of miracles at any time. This may be called the objection of the present day to miracles. It was the chief pillar on which Hume's argument against the credibility of miracles rested. For he said, — (a) That our belief in the laws of nature rests on a "uniform, firm, unalterable experience." (b) That our belief in human testimony rests on a "variable experience." (c) That a miracle is an event "contrary to uniform experience, when the circumstances are the same." "That a dead man should come to life is a miracle, because that has never been observed in any age or country." (d) That the best human testimony in favor of miracles can only justify doubt. (e) That such testimony may be imagined as would justify examination and, perhaps, belief, if the miracle alleged had no connection with religion. But if it had such connection, no human testimony would deserve the least attention.

But this argument is unsound, (1) Because it ignores the moral government of God. (2) Because it confounds experience and testimony. (3) Because it fails to discriminate between different kinds of testimony. (4) Because it begs the question by the definition which it gives to the word "miracle." (5) Because it discriminates against miracles connected with religion, and so against religion itself.

It may be observed that Hume not only begs the question by defining a miracle, an event "that has never been observed in any age or country," but also renders a second miracle impossible; for a second event of the kind could not, by this definition, be a miracle, — that is, an event "that has never been observed in any age or country."

¹ See Butler (J.) "Analogy," Part II. ch. 7. "It is objected further, that, however it has happened, the fact is, that mankind have, in different ages, been strangely deluded with pretences to miracles and wonders. But it is by no means to be admitted, that they have been oftener, or are at all more liable to be deceived by these than by other pretences."

It may be remarked also, (a) that one of the chief ends for which miracles are said to have been wrought forbids their indefinite multiplication. Customary events are not the fittest credentials for an extraordinary messenger. (b) That the fact that few events are miraculous no more proves that none are miraculous than the fact that few mountains are volcanoes proves that none are volcanoes. (c) That man himself, within certain narrow limits, is free, having power to act upon the forces and sequences of material nature, — to disturb them, to resist them; to combine them, to guide them, to re-enforce them, — how much more, then, may God, the Infinite Mind, control, supplement, overpower, or supersede the forces of nature, to accomplish a high moral purpose! The introduction of new races proves that he does this.

3. The true view of God's perfection is inconsistent with the occurrence of miracles at any time. For, if God interposes to disturb the laws of nature, he repudiates his own work. A miracle, therefore, supposes imperfection in the work of God.

In reply to this, it may be remarked, —

(a) It is by no means self-evident that a world, independent of God, complete in itself, and needing no care or help in any emergency, would be a better world than one dependent on him, and needing his care and help. The oak is not necessarily better than the vine.¹ The greatest independence of the creature conceivable might not be the best thing for the universe, embracing both Creator and creatures. And, if a universe comprehends in itself created beings who are moral, and are to be trained by moral influences, it cannot be shown that a need of divine interposition, making natural forces bend to the exigencies of moral order, would be an imperfection.

¹ Butler (J.) "Analogy," Part II. ch. 3. "Just as if," says John Foster, "the order of nature had been constituted by some other and greater Being, and intrusted to the Almighty to be administered, under an obligation never to suspend, for a moment, the fixed laws." — "Christian Morals," p. 216.

(b) The Christian doctrine of miracles assigns them a place in the eternal plan of God. He is supposed to introduce them whenever, and only when, the highest order and good of the universe require them. "They are consequents palpable to the eye, but whose antecedents belong to the infinite laws of order which you cannot measure, since they are out of sight. The same consequents were never given before, because the same antecedents were never given."¹ Hence, moral law or reason, instead of mere physical force, bears rule in all worlds. "Lex est perpetua voluntas Dei," observes Zwingle. Once admit the existence of a personal Creator, all-wise and most-merciful, and this appears to be the only natural view of his relation to the universe.

(c) Miracles do not violate the essential order of nature, — the law of cause and effect. They only suppose that an invisible power, for an important end, sometimes directs, assists, or overcomes the forces of nature. The action of the human will does this on a small scale; and there can be no absurdity in supposing that the action of the divine will may do the same on a larger scale, for a sufficient reason. No force of nature is dishonored by being overcome by a greater force; and no one can doubt that moral order is a higher good than physical order.²

4. The view that God is a blind force immanent in nature renders the idea of miracles absurd. This statement is unanswerable. If there is no personal God, miracles are incredible. If nature is all, then the forces of nature will always have their way. Hence, Baur and Strauss, resting on their denial of any God but nature, were consistent in denying the possibility of miracles. Pantheism is per se a rejection of the Christian religion; but Pantheism is false, and inferences from it are worthless.

It should be recollected that the objections against miracles, if valid at all, are conclusive against a supernatural revelation of the divine will in any form, and that the occurrence of a single miracle establishes the worthlessness of these objections. If Christ really existed as a supernatural being, or if he rose from the dead, according to the Gospels, the objections which we have been reviewing have no force at all. In evidence of the fact that such a person as Jesus Christ lived in Palestine, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, we may appeal to the entire New Testament, and, indeed, to the existence of Christianity. The fact is not now denied. In evidence of the fact that Jesus Christ was a supernatural being, we may appeal, in like manner, to the plain testimony of the Gospels and the other books of the New Testament. The fact can only be denied by mutilating the Gospels, by arbitrarily rejecting their testimony on certain points, while it is admitted on others. — See “Part V. ch. 1. The Deity of Christ.” In evidence of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, our appeal is also to the New Testament. This evidence has been most strenuously assailed, but without success; for it is invulnerable.

¹ Sears (E. H.) "The Fourth Gospel, the Heart of Christ," p. 24.

² Chalmers (T.) "Institutes of Theology," I. p. 170, note; Channing (W. E.) "Dudleian Lecture on the Evidence of Revealed Religion," Works III. p. 105 sq.; Smith (H. B.) "Am. Presb. and Theol. Rev." for 1864, p. 143.

We hold, therefore, that all objections to occasional miracles for a high moral end are futile; but we concede the propriety of carefully scrutinizing the evidence for an alleged miracle before admitting its reality. For it is perfectly true that a miracle, viewed as a mere phenomenon of nature, is improbable. Were it not, it would be useless in connection with a supernatural word from God. “So far as a miracle, in itself, and apart from its relations to a special divine intention, is probable, just so far does it lose its usefulness as a sign of God’s interest in that word.”¹ What, then, can be said of the testimony offered by the evangelists to the wonderful works of Christ?

(1) The number of witnesses is ample. (2) Their integrity is above suspicion. (3) Their powers of observation and memory were excellent. (4) The phenomena which they attest were sensible. (5) Their testimony itself is positive. (6) Their testimony is independent. (7) Their testimony is substantially harmonious. (8) Their testimony makes the teaching of Christ grow naturally out of his miracles. (9) The aim of Christ's miracles was Godlike. (10) The references to attendant circumstances are numerous and accurate.

¹ Park, in Smith’s “Dict. of the Bible,” Am. ed.

Now, it is perfectly evident that this testimony is decisive, provided miracles are not rationally impossible or absurd; for it is of the very best kind, and there is no rebutting testimony. No one who was present pretends to deny the events recorded by the evangelists; and only a person who was present could bear witness that such events did not then and there take place.

But, as we have seen, miracles are not absurd; they are not even, in all circumstances, improbable. Says Paley, "Miracles are no more improbable than these two propositions: (1) That a future state of existence should be destined by God for his human creation; and (2) That, being so destined, he should acquaint them with it." Says Mill, "The only antecedent improbability which can be ascribed to the miracle is the improbability that God would interfere with the regular course of events to perform it."¹

It appears, therefore, that if the welfare of his creatures can be promoted, on the whole, by miracles, God, as wise and benevolent, may be supposed to work them, and to work as many of them as will, in the highest degree, promote this end. Beyond that limit, he cannot be supposed to go; unless, indeed, his own glory may be conceived of as another end to be secured by miraculous interposition. Perhaps it is unnecessary for us to attempt any separation between these ends; they may exactly coincide: whatever tends to secure one of them may equally tend to secure the other.

Conclusion.—In view of the facts which we have thus drawn from trustworthy records of Christ's life, we must pronounce him INFALLIBLE, and receive all his words as true; for these facts cannot be reconciled with the hypothesis that he was either a deceiver or self-deceived. They are intelligible and credible only on the supposition that he was what he claimed to be,—a humble, holy, INFALLIBLE Being.

¹ See also Professor Harris (S.) in Bib. Sac. XIII. p. 279, and Professor Lewis (T.) "Divine Human in the Scriptures," p. 149.

III. THESE RECORDS PROVE THAT CHRIST PROMISED THE INSPIRATION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT TO HIS APOSTLES, BY WHOM, WITH SOME OF THEIR ASSOCIATES, THE NEW TESTAMENT WAS WRITTEN.

In this statement the word “inspiration” is used as a theological term, to signify a work of the Spirit upon the mind, rather than upon the heart; upon the intellect, rather than upon the affections. In other words, it denotes a work of illumination, rather than a work of conviction or of sanctification.

The promise referred to in this statement may be found in John xiv. 15–17, 26; xv. 26, 27; xvi. 7–15; Acts i. 5, 8; Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12; and it may be said,—

(1) To embrace several particulars. Thus the Holy Spirit was promised,—(a) As one who would abide with the apostles as a permanent Helper (John xiv. 16); (b) as one who would recall to their minds the words of Christ (John xiv. 26); (c) as one who would make known to them truth not fully taught by Christ (John xvi. 12); (d) as one who would reveal future events to them (John xvi. 13); (e) as one who would guide them into the whole doctrine of Christ (John xiv. 26; xvi. 13; Acts v. 8); and (f) as one who would give them wisdom and utterance in times of danger (Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12).

(2) To refer primarily to the apostles. For, (a) It was addressed to them, with no express reference to a wider application (except in John xiv. 16; xvi. 8–11). (b) In certain particulars, it was obviously limited to them (John xiv. 26; xvi. 12). (c) In others, it referred to their special duties (John xv. 26; Acts i. 8). (d) In one case, it had in view their approaching trials (Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12). (e) In some of its phraseology, it pointed to a work of the Spirit which was specially needed by the apostles, that is, a work of divine illumination,—(a) by designating the Spirit three several times as "the Spirit of the Truth" — a title nowhere else given to him; (b) by describing him as a Teacher of new truth; and, (c) by making him a Revealer of things to come. Diversities of gifts were needed by the church; and the gift which the apostles needed more than any others, at that time, or since, was extraordinary divine illumination.

It may be remarked, that certain expressions in the last discourse of Christ with his disciples are true of all Christians, because the conditions of discipleship were the same for them and for others.

Moreover, certain expressions in Matt. x. show that Christ adapted his words to the circumstances and needs of the apostles after his own death. Their temporary mission was typical of their permanent work.

It may also be remarked, that Paul was a "called apostle," and, therefore, entitled to a fulfilment of Christ's promise to the eleven. For, (a) he claimed to be an apostle (Rom. i. 1; 1 Cor. i. 1; ix. 1; and often). (b) His claim was recognized by other apostles (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16; 1 Pet. i. 12; Gal. ii. 6-9). (c) Miracles were wrought at his word (Acts xiv. 3; xix. 11, 12; xx. 9-12; xxviii. 3-6; 2 Cor. xii. 12).

That the promise in question was specially meant for the apostles may also be inferred from several other considerations; for example, —

(a) From their own interpretation of it (Acts ii. 16-33; iv. 8; v. 32; x. 19; xi. 12; xiii. 9; xv. 28; xvi. 6, 7; 1 Cor. ii. 10 sq.; Gal. i. 11, 12; Rev. i. 1 sq.; 1 Tim. iv. 1).

(b) From their professing to speak the word or command of God (1 Cor. ii. 13; 1 Thess. ii. 13; iv. 15; 2 Thess. iii. 1; 2 Cor. i. 18 sq.; Col. iii. 16; 1 John ii. 14; 1 Tim. i. 1; Titus i. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 25; Rom. xvi. 26; x. 17; Col. i. 25; 1 Pet. i. 23; Eph. iii. 3, 5, 8; Gal. i. 11, 12).

(c) From the authority with which they speak, — as if they knew the will of God. Thus Paul, in 1 Thess. iv. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 15; iii. 4, 6, 10, 12, 14; 1 Cor. vii. 17; v. 3-5; Gal. i. 8-9, claims inspired authority; which, however, as he intimates, only puts him on a level with the older apostles.

(d) From their recognition of the divine authority of the Old Testament, while putting their own teaching on the same plane with it (1 Pet. i. 10-12; 2 Pet. i. 19-21; 2 Tim. iii. 16-17; (cf. Rev. xxi. 14); Acts ii. 15 sq.; and Eph. ii. 20; Heb. ii. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16).

(e) From the plenitude of spiritual gifts which they possessed, enabling them to direct even inspired teachers (Acts viii. 26, 29; (cf. x. 19); xi. 28; xiii. 2; (cf. xvi. 6, 7); xx. 11; 1 Tim. iv. 14; Matt. xvi. 17; 1 John ii. 20; 1 Cor. xiv. 18, 36, 37).

It is, therefore, evident that the promise made by Christ to his disciples was intended primarily and, in part, exclusively for them. It is not then directly, and in all its language, applicable to Christians of every age. Yet all Christians may have the full benefit of it mediately; for all may have the assistance of the Spirit in studying the inspired truth of Scripture.

But our third proposition adds, "by whom, with some of their associates, the New Testament was written." And in proof of this, it may be observed, that the best Christian scholars admit that all the books of the New Testament, — except the Gospels of Mark and Luke, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of James and Jude, the Second Epistle of Peter, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, — were written by apostles, and that these were written by associates of apostles. We have proved that the former are inspired, by proving that their writers, the apostles, were inspired; but what shall be said of the latter?

1. *That the books written by associates of the apostles must have had, if necessary, the sanction of the apostles themselves.*¹

¹ See the Articles on Mark, Luke, James, and Jude, and on the books attributed to them, in Smith's "Dict. of the Bible;" McClintock and Strong, "Dictionary of Historical, Ecclesiastical, and Doctrinal Theology;" Fairbairn (F.) "Imperial Bible Dictionary;" Kitto (J.) "Bible Cyclopædia," ed. by W. L. Alexander; Winer (G. B.) "Biblisches Real-wörterbuch;" Herzog "Real-Encyclopædie;" Schenkel (D.) "Bibel-Lexicon;" Wetzer und Welte, "Kirchen-Lexicon;" "Nouvelle Encyclopédie Théologique; Dictionnaire des Prophéties, et des Miracles" (vols. xxiv. and xxv.).

They could have had that sanction by submitting them to the correction of the apostles; for John, at least, lived twenty or thirty years after they were written. And early tradition asserts that they were, some of them, indorsed by apostles,—as Mark's by Peter, and Luke's by Paul. James and Jude were sons of Mary and brothers of Christ.

(1) Mark is reported by the early Christians to have been the amanuensis, or interpreter, of Peter (cf. 1 Peter v. 13), and to have based his Gospel on Peter's teaching. There is no reason to doubt the substantial truth of this early tradition. Moreover, the Gospel of Mark appears to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem. But the apostle John survived that event almost thirty years; and this Gospel could hardly have been circulated without his sanction: the use of it was, however, very early and unquestioned.

(2) Luke is reported by the early church to have been long a companion of Paul, and to have written the Third Gospel and the Acts during his life; and therefore, we may surely assume, with the benefit of his supervision (cf. 1 Tim. v. 18; Luke x. 7). Moreover, both these were, without doubt, in circulation twenty years before the death of John, and must naturally have been approved by him.

(3) The Epistle to the Hebrews was probably written by the direction and under the eye of Paul (whether by Luke or by some one else we cannot tell), and was sent to those addressed as a letter from that apostle.

(4) The Epistle of James was probably written by James, a brother of Christ, who was pastor of the church at Jerusalem, and possessed apostolic influence.

(5) The author of the Epistle of Jude was probably a brother of Christ, and an associate of the apostles; and his letter was in this case, we can hardly doubt, indorsed by them.

(6) The Second Epistle of Peter was probably written by the apostle: if not, it is spurious,—the work of some unknown writer, and wholly unworthy of a place in the canon. But there is too much evidence, both external and internal, of its genuineness, to permit us to hesitate in receiving it as a part of the sacred record.

2. That these associates of apostles, namely, Mark, Luke, James, and Jude,¹ were probably themselves inspired. For (a) many associates of the apostles were inspired (Acts ii. 17, 18; xi. 27, 28; xxi. 9; 1 Cor. xi. 4; xiv. 24–34); and, therefore, (b) it is extremely probable that these men were thus qualified for their work. Indeed, it seems to us more probable that these writers were inspired than that they looked to the apostles for an indorsement of their writings. But, loving the truth and anxious to have it delivered to the people in its purity, it is unreasonable to suppose they would have neglected to submit their work to the superior knowledge of apostles, if they were not themselves conscious of divine illumination guarding them from error.

It has now been shown that the New Testament Scriptures were either written or sanctioned by men divinely inspired; it is, therefore, certain that they deserve our respect and confidence as a proper revelation from God. Nay, we may speak of them with propriety as the word of God.

Having reached this conclusion in respect to the New Testament Scriptures, we might proceed at once to make use of them in proving the divine authority of the Old Testament. But it will be better to notice, at this point, certain objections which are sometimes urged against the conclusion stated above.

1. Though the writers of the New Testament knew the will of God by the illumination of his Spirit, they may not in all cases have taught faithfully what they knew. Fear, flattery, or ambition may have led them to modify or withhold the truth. Indeed, this appears to have been done by Peter at Antioch, to the great grief of Paul (Gal. ii. 11 sq.).

In reply to this objection, we remark:—

(a) That the general character of the apostles forbids us to suppose that they deliberately taught what they knew to be erroneous. If this be not evident from the tone of their writings and from what is known of their lives, nothing in the past can be evident.

¹ See Acts xii. 12, 25; xiii. 5, 13; xv. 37, 39; Col. iv. 10; 1 Tim. iv. 11; Philemon, 24; 1 Pet. v. 13, and Acts xvi. 10; xx. 5; xxi. 17; xxvii. 1; xxviii. 16.

(b) That it is, on the whole, easy and necessary to distinguish between the private conduct and the public teaching of inspired men. This distinction is as old as Augustine, — perhaps older; and no one should hesitate to apply it to the holy apostles, as well as to the ancient prophets. Perfection of character has never been supposed indispensable in order to correctness of teaching. Remember Balaam, Jonah, and even Moses.

(c) There is no evidence that Peter taught any thing inconsistent with the gospel except, in a certain sense, by his example. And it is even possible that he hoped to win over the brethren from Jerusalem to better views, by going with them for a time. His fear of displeasing them may have been accompanied by a hope of conciliating and gaining them.

(d) There is some evidence, in the use which Paul makes of the occurrence, that Peter admitted the justice of his fellow-apostle's remonstrance, and from that time onward acted in harmony with his own knowledge and conviction of duty.

(e) There is no evidence or probability that the Holy Spirit would have granted further assistance to any apostle who, in his teaching, had rejected the light of that Spirit, or that he would have suffered the other apostles to recognize such an one as their peer. We must, therefore, suppose that all apostatized, and yet persisted in claiming what they knew they had forfeited; or else that all proved faithful in their work, and enjoyed the promised illumination of the Spirit therein. The latter is the only reasonable view.

2. In certain instances the New Testament writers appear to have erred in their language through carelessness or passion. Thus, it has been said that Luke antedates the census or enrollment under Cyrenius (Luke ii. 2; Acts v. 37; Josephus Antt. xviii. i. 1); that Stephen exaggerates the time of Israel's bondage in Egypt (Acts vii. 6; Gen. xv. 13;

Ex. xii. 40; Gal. iii. 17), and ascribes an act to Abraham which was done by Jacob (Acts vii. 16); and that Paul spoke ignorantly and in wrath before the Sanhedrin (Acts xxiii. 5).

But, (a) Luke was probably correct in his statement about the time of the registration which he had in mind.¹ (b) Stephen probably called the whole period from Abraham's entrance into Canaan until the exodus (in round numbers 400 years, but more exactly 430 years, Ex. xii. 40) the period of servitude in Egypt, from its leading and characteristic portion.² (c) In Acts vii. 16, the language of Stephen may be explained as elliptical, but intelligible to his hearers, who knew traditionally what had not been placed in the sacred record; or an error may have crept into the text by transcription.³ (d) The words of Paul in Acts xxiii. 5: "I wist not, brethren, that he was high priest," may be understood, with Calvin, Alexander, Meyer, and others, as indignant irony.⁴

3. Paul is thought to admit that some of his teaching was not inspired, for example, 1 Cor. vii. 6, 12, 25, 40; 2 Cor. xi. 17; (cf. Rom. iii. 5; vi. 10; Gal. iii. 15.)

In reply, it must be said, that he makes no such admission. For, (a) In the first passage, he merely says that he is giving his readers a permission not a command. (b) In the second, he gives instruction on a point that Christ had not expressly noticed. (c) In the third, he says he has no command uttered by Christ to give them, but rather, and only, his apostolic advice. (d) In the fourth, he gives his advice again, adding, "and I suppose that I also have the Spirit of God." (e) In the fifth, he acknowledges that he has been compelled to answer fools according to their folly.

IV. BOTH CHRIST AND HIS INSPIRED APOSTLES INDORSED THE OLD TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES AS FROM GOD.

To establish the truth of this proposition, it must be shown

¹ Fairbairn (P.) "Hermeneutical Manual" et Appendix; Tholuck "Bib. Sac." I. 443: "New Englander" for 1870, Woolsey (T. D.)

² Hackett, Alexander, et alii.

³ See Hackett, and other commentators, especially the note of Wordsworth.

⁴ See particularly the note of Meyer.

that the Old Testament Scriptures existed in the time of Christ as a well known collection of sacred writings; for some of the books found in the Old Testament are not referred to separately, in the New Testament. Hence we remark:—

1. That our present Old Testament Scriptures, the Apocrypha excluded, were all written some centuries before Christ. In support of this statement, we can do no more than appeal to the standard Introductions to the Old Testament; for the presentation of this evidence in detail belongs to the biblical department of instruction.¹

2. That they were well known at the time of his advent as a collection of sacred writings. This might be proved by the words of our Saviour and his apostles; but it may also be proved by the testimony of uninspired men. In the preface of the "Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach," we have the words, "Since so many and great things have been given to us by the law and the prophets, and the books which followed after them, so that it is necessary to praise Israel for learning and wisdom, . . . my grandfather Jesus having applied himself for a long time to the reading of the law and the prophets and the other ancestral books, and having secured great skill in these, was moved also himself to compose something pertaining to learning and wisdom." A little below, the preface speaks once more of "the law and the prophets and the rest of the books."

Again: Josephus, in his work against Apion, remarks that the composition of the Jewish sacred books had not depended upon every one's caprice, but upon "the prophets, who had learned the most exalted and most ancient things according to the inspiration of God, and had recorded the events occurring in their own times wisely as they happened;" and then (ch. viii.) proceeds thus: "For there are not among us myriads of discordant and conflicting books, but twenty-two only, containing a register of the entire time, which are justly considered divine; and, of these, five are of Moses. From the death of Moses until the reign of Artaxerxes, the king of the Persians, who succeeded Xerxes, the prophets subsequent to Moses recorded in thirteen books the things which were done in their own times; and the remaining four embrace hymns to God, and moral suggestions to men. And, from Artaxerxes to our own time, some have indeed been written; but they have not been thought worthy of like faith with those preceding them, because there was no strict succession of the prophets." He adds, in respect to the Sacred Scriptures, "Neither has any one ventured to add any thing, or change them; and it is innate in all Jews, straightway from their earliest origin, to consider these the doctrines of God,—to abide by them, and, if need be, gladly die for them."

¹ Horne (T. H.) "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," last ed.; Hävernick (H. A. C.) "Handbuch der Historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament"; Keil (C. F.) "Manual of Historico-Critical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the O. T."; Bleek (F.) "Einleitung in das Alte Testament: translated also; DeWette (W. M. L.) "Einleitung in die Bücher des A. T." translated imperfectly; Stuart (M.) "Crit. and Hist. Defence of the Old Testament Canon"; and the articles on "Canon of the O. T." and on the several books of the O. T., in Herzog, Winer, Smith, Fairbairn's Kitto, Alexander, McClintock and Strong, and other dictionaries of the Bible.

The language of Josephus shows, (a) That the Jews had books which they did not consider inspired or sacred. (b) That a prophetic origin or approval was esteemed necessary to render a book sacred. (c) That they did not tamper with their sacred books. (d) That these books were regarded as a completed whole. (e) That none of them were written after the time of Artaxerxes (or Esther).

And it may be remarked, that his use and citation of the Old Testament are said to agree with the canon cited by him.

On the other hand, the words of Jesus, the son of Sirach, show very clearly that the Old Testament was divided into three parts,—the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa. This division is recognized by Christ.

3. That they were recognized collectively or severally by

*Christ and his apostles as the word of God.*¹ In proof of this statement, we appeal, (1) To the words of Christ (Matt. xxi. 42; (cf. Mark xii. 10); Matt. xxii. 29; (cf. Mark xii. 24); Matt. xxvi. 54, 56; (cf. Mark xiv. 49); Luke iv. 21; xxiv. 46; John v. 39; vii. 38; x. 35; xiii. 18; xvii. 12; Matt. v. 17-19; vii. 12; xxii. 36-40; Luke xvi. 17; xxiv. 44; xi. 49). (2) To the words of the New Testament writers (Luke xxiv. 27, 32, 45; John ii. 22; xix. 24, 28, 36, 37; xx. 9; Acts i. 16; viii. 32, 35; xvii. 2; xviii. 28; Rom. iii. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 15-17). From these and similar passages, it is sufficiently evident that no one can reasonably accept the New Testament as God's word without accepting the Old Testament as being equally so.

In confirmation of this evidence, we remark, (1) That the Old Testament Scriptures have been found trustworthy as historical records. Indeed, they are distinguished for the impartiality with which they record the faults and sins and disasters of the chosen people, and its heroes. A divine conscience seems to hold them to the strict line of honest history and biography.² (2) That some of them have been proved to be inspired by the fulfilment of prophecy. We refer to the predictions respecting Babylon, Nineveh, Jerusalem, the Jewish nation, and the Messiah, with their fulfilment as described by sacred or profane historians. In the first ages of Christianity, great use was made of this argument.³ (3) That some of them were authenticated by the working of miracles. We refer, of course, to such miracles as were wrought at the word of Moses, Joshua, Elijah, Elisha, and others. The argument from miracles is less trustworthy and convincing when founded on those recorded in the Old Testament than it is when founded on those attested by the apostles; but the argument from the fulfilment of prophecy is far more extensive and important as related to the Old Testament than it is as related to the New. (4) That the doctrines of the Old Testament are such as must be referred to a divine source. In respect to God and his relation to man, as well as to all things visible and invisible, their teaching is superhuman.¹

¹ Lechler (D. G. V.) "The Old Testament in the Discourses of Jesus," Chr. Rev. vol. xxiv. pp. 368-390, 543-574; Fairbairn (P.) "Hermeneutical Manual of the N. T." p. 390 sq.; Davidson (S.) "Hermeneutics," "Quotations from the Old Test. in the N. T."

² Rawlinson (G.) "Historical Evidences of Christianity."

³ See Gifford (E. H.) "Voices of the Prophets"; Smith (R. P.) "Prophecy a Preparation for Christ," and "The Messianic Interpretation of the Prophecies of Isaiah"; Keith (A.) "On the Fulfilment of Prophecy"; Fairbairn (P.) "Prophecy: its Distinctive Nature, its Special Function, and Proper Interpretation"; Hofmann (J. C. K.) "Weissagung und Erfüllung"; Knobel (A.) "Der Prophetismus der Hebræer"; Tholuck (A.) "Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen"; Davison (S.) "Discourses on Prophecy"; Patton (Wm.) "The Judgment of Jerusalem."

The conclusion which has now been reached is this, — that the sacred writers were moved and assisted by the Holy Spirit to put on record all which the Bible, apart from errors in the text, now contains. As to the Old Testament, this is taught by the Saviour and his apostles; and, as to the New Testament, it is established by evidence previously given.

But it is important for us to consider more carefully the nature and extent of inspiration in the sacred writers.²

And, in doing this, we assert, —

¹ See also, "The Religion of the Christ," by Stanley Leathes, an excellent volume of the Bampton Lectures.

² See Dick (J.) "An Essay on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures," &c.; Parry (W.) "An Inquiry into the Nature and Extent of the Inspiration of the Apostles," &c.; Haldane (R.) "The Books of the Old and New Testaments proved to be Canonical, and their Verbal Inspiration Maintained and Established;" Carson (A.) "The Theories of Inspiration of the Rev. Daniel Wilson, Rev. Dr. Pye Smith, and the Rev. Dr. Dick proved to be Erroneous;" Gausson (I. R. L.) "Theopneusty; or, the Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures;" Bannerman (J.) "Inspiration: The Infallible Truth and Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures;" Garbett (E.) "God's Word Written; The Doctrine of the Inspiration of the Holy Scripture Explained and Defended;" Lee (W.) "The Inspiration of Holy Scripture; its Nature and Proof;" Woods (L.) "Inspiration of the Scriptures," Works Vol. I. Lects. IX. to XIV. incl.; Row (C. A.) "The Nature and Extent of Divine Inspiration, as stated by the writers, and deduced from the Facts of the N. T.;" Warrington (G.) "The Inspiration of Scripture; Its Limits and Effects;" Lewis (T.) "The Divine Human in the Scriptures;" Curtis (T. F.) "The Human Element in the Inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures;" Macnaught (J.) "The Doctrine of Inspiration," &c.; Rothe (R.) "Zur Dogmatik;"

V. THAT THE INSPIRATION OF THE APOSTLES AND PROPHETS WAS DIFFERENT IN KIND FROM THAT OF ORDINARY CHRISTIANS.

This is denied by many at the present time. They assert that inspiration has always been proportioned to the spiritual attainments of the subject, and hence that many good men at the present time have even a higher degree of inspiration from God than the ancient prophets or apostles. In opposition to this modern view, and in support of our proposition, we appeal, —

1. To the impression which the Scriptures as a whole make on the reader's mind. This is certainly unique, and generally favorable to the claims of the writers; and, when it is so, they are admitted to have had an inspiration altogether peculiar. If those claims are denied, the writers are supposed to have been deceivers or deceived.

2. To the common belief of Christians in every age since the first. The adherents of the Papacy claim for the Pope, not an original inspiration for the communication of new truth, but simply a judicial inspiration, enabling him to recognize and indorse old truth, — the teachings of Christ and his apostles.

3. To the manifest superiority of the Sacred Scriptures to other religious writings of the same period. From Peter to Clement, from Paul to Ignatius, from John to Polycarp, from James to the Shepherd of Hermas, the descent is steep and long.

4. To the equality, at least, of the Sacred Scriptures to Christian writings in any age. This seems to us very remarkable. It is not so with other branches of knowledge. Ancient works on moral science and political economy, not to speak of natural science, are now worthless, except for history.

Philippi (F. A.) "Kirchliche Glaubenslehre: Erstes Kapitel;" Turretin (F.) "De Scriptura," Vol. I. Loc. II. Quæstiones XVI, XVII.; Gerhard (J.) "Loci Theologici, Tom. I. Loc. I. De Scriptura Sacra;" Oosterzee (J. J. van) "Christian Dogmatics," I. p. 194 sq.; Herzog, R. E. s. v. "Inspiration;" Jalaguyer (P.) "L'Inspiration du N. T.;" Guizot (F. P. G.) "Meditations," I.; Schmidt (W.) "Zur Inspirationsfrage;" Dietzsch (A.) "Die Lehre von der Inspiration der Schrift," in Stu. u. Kr. 1869 S. 428 sq.

5. To the knowledge of future events possessed by many, if not all, the writers. In this it is perfectly plain that prophets and apostles differed from ordinary Christians. Indeed, the most eminent men of God, since the apostolic age, have been destitute of this knowledge, not being able even to understand some of the biblical prophecies which are to be fulfilled hereafter.

6. To the miracles which attested the authority of apostles and prophets as teachers of truth. This peculiar attestation points to something peculiar in their inspiration. Christ appealed to it, Paul relied upon it; and there is no evidence more suitable to convince the mind of a proper revelation from God.

But we are prepared to go yet further, and assert, —

VI. THAT THE INSPIRATION OF THE APOSTLES AND PROPHETS MADE THEM INFALLIBLE TEACHERS OF TRUTH.

And, by "infallible teachers," we mean those who set forth by voice or pen the will of God in the best manner practicable, — whose teaching the reason of man has no right to modify or reject, but only to ascertain and obey. Rightly interpreted, their teaching is correct so far as it goes. Mr. Campbell very pertinently and forcibly remarks, "It is one thing to say that, because of human limits, what God can reveal of himself to man is to be held to be less than what God is; and it is quite another thing to say, that what God sees it good to reveal of himself to man he cannot truly and effectually reveal through man, — that the medium must more or less color and distort the light passing through it. This, consistently held, makes a revelation to man and a revelation through man impossible. If man cannot transmit light without distorting it, then neither can he receive light without misconceiving it."¹

In support of this proposition, we appeal, —

1. To their marvellous accuracy of statement in matters which can be tested. This is most evident in respect to the New Testament. Of the hundreds of particulars referred to in that volume, not one can be proved an error. This is a very bold statement, no doubt; and of course it refers to the writings as they came from the hands of inspired men, and not as we have them now in the best editions of the New Testament.

¹ Campbell (J. McLeod) "Thoughts on Revelation," a suggestive work.

2. To the remarkable originality and consistency of the Scriptures in their teaching. For example, (1) In respect to the character of God — his personality, supremacy, righteousness, and benevolence; (2) In respect to the Moral Law; (3) In respect to the sinfulness of man; (4) In respect to the way of human salvation.

3. To the divine authority which the apostles and prophets claimed for their teaching. Nothing is more certain than that they professed to speak for God. The prophets of the Old Testament, and the apostles of the New, declared their word to be final, — a message from the living God, which all should hear and obey.

4. To the supernatural evidence which proved their authority to speak for God. This evidence consisted in the working of miracles and the fulfilment of predictions uttered by them (Deut. viii. 20–22; xiii. 1–3).

Yet it must be conceded that the evidence for infallible correctness in the expression of religious truth is much stronger than the evidence for such correctness in references to secular affairs. For not only are a vast majority of the passages in which divine authority is expressly claimed such as reveal or enforce religious truth, but the admitted object of divine communications from first to last is religious. Beyond question, then, the teaching of the Bible is almost wholly religious. All other instruction is ancillary to this.

Yet it is difficult to see how inaccurate representations of history can give just views of divine providence or of human character. And, therefore, upon examination, it will be almost impracticable to draw a line between secular and religious truth in the Bible. Indeed, all events that have found a place in the sacred record appear to have found it by virtue of their relation to the moral government of God.

Looking, then, at the claims of the sacred writers, and at the object for which they were inspired, the argument for their infallibility as teachers of religion is far stronger than that for infallibility in speaking of ordinary affairs; but looking at the way in which they teach,—that is, by frequent reference to ordinary affairs,—it is hard to see how mistakes in the latter will not vitiate the former. We are therefore led to infer the correctness of their references to secular matters from their divine authority in teaching religious truth.

As to the psychology, or human side, of inspiration, three remarks are submitted: (a) The words which they were to employ appear to have been sometimes given to the sacred writers by inspiration. Prophets and seers of visions were addressed through their spiritual senses. (b) The mental powers of the sacred writers were raised and cleared and guided, but not suspended, by inspiration. The action of their bodily senses may have been arrested in cases of ecstasy, but not the action of their mental and moral powers. (c) The apostles as well as the prophets received the truth by inspiration gradually, and as they needed it for their work, and not all at once.

These are the elements of our belief on the subject; and it will be seen that they point towards what is called the theory of dynamical inspiration. But no one of the prophets or sacred writers has attempted to describe the relation of his spirit to the Spirit of God in times of inspiration. Perhaps he could not. The words which Peter Bayne puts into the mouth of Elijah may be true:—

“ Ask not how I know;
No prophet knoweth how he knoweth God,
Or how he knows that God’s breath moveth him.
I know not how I live, yet cannot doubt
That here I am. The light that showeth God
Burns up both doubt and proof, as the full sun
Quencheth both moon and stars in blaze of day.”¹

¹ Days of Jezebel,” pp. 189, 190. Köster (A.) “Wie verhält sich in der heil. Schrift die Offenbarung Gottes zu der freien Geistesthätigkeit der heiligen Schriftsteller?” St. u. Kr. 1852, 875 ff.

The sources of knowledge open to the minds of inspired men may be specified as follows :—

1. Revelation. To this may be referred all their knowledge of future events, and much of the doctrinal truth which they taught.

2. Observation. To this may be traced the larger part of the history contained in the Old Testament and in the New; and the value of this part of the Bible depends, in a great measure, on the fact that the minds of inspired men were in a normal state.

3. Experience. To this may be traced much of the Psalms, as well as the Lamentations and Ecclesiastes. That the feelings which the sacred writers have expressed, for example, in the Psalms, were right in the circumstances may be inferred :—

(a) From the general character of the Psalms. The views which they express of God, of man, of sin, of righteousness, are manifestly of divine origin; and the religious emotions which they utter have called forth a response from the best Christians in every age.¹

(b) From the quotations of the Psalms in the New Testament. They are quoted very often, and in no case with any hint of their being marred by human imperfection.

(c) From the want of any criteria by which the right and wrong sentiments supposed by some to be in them can be discriminated. For the psalms are separate productions, every one complete in itself, and no one laying down rules by which others are to be judged. In every case the materials for correct interpretation are to be sought in the psalm itself.

4. Study. This was evidently a source of knowledge to some of the sacred writers. From the preface to Luke's Gospel, we learn that he obtained his accurate knowledge of our Saviour's history by careful investigation. He may have been inspired to collate and select the testimony; but he unquestionably obtained his information from others and by faithful inquiry. The same may be said of other sacred writers.

¹ Chambers (T. W.) "The Psalter; A Witness to the Divine Origin of the Bible."

In view of what has now been stated, we claim that our theory of inspiration accounts for all the phenomena of the Bible better than any other,—for its varieties of style as well as numerous writers; for its verbal discrepancies, as well as essential harmony; for the personal feelings and tastes which are revealed by its writers; and for a thousand traces of high yet free spiritual action on their part. How any one can read the New Testament, the Book of Revelation excepted, and doubt whether its writers speak with conscious freedom, and also with conscious authority, passes our comprehension. The letters of Paul are intensely natural and equally super-natural: the Word was made flesh without losing its heavenly truth and power.

Before leaving the present topic, we must refer to a few objections to our view.¹

The Bible, it is said, cannot be the infallible word of God:—

I. Because a belief in its infallibility leads to bibliolatry. This is a mistake. The student of nature believes her testimony to be infallible, yet he is not led by this belief to pay religious homage to nature. And the same is true of those who accept the teaching of the Bible as infallible; they recognize the duty of worshipping God, and him only.

II. Because this belief retards the progress of science. Men, it is said, are rendered by it suspicious of the discoveries of science, and slow to give it their support. This is also a mistake. Believers in the truth of the Scriptures believe in the truth of nature also, and encourage the highest schools of learning. They may be slow to receive scientific views which appear to be inconsistent with what they suppose the Bible teaches; but they have no fear of true science, no desire to prevent men from studying the works of God in nature.

III. Because infallibility in the original Scriptures requires

1 Birks (T. R.) "The Bible and Modern Thought."

for its complement infallibility in all copies, translations, and, some would say, interpretations of them. For otherwise, we are told, the benefit of infallibility is lost to all but the primitive readers. But this, again, is a mistake; for the errors from transcription, translation, &c., are such as can be detected, or at least estimated, and reduced to a minimum; while errors in the original revelation could not be measured.

IV. Because it has much obscure language. The object of a supernatural revelation is to make known important truth: hence words will be used, not to hide, but to express thought; and we have a right to expect the clearest language possible.

This objection is plausible, but unsound; for the obscure language of Scripture may be due (1) To a transcendent element in the objects or events referred to; (2) To its truth to nature and history; (3) To its adaptation to the first recipients; (4) To its adaptation to special ends, distinct from that of teaching; (5) Adaptation to man at every stage of human history; (6) Adaptation to man as under probation.

V. Because it sometimes uses unsound arguments. It is admitted by some that the leading ideas of Christianity were supernaturally revealed to the sacred writers; but the subordinate ideas, and the arguments used, are said to be the fruit of their unaided reason, and so not the word of God. This, however, is a mistake. Neither Christ, nor any one of his apostles, can be shown to have argued sophistically. Sometimes, indeed, an argument may not be stated in full; for example, Matt. xxii. 23, sq.; but it is never unsound. — See also Gal. iii. 16.

VI. Because it admits to some extent false interpretation. Many passages of the Old Testament, it is said, are incorrectly interpreted by writers of the New Testament: hence their words are not infallible. But it is to be observed (1) That the language of the Scriptures is confessedly obscure in many places; (2) That some of these are the very passages said to be misinterpreted in the New Testament; and (3) That the New Testament writers believed in the divinity of the Old Testament, and interpreted it accordingly.¹

VII. Because it teaches scientific errors. In reply to this charge, it may be remarked, that all references to matters of science in the Bible are (1) Merely incidental and auxiliary; (2) Clothed in popular language; and, (3) Confirmed by consciousness, so far as they relate to the mind. Remembering these facts, we say that the Bible has not been shown to contain scientific errors. — Astronomy, geology, ethnology.

VIII. Because it teaches historical errors. On the supposed historical errors of the Bible, we remark, (1) They relate, for the most part, to matters of chronology, genealogy, numbers,² &c. (2) Transcribers are specially liable to mistakes in copying numbers, names, &c. (3) Different names for the same person, and different termini for the same period, are quite frequent. (4) Round numbers are often employed for specific. Making proper allowance for these facts, we deny that historical errors are found in the Bible.

IX. Because it contains contradictory statements. On this we remark, (1) That statements may be contradictory in words, but not in sense. "Answer not a fool," &c. (2) They may seem to be contradictory in sense when they are not: for example, the unity of God and the Trinity; Paul and James on justification. (3) They may be contradictory in sense, but not in moral bearing; for example, rest on the Sabbath, yet extra work for priests. Moses and Christ on divorce. Bearing in mind these facts, it will be impossible for us to find in the Bible any contradictions which mar its excellence.³

¹ Barrows (E. P.) "The Quotations of the N. T. in their relation to the question of Inspiration," Bib. Sac. xxx. pp. 305-322; Fairbairn (P.) "Hermeneutical Manual," Part Third; Scott (J.) "Principles of N. T. Quotation established and applied to Bible Science"; Reinke (L.) "Zur Erklärung des A. T." Bd. II. und IV.

² Bib. Sac. xxx. p. 323. sq., Gardner (F.) "The Chronological value of the Genealogy in Gen. V.," Reinke (L.) "Zur Erklärung des Alten Testaments" Bd. I.

³ Haley (J. W.) "An Examination of the Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible."

X. Because it contains false prophecy. There is none in the Bible uttered by those who are recognized as true prophets. But it is to be noted, (1) That, for obvious reasons, prophecy is more obscure than almost any other kind of writing; and (2) That it is sometimes expressly and sometimes tacitly conditional.

XI. Because it teaches bad theology. God, it is said, is represented in the Scriptures as changeful, jealous, revengeful, and, in a word, human. To this we reply, (1) It is due in part to the imperfection of human language and the limits of human thought. (2) It is also due in part to the end sought by the Bible, determining its style. (3) It is so modified by other representations, as to give a fair mind the right impression of God.

XII. Because it teaches bad morality. Deception, treachery, revenge, cruelty, lust, are said to be sanctioned by the approved or unreprieved conduct of good men. This charge rests on two mistakes: (1) A mistake as to the real character of certain acts; (2) A mistake as to the indorsement of other acts by the Bible.¹

In establishing the divine authority and inspiration of the Scriptures, we have established the truth of the Christian religion. Says Bishop Butler, "In the evidence of Christianity there seem to be several things of great weight, not reducible to the head, either of miracles, or the completion of prophecy, in the common acceptation of the words. But these two are its fundamental proofs. . . . Thus the evidence of Christianity will be a long series of things, reaching, as it seems, from the beginning of the world to the present time; of great variety and compass, taking in both the direct and the collateral proofs, and making up, all of them together, one argument." And Davison on Prophecy, remarks: "If contrivance or accident could have given to Christianity any of its apparent testimonies, its miracles, its prophecies, its morals, its propagation, or its founder, there could be no room to believe, or even imagine, that all these appearances of great credibility, could be united together, by any such means. If successful craft could have contrived its public miracles, or the pretence of them, it requires another reach of craft to adapt its prophecies to the same object. Further, it requires not only a different, but a totally opposite art to conceive and promulgate its admirable morals. Again, its propagation, in defiance of the powers and terrors of the world, implied still other qualities of action. Lastly, the model of the life of its founder is a work of such originality and wisdom, as could be the offspring only of consummate powers of invention, or rather never could have been devised, but must have come from real life. The hypothesis sinks under its incredibility. Each of these suppositions of contrivance being arbitrary and unsupported, the climax of them is an extravagance."

¹ Hessey (J. A.) "Moral Difficulties of the Bible," First and Second Series; Reinke (L.) "Zur Erklärung des A. T." Bd. I.

PART THIRD.

THE PERFECTION OF GOD.

Having considered some of the evidence which sustains our belief in the existence of a Supreme Being who is called God, and some of the evidence which justifies our confidence in the Bible as a revelation made by him, we are now to look at the evidence of his perfection, which is offered to us by the Bible and by nature—including the soul of man.

This should be done with profound reverence,—for the Maker of the universe is a being greater and better than we can ever hope to comprehend,—but, at the same time, with holy freedom, because he has made us in his own image, capable of knowing him in part.¹

Nor do we limit God by assigning to him certain distinguishable attributes,—for example, knowledge, goodness, power; for infinite power may be exercised for the worthiest object, as apprehended by perfect intelligence.²

MODES OF GOD'S EXISTENCE.

I. Unity. God exists as a single essence or substance. In this respect he is one; and there is no second being of the same nature. Hence, Dualism, Tritheism, Polytheism, and Pantheism are all inconsistent with Theism. The unity of God is established by the testimony of Scripture (Deut. vi. 4; 2 Sam. vii. 22; Ps. lxxxvi. 10; Isa. xliii. 10; Matt. xix. 17; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Gal. iii. 20; 1 Tim. ii. 5;) and by that of human reason,—one God, or no God.

¹ Calderwood (H.) "The Philosophy of the Infinite"; Porter (N.) "The Human Intellect," Pt. iii. c. 8. and Pt. iv. passim; McCosh (J.) "The Intuitions of the Human Mind"; Müller (J.) "The True Idea of God," Book iii. c. 4. in "The Christian Doctrine of Sin"; Nietzsche (C. I.) Article "Gott," sec. iii. "Eigenschaften," in Herzog, "Real-Encyclopädie"; Thomasius (G.) "Christi Person und Werk," Bd. i. secs. 7-17; Martensen (H.) "Dogmatics" sec. 46. sq.; Woods (L.) "Lectures," &c., vol. i. lec. xvi.; Oosterzee (J. J. van) "Christian Dogmatics," First Division, vol. i. p. 234 sq.; Charnock (S.) "On the Divine Attributes."

² Against Bruch (J. F.) "Die Lehre von den göttlichen Eigenschaften"; Mansel (H. L.) "The Limits of Religious Thought"; Spencer (H.) "First Principles of a New Philosophy"; Schleiermacher (F.) "Der Christliche Glaube."

II. Independence. This is affirmed of God in respect (1) To his existence, which is underived and absolute. He is the Exister; he has life in himself (Ex. iii. 14; John v. 26). (2) To his knowledge (Heb. iv. 13, and passages under Omniscience, infra). (3) To his action (Gen. i. 1; Acts xvii. 24). (4) To his happiness (Eph. i. 11; 1 Tim. vi. 15, 16).

The independence of God is also included in the perfection of his being, which may be inferred from the constitution of the human soul.

III. *Immutability.*¹ In his being, God remains what he is. The idea of his nature is always fully realized, without change or development (J. Müller). He is forever the same in essence, in knowledge, in character, in purpose, in blessedness (Mal. iii. 6; James i. 17; Isa. xl. 28; Ps. cii. 28; Heb. i. 12; xiii. 6). The obvious meaning of these passages must not be denied on account of other expressions which speak of change in God; for the latter are adaptations of thought to our weakness.

This view is sustained by just inference from the perfection of God—"He cannot change for the better, because he is best; nor for the worse, because he would thereby cease to be perfect."

Some have supposed that God is mutable in happiness and in action. But, as to the former, it may be said that omniscience precludes fluctuations of feeling. As to the latter, it may be said, that the mode of God's action is above the grasp of our understanding. It may be without succession, in him.

¹ Dorner (J. A.) "Ueber die richtige Fassung des dogmatischen Begriffs der Unabveränderlichkeit Gottes," Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, Bde. I., II., III.

IV. Eternity. By this is meant existence without beginning or end.—(See Gen. xxi. 33; Deut. xxxii. 40; Ps. xc. 2; Isa. xli. 4; 1 Tim. i. 17; 2 Peter iii. 8; Rev. x. 6.) Thus far all theists are agreed.

But many also embrace the idea of timeless being in the word eternity as affirmed of God. And this appears to be suggested (1) by such passages as John iii. 13; viii. 58; James i. 17; (2) by the difficulty of seeing how temporal succession could be experienced by a self-existent being; and (3) by the imperfections or limitations which seem inseparable from existence in time.

On the other hand, it must be admitted that the Scriptures generally speak of God as if his life were divisible into periods,—for example, the past and the future,—and that the faculties of the human mind are absolutely unable to conceive of real existence independent of time. If God is a perfect being, however, he cannot grow wiser by growing older. Can he grow older without growing wiser?

V. Omnipresence. There is no point in the universe where God is not (1 Kings viii. 27; 2 Chron. vi. 18; Isa. xliii. 2; lxvi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 23; Amos ix. 2; Ps. cxxxix. 6–12; Acts xvii. 27, 28; Matt. xxviii. 20). In many places of Scripture God is represented as filling immensity; but in other places he is represented as simply present everywhere. The omnipresence of God is best understood in the light of his spirituality, to which we now pass.

VI. Spirituality. (1) Positively: God is a real being, and one that acts as well as exists. He is therefore something more than a condition of being, like space or time, and more than simple action—actio purissima; he is an agent, an actor, a fons actionis. Moreover, he is a living being; for spirit is always in a certain sense life (John vi. 63; Gen. i. 2; Luke viii. 55; 1 Cor. xv. 45; 2 Cor. iii. 6; Rev. xiii. 15). (2) Negatively: God is an immaterial being (Ps. cxxxix. 7; John iv. 24; Ex. xx. 4; Isa. xl. 25; Rom. i. 20; Col. i. 15; 1 Tim. i. 17). The language of Ps. cxxxix. 7, and of John iv. 24, appears to account for the omnipresence of God, by the fact of his spirituality. And this is reasonable; because matter by its very properties presupposes the existence of space as a condition of its own existence; while spirit does not. There seems to be no evidence that spirit fills any part of space, or that the infinite Spirit is in any way dependent on space.

VII. Personality. God is a personal being, one who knows, feels, and wills. This is proved (1) By the direct testimony of Scripture. Every attribute and action of a personal being is ascribed to him. (2) By the indirect testimony of Scripture; which is to this effect, that man was made in the image of God, and man was personal the first day of his life. Besides, personal life is the highest life.

VIII. Trinity. God is a tri-personal being; for the Scriptures reveal (1) The deity of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, respectively (John i. 1; Acts v. 3, 4). (2) Their mutual knowledge and love (Matt. xi. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 10; Matt. iii. 17; John iii. 35; iv. 34; v. 30; Rom. viii. 27). (3) Their distinct, yet relative offices (1 Cor. xii. 4-6; Eph. ii. 18-20). Remarks. (a) A distinction is to be made between what is above and what is against human reason. (b) The words "person" and "personal" are modified by the essential unity of the Godhead, and only signify that the distinction is of a personal nature. (c) There is no manifest contradiction between an assertion that God is one in essence and an assertion that the Godhead is tri-personal. (d) The doctrine of the tri-personality of God assists us to comprehend in some measure his self-sufficiency and his love.¹

"God from eternity is love. But if love is communion, if its nature is self-surrender, he cannot exist without having an object to which he gives himself. If he were self-satisfied, self would rule in his nature; and he would be the principle of all egoism. He needs another self to whom he may give himself. But what self could satisfy him,—could be one whom he could make a sharer of all his glory, and in whom his life could find its all? To be satisfied, love longs for an equal. As God has not his equal, he can, therefore, in an original and perfect way love only himself; but himself, not in his own, but in another self,—in a self which is like himself, and in concrete nature one with himself. This is the Son. But the Son, because spirit and equal with the Father, is, like the Father, love. Whom does the Son love? Whom, but the Father? The Father loves the Son, the Son the Father. Their love is mutual.

¹ Weisse (C. H.) "Zur Vertheidigung des Begriffes der immanenten Wesens-trinität," in St. u. Kr. 1841, 345 ff.; Köster (F.) "Nachweis der Spuren einer Trinitätslehre vor Christo," in St. u. Kr. 1846, 436 ff.

But it is a law that true mutual love unites in a third. One would be bound up in another, and lose itself in him, if in self-surrender it found its all in him. Both remain free in their perfect self-surrender, if a third, equally dear to both, comes in. The bond of friendship is consecrated, if the two friends seek a common end. And, the higher this end, the nobler and firmer the bond. However inward the mutual love of husband and wife, it tends to pass beyond them to a third, and, indeed, to a third like themselves,—personal, on which their common love may rest. First in the child, the peculiar family blessing, does the marriage life become complete. And the same law rules in divine love. The mutual love of the Father and the Son only becomes perfect self-communication in a third. And, since it is the highest love, it demands the highest object,—one that is no less than divine. Can it be the common, divine nature, in which their love rejoices? Love is only satisfied perfectly in an ego. And so the love of God is not without a third ego in the common concrete nature,—is not without the Holy Spirit.”¹

ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.²

In considering the attributes of God, it will be convenient to follow the ordinary analysis of man’s spiritual powers—intellect, conscience, sensibility, and will.

¹ Slightly condensed from Schöberlein (L.) “Die Grundlehren des Heiligtums entwickelt aus dem Princip der Liebe,” s. 22 sq.

² Jackson (T.) “A Treatise on the Divine Essence and attributes;” Macculloch (J.) “Proofs and Illustrations of the Attributes of God.”

I. Omniscience. God knows all objects and events that ever have been or ever will be, either actual or possible. His understanding is infinite. In proof of this statement, our appeal may be made (1) To the testimony of Scripture. (a) 1 Kings viii. 39; Ps. cxxxix. 2, 11, 12; Jer. xvi. 17; Luke xvi. 15; Rom. viii. 27; Heb. iv. 13. (b) Isa. xlii. 9; Ex. iii. 18 sq.; Jer. i. 5; Ps. cxxxix. 16; 1 Sam. xxiii. 10-13. (2) To the testimony of reason. For omniscience is presupposed by the perfection, and assured by the eternity and omnipresence of a personal being.

It may also be remarked, (a) That the knowledge of God is intuitive, independent, complete, and timeless; and, (b) That it is consistent (1) with a real though derived energy in physical causes; (2) with a real though limited freedom in voluntary causes; and (3) with purpose and election on the part of God. Cicero denied the second position thus: "If all future events are foreknown, they will occur as they are foreknown; and, if they will occur in this order, the order of events is certain to the foreknowing God; and, if the order of events is certain, the order of causes is certain; for nothing can take place which is not preceded by some efficient cause. But, if the order of the causes of all events is certain, all events come to pass by fate. If this be so, there is nothing in our power, and there is no choice of will." — ("De Fato et Divinatione," ii. 5-7).

And to his argument, Augustine thus replies: "It does not follow, that, if the order of all causes is certain to God, nothing depends on the choice of our will; for our volitions themselves are in the order of causes, which is certain to God, and foreknown by him, inasmuch as human volitions are the causes of human deeds. Hence, whoever knows all the causes of events cannot be ignorant of our volitions, as being also among those causes. So, then, we are by no means compelled, either, retaining the foreknowledge of God, to remove choice of will, or, retaining choice of will, to deny God's foreknowledge of future events; but we embrace both, — one, that we may believe well; the other, that we may live well." — ("De Civ. Dei," v. 9, 10.) This reply may not be wholly satisfactory; yet it probably states the truth with sufficient accuracy.

II. Righteousness. This attribute of God answers to a perfect conscience in man, and is the source of moral law to all created moral beings. Some writers prefer to call it holiness; and the only objection to this is the circumstance that the term holiness appears to be used in certain passages of Scripture to denote the sum total of moral perfections in God, and is therefore equivalent to righteousness and benevolence.

In proof of God's righteousness, we appeal (1) To the Word of God, (a) Ps. xi. 7; xv. 1; xxxiii. 5; xlv. 8; Lev. xix. 2; Isa. vi. 3. (b) Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. xcvi. 2; cxlv. 17; Rom. ii. 13; vii. 12. (2) To reason; for this attribute is comprehended in our idea of perfection. (3) To conscience; for we are often reminded by this inward monitor that God is displeased with sin. (4) To our religious instinct; which requires righteousness in the object of worship.

It may also be remarked, (a) That the justice of God is his righteousness, as expressed in moral government. (b) That righteousness cannot be sacrificed to benevolence. (c) That, from different points of view, the righteousness and benevolence of God may in all cases seek the same things, and, thus acting, neither of them be any check upon the other. (d) That the words, anger, fury, vengeance, &c., when applied to God, denote no effervescent passion, but an eternal and unchangeable hatred of moral evil. (e) That such expressions do not exaggerate God's hostility to sin.—(Lac. De Ira V. 9). And (f) That temporal calamities do not generally prove that those who suffer them are specially guilty in the sight of God (Job i.; Luke xiii. 2-5; John ix. 1-3; Heb. xii. 6.)

III. Benevolence. By this, we mean that God desires the welfare of his creatures, with a desire most powerful and most pure. In proof of this may be alleged (1) The testimony of Scripture (Ps. lvii. 11; cxlv. 9; ciii. 11-13; cxxxvi. 1-26; Isa. xlix. 14-16; Matt. v. 45; vii. 11; Luke xii. 7; John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 8, 18; 1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Ezek. xviii. 23; xxxiii. 11). (2) The testimony of reason. The moral perfection of God, and the predominance of happiness over misery in the animal world, may be insisted upon in this connection.

It may now be remarked, (a) That the grace of God is his benevolence as exercised towards the guilty or the undeserving. (b) That the mercy of God is his benevolence, as exercised towards those who are miserable, as well as guilty. (c) That the patience of God is his benevolence, as exercised in forbearing to punish the guilty without delay. (d) That the wisdom of God is his omniscience, exercised with righteousness and benevolence in securing the best ends by the best means.

IV. Omnipotence. God can effect whatever power can effect, under the influence of perfect holiness and love.

In proof of this, we may appeal (1) To the testimony of Scripture (Matt. xix. 26; Luke i. 37; Eph. iii. 20; 2 Cor. vi. 18; Gen. xviii. 14; Jer. xxvii. 5; Isa. xl. 26; (cf. Job. xli.) Ps. cxxxvi. 4; Jer. xxxii. 17). (2) To the testimony of reason. The perfection of God, and the creation of the universe, suggest omnipotence in God.

The perfection of God may also be indicated by the following affirmations and negations:—

1. That he is a living Being or Spirit, having (a) a perfect intellect, which gives in action omniscience. (b) A perfect conscience, which gives in action absolute righteousness. (c) A perfect sensibility, which gives in action all right feeling and desire. (d) A perfect will, which does all that power can do, under the direction of perfect knowledge, holiness, and love.

2. That he is an infinite Being or Spirit, and so (a) Independent of any other being or force,—uncreated himself, and the creator of all else.¹ (b) Unconditioned by time or space, which condition all finite being; that is, eternal and omnipresent. (c) Unchangeable in essence, in knowledge, in character, and in blessedness.

¹ Mosheim says: “Deus est illa natura, quæ ipsa independens est, et ex qua reliqua omnia pendent”; and, from the independence of God, he proceeds to infer all his other perfections,—unity, spirituality, immensity, eternity, immutability; while from the dependence of all other things upon him are inferred his life, intelligence, and freedom.

Query: Is conscience a separate faculty, or simply a peculiar exercise of intellect and feeling?¹

PURPOSE OF GOD.

The word "purpose" is often used to denote the resolve or determination of the mind to seek a particular object. But it cannot be wise for an omniscient Being to make any thing an end of action, unless it is known to be attainable; and, if it is known to be attainable, the means or mode of attaining it must also be known. Accordingly, the purpose of God, embracing both end and means, must comprehend whatever he has determined to do or to permit.²

This is evident from many portions of Scripture, (for example, Acts xv. 18; xvii. 26; Rom. viii. 28; ix. 11; Eph. i. 4, 11; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 2 Tim. i. 9; 1 Cor. ii. 7; Matt. xxv. 34; Acts ii. 23; iv. 27, 28; Ps. lxxvi. 11; Prov. xvi. 4, 9.)

From these and similar passages, it appears that the purpose of God (a) antedates creation; (b) springs from his own good pleasure; (c) embraces all the events of time; and, (d) goes into effect in every instance.

Contemplated from the divine side, such a purpose seems to be reasonable and necessary. How a perfect Being could undertake the work of creation without such a purpose is inconceivable.

But, contemplated from the human side, it appears, at first sight, to be inconsistent with moral freedom and accountability. Whether it is so or not depends, however, upon the way in which the purpose is accomplished. It may interfere with human freedom no more than does perfect foreknowledge.

¹ See an elaborate and, in many respects, excellent analysis of the Divine Attributes, as attributes of Being, of Knowledge, and of Will, in Hase's "Huterus Redivivus."—Pt. II. sects. 58, 59, 60.

² Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," I. c. ix.; "The Decrees of God"; Balmer (Robt.) "Remarks on the Doctrine of the Divine Decrees," in "Theol. Tracts," iii. 207-17; Baird (S. J.) "The Eternal Plan," in "The Elohim Revealed," ch. II.; Chalmers (T.) "Institutes of Theology," vol. II. Pt. III. c. 3; "Predestination"; Oosterzee (J. J. van) "Christian Dogmatics," vol. II. p. 448 sq.; Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, "The Decrees of God," 60 sq.

The same reply must be made to those who assert that such a purpose on the part of God renders the use of means needless and vain. For there is every reason to believe that this purpose is to be accomplished, in a great measure, by the use of means.

Says Canon Liddon, in a discourse on "Prayer, the Characteristic Action of Religion," "God orders all that happens to us, and, in virtue of his infinite knowledge, by eternal decrees. But he also says to us, in the plainest language, that he does answer prayer; and, that practically his dealings with us are governed, in matters of the greatest importance, as well as of the least, by the petitions which we address to him. What if prayers and actions, to us at the moment perfectly spontaneous, are eternally foreseen, and included within the all-embracing predestination of God, as factors and causes, working out that final result, which, beyond all dispute, is the product of his good pleasure? Whether I open my mouth, or lift my hand, is, before my doing it, strictly within the jurisdiction and power of my personal will; but, however I may decide, my decision, so absolutely free to me, will have been already incorporated by the all-seeing, all-controlling Being, as an integral part, however insignificant, of his one, all-embracing purpose, leading on to effects and causes beyond itself. Prayer, too, is only a foreseen action of man; which, together with its results, is embraced in the eternal predestination of God. . . . That which is to us a free self-determination may be not other than a foreseen element of his work." — Prayer-Gauge Debate, p. 300.

In considering the purpose of God as logically antecedent to his action ad extra, it is natural to inquire after the chief end sought by him in that action; for a reasonable being always acts with a view to the accomplishment of some end or ends which are deemed worthy.¹

¹ Edwards (J. Sen.) "A Dissertation concerning the End for which God created the World," "Theol. Tracts," II. 293 sq.; Martin (J.) "The Glory of God as the Great End of Moral Action," in "Theol. Tracts," III. 221-42; Baird (S. J.) "God's Object was to reveal himself," in the "Elohim Revealed," p. 84 sq.

The Scriptures suggest two distinguishable, if not opposite ends, for the attainment of which God undertook the work of creation and moral government, namely, the manifestation of his own glory, and the communication of good to his creatures.

Of the passages which suggest that the end for which God created the world was his own glory, the following may be cited: (Prov. xvi. 4; Rom. xi. 36; Col. i. 16; Heb. ii. 10; Isa. xlviii. 11; xliii. 6, 7; lx. 21; lxi. 3; Eph. i. 5; John xvii. 10; 2 Thess. i. 10-12; 1 Peter iv. 11; Rev. xiv. 6, 7; 1 Cor. vi. 20; x. 31; 1 Cor. i. 26-30; Eph. ii. 8-10.)

Of those which suggest that the end for which he created the world was the good of his creatures, the following deserve attention: (Ps. ciii. 9; Ezek. xviii. 32; xxxiii. 11; Lam. iii. 33; 2 Pet. iii. 9; John iii. 16; Eph. ii. 4; 1 John iv. 9, 10, 16; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. v. 20; Deut. vii. 7, 8; Ps. xxv. 8; xxxi. 17; xlv. 26; 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23; 2 Cor. iv. 15; Ps. cxxxvi. 4-9.)

It is possible to unite these ends, and suppose that the one supreme end and reason for God's action ad extra is the manifestation of his glory in the communication of good to other beings. And the fact that we become like him by being animated with love to others leads to a belief that his purpose to manifest his own glory is intrinsically the same as his purpose to create other beings, and impart to them the greatest possible good, and vice versa.

But is not the existence of evil, and especially of moral evil in the world, incompatible with this identification? By many, it is asserted to be so; by others, it is denied to be so; and, by still others, it is said that, owing to his limited knowledge, man is unable to determine whether it is so or not.¹

If a universe which contains in it a race of beings able to do wrong as well as to do right is on the whole better, notwithstanding the presence of sin, than a universe without such a race of beings, the question may be answered in the negative; and this view is required by the scriptural and rational doctrine of God's perfection.

¹ Ballantyne (John) "On the Origin of Evil"; Bellamy (Jos.) "The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin"; Young (John) "Evil not of God"; Barnes (Alb.) "Sin and Suffering in the Universe," in the Am. Presby. Rev. 1869-70; Ernesti (H. F. T. L.) "Ursprung der Sünde."

It may then be said that God purposed to originate a universe which would contain beings who could do wrong as well as right, and to use none but moral means in preventing them from doing wrong. His purpose included a permission of moral evil in this sense only—that he would not effectively exclude it from the universe, but not in the sense that he authorized any one to commit sin, or left any moral being in doubt respecting his hatred of sin.

The doctrine of the divine purpose tends to fill the soul with adoring thoughts of God, and humble thoughts of self. Yet it is so apprehended by many as to make them feel that God is a "hard master." It should, therefore, be studied with the utmost reverence and trust, and taught with the greatest care, in order that misapprehension may, if possible, be prevented.

"And not alone the natures are foreseen
Within the mind that in itself is perfect,
But they together with their preservation.
For whatsoever thing this bow shoots forth
Falls foreordained unto an end foreseen,
Even as a shaft directed to its mark."

Dante Paradiso, VIII. 100.

CREATION BY GOD THROUGH THE WORD.

The first act of God in carrying into effect his purpose was that of creation. And by the act of creation is meant an act that originated being, and thereby increased the sum total of force in existence. For while neither the essence nor the power of God was diminished by that act, new being and power, in some sense outside of himself, were brought into existence by it.

This statement is favored (1) By the language of Scripture. (a) John xvii. 5, 24; Eph. i. 4; (b) Matt. xix. 4; Mark xiii. 19; Rev. x. 6; Gen. i. 1; (c) Heb. xi. 3; Rom. iv. 17. Hence (a) there was a time when the worlds were not yet founded; (b) their establishment was a work of God; and (c) the visible universe was not formed out of any thing previously existing. (2) By the absolute perfection of God. For the only alternative to it is pantheism or dualism; that is, (a) the doctrine that there is no reality except God, or an emanation from God; or (b) the doctrine that either matter or spirit, outside of God, is eternal and self-existent.

But, against this view of creation, two objections have been urged, (1) That it is unthinkable, and therefore cannot be true. But many things are credible which are nevertheless unthinkable. And (2) that it supposes a limit to the being of God, and thereby pronounces him finite. But this is a mistake. It rather declares his power and wisdom to be unlimited. No perfection of his nature is abridged by the view; though, if it be correct, he is not the sum total of being.

This first act of God was carried into effect by the agency of the eternal Word (John i. 3, 10; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2, 3). The language of these passages does not mean that God, the Father, exerted through the Word, as a medium, power which did not belong to the Word himself; but that the Word represented and revealed the power of God, the Father, in this act. The acting personality was that of the Word; but he did not act by himself alone: his nature was one with the Father's, and his action was a perfect expression of the Father's nature and will.

Whether matter and spirit were created at the same instant, or at different times, the Scriptures do not affirm. It seems, however, to be intimated that the creation of angels was prior to that of men, and indeed to the present order of the material universe (Job xxxviii. 7; Gen. iii. 1, 24). But it is not, therefore, necessary to suppose that they were created before the substance of which the material universe has been formed was called into being. If creation may be divided into several acts, the following order of succession is probable:—

(a) The creation of matter in its primitive state; but what that state was has never been ascertained. Probably, however, matter was endowed at first with the properties which it now possesses, and was put into such motion that subsequent changes have been, for the most part, natural results of the properties and motions thus given to it.

(b) The creation of vegetable and animal life-forces, as soon as the earth, or any other planet, was ready to receive and support them. The evidence in favor of successive creations has not, it seems to me, been met by any equal evidence in favor of progress from race to race by natural development and selection.

(c) The creation of men when the earth had been prepared for their reception. And, by men, are to be understood rational, moral, and religious beings, not essentially different from those who now inhabit the earth. The date of man's advent cannot be ascertained with certainty from any statements made by Scripture, or from any facts yet discovered by science.

(R) Just where the creation of angels should be placed must be left undecided.

PRESERVATION BY GOD THROUGH THE WORD.

All things created owe their continuance in being to the power of God. Two propositions are embraced in this statement: first, that all created things have a being or nature of their own. And, second, that this being or nature is forever dependent on God.

The statement is therefore opposed to either a pantheistic, dualistic, or deistic view of the relation which God holds to the world. For pantheism embraces the world in the idea of God, while dualism regards the world as uncreated and antagonistic to God; and deism pronounces the world, once created, perfect and self-sufficient. But the statement given above makes the world real, though created and dependent.¹

In proof of this statement, reference may be made to the following passages of Scripture: (Job x. 12; Ps. civ. 29, 30; Isa. xl. 26, 29; Neh. ix. 6; Acts xvii. 28; Heb. i. 3; Col. i.

¹ Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," I, p. 278 sq.

17.) And from them it is evident that the sacred writers do not represent preservation as equivalent to a perpetual act of creation; but, on the other hand, they clearly distinguish it from simple oversight, care, or direction.

If it be objected that the view here given makes God the upholder of moral evil, since he upholds the evil-doer at the very instant and in the very act of evil-doing, it may be replied, (a) That God upholds what he has created, namely, the free moral agent; but he neither upholds, nor has he created, evil-doing. (b) That the nature of moral government appears to justify, if not to require, the very course which God pursues; for to give the sinner time to repent is to give him time which he may use in further sin. And (c) That God forbids wrong doing, and brings a vast amount of moral influence to bear against it.

The doctrine that all created beings are forever dependent on God for existence, having no absolute life of their own, not only agrees with a certain feeling of dependence which is instinctive in man, but also tends to unite the Christian's heart to God by a sense of unspeakable gratitude. He would not have it otherwise. He delights in the thought that underneath him are the everlasting arms.

PROVIDENCE OF GOD IN CHRIST.

The word "providence" means, primarily, foresight. But as human foresight is associated with plans and efforts to bring to pass certain results, the word "providence" has come to signify the provision which God makes for attaining the ends of his government, and so the care which he takes of all his people, indeed, of all his creatures.¹

¹ Baird (S. J.) "The Providential Administration," in "Elohim Revealed," p. 100 sq.; Calvin (J.) "Institutio Christianæ Religionis," Lib. I. c. 16; Davidson (A. D.) "Lectures Expository and Practical on the Book of Esther"; Flavel (J.) "Divine Conduct; or, the Mystery of Providence"; South (R.) I. VIII. "All Contingencies under God's Providence"; Bushnell (H.) "Sermons of the New Life," "Every Man's Life a Plan of God"; Hitchcock (E.) "Special Divine Interpositions in Nature," in Bib. Sac. XI. 776 sq.; Sherlock (W.) "A Dis-

Of course, therefore, his "providence" is but a part of his work in carrying into effect his "purpose;" and a large part of the scriptural testimony to the existence of his "purpose" is proof of his "providence." Provision rests upon a plan. "I believe," says Bacon, "that God. . . doth accomplish and fulfil his divine will in all things, great and small, singular and general, as fully and exactly by Providence as he could by miracle."

The providence of God embraces such particulars as these: (a) Direct action of his own in the hearts of men (Matt. xviii. 20; (cf. xxviii. 20); John xiv. 20, 21; Phil. iv. 13; (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 3); Rom. v. 5; Gal. v. 22; Phil. ii. 13). (b) Divine action blended with human, as in prayer (Rom. viii. 26; John xvi. 23; (cf. xiv. 13, 14; Prov. xvi. 1, 9; xx. 24; xxi. 1); Jer. x. 23). (c) Divine action adapted to the moral states of men (Gen. vi. 11-13; xviii. 20, 21; xix. 24; (cf. Ex. xix. 16 sq.); Josh. iii. 16; John iii. 10; Heb. ii. 4). (d) Divine power over-ruling and using the wickedness of men (Gen. i. 20; Ex. iii. 19-21. (cf. ix. 12); 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23; Ps. lxxvi. 11; Rom. ix. 17; Isa. x. 5, 7, 12, 15; (cf. Acts xvi. 22-39); Prov. xvi. 4; (cf. Waterland, Vol. V. p. 479 sq.). (e) Divine power, using good and evil angels (Ps. ciii. 20; Heb. i. 14; Matt. xviii. 10; Acts v. 19; 2 Sam. xxiv. 1; (cf. 1 Chron. xxi. 1). (f) Divine power, making use of irrational creatures and the elements of nature (Ex. viii. 12, 13, 16, 19; Josh. x. 11; Joel i. 4-12).

In administering his moral government providentially, God sometimes reveals its fundamental principles by laws adapted in form and detail to the condition of those addressed. Thus the laws of the Mosaic economy, in respect to domestic servitude, divorce for other cause than adultery, revenge for injury to kindred, and distinction of clean animals from unclean, course concerning the Divine Providence"; Charnock (S.) "The Providence of God"; Spurgeon (C. H.) 2d Series, "God's Providence"; Zwingli (U.) "De Providentia Dei," 1530; Leibnitz (G. W.) "Essais de Théodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté d'homme et l'origine du Mal"; Lange (J. P.) in Herzog "Real-Enkyclopädie" s. v. "Vorsehung."

were adapted to the condition of the people as a theocracy for that time.

So close a connection unites all parts and events of the created universe that God's government must be providential over every part and event, or over nothing at all. Hence the propriety of distinguishing between a general and a special providence is doubtful. Perhaps it would be well to characterize the providence of God as special in the case of miracles, gracious in respect to Christians, and particular in all things.

While every event is to be regarded as strictly providential, it is not in all cases easy to ascertain the import of a particular event. But, the more momentous an event is to any person, the more emphatically does God appeal to him by it.

Yet this by no means justifies one in denying the care of God over small events and insignificant beings. Jerome greatly erred in saying, "It is absurd to draw down the majesty of God, so that he know at every moment how many gnats are born, how many die; what a multitude of bugs, fleas, and flies there may be in the earth; how many fishes swim in the water. We are not such foolish adulators of God as that, while we draw his power down to the lowest matters, we are injurious to ourselves, saying that there is the same Providence over rational and irrational beings." Just the view of heathen philosophers!—" Magna dii curant, parva negligunt" (Cic. de nat. deor. ii. 66). But the Christian view is well expressed by Ambrose, a contemporary of Jerome: "What architect neglects the care of his own work? Who deserts and neglects what he has thought proper himself to found? If it is unworthy of him to rule it, was it not more unworthy of him to make it?"

No other doctrine of the divine government satisfies the Christian heart half as well as the scriptural one,—that it is throughout providential; and it is strikingly suggested by the words of a pagan writer: "If God will, you are safe, though you swim on a straw."

DOCTRINE OF ANGELS.

It may be premised, (1) that the word "angels" is here used to denote an order of rational beings distinct from mankind; (2) that our knowledge of such beings is derived from the Bible alone; (3) that the Bible speaks of them because of their connection with men in certain relations and events; (4) that Satan and demons will be regarded as fallen angels; and (5) that other applications of the term "angels" will not be considered in this place.—See (a) (Gen. xvi. 7, 10, 13; xviii. 13 sq.); (b) (Eccl. v. 5; Isa. xlii. 19; Mal. iii. 1; 1 Sam. xi. 3); (c) (Ps. civ. 4).

I. The NATURE of angels; or, in other words, their essence, their power, and their knowledge.¹

(1) The essence or substance of angels. It has been commonly believed by Christians that angels are personal beings who exist without bodies. And, in support of this belief, reference is made, (a) To passages of Scripture which call them "spirits: (for example, Heb. i. 14; 1 Kings xxii. 21; Mark ix. 20, 25; Luke xxiv. 39; 1 Sam. xvi. 14, 16, 23; xviii. 10; xix. 9; Luke vii. 21; viii. 2; Acts xix. 12, 15; 1 Tim. iv. 1). (b) To passages which represent them as God's attendants and ministers (Luke i. 19; Gen. xxxii. 1, 2; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 18; Matt. xxiv. 16; xxvi. 53; Luke xv. 10). (c) To passages which represent them as superior to the known laws of matter (Acts xii. 7; Num. xxii. 23-27, 32, 33; 1 Chron. xxi. 14-16, 27). (d) To passages which represent them as taking possession of men (Matt. xii. 26-29; Luke

¹ See on the whole subject, Ode (J.) "Commentarius de Angelis," 1739; Twisten (A. D. C.) Dogmatik, II. 305-383, in Bib. Sac. I. 768-793, II. 108-140 Mayor (L.) "Scriptural Idea of Angels," in Am. Bib. Repos., Oct. 1838, XII 356-388; Stuart (M.) "Sketches of Angelology in the Old and New Test." Bib. Sac. I. 88-154; Whately (R.) "Scripture Revelations respecting Good and Evil Angels"; Timpson (.) "The Angels of God; their Nature, Character, Ranks," &c., 2d ed., London, 1847; Rawson (J.) "Nature and Ministry of the Holy Angels," N. Y. 1853; also articles in Herzog, Smith, Kitto, Fairbairn, McClintock and Strong; and Theologies; e. g. Hahn (G. L.) Die Theologie des N. T." s. 259 sq.

iv. 33, 35, 36, 41), and many others. Taken by themselves, these passages afford very considerable evidence that angels are bodiless.

But against this belief and evidence, the following arguments have been brought : (a) The words of Christ in Luke xx. 26, which are supposed to prove that angels have bodies similar to those of the glorified saints; for the saints after the resurrection are said to be "like angels." Yet the words of Christ, strictly interpreted, only prove that glorified saints will not marry, because they cannot die; and they cannot die because they are like angels, being sons of God. They may, then, be different from angels, in that they have immortal bodies; while they are like them in the particulars named by Christ.

(b) The words of Jude vv. 6-8, are supposed to attribute a carnal nature to certain angels, and indeed to have reference to the wickedness described in Gen. vi. 2, 4. And it is argued that the expression "sons of God" in the latter passage signifies angels. (1) Because the same expression denotes angels in other parts of the Bible; (for example Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxix. 7; Ps. lxxxvii. 7; Luke xx. 36). But, it is replied, that pious men are virtually called "sons of God," in the Old Testament; (for example Ex. iv. 22; Deut. xiv. 1; xxxii. 5; Ps. lxxiii. 15; Hosea ii. 2); and that all Christians are represented as "sons of God" in the New Testament; (for example Gal. iii. 26; iv. 5, 6). (2) Because the manifest contrast between "sons of God" and "daughters of men" requires us to interpret the former of superhuman beings,—that is, angels. This contrast, however, is sufficiently marked by supposing the former to have been the pious descendants of Seth; while the latter were the ungodly descendants of Cain. (3) Because this passage, thus interpreted, explains the otherwise unintelligible reference in Jude. This may be admitted, and still the inquiry be raised whether it is not better to leave the reference in Jude obscure and doubtful than to suppose evil angels capable of the unnatural offence ascribed to them by the proposed interpretation.¹

(c) Many passages of Scripture represent angels as appearing to men in visible forms (Gen. xviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 4; Acts i. 10). To this it may be replied, that in order to appear at all, they must assume a form of some kind, and a human form would be more suitable than any other. Besides, they are represented, also, as eating human food; and, if we infer that their corporeal appearance was normal, shall we not be constrained to infer that their eating of flesh, &c., was also normal?

(d) The existence of finite beings who are incorporeal is said to be absurd. Bodies are necessary to bring them under the laws of space. They must have a material ποῦ σῶμα and this must be a living body. But who knows this to be true? Our experience may be of little value in showing the possibilities of existence. With the same boldness, some say that an Infinite Being cannot know or will.²

On the whole, we think the weight of evidence in support of the belief that angels are incorporeal beings is greater than that which favors the opposite belief, — “Adhuc sub iudice lis est.”

2. The power of angels. This must be very great, as compared with that of men (Ps. ciii. 20; 2 Peter ii. 10; 2 Thess. i. 7; (cf. Gen. x. 9; Isa. ix. 5). Both of the words in the first passage refer properly to strength or power, — mighty in power, or strong in might. Both of the terms used to define the superiority of angels in the second passage denote power, in the proper sense of the word. And angels are described, in the third, as “the angels of his might,” meaning, those by whom the power of the Lord Jesus will be wielded, or, at least, fitly represented, at his appearing. The texts to be compared illustrate the use of the principal Hebrew term applied to angels in Ps. ciii. 20.

¹ See Hofmann, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, Kurtz, Knobel, Kalisch; and, on the other hand, Keil, Reinke, Vol. V., Calvin, and a great majority of interpreters.

² See Bib. Sac. Oct. 1876, p. 740 sq.

To these statements, and to others of a similar character found in Scripture, may be added the fact that God is often called "Jehovah of hosts," because the angels, as a great army, do his bidding; and, from the way in which this designation is applied, we naturally infer that the soldiers of the heavenly host are mighty and glorious, answering, in some slight degree, and far better than any earthly beings, to the greatness of God. The following passages are also worthy of notice, as they indicate the might of certain angels, if not of all (Rev. v. 2; x. 1; xviii. 21; xx. 1-3).

Yet the power of angels is strictly finite, and, therefore, as nothing in comparison with that of God. They are never represented as sharing in the work of creation; and they are always described as subject to God or to Christ. — (See Heb. i. 14; ii. 5; Jude 9.)

3. The knowledge of angels. That this is very great, as compared with that of men in the present life, may be inferred, (a) From the language of Christ, as preserved in Matt. xxiv. 36; Mark xiii. 32; for obviously this language is ascensive or climacteric, assuming a greater knowledge on the part of angels than on the part of men. The belief of the Jews in the time of David is probably indicated by the words of the wise woman of Tekoah to David (2 Sam. xiv. 17, 20); but we cannot appeal to that belief as certainly correct. (b) From the circumstance that they appear to have been for a long time at home with God (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Isa. vi. 3; Matt. xviii. 10; xxii. 30). We do not, it is true, know the time when the angels were created; but it is generally supposed that their creation preceded that of men, if not of the whole visible universe (Job xxxviii. 7). (c) From the devout interest or curiosity which they are said to feel in the work of divine grace (1 Peter i. 12; Luke ii. 13 sq.; Eph. iii. 10; 1 Tim. iii. 16; v. 21; (cf. Rev. v. 11, 12). (d) From instances of demoniac and satanic intelligence recorded in the gospels (Mark i. 24; Matt. v. 1 sq.; (cf. Acts xix. 15).

But it is evident from the same passages that the knowledge of angels is limited, and, in this respect, unlike that of God.

Indeed, it is by no means certain that either good or evil angels can know what are the thoughts of any man by direct intuition, though they may be marvellously sagacious in conjecturing human thoughts. Neither Gabriel nor Satan is to be supposed omniscient or omnipresent.

II. The CHARACTER of angels. The word character is here used as a synonyme for moral character, and in this respect they may be said to form two perfectly distinct classes. For, —

1. Many of them are sinless. This may be inferred (a) from the epithets applied to them by the sacred writers (Acts x. 22; 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Cor. xi. 14; (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 2; Zech. xiv. 5). In the second passage referred to, they are called “elect angels”; probably because they hold some such relation to other angels as “the elect” among men do to other men. Elliott says, “With such passages as 2 Peter ii. 4, Jude 6, before us, it seems impossible to doubt that the ‘elect angels’ are those who kept their first estate, and who shall form part of that countless host (Jude 14; Dan. viii. 10) that shall attend the Lord’s second advent.” (b) From the place where they dwell (Luke i. 19; vii. 8, 9; Matt. xviii. 10; Mark xii. 25; Rev. v. 11). It is impossible to suppose that impure beings would be represented as having their home with God in heaven. (c) From the worship which they are said to pay unto God (Rev. v. 11; vii. 11 sq.; Isa. vi. 3). (d) From the offices which they are said to perform (Gen. xxviii. 12; Matt. xxvi. 53; Luke xxii. 43; xvi. 22; Heb. i. 14; (cf. Heb. xiii. 2).

As to the present character of this class of angels, the teaching of the Bible is sufficiently explicit. But the history of mankind naturally suggests to us many queries in respect to the history of holy angels; for example, were they ever in a state of probation? Were they once tried, as were our first parents, to see if they would remain obedient to God? An affirmative answer may be given, with some confidence, to this question; both because such a trial seems necessary in itself to the proper training of moral beings under God, and also because certain angels appear to have fallen away from their allegiance to God. Are they now in a state of probation? Probably not; or, at least, in no other sense than a moral being is always under probation; in no other sense than glorified men will be under probation hereafter. Have they always been holy, or have they been recovered from a sinful state? There appears to be no evidence in the Bible, unless it be the use of the word "elect" in 1 Tim. v. 21, that any of the holy angels were ever guilty of sin; and this adjective is scarcely sufficient to justify us in supposing a fall and recovery of good angels. Is their stability in virtue due, in part, to either angelic or human apostasy? It may be. Beholding the ruin that has overtaken other offenders, they may have been forewarned, and, seeing the wonders of redemption, they may have learned to love more than they otherwise would. Is their blessedness due at all to the work of Christ? Probably, yea, certainly, it is; for they take a profound interest in his work and the glory of his kingdom; but it is unsafe to infer, from Eph. i. 10 and Col. i. 20, that they have any need of the atonement as a means of redemption. These passages, however, indicate the unity of God's moral government, and the reason why some knowledge of angels is given to men.

2. Many of them are sinful. This may be learned (a) From the epithets which are applied to them; (for example Matt. x. 1; Mark iii. 11; Luke ix. 42; Matt. xii. 45; Luke viii. 2; Acts xix. 12-16). (b) From the place where they are said to dwell; (for example 2 Peter ii. 4; Jude 6; Luke viii. 31; Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. xx. 7, 10). (c) From the work which they are said to perform; (for example Job i. 6-9; ii. 1 sq.; Zech. iii. 1, 2; 1 Sam. xvi. 14; xviii. 10; 1 Kings xxii. 21 sq.; Zech. xiii. 2; Rev. xii. 10; Matt. xiii. 39; Luke viii. 12; John viii. 44; xiii. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 7; 2 Tim. ii. 26; 1 Peter v. 8; Eph. vi. 11, 12; 1 Tim. iv. 1).

Several queries are also suggested by the language of Scripture in respect to evil spirits; for example, (a) Are demons, together with Satan, fallen angels? We have assumed this to be the meaning of Scripture, and would refer to the following passages in support of our assumption: (2 Peter ii. 4; Jude 6.) But some have insisted that Satan was never a holy being, appealing to the following passages: (John viii. 44; 1 John iii. 8; Rev. xii. 9.) It is, however, incorrect to suppose that the phrase, "from the beginning," as used by John, refers to any other beginning than that spoken of in Gen. i. 1. The sinfulness of Satan antedates that of mankind. He has been known to our race in no other character than that of a tempter and seducer. To suppose that he was created morally evil is absurd; and to suppose that he is uncreated is to deny the supremacy of God. The only view consistent with biblical monotheism is that of his early apostacy; and, if he apostatized, so also did all his angels, — that is, the demons.

(b) Are they all doomed to eternal punishment? The Bible appears to render this certain (Matt. xxv. 41; 2 Peter ii. 4; Rev. xx. 2, 3, 10 (cf. Eph. i. 10, 21, 22; Col. i. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 25). The passages inclosed in parenthesis have been thought by some to predict a final restoration of all beings, including fallen angels, to the favor of God; but they do not seem to me to warrant such a view.

(c) Has the recovery of their forfeited state ever been possible? The Bible nowhere intimates that it has; while the most natural inference from the language of Peter and Jude is, that it has not. Many modern critics affirm that the language of Peter and Jude can only be reconciled with that of other parts of Scripture, by supposing that some of the apostate angels have been kept in close confinement since their fall, while others have been allowed to roam abroad and tempt mankind. But this view is precarious; and, even if it were correct, it would not prove that any offer of pardon has been made to the unconfined apostates. Besides, the Bible seems to assign the first place in evil to Satan, who is certainly represented, as in some sense, free to wander up and down the earth, tempting mankind. Perhaps tartarus is not so much a place as a state, and the confinement not so much local as moral and providential.

(d) In what did the peculiar enormity of their original sin consist? Any reply to this must be conjectural. It is evident, however, that one, at least, of the angels must have sinned without being tempted thereto by any living being; but it is improbable that this was the case with all. Hence, the enormity of their sin must be sought in something else. Perhaps it was in this, that they had greater knowledge of God than was possessed by Adam and Eve,—a knowledge due either to their longer life before sin, or to their closer relation to God, or to both these circumstances combined.

(e) Have we any right to say that their sin was greater than that of our first parents? Either their sin was greater, or some other circumstance rendered the course which was taken with men less appropriate for them. The government of God is always determined by sufficient reasons. It is holy and wise.

III. The EMPLOYMENT of angels.

1. Of good angels. This is indicated (a) By the names which are given to them in the sacred record: in Hebrew, מַלְאָכִים, properly an abstract noun, signifying execution, service, sending, but generally used as a concrete, meaning (1), messenger, and (2) messenger of God; in Greek, ἄγγελος, signifying also (1) messenger, and (2) messenger of God. It is to be observed that Hebrew names were often significant of the office or character of those to whom they were given. In this case, obviously, the name was derived from the office or employment,—that is, from the employment of this order of beings with reference to men. But it would be a hasty inference should we say that, because they are called angels, their time is mostly given to the work of bearing messages from God to his creatures. In respect to men only can their name justify such an inference. As known by men, they are God's messengers.

The same is proved (b) By the actions ascribed to them by the same authority.—See 1 Kings xix. 5; Matt. i. 20; ii. 13, 19; Luke i. 11 sq.; Acts v. 19; viii. 26; xii. 7; Heb. i. 14; Ps. xci. 12; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 18; Acts vii. 53;

Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2. From these passages we conclude that angels were often employed by Jehovah as his messengers to men, that they took some part in delivering the law on Sinai to Moses, and that they execute the will of God among men whenever he pleases, be that will gracious or retributive.

But it has been asserted with confidence (a) That particular men or nations or elements are intrusted to the care of particular angels, who are therefore called "guardian angels." (Matt. xviii. 10; Acts. xii. 15; Dan. x. 5 sq. 20, 21; xii. 1; Rev. vii. 1, 2; xiy. 8; xvi. 5; xix. 17.) In Matt. xviii. 10, it is said of believers in Christ that "their angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven"; but this may only signify that the angels who are ministering spirits to Christians dwell in heaven as their home, and are permitted to see God face to face. It does not prove that a particular angel is put in charge of a particular believer; nor does it prove that angels spend most of their time in serving the heirs of salvation. In Acts xii. 15, an expression is used which implies a belief in the doctrine of "guardian angels," and also a belief that each man's angel appeared sometimes in the semblance of the person himself. But we do not know who the speakers were; they may not have been inspired persons; and nowhere else in the Bible is there any trace of this supposed imitation of the form or voice of particular men.—See Wetstein ad loc. and the note of Hackett. Owing to the dramatic and symbolical character of Revelation, it seems to be unsafe to rely upon the representations which it gives of angels as literally exact; and therefore the doctrine of tutelary angels is nowhere taught, unless it be in the book of Daniel.

In Dan. x. 21, a heavenly messenger addressing Daniel uses the expression, "Michael, your prince"; and in xii. 1 it is said that "in those days shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people." Here, certainly, a particular angel may be meant, who was charged with the duty of guarding the interests of the chosen people; but whether he did this always, or only at a certain crisis of their history, is not stated. More exactly, it is only stated that he did this at a certain crisis.

The doctrine of tutelary angels does not, therefore, seem to be clearly taught in the holy Scriptures.

(b) It has been supposed that the holy angels are, in some real sense, an organized community, kingdom, or army. — (See Luke ii. 13; Rev. xii. 7; xix. 14; 2 Peter ii. 11; 1 Thess. iv. 16; Jude 9; (cf. Luke i. 19; Rev. viii. 2, 6; Rom. viii. 38; 1 Pet. iii. 22; Eph. iii. 10; Col. ii. 10, 15; Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16.) Also Eph. iii. 15; Heb. xii. 22, 23.)

From these passages it may be inferred (1) That holy angels do not live and act every one by himself, but rather in sublime order and concert. (2) That some of them are distinguished for wisdom and strength above their fellows, and are, therefore, under Christ, leaders of the celestial host. (3) That these leaders have different degrees of authority, according to their several ability. Hahn classifies them thus: (a) Archangels (especially Michael), or those who stand before God. (b) Primacies, ἀρχαί. Thrones, θρόνοι, or authorities, ἐξουσίαι. Powers, δυνάμεις. (c) Lordships, κυριότητες. (4) That something analagous to tribal or local divisions may exist among them. Yet this is by no means certain. (Eph. iii. 15).

(c) It has likewise been supposed that the holy angels are very numerous: (Matt. xxvi. 53; Heb. i. 14; xii. 22; Rev. v. 11; Dan. vii. 9, 10). The word of God, it will be seen, fully justifies the belief referred to. But whether the unfallen angels outnumber the fallen, we can not tell; though it would be pleasant to suppose that they do.

Remark (1) No religious veneration should be paid to angels: (Col. ii. 18; Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8, 9.)

Remark (2) Neither should they be invoked as advocates of men before the throne of God; for there is one Mediator between God and men; and, besides, angels are not omnipresent.

Remark (3) The doctrine of angels, and especially of good angels, "renders more clear our conception of the all-surpassing majesty of God,—of the divine greatness of the Lord, and of the glory of his yet future appearing. . . It raises man, by reminding him of his exalted rank and high destiny (Matt. xxii. 30). It shames the sinner, by asserting to him the possibility of a normal development of spiritual beings, and at the same time by showing to him their interest in the work of his conversion. It directs the Christian to a lofty source of consolation (Ps. xci. 11. 12); an excellent example (Matt. vi. 10), and a heart-cheering perspective" (Hebrew. xii. 22). Oosterzee.

We come now—

(2) To the employment of evil angels, which may be treated briefly, since it is, speaking generally, just the opposite of that to which good angels are devoted. The kind of activity characteristic of evil spirits is indicated, (1) By the names given to their chief,—namely, adversary, slanderer, and perhaps Apollyon (1 Chron. xxi. 1; Matt. iv. 1; ix. 34; 1 Peter v. 8; Rev. ix. 11; xii. 9, 10). His followers are like him, working toward the same end which he seeks. (2) By the actions ascribed to him or to them (1 Chron. xxi. 1; Job. i. 6 sq.; Luke viii. 12; John xiii. 2; 2 Cor. xi. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 7; iv. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 26; 1 Peter v. 8; Rev. xx. 1, 3). (3) By their taking possession of men.¹

We mention this separately, because it seems to have been limited to a brief period of time. From the accounts in the New Testament, we conclude (1) That evil spirits can so unite themselves to a human being as to control his bodily organs, causing dumbness or blindness (Matt. ix. 32; xii. 22; Luke xi. 14). (2) That they can thereby produce or aggravate disease,—as insanity, epilepsy, lunacy, emaciation (Matt. viii. 28; xvii. 15 sq.; Mark ix. 18; v. 3 sq.; Luke viii.

¹ See Farmer on "Demoniacs"; Owen, "Demonology of the New Testament," "Bib. Sac.," xix. 1 sq.; "Demoniacal Possessions of the New Testament," "Am. Presb. and Theol. Rev.," 1865, 495 sq.; Hovey on "The Miracles of Christ," ch. iv.; Smith's "Dict. of the Bible," article "Demon"; Kitto's "Cyc of Bib. Lit.," article "Demon"; Herzog, iii. 240, art. "Dämonische"; Kitto's "Jour.," iv. 1. vii. 394; "Meth. Quar. Rev.," x. 213; Appleton's Works, ii. 94.

28, 29; ix. 39). (3) That their presence was revealed by some peculiarity unknown to us at the present day. (4) That their usurped control over the bodily organs of men was not confined to those pre-eminently wicked (Mark ix. 14-28).

Remarks. (a) With reference to the demons, their removal was called a "casting-out" (Matt. viii. 16; x. 1, 8; Mark i. 34, 39); with reference to the demoniacs, a "healing" (Matt. xv. 28; Luke vi. 18; vii. 21). (b) Some of the Jews claimed to cast out demons (Matt. xii. 27; Josephus Antiq. viii. 2, 5). Whether Christ indorsed the correctness of their claim is doubtful. (c) Evil angels are spoken of as a kingdom (Matt. xii. 26; Mark iii. 54; Luke xi. 18; Rev. xii. 7) with a ruler at their head (Matt. ix. 34; xii. 24; xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 7, 9; 2 Cor. xii. 7). This ruler is called, by way of eminence, The wicked one (Matt. v. 37; vi. 13; xiii. 19, 38; John xvii. 15; 1 John ii. 13, 14; iii. 12; v. 18, 19; Eph. vi. 16; 2 Thess. iii. 3; The satan (Matt. xii. 26); The devil (Matt. xiii. 39); The enemy (Matt. xiv. 25); The adversary (1 Tim. v. 14; 1 Peter v. 8); The accuser of the brethren (Rev. xii. 10); The spirit of error (1 John iv. 6); The ruler of this world (John xii. 31; xvi. 11); (cf. xiv. 30;) The god of this world (2 Cor. iv. 4); The old serpent (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2); The great dragon (Rev. xii. 3, 4 sq.; xiii. 2, 4). "Army of fiends, fit body to fit head," Milton Par. Lost, iv. 953. This same prince of the demons is represented as ruling over mankind (1 John v. 19; John xiv. 30; xii. 31; xvi. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 4).

The language of these and other passages of the New Testament is very strong. Satan is even represented as having in some sense the power of death; which, however, cannot mean that he has power to take the lives of men at will, or that he is the one who does put an end to the natural lives of most men (Heb. ii. 14). It may be worthy of notice that Satan's subordinates also bear sway over men (Eph. vi. 12). To many minds the idea of such a kingdom is very awful. They prefer to think of evil spirits as acting without skill or concert; but this is not the doctrine of the New Testament.

There is wonderful order in their madness. Still, their power over men is limited. They can do nothing without man's consent; and their apparent victories lead only to a more complete overthrow.

Queries. (1) Are demons still permitted to take possession of men as in the time of Christ? We believe not; at any rate we are not aware of any evidence that would justify an affirmative answer to this question.

(2) If not, why were they permitted to do it then? Possibly that the lordship of Christ over the invisible world might be signally revealed, even in his humiliation. "The clearest revelation of heaven," says Macmillan, "is the necessary correlative of the clearest revelation of hell." Satan has been called Dei Simius, the ape of God; "He can only sow tares,—an imitation of wheat."

(3) Are the rappings, table-movings, &c., of modern times, the direct work of evil spirits? From the best evidence we have, it seems to us far more likely that they are of mundane origin.

(4) Have evil angels any special connection with pagan deities? (1 Cor. x. 20, 21; viii. 4.) No other connection than they have with all great manifestations of sin in the world.

(5) Will evil spirits resume their former modes of action at any future period? (Rev. xx. 8.) Possibly, yet with variations adapted to the weakness of man at the time.

PART FOURTH.

THE DOCTRINE OF MAN.

THE topics which belong to this part of theology are the unity of mankind, the essential elements of human nature, the endless existence of man, the moral constitution of man, and the sinfulness of man.

I. THE UNITY OF MANKIND.

It seems to us, on the whole, evident that all the races or varieties of mankind belong to one species. And in support of this view we appeal with a good degree of confidence:—

1 To the Holy Scripture.—Gen. i. 27; ii. 7, 15 sq.; vi. 7, 8; vii. 21; viii. 1, sq.; Acts xvii. 26; Rom. v. 12 sq.; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. These passages appear to be sufficiently plain; and we are aware of no good reason for doubting that their writers believed in the unity of the human race. The word αἰῶνος in Acts xvii. 26, is omitted by Lachmann, Tischendorf and Tregelles; but its absence does not weaken the value of the text for our argument.

2. To the Anatomical Structure of Men. This is nearly the same in all varieties of the human race. The differences between the highest and the lowest types of mankind are said by competent authorities to be less than the difference between varieties of the same species in some of the lower animals.

3. To the Physiological Peculiarities of Men. (1) All races are fruitful with one another. (2) The duration of pregnancy is the same in all. (3) The normal temperature of the body is the same. (4) The mean frequency of the pulse is the same. All these are facts of special importance to the argument.

4. To the Pathological Characteristics of Men. All varieties of men are liable to the same diseases in the same circumstances. This is not true of other animals. Again, the blood of a healthy man, injected into the veins of a feeble one, is far more invigorating than that of any other animal; just as the blood of a horse is better for another horse than is that of any animal of a different species. Besides, human blood is distinguishable by the aid of the microscope from that of any other animal.¹

5. To the Duration of Human Life. This is nearly the same in all varieties of mankind. The differences between different nations are slight, and probably due to the influences of climate and civilization, acting through long periods.

6. To the Cardinal Powers of the Human Mind. These are everywhere the same. The mental, moral, and religious capacities of the human spirit are identical in kind the world over. This is a great point.

Note. Just now the tendency of scientific speculation is favorable to the Darwinian hypothesis, of progress by natural selection, — a theory which makes far less of the distinction between different species than any other; but, whatever of truth may be represented by the hypothesis of Darwin, it is quite insufficient to account for the origin of the human spirit, and need not therefore occupy our time in a theological course.

¹ See Pritchard (J. C.) "Researches into the Physical History of Man," and "The Natural History of Man," both able works; Smith (T.) "The Unity of the Human Race," &c.; Hale (M.) "Primitive Origination of Man"; Caldwell (C.) "Thoughts on the Original Unity of the Human Race," adverse to its Unity; Cabell (J. L.) "The Testimony of Modern Science to the Unity of Mankind," a very good discussion; Quatrefages (A. de) "Unité de l'Espece Humaine," also "Histoire Naturelle Generale," "Revue des deux Mondes," Nov., Dec., 1868, 832 sq.; Ladevi-Roche (M.) "L'Unité des Races Humaines d'après des données de la Psychologie et de la Physiologie"; Whitney (W. D.) "Language, and the Study of Language"; Müller (M.) "Lectures on the Science of Language," series I. and II.; Bunsen (Chev.) "Philosophy of History," or Vols. II. and III. of "Christianity and Mankind"; Smith's (W.) "Dictionary of the Bible," in the article "Confusion of Tongues"; Burnouf (E.) "La Science des Religions," several articles in the "Revue des deux Mondes" of 1867 and 1868; Ehrenfeuchter (F.) "Entwicklungsgeschichte der Menschheit in Ethischen Beziehung"; Rauch (P. M.) "Die Einheit des Menschengeschlechtes"; Burgess (E.) "Antiquity and Unity of the Human Race"; Peschel (O.) "The Races of Man and their Geographical Distribution."

II. THE ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS OF HUMAN NATURE.

It has long been a question with philosophers and theologians, whether the being of man comprises three elements, — body, soul, and spirit, — or only two, — body and spirit; and it is our purpose to notice in this section some of the arguments for each of the two views.

In confirmation of the former view, it is said,¹ —

1. That several passages of the New Testament teach it plainly, — (namely, 1 Thess. v. 23; Heb. iv. 12; Phil. i. 27; Luke i. 47; 1 Cor. xv. 44). The first and clearest of these passages is translated by Ellicott, "May your spirit and soul and body be preserved whole, without blame, in the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ!" And he regards it as a "distinct enunciation of three component parts of the nature of man." This is certainly the most obvious view of the apostle's meaning; and it is adopted, with some differences of opinion as to the exact distinction between "spirit" and "soul," by Alford, Ellicott, Olshausen, Meyer, and De Wette; though De Wette thinks the enumeration merely "rhetorical."

In the second passage, the word of God is represented as "piercing, even to a dividing of soul and of spirit, of joints and of marrow," — that is, cutting through soul and through spirit, through joints and through marrow. Here the spirit seems to be thought of as deeper than the soul, — as the innermost part of man's nature. Tholuck defines "spirit" in this place as "the spirit according to its eternal side," and "soul" as "the spirit according to its natural side."

The third passage reads thus: "That ye stand in one spirit, with one soul, striving together for the faith of the gospel." Here it would not be difficult to explain the use of

¹ Olshausen (H.) "Opuscula Theologica," 1834, p. 143 sq.; Göschel (C. F.) "Der Mensch nach Leib, Seele und Geist diesseits und jenseits," suggestive; Delitzsch (F.) "A System of Biblical Psychology"; Heard (J. B.) "The Tripartite Nature of Man"; Boardman (G. D.) "The Scriptural Anthropology," in Bap. Quar., vol. I., pp. 175-90, 324-40, 428-44; Usteri (L.) "Entwicklung des Paulinischen Lehrbegriffes," Anhang I. S. 384 sq.; Schubert (G. H.) "Die Geschichte der Seele"; Planck (K. E.) "Seele und Geist"; Ulrici (H.) "Leib und Seele."

"soul" in the second clause, without supposing it to signify a constituent part of human nature, in distinction from the "spirit." Indeed, there is much reason to suppose that the word "spirit" signifies, in this place, the Holy Spirit, in whom alone Christians can expect to be truly united. — See Alford's note on the passage.

The fourth reads as follows: "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit rejoiced in God my Saviour!" but it seems to us plain that the two terms, "soul" and "spirit," may, in this case, refer to one and the same essential principle. And the last text reads: "It is sown a psychical body; it is raised a pneumatic body." We suppose that the word "soul" often denotes the animal life; and hence, a psychical body is one adapted to animal life, while a spiritual body is one adapted to spirit life. The passage does not therefore establish the fact of a distinction between soul and spirit.

2. That several doctrines of the New Testament are rendered more intelligible by it; for example, that of hereditary depravity, that of regeneration, and that of eternal retribution. But we do not think any thing is gained in this respect by the tripartite theory of man's nature. The other arguments adduced by trichotomists are equally inconclusive, and may be passed without further notice.

In confirmation of the second view, reference is made, —

1. To the plain teaching of the New Testament: as in Matt. x. 28; xxvi. 41 (cf. Mark xiv. 38); Luke xii. 22 sq.; Acts ii. 27; Rom. ii. 28, 29; 1 Cor. v. 3, 5; vi. 16 sq.; vii. 34; 2 Cor. vii. 1; Col. ii. 5; Heb. xii. 9; James ii. 26; 1 Peter ii. 11; iii. 18; iv. 6. For these and similar passages make it certain that the words, "soul and spirit," may often be used interchangeably, — to denote the spiritual part of man in distinction from the bodily, and especially that human nature consists of two parts, body and soul, or flesh and spirit.¹

¹ Hahn (G. L.) "Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments," sects. 149-154. Riddle (M. B.) "Lange on Romans" Am. Ed. "Excursus on Biblico-Psychological Terms." — See ch. VII. v. 13; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," vol. II. p. 44 sq.; Stu. u. Kr. XII. Ackermann (C.) "Beitrag zur theologischen Würdigung und Abwägung der Begriffe πνεῦμα, νοῦς und Geist."

2. To the phenomena of consciousness. There is nothing, it is said, in human experience, which may not be traced as readily to two essential principles as to three. It is as easy to believe that the spirit has direct connection with the body as to suppose that it has connection with it indirectly, through the soul; to suppose that one and the same spiritual principle has a wide range of susceptibilities, passions, and powers, some higher and some lower, as to suppose two spiritual principles have this range. In short, the law of parcimony forbids us to assert any essential distinction between soul and spirit, unless we do it on the authority of Scripture.

— But it is admitted that the words “soul” and “spirit” are not strictly synonymous. If they do not denote two parts of human nature, they must be admitted to denote the same part as seen in different lights, or as performing different functions; for, in certain connections, one of them is always used; and, in other connections, the other. What, then, are the meaning and use of these words respectively? Trichotomists and dichotomists are alike interested in finding a true answer to this question.

1. The word “soul” is often used as nearly equivalent to self or person. To say, “My soul doth magnify the Lord!” is to say, “I, myself, do magnify the Lord!” And, from this, it is but a step to the conclusion, that the soul is the synthesis of spirit and body,—the being which results from their union. — See Gen. ii. 7. The breath of life from God was the unembodied spirit; while the “living soul” was the result of the spirit’s union with the body: it denoted the complex being in its completeness.

But a close study of the Scriptures leads rather to the view that man is called soul, a superiori parte, and not because the word “soul” properly means a being composed of body and spirit. This is rendered certain by the fact, that the soul is sometimes contrasted with the body; for, if the body were a part of the soul, it could not be thus contrasted with it. — See Matt. x. 28; 1 Pet. ii. 11.

(2) The word “soul” is supposed to denote the spirit as modified by union with the body. It is the intelligent life-principle as it exists in man. This definition accounts for the use of the word "soul," rather than spirit, when reference is made to passions and desires awakened by sense or the flesh, and also for its use when mere life is referred to. For, according to this theory, the soul is at once the vital power and the rational power in man. Its functions are partly unconscious, and partly conscious; partly animal, and partly rational.

(3) The word "soul" is thought to be used when certain functions or relations are in the writer's mind; and the word "spirit" when certain other functions or relations are in his mind. Thus the immaterial principle in man is called soul, when it is conceived of as looking earthward, — as affected by the body, or as acting through the body; while it is called spirit when it is conceived of as looking God-ward, — as affected by the spirit of God, or as contrasted with the flesh. Hence those qualities of our inner nature which are modified by the flesh, and perishable, are suggested by the name "soul;" while those which are moral, religious, and eternal are suggested by the name "spirit."

It will be found difficult, and probably impossible, to account, by either of these theories, for the selection of the term "soul" or "spirit" in every instance where one of them is used. But by bearing in mind the last two, and also the fact that in many passages either of the words would be sufficiently exact, nearly all the language of the sacred writers may be readily explained.

III. THE ENDLESS EXISTENCE OF MAN.

The term "man" will be used in this section to denote whatever is essential to human personality. So long as the person exists, the man exists.

It may be a question, whether the endless existence of man should be considered at all in this place; for it will be necessary to recur to the same subject in the last part of theology, and exhibit more fully some of the evidence of man's unending existence.

So close a connection, however, exists between the moral nature of man and his endless existence, that a notice of the latter cannot be postponed to the end of our course; yet it will be enough for the present, if the chief lines of argument are indicated.¹

(1) The Scriptures predict such an existence. As to the pious, this is commonly admitted; but, as to the wicked, some entertain doubts; yet these doubts, it seems to us, do not spring from any obscurity in the language of Scripture. — See Matt. xxv. 46. "And these shall go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

In confirmation of the biblical view, we remark, —

(2) The mental powers of man are adapted to endless existence. He is put in relation to endless being by his conception of it. His mind is also capable, so far as can be ascertained, of indefinite growth in knowledge and power. Such a mind seems to have been formed for perpetual existence.

(3) His moral powers are adapted to such an existence. They recognize moral relations and qualities which are the same forever, and perceive the excellence of God more perfectly the longer they contemplate it. Moreover, the incompleteness of moral government in this life, as judged by conscience, points to a future, if not to an endless existence of man, in which "all odds shall be made even."²

(4) His spiritual sensibilities are adapted to such an existence. They are fitted to enjoy permanently whatever is beautiful, true, or good. Such objects do not cloy. Hence, man appears to have been made "to glorify God, and enjoy him forever."

¹ Channing (W. E.) "Works," vol. IV. pp. 169–182; Gray (J. T.) "Immortality: its Real and Alleged Evidences"; Simpson (A.) "Prize Essay on the Immateriality of the Mind, and the Immortality of the Soul"; Guizot (F.) "Meditations and Moral Studies"; Newman (F. W.) "The Soul: its Sorrows and its Aspirations"; Parker (T.) "A Sermon of Immortal Life"; Müller (J.) "Studien u. Kritiken," 1833, sects. 703–794; Estes (H. C.) "The Christian Doctrine of the Soul"; Dick (T.) "The Philosophy of a Future Life"; Taylor (I.) "Physical Theory of a Future Life"; Fichte (I. H.) "Seelenfortdauer u. Weltstellung des Menschen."

² See Jackson (W.) "The Doctrine of Retribution"; also Butler and Kaut.

"That religious instincts are as truly a part of our nature as are our appetites and our nerves is a fact which all history establishes, and which forms one of the strongest proofs of the reality of that unseen world to which the soul of man continually tends." — Lecky, "Hist. of European Morals," I. 339, 340.

(5) His best aspirations point to such an existence. This is commonly admitted. Annihilation is never thought of with pleasure, except as a release from misery. It is coveted, not by the good, but by the bad; and not by them as desirable in itself, but as a less evil than endless woe. Says Tennyson, —

"My own dim life should teach me this, —
That life shall live forevermore;
Else earth is darkness at the core,
And dust and ashes all that is."

(6) The general belief of mankind points to such an existence. This belief is not universal: but it is so prevalent as to be esteemed normal; and, as normal, it is an indication of endless existence on the part of man.

IV. THE MORAL CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

No part of systematic theology requires more cautious and accurate treatment than this. If man ever "sees through a mirror obscurely" (1 Cor. xiii. 12), it is when he undertakes to explore the depths of his own spirit, and ascertain its powers in the domain of religion. And it has been truly said, that a "large portion of the predestinarian controversy has arisen out of an attempt to exclude, on speculative grounds, either one or other of the two fundamental conceptions, — the freedom of man, and the supremacy of God."¹

That man is a moral being may be proved by an appeal to the word of God, to the common consent of mankind, and to the testimony of consciousness itself; for there is hardly a paragraph or doctrine of Scripture which does not imply the moral nature and accountability of man; there is scarcely a law of civil government, or an institution of civil society which does not presuppose the same thing; and there is no rational man who fails to perceive a moral quality in many of his own actions and affections.¹

¹ From Hannah (J.) "The Relation of the Divine and Human Elements in Scripture."

It is also certain that moral character may be revealed by almost any kind of action possible to the human soul, whether it be that of thinking, that of desiring, or that of willing. Yet every kind of spiritual action may not be equally the proper cause or source of virtue and sin; and it is therefore important to ascertain, if possible, to which grand division of the soul's life and movement they should be specially referred.

Many persons regard the sensibilities, propensities, feelings or tastes, of the soul as being the source of man's moral character. They believe that his thoughts and actions spring from his feelings, and say, that, as the heart is, so is the man. Others suppose the will to be fundamental and controlling,—the proper author of propensities and affections as well as of thoughts. Which of these views is correct?

(1) If one appeals to the Word of God for an answer to this question, he will readily find many expressions concerning man, as he now is, which seem to support the former view; (for example, Jer. xxxi. 18; Ezek. xxxvi. 26; Matt. vii. 17, 18; John vi. 44, 65; xv. 5; Eph. ii. 5, 10; Phil. ii. 13.) "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art Jehovah, my God."—"A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh."—"So every good tree bringeth forth good fruits; but the corrupt tree bringeth evil fruits. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruits, nor a corrupt tree bring forth good fruits."—"No one can come to me, except the Father, who sent me, draw him."—"For this cause, I have said to you, that no one can come to me except it be given him from the Father." — "Without me, ye can do nothing." — "But God. . . . made us, even when we were dead in sins, alive with Christ." — "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works." — "For it is God who worketh in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure." From these passages, it appears that all holy action in man is due to divine grace; that the state of every unrenewed soul is such as to make this grace practically indispensable,¹ and that moral action does, as a matter of fact, in the case of fallen men, spring from some permanent moral state or bias; and this permanent state is naturally thought to be a state of the feelings or affections or susceptibilities.

¹ Butler (J.) "Sermons upon Human Nature"; Alexander (A.) "Outlines of Moral Science"; Rothe (R.) "Theologische Ethik"; Jouffroy (Theo.) "Introduction to Ethics"; Hofmann (R.) "Die Lehre vom Gewissen."

But the inquirer will also find many expressions of Scripture which seem to support the latter view; (for example, Ezek. xviii. 26, 27, 31, 32; Matt. xi. 28–30; Acts ii. 38; iii. 19.) "When a 'righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them, for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die. Again, when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive." — "Make you a new heart and a new spirit; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? . . . Wherefore turn, and live ye." — "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest," &c. "Repent, and be each of you baptized, upon the name of Jesus Christ, unto remission of sins." — "Repent, therefore, and turn, that your sins may be blotted out." These passages clearly teach the duty of sinners to repent and seek the Lord: nay, sinners are commanded, to make themselves a new heart, as they are elsewhere commanded to love God with, all the heart and their neighbor as themselves. This, therefore, is their perpetual duty; and hence it must be within the power of their will.

There is, then, a seeming disagreement between the two classes of texts cited; and the Bible fails to answer directly the question proposed. The former class leads to one inference, and the latter class to another. They may be reconciled by assuming, that, as a matter of fact, in the case of sinners, divine grace always takes the initiative in good, not because a sinner cannot, but because he will not, of himself, turn to the Lord.

¹ Nemo per se satis valet ut emergat, oportet manum aliquis porrigat, aliquis educat.—Seneca Ep. 52.

But the language of Paul, in Rom. ix. 15, 16, appears to turn the scale in favor of the Calvinistic view as practically correct. — "I will have mercy on whomsoever I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomsoever I have compassion." — "So, then, it is not of him who willeth, nor of him who runneth, but of God who showeth mercy." Beneath the whole discussion of Paul may lie the assumption that no man truly wills or runs without prevenient grace, — a grace which always takes the initiative in human salvation.

(2) If one appeals to the history of mankind for an answer to the question proposed, the same result will follow; for on the one hand, according to the testimony of history, sin appears to be universal in the race. And the universality of sin, from the hour of the fall until now, is hardly consistent with any theory of action which does not trace it back to a bias of the heart; or, if any one prefers, to a bias of the will, regarded as embracing in itself permanent moral affections and susceptibilities.

But, on the other hand, according to the testimony of sacred history, man was created upright, with a pure heart,¹ and by an act of his own will disobeyed the will of God. Hence Calvinists, as well as Arminians, admit that a holy being may fall into sin by exercising his freedom of will; but they deny that there is any evidence of power in a fallen being to recover, unaided, his lost rectitude of feeling.

¹ On the Sinless Condition of Man in Eden, reference may be made to the following works: Winer (G.B.) "The Confessions of Christendom," p. 78 sq.; Hase (C. A.) "Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ," p. 55 sq.; Niemeyer (H. A.) "Collectio Confessionum in Ecclesiis Reformatis Publicatarum," pp. 79, 80, 88, 106, 116, 341, 368, 393, 476.

Thus the general course of human action since the fall favors one view; and the first act of sin in Eden the other view: and the question before us is not yet clearly answered, unless it be said that will is the cause of sin in a holy being, and wrong desire the source of sin in unholy beings. Many accept this double answer.¹

(3) If one appeals to moral consciousness for an answer, the result will be far from certain; for, on the one side, will appear a certain repugnance to holy action, which seems to unnerve, without excusing the sinner,—a fearful suspicion that sin is not wholly avoidable by his own power, and an instinctive moral judgment against selfishness and want of love to God, as being in their very nature sinful. “For example, not only are malice and envy sinful, when ripened into act, but the smallest conceivable exercise of such feelings is evil; and, as they increase in strength, their moral evil increases. It does not require an act of volition,—consenting to these feelings,—to render them evil; their very essence is evil, and is condemned by the moral sense of mankind.”²

“The reality of sin, for every man whose experience is worth being taken as testimony, is not in particular volitions of his will, but in its abiding state,—not in what he chooses to do now and then, but in that unceasing, uninterrupted determination of self to evil. This is the torment of his life,—that below his volitions to sin, below his resolutions to reform, even below his deepest self-examination, and his most distinct self-knowledge, below all the conscious exercises and operations of his soul,—there is a sinful heart, a dark ground of moral evil.”³

¹ Aug. “de natura et gratia,” I. c. 28; “Encheiridion ad Laet.” c. 30: Homo libero arbitrio male utens, et se perdidit et ipsum. Sicut enim qui se occidit, se occidendo non vivit nec seipsum potest resuscitare quum occiderit: ita, quum libero peccaretur arbitrio, amissum est et liberum arbitrium.” But see Hazard (R. G.) “Freedom of the Mind in Willing,” and “Causation and Freedom in Willing.” Willing is always and by its very nature free. Speaking accurately, the sinner is just as free in the act of willing as the saint; but he does not act as wisely: he does not seek his real and highest good; and he knows this at the time.

² Alexander (A.) “Outlines of Moral Science,” p. 145.

³ Shedd (W. G. T.) “Essays and Discourses,” p. 230.

But, on the other side, will appear a persuasion that our moral action is free,—that we are able, in every instance, to do right, and refrain from wrong,—that, whenever we have decided in favor of evil, we could have decided otherwise; and, in view of this a tendency to modify our instinctive moral judgment against evil biases or feelings, and to pronounce them innocent, unless they are indorsed or fostered by the will.¹ But it is replied to one of these statements that, “when we feel that we could and would act differently from what we have done, in certain specified circumstances, it is always on the supposition that our views and feelings should be different.”² Or, in other words, and with special reference to sin, it is said that “the will, in the time of a leading act or volition that is diverse from, or opposite to the command of God, and when actually under the influence of it, is not able to exert itself to the contrary,—to make an alteration in order to compliance. The inclination is unable to change itself; and that, for this plain reason, that it is unable to incline to change itself. Present choice cannot, at present, choose to be otherwise; for that would be at present to choose something diverse from what is at present chosen. . . . To suppose that the mind is now sincerely inclined to change itself to a different inclination is to suppose the mind is now truly inclined otherwise than it is now inclined.”³

In estimating the value of the testimony of moral consciousness in respect to the proper cause of sin in man, it is necessary to bear in mind the fact, that different persons appear to differ in their moral judgment when looking at the state of their feelings and affections.

(4) Finally, if one appeals to reason, logic, or the causal

¹ Metcalf (D.) “An Inquiry into the Nature, Foundation, and Extent of Moral Obligation”; Hazard (R. G.) “Freedom of the Mind in Willing”; Whedon (D.D.) “Freedom of the Human Will”; Tappan (H. P.) “The Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness.”

² Alexander (A.) “Moral Science,” p. 119; Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, “The Power of Contrary Choice,” 250 sq.

³ Edwards (J.) “Inquiry concerning the Freedom of the Will,” Part III sect. 4.

judgment, a double response is heard; for, resting on the axiom that every event is due to a cause fitted to produce it, some argue, very justly, that choice, without any feeling or desire, is unthinkable; that choice, in accord with a weaker desire, instead of a stronger, is also unthinkable; and that such a choice, if possible, would be no expression of character, — would have no moral quality, would be purely capricious.¹

The first of these statements is admitted to be true by Sir Wm. Hamilton, and many others, who assert in the strongest manner the freedom of the will. Thus, "We cannot possibly conceive the existence of a voluntary activity independently of all feeling; for voluntary conation is a faculty which can only be determined to energy through a pain or pleasure, — through an estimate of the relative worth of objects."² And, if the first be correct, the second must be correct also, for to follow a weaker inducement instead of a stronger is even more inconsistent with the causal judgment than to act without any inducement at all. Moreover, it seems to be self-evident, that any action of the will which takes place without regard to reasons, motives, or inducements must be capricious and even dangerous.

President Edwards included feeling, desire, &c., in his definition of the will, and then affirmed that an element of love belongs to all virtue. Hence, this element must be in every choice or volition which is truly virtuous; for if love were not in the choice itself, but only in the effect of it, the choice would not be pleasing to God, and the effect, — virtue, — would be an effect without a cause. Virtue must, therefore, be logically antecedent to right volition, and must be in the feeling.

But, resting on the same axiom, others argue with equal force, that a cause can only be responsible for its effect; that no person can be worthy of praise or of blame for what is in his heart without the consent of his will, and that no person can be worthy of blame for failing to make a choice, which he has not power to make. In a word, ability and responsibility are coëxtensive, and man can be accountable for that alone which has been made his own by his will.

¹ Edwards (J.) "Inquiry concerning the Freedom of the Will," and "Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity"; Alexander (A.) "Moral Science," cc. 13-23.

² Hamilton (Sir Wm.) "Metaphysics," pp. 130, 567.

But how is the autocracy of the will vindicated? By some, an act of moral choice is pronounced creative, or independent of the law of cause and effect.¹

By others, the imperative of duty is pronounced incommensurable with any other motive, even as light is incommensurable with sound. Hence, man is only free in his moral action.²

It will be seen that neither of these theories is free from difficulties. The former is suggested by the spontaneous decision of conscience, by the facts of experience and observation as to the influence of sinful affections upon conduct, and by the doctrines of election and regeneration by the Spirit of God; while the latter is suggested by our sense of freedom in action, by the fact of human responsibility for moral conduct, and by the action of conscience when swayed by the causal judgment.

To judge of the two views by their practical influence, it would seem as if both of them were needed,—the former to make men feel their need of divine help, and the latter to make them see the divine righteousness.

And there is doubtless a measure of truth in each of these views. For the interdependence and interaction of the different powers of the human spirit are so subtle, so mysterious, as to escape, in a great measure, the notice of consciousness; and the power of choice may, perhaps, hold different relations to the moral bias at different stages of probation.

¹ Tappan (H. P.) "A Review of Edwards's Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will," and "The Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility"; Hamilton (Sir Wm.) "Metaphysics," II. XLVI.; Murray's "Outline of Hamilton's Philosophy," p. 226 sq.

² Hickok (L. P.) "Moral Science," p. 15 sq.

The following propositions may be safely accepted as true ; namely, —

(a) *That every man has whatever power of will is necessary to make him justly responsible for the moral good or evil in his character and conduct.*¹

(b) That this power is inalienable, no degree of progress in holiness or sinfulness having any tendency to destroy it. However holy Gabriel may be, he possesses it; however wicked Satan may be, he also possesses it.²

(c) That even the moral bias of man's heart is in a most important sense voluntary; since all spiritual activity is at once intellectual, emotional, and voluntary.

(d) That moral character, as a permanent thing, may be discovered most readily in the state of the moral susceptibilities and feelings.

(e) That conscious choice and volition indorse, express, and deepen this character or these susceptibilities; while the latter in turn have great influence upon the former.

(f) Hence, that virtue and sin cannot be traced wholly to either function of man's spirit, — to his moral taste or to his will.

(g) Yet a certain power of choosing his end or aim in life appears to be the rational basis of responsibility.

V. THE SINFULNESS OF MAN.³

I. THE REALITY OF SIN IN MANKIND.

It may seem unnecessary to say a word on this point; but it is known that some distinguished men have pronounced the idea of sin an illusion: and there is reason to fear that

¹ "Bib. Sac." for 1839, p. 381.

² Says Calvin: "Nego peccatum ideo minus debere imputari, quod necessarium est; nego rursus evitabile esse, quia voluntarium sit, Pro servitute miserabiles sumus, pro voluntate inexcusabiles."

³ Müller (J.) "The Doctrine of Sin"; Ernesti (H. F. T. L.) "Ursprung der Sünde," etc.; Edwards (J.) "The Doctrine of Original Sin," Works, Vol. II., p. 309 sq.; King (W.) "The Origin of Evil"; Young (J.) "Evil not of God"; Ritter (H.) "Über das Böse und seine Folgen"; Bellamy (J.) "The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin"; Woods (L.) Works, Vol. II., pp. 201-388, their influence, unless it be counteracted, will encourage many to indulge their selfish and sensual desires.

The possibility of sin is denied on at least three grounds, namely, —

(1) On that of Divine Predestination. God has fixed all events by his purpose and agency. They must, therefore, take place as he has determined; for his purpose cannot be thwarted. Hence, there is no such thing as sin. His purpose is good; and, as all events are embraced in his purpose, they, too, must all be good.

(2) On that of Constitutional Causality. Every being has its own constitution or nature; and the contents or qualities of that nature, together with the circumstances in which it is placed, must determine its action. Hence, the Author of that nature, and of the circumstances affecting it, is responsible for all that it does.

(3) On that of Hereditary Depravity. Men are born with a damaged, or, at least, an imperfect moral nature; and, on this account, they cannot be altogether blameworthy for their evil conduct.

These arguments against the reality of human sinfulness are plausible, but delusive. They rest upon the assumption that man has no true freedom, but is strictly included in a chain of causes and effects, every link of which is forged by something outside of his proper self, — either by God, in making human nature, or by God plus Adam in making and marring that nature.

"Man's Depravity"; Storr and Platt, "Biblical Theology," Vol. II., b. III. Nitzsch (C. I.) "System of Christian Doctrine," Part II.; Philippi (F. A.) "Kirchliche Glaubenslehre," Bd. III., "Von der Sünde"; Heppe (H.) "Dogmatik," s. 251 sq.; Schmid (C. F.) "Biblische Theologie des N. T." s. 196 and 494; Schleiermacher (F.) "Christliche Glaube," I., 358; Tholuck (A.) "Guido and Julius, or Sin and Propitiation"; Schenkel (D.) "Christliche Dogmatik," &c. Bd. II., s. 186-455; Barnes (A.) "Sin and Suffering in the Universe," Am. Presb. Rev., Oct. 1869, Jan. 1870; Herzog, s. v. "Sünde," by Dörtenbach; Hodge (Princeton Essays) "Original Sin," and "The Doctrine of Imputation"; Sheldon (D. N.) "Sin and Redemption"; Tulloch (J.) "The Christian Doctrine of Sin"; Wardlaw (R.) "Systematic Theology," Vol. II.; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," Vol. II.

But the assumption must be rejected, in view of its consequences; for, if consistently applied, it forbids us to believe (a) That man is free in any part of his conduct. In so far at least as the assumption rests upon the doctrine of predestination, or upon the theory of constitutional causality, it is applicable to all human action,—to thinking and speaking, to planting and sowing, as well as to choosing moral good or evil. But who is willing to concede that personal freedom is always an illusion? (b) That the action of his mind is trustworthy on any subject. For, if its action is unworthy of trust when it pronounces conduct to be right or wrong, it is equally unworthy of trust when it denies this,—in fact, it is not to be trusted at all. The outcome is blank skepticism: we can neither believe nor disbelieve; and we know nothing at all. This consequence of the assumption may be accepted in words, but it cannot be in heart or in life. (c) That the action of beings thoroughly bad can be at all blameworthy. For, if a hereditary bias to moral evil diminishes the guilt of one who breaks the moral law, it does this by diminishing his moral power; and, if he goes on in sin till he is wholly averse to good, he will then do evil without guilt. All his guilt will be due to his conduct while yet partly inclined to good. Hence, the most hardened men are the least culpable for their present action; and Satan, if wholly evil, does not commit any sin.

The consequences of the assumption on which the arguments against human sinfulness rest prove it, therefore, to be incorrect. Fatalism is false; and sin is no illusion.

For, (1) The Word of God declares it to be a reality (Rom. iii. 9, 23; Gal. iii. 10). Christ himself came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. He came into the world to save sinners: yet he tasted death for every man; and all who are saved will owe their salvation to him.

(2) The common judgment of mankind declares it to be a reality. This is evident from the nature of human government, from the literature of the world, and even from the language of men who deny the right of either God or man to resort to punishment, except for purposes of reformation or self-defence.

(3) The consciousness of every man declares it to be a reality. There is no one who is able to say, "I have never sinned in desire, in thought, or in act. My heart is pure, and my hands are clean." Every man knows that he himself has done what he believed to be wrong.

There is, then, the best possible evidence of the existence of sin among men, — the testimony of Scripture, the testimony of mankind by government and literature, and the testimony of consciousness.

Sin is no phantom, but the saddest of all realities; and hence it is certain that men possess whatever power of will, of self-control, and of self-direction is necessary to moral character and responsibility.

II. *The nature of sin in mankind.*¹ In considering this point, it will be convenient to look at several definitions which have been thought to express the nature of sin.

1. *Sin is want of conformity to the law of God.*² In support of this definition, appeal is made (a) To the language of Scripture (1 John iii. 4; Matt. xiii. 41; Rom. vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 14; Rom. ii. 25; v. 14; Heb. ii. 2; Gen. iii. 3). (b) To many biblical designations of sin. — See Trench, New Testament Synonymes, 226 sq. (c) To the test-prohibition of Eden. This was a positive, in distinction from a moral rule, and, as such, was specially adapted to test man's disposition to obey. According to this view of the case, sin is essentially disobedience.

Two remarks are suggested by this definition, namely, (a) That if the emphasis is laid on mere infraction of law, this being regarded as the core of sin, the definition is wholly unsatisfactory; for what the law of God requires or forbids is required or forbidden because it is right or wrong: in other words, the law reveals, but does not originate right and wrong. It is an expression of something; and we need to study what it expresses, in order to learn the nature of sin. This is true of the moral law, which is principally meant in this discussion. (b) That if the emphasis is laid on the rightness or divineness of the law, on its being God's law, this also raises a further question, to wit, What is it that the law brands as sin? What is it that man is forbidden to do? If this can be ascertained, the real nature of sin may be known. If, for example, all that the law forbids can be resolved into pride, or traced back to pride as its source, then the principle of sin must be pride.

¹ Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," vol. II. p. 133 sq.; Müller (J.) "Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde," s. 32 ff.; Oosterzee (J. J. van.) "Christian Dogmatics," II. p. 393 sq.; Sartorius (E.) "Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe," I. s. 61 ff.; Weitzäcker (C.) "Zu der Lehre vom Wesen der Sünde," in the "Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie," 1856, s. 131 sq.

² "Confession of Faith," of the Presbyterian Church of the U.S. p. 186.

Hence, the definition of sin, now in question, is formal instead of real, and, though correct, is not satisfactory. It settles nothing as to the unity of the law or the unity of sin; yet it is Scriptural, and in many respects extremely convenient. "There is," says Cicero, "a true law, a right reason, which accords with nature, and is implanted in all men, which is constant, eternal,—which calls to service, and deters from wrong, with a voice of authority that the good always obey, and the evil disregard. This law cannot rightfully be changed by adding to it, or taking from it; nor can it be abrogated as a whole. We can be set free from it neither by the senate, nor by the people; we need seek no other man as an interpreter of it: it is not one law in Rome, and another in Athens, one now, and another by and by; but this one eternal and unchangeable law will bind all nations in all times."—De Re Pub. III. 22.

"Of law," remarks Hooker, (vol. I. p. 240), "there can no less be acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power: both angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all, with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy." — "Order is heaven's first law;" but is order the only thing sought by law?

We accept this definition as beautiful and convenient, but not as ultimate.

2. Sin is inordinate desire or concupiscence. In support of this definition, appeal is made to the language of Paul (Rom. vii. 8, 14, 18, 23, 24; viii. 6 sq.; Gal. v. 16 sq.; Rom. iv. 1; Phil. iii. 4; Col. ii. 18; Rom. i. 18 sq.; 1 Cor. iii. 1-4; i. 26; 2 Cor. i. 12 (cf. John iii. 6; i. 13; Gen. vi. 3).¹

But Paul uses the words "flesh," "fleshly," or "carnal," and the like, in these passages, to denote man in his unrenewed state,—or man, in so far as he is not ruled by the Spirit of God: they refer to the whole nature of man.

The body, indeed, is both an occasion and an organ of sin; yet sin no more originates in a bodily appetite than it does in the object which that appetite craves. A carnal mind is one that is obedient to bodily and sinful impulses,—to appetite, lust, pride, envy, wrath, and other evil affections; but sin originates in the mind or heart.—(See Prov. iv. 23; Matt. xv. 19.)

This second definition is unsatisfactory: (a) Because it fails to refer all sin to a single root or principle. Any inordinate desire is sinful. (b) Because, in the last analysis, it is only a formal definition; for inordinateness, or non-conformity to the divine rule, is supposed to be the very core and essence of sin. (c) Because it ignores the relation of will and choice to sin, and locates the latter in the heart or emotional nature of man. (d) Because, as commonly explained, it gives undue prominence to sensuality. This is, however, due, in all probability, to Paul's use of the term "flesh," in describing human sinfulness, rather than to the terms of the definition.

¹ Gould (E. P.) "New Testament use of Σάρξ," Bib. Sac. 1875, p. 36 sq.; Ernesti (H. T. L.) "Vom Ursprung der Sünde nach Paulinischen Lehrgehalt"; Cremer (H.) "Biblical Theological Dictionary of New Testament Greek," s. v. σάρξ; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," II. p. 140 sq.; Müller (J.) "Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde," vol. I. s. 450 sq.

3. Sin is a deficiency of love to God and man. In support of this definition, reference is made, (1) To the Word of God. (Matt. xxii. 37-39; Luke x. 27, 28; Deut. vi. 5; x. 12; xxx. 6.) (2) To the general goodness of many acts performed by unrenowned men. These acts shine with every good quality but one; and they are sinful by reason only of their lack of love to God. (3) To God's relation to sin. For, according to this definition, "whatever is evil is so not by the Creator's action, but by the creature's defection."—(Aug.) Uncreated and unsupported by God, it is unreal and unsubstantial; it is not something, but a want of something. And this view of sin is supposed to diminish the difficulty in accounting for its presence in the moral universe.

But against this definition may be urged the fact, that sin appears to be more than a lack of moral power, more than an absence of suitable love: it appears to be often positive, energetic, and hostile to good,—hatred, instead of love; power, turned in a wrong direction.¹

4. Sin is preference of self to God. De Pressensé says, that "there is only one way of violating the moral law, namely, to live to one's self, and not to God,—to substitute selfishness for love"—("Jesus Christ," p. 234); and Auberlen says, that "the first element of sin is departure from God," while the source of this departure is nimius amor sui. Julius Müller, and a majority of modern theologians, adopt this definition. And it is supported (a) By many expressions of the sacred record; (for example, John v. 30; vii. 18; viii. 50; Matt. xxvi. 39; xx. 28; Rom. xv. 3; xiv. 7; Gal. ii. 20; 2 Cor. v. 15; Phil. ii. 4, 21; 1 Cor. x. 24, 33; John xii. 25; 1 Cor. xiii. 5). (b) By a careful study of selfishness. For this disposition will be found to comprehend self-indulgence, self-seeking, and self-will. And in these three forms, variously combined, preference of self will be seen to account for nearly or quite all sin.

¹ Says Calvin, "Quare qui peccatum originale definierunt carentiam justitiæ originalis, quam inesse nobis oportebat, quanquam id totum complectuntur quod in re est, non tamen satis significanter vim atque energiam ipsius expresserunt. Non enim natura nostra boni tantum inops et vacua est; sed malorum omnium adeo fertilis et ferax, ut otiosa esse non possit." Lib. II. 1. 8. prope finem.

But it must be borne in mind, that selfishness, or supreme regard to self, does not forbid a secondary regard to other beings, any more than supreme love to God forbids a secondary, but great love to other beings. The definition uses the word selfishness in a broad sense, meaning by it only this, that the highest place, which belongs to God, is really given to self; and, thus explained, the definition is better than any other.

R. Several passages of Scripture speak as if love of the world were the root of human sinfulness; (for example, 1 Tim. vi. 10; 2 Tim. iii. 2-4; 1 John ii. 15). But "external things, in their true and normal relation to personality, are only means; and they remain so, though their use may be perverted. The man who loves earthly things instead of God really loves himself in them, — seeks, by means of them, his own gratification." — (Müller I. p. 133, Trans.)

III. THE EXTENT OF SIN IN MANKIND.

The evidence on this point justifies the statement, that all men, with the single exception of Jesus Christ, are morally depraved at birth, and, if they live long in this world, are found guilty of personal sin. By moral depravity is meant a state of the human soul which naturally leads to sin, and which can only be explained as an effect of sin.¹

In proof of this, reference may be made (a) To passages of Scripture which include bodily death in the penalty of sin; (for example Gen. ii. 17; Rom. v. 12 sq.; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, ¹ Edwards (J.) "The Doctrine of Original Sin;" Shedd (W. G. T.) "Essays and Discourses," p. 218 sq.; Müller (J.) "The Doctrine of Sin," II. p. 343 sq.; Woods (L.) "Works," I. p. 63 sq.; Wardlaw (R.) "Systematic Theology," vol. II. p. 119 sq.; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," vol. II. p. 192 sq.; Oosterzee (J. J. van) "Christian Dogmatics," vol. II. p. 423 sq.; Reuss (E.) "History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age," vol. II. c. VI.; Lutterbeck (J. A. B.) "Die N. T. Lehrbegriffe," Bd. II. sect. 51; Turretin (F.) I. Loc. IX. Qu. x.; Philippi (F. A.) "Kirchliche Glaubenslehre," Bd. III. sect. 151 sq.; Schmid (C. F.) "Biblical Theology of the N. T." sect. 76; Winer (G. B.) "A Comparative View of the Doctrines and Confessions of the Various Communities of Christendom," p. 86 sq.

45 sq.) (b) To passages which represent the atonement as universal: (1 John ii. 2; 1 Tim. ii. 6; iv. 10; Heb. ii 9; 1 Peter iii. 18.) (c) To passages which teach that man's nature is vitiated at birth: (John iii. 6; 1 Cor. vii. 14; Eph. ii. 3; Rom. v. 12 sq.; 1 Cor. xv. 22; (cf. Ps. li. 7; lviii. 4; cxliii. 2; Isa. xlviii. 8; Prov. xxi. 8; Eccl. ix. 3; Gen. viii. 21; 1 Sam. xv. 3). (d) To passages which assert the sinfulness of all men; (1 Kings viii. 46; Eccl. vii. 20; Rom. iii. 9 sq.) But these passages may be supposed to refer to such only as have personally and consciously disobeyed the law of God. They can be used as confirmatory of better evidence; but they would have little force, taken by themselves. (e) To the language of pagan writers. Says Ovid, "We always strive after what is forbidden, and covet what is denied."—(See Amor. III. El. 4, 17; II. El. 19, 3; Metam. VII. 18 sq., and Prov. ix. 17.) And Seneca remarks, that "we have all sinned, some more and some less; some of set purpose, others impelled by chance, or borne away by another's wickedness. Some of us have persisted in good with too little energy, and, unwilling, resisting, have lost our innocence. Nor do we sin only; but we shall sin to the end of life."—(Clementia, c. 7; cf. c. 23.)

If all men are either morally depraved or sinful at birth, it must be in consequence of the apostacy in Eden; for Christians agree in teaching that man was originally upright. As he came from the hand of his Creator, he was inclined to good rather than to evil; but, since the fall, all men are inclined to evil.

The following synopsis will show what have been the views entertained by Christians on this point:—

The Council of Trent, at its fifth session, adopted this canon: "If any one shall assert that the transgression of Adam injured only himself, and not his posterity; and that he lost the holiness and righteousness which he received from God for himself only, and not for us also; or that, stained by the sin of disobedience, he transmitted to the whole human race only death and penalties of body, but not also sin, which is the death of the soul, — let him be anathema.”¹

The Augsburg Confession declares that, “since the fall of Adam, all men propagated in the natural way are born with sin, — that is, without fear of God, without trust in God, and with evil desire.” And the Formula of Concord says, “We believe that original sin is not a slight corruption of human nature, but one so profound, that it has left nothing sound, nothing incorrupt in the body or mind of man, in his inward or outward powers.”

The Confession of Basle (Reformed Church) uses this language: “Through Adam’s fall, the entire human race is corrupted, and subject to condemnation; our nature has been weakened, and affected with such a bias to sin that, unless the Spirit of God restores it, man of himself can do nothing good.”

Art. 9, of the Thirty-nine Articles, speaks of “original sin” as “the fault or corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is, of his own nature, inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore, in every person born into the world, it deserveth God’s wrath.”

The Westminster Confession, after speaking of the fall of our first parents, says, “They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed, and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity descending from them by ordinary generation. From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil, do proceed all actual transgressions.”

The Confessio Remonstrantium (Arminian) says, that “by transgression Adam was made through the power of the divine threatening guilty of eternal death and manifold misery, and was deprived of that primeval happiness which he had received at creation. But because Adam was the root and source of the whole human race, he involved not only himself, but also all his posterity who were in his loins, as it were, and were to spring from him, by natural generation, in the same death and misery," &c.

¹ See further statements and explanations in Winer (G. B.) “A Comparative View,” &c., p. 86 sq.

The Quakers, according to Barclay's "Apology," "confess that a seed of sin is transmitted to all men, from Adam, although imputed to none until by sinning they actually join with it."

The Catechismus Racovianus (Socinian) says, "Man is exposed to death, because the first man transgressed the plain command of God, to which death was threatened as a punishment; whence also it has come to pass, that he has drawn all his posterity with him into the same sentence of death, yet only as every one's own sin is added." — "Since the fall of Adam was but a single act, it could not have power to deprave his own nature, still less that of his posterity; yet we do not deny that by the practice of sinning, assiduitate peccandi, the nature of men has been infected with a certain vice and too much inclination to sin, — ad peccandum nimia proclivitate."

These citations show the general current of thought and belief in respect to the effect of the fall upon the moral condition of mankind. Believers in Christ have been convinced by the word of God, in addition to their own observation, that the spiritual state of all men is evil, and that this evil state is a result of the sin of our first parents.

IV. THE DEGREE OF SIN IN OUR RACE.¹

In respect to this it may be affirmed, —

1. That no man, except Jesus Christ, has fully obeyed the law of God. — See (Matt. xxii. 37-40; James ii. 10; 1 John iii. 15; iv. 20; Gal. iii. 10.) And this is equivalent to saying, that every man who has acted as a moral agent has disobeyed that law.

2. That no unregenerate man has any proper love to God (Rom. viii. 7; 1 John iv. 7). Sin is therefore in all the life; and the principle of holiness is entirely wanting. Hence unrenewed men are said to be "totally depraved"; they have not obeyed the law at all.

¹ Wardlaw (R.) "Syst. Theol." vol. II. p. 119 sq.

3. That selfishness reigns in the hearts of all unrenewed men (Phil. ii. 21). On this point, reference may be made to what is said above under the fourth definition of sin.

4. That hatred to God is present in the hearts of all unregenerate men (Rom. viii. 7). It is there, though latent. Let the nature of God be seen in a true light, as opposed to all self-indulgence, self-seeking, and self-will, and this enmity or hatred will emerge at once into conscious action.

5. That all men are not equally sinful. — (See Prov. xxix. 1; Jer. xiii. 23; Luke xii. 48; John iii. 19; xv. 22, 24; 2 Tim. iii. 13; Rom. ii. 12; iv. 15; v. 13; 1 Cor. xiv. 20 (cf. Matt. xviii. 3; xix. 14; Mark x. 14; Luke xviii. 16; Ezek. xvi. 47-52; Matt. x. 15; xi. 22; John xix. 11; 1 Tim. v. 8; 2 Peter ii. 20, 21; Amos iii. 2). These passages teach that the sinfulness of men is much greater in some instances than it is in others, and especially that it is modified by the knowledge of the sinner.

V. THE IMPUTATION OF SIN; OR THE ACCOUNTABILITY OF MEN FOR THEIR SINFULNESS.

This topic suggests questions which it is very difficult to answer; and it may therefore be well to review some of the prominent theories in respect to it.

I. *The Pelagian Theory.*¹ This theory assumes that man can be responsible for nothing but his own voluntary action. It denies the hereditary depravity of mankind since the fall. "Capaces enim utriusque rei, non pleni nascimur, et ut sine virtute, ita sine vitio procreamur, atque ante actionem propriæ voluntatis id solum in homine est quod Deus condidit." — (Aug. De pec. orig. c. 13.) "Nemo naturaliter malus est; sed quicunque reus est, moribus, non exordiis, accusatur." —

¹ See Neander's "Dogmengeschichte," I. s. 360 sq.; Hagenbach (K. R.) "History of Doctrines," sects. 110-113; Shedd (W. G. T.) "History of Christian Doctrines," II., IV.; Wiggers (G. F.) "Augustinism and Pelagianism," p. 59 sq.; Ellis's "Half-century of the Unitarian Controversy," p. 56 sq.

(Opus Imp. I. 105, cf. v. 56.) It emphasizes "the power of contrary choice," — the "possibilitatem utriusque partis." And it declares that Adam and Christ are set forth in Rom. v. 12 sq. (cf. 1 Cor. i. 30; 2 Cor. v. 21) as typical personages merely, illustrating the divinely established connection between sin and death, righteousness and life.

This theory is unsatisfactory (a) Because it denies such a connection between our sinfulness and the fall of Adam as the Scriptures assert (for example, Rom. v. 12, 18, 19). (b) Because it denies, on the other hand, such a connection between the righteousness of believers and the work of Christ as the Scriptures assert (Rom. v. 9, 17, 18, 19; x. 4; 1 Cor. i. 30). (c) Because it makes too little of sin as affecting moral character; too little of the moral bias of the soul to evil. (d) Because it fails to account for the universality of sin in mankind.

II. The Arminian Theory. The authorities for this theory are given below.¹ The Arminian theory supposes man to be responsible for his own voluntary action (or inaction), and, strictly speaking, for nothing else. It supposes that, since the fall, men are born "without original righteousness," and morally powerless, needing "new grace," but not guilty. "Unde fit, ut posterī omnes Adami eadem justitiā destituti, prorsus inepti et inidonei sint ad vitam æternam consequendam, aut in gratiam cum deo redeant, nisi deus novā gratiā suā eos præveniat, et vires novas iis restituat ac sufficiat, quibus ad eam possint pervenire." — (Apol. Conf. Remonstr. p. 84, b.) It supposes that men are made responsible for the right and wrong of their conduct by a gracious ability imparted by God. "It is not, then, until there is redemptively conferred upon man what we call a gracious ability for the right that man can strictly be responsible for the wrong." — (Whedon.) And it supposes that Adam and Christ are represented as "federal heads" of mankind in Rom. v. 12, but only "conceptually," or by a "legal fiction." But in reality the case stands thus: "It is as a depraved being that man becomes an ego; but instantly after, in the order of nature, he is met by the provisions of the atonement. If he is not thereby immediately unconditionally justified and regenerated, his death before the commission of actual sin would place him out of the category of condemnation." In other words, gracious aid is always granted, and must be granted, to render man justly accountable for sin.

¹ "Remonstrantia, libellus supplex exhibitus Hollandiæ et Westfrisiæ Ordinibus," 1610. Five Articles; "Confessio, seu Declaratio Sententiæ Pastorum, qui in fœderato Belgio Remonstrantes vocantur, super præcipuis articulis rel. Chr." 1622 (Simon Episcop. Opp. II. 69); Limborch (Phil. a) "Theologia Christiana" (Amstel. 1686, 1730); Arminius (Ja.) "Opera Theol." 1609, 1635; Wesley (J.) "Works" see p. 25 supra; Whedon (D.D.) "Doctrines of Methodism," Bib. Sac. XIX. p. 241 sq.

This theory is unsatisfactory (a) Because the Scriptures do not found human responsibility on gracious aid, or the work of the Spirit. (b) Because they do not teach that this influence of the Holy Spirit is given to all men; much less do they teach that it is given to all in early life. (c) Because they do not justify us in calling that "grace" which must be imparted by God, to constitute man responsible. (d) Because they teach a doctrine of election which this theory repudiates. (e) Because they teach the entire sinfulness and the accountability of Satan, without once suggesting the idea of gracious aid, imparted to him for the purpose of rendering him justly accountable. The writer, at least, does not recollect any passage where such aid is pronounced necessary for Satan.

III. *The Edwardean Theory.*¹ This theory maintains that man is responsible for all his voluntary action (or inaction), and that he always has a natural ability to do right, though his inclination to sin leads him to do wrong uniformly. It also maintains that Adam and Christ are treated in Rom. v.

¹ See Duffield (G.) "Doctrines of the New Sch. Presb. Church," Bib. Sac. XX. p. 561 sq.; "The Auburn Declaration," Presb. Rev. 1876*; Fiske (D. T.) "New England Theology," Bib. Sac. XXII. 477 sq. and 568 sq.; Haven (J.) "Sin as related to Human Nature, and to the Divine Purpose," Bib. Sac. XX. 445 sq.

* It is not meant that the New School Presbyterians adopted in all respects "The New England Theology," but that the two may be studied together, as kindred types of thought.

12 sq. as sources of inclination to evil and to good; yet it denies that men are responsible for any inherited inclination. They are only responsible for the action by which they freely appropriate and express such an inclination. Hence men are born depraved, but not sinful; loaded with misfortune, but not with guilt. Their guilt begins with moral action; and this, owing to their inherited bias to evil, is always sinful.

In favor of this theory, it is urged (1) That it does something to explain the fact of human responsibility, — a great deal, indeed, if its distinction between natural and moral ability is correct, and if the former is a sufficient basis for responsibility. (2) That it agrees with many representations of Scripture as to personal guilt, and especially with the accounts of the final judgment (Ezek. xviii. 1–32; Matt. xxv. 14–46; 2 Cor. v. 10). (3) That it is compatible with the Scriptural doctrines of election and the work of the Spirit.

But it is not wholly satisfactory (a) Because it does not agree with the most obvious sense of Eph. ii. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 14; Rom. v. 12–19; John iii. 6. For these passages suggest that all men are exposed, even from birth, to the just displeasure of God. (b) Because it tends to make the salvation of all who die in infancy independent of the death of Christ; for, if they are simply unfortunate, it is impossible to see why Christ should suffer for them. — (See Rom. v. 8 sq.; 2 Cor. v. 15, 21; Heb. ix. 22, 26, 28; 1 Peter, iii. 18; 1 John ii. 2.) (c) Because it fails to satisfy the logical understanding, that man has all the power necessary to right action; for the admission of moral inability¹ seems to render null and void the assertion of natural ability. Besides, the difference between holding a child to be guilty for actions which flow uniformly from a bias to evil, and holding him guilty for that bias, seems much greater in theory than in practice.

iv. *The Placean Theory.*² This theory supposes that men are accountable for all the sin which they commit, or desire to commit, or which they indorse in others by sympathy of aim and spirit. It supposes that all men participate with Adam in the corruption of nature induced by the fall. It supposes that they are directly charged with this corruption, and mediately with the sin which it indorses; and it supposes that Adam and Christ are set forth, in Rom. v. 12 sq., as the sources, respectively, of sin and death, righteousness and life, in mankind.

¹ Since any inability is said to be inconsistent with responsibility, and especially if that inability is inherited.

² See Shedd (W. G. T.) "Hist. of Christian Doctrine," II. p. 158 sq.; Hagenbach (K. R.) "Hist. of Doctrines," II. pp. 181, 262; Baird (S. J.) "Elohim Re-

In support of this theory, it is said, (1) That it is in harmony with several statements of Scripture.—(See Luke xi. 47, 51; Matt. xxiii. 35, 36; Ex. xx. 5, 6; xxxiv. 7; Ps. ciii. 17, 18; Ezek. xviii. 1–32. Edwards (J.) “Inquiry concerning the Freedom of the Will,”—“Works” II., p. 482.) (2) That it agrees with the working of conscience, which holds every one responsible for his moral assent to evil. “Evil dwells in him, not as a dead inheritance, handed down from Adam, but as his own evil to which he consents.”—(Dorner, Hist. of Prot. Theol. I., p. 212.)

Yet it is not wholly satisfactory, (a) Because it casts so faint a light on the justice of God in the imputation of Adam’s sin to adults who do as he did. (b) Because it casts no light on the justice of God in bringing into existence a race inclined to sin by the fall of Adam. The inherited bias is still unexplained, and the imputation of it a riddle or a wrong to the natural understanding.

v. *The Augustinian Theory.*¹ The defenders of this theory agree with those just named, in making every man responsible for his moral feelings, as well as actions, and, in supposing him to be a particeps criminis, whenever he assents in heart to a sinful action.

vealed,” &c., p. 45–6; Schweitzer (A.) “Placæus,” Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie; Placæus (J.) “Opera Omnia,” 1699 and 1702, “Theses Theologicæ de Statu hominis lapsi ante gratiam,” 1640, and “Disputatio de imputatione primi peccati Adam,” 1655.

¹ Shedd (W. G. T.) “Discourses and Essays,” p. 218 sq.; Baird (S. J.) “The Elohim Revealed in the Creation and Redemption of Man”; Hodge (C.) “Systematic Theology,” II. p. 51 sq., and p. 216 sq.

They generally accept the traducian theory of the origin of human souls, as well as of human bodies. They emphasize the oneness of the human race, and approve the language of Augustine, saying, "We were all in that one man [Adam], since we were all that one man who lapsed into sin through the woman that was made from him previous to transgression. The form in which we were to live as individuals had not, indeed, been created and assigned to us, man by man; but that seminal nature from which we were to be propagated was in existence."

Hence they regard Adam and Christ as the sources, respectively, of sin and death, righteousness and life. Without rejecting the doctrine of "federal headship," they make it rest upon a real and natural headship, which is of chief importance.

Of this theory it may be remarked, (a) That it was probably suggested to the mind of Augustine by the inaccurate Latin version of ἐξ ἑ in Rom. v. 12; (b) That it does not remove the objection which human reason urges against holding all men responsible for the first sin of Adam; for it does not assert that all human souls were so included in Adam's soul as to act with the latter consciously in that first sin; (c) That it lays too little stress upon the distinction between nature and will, between an unconscious bias and a rational choice; and (d) That it breaks down, when applied to the connection between the justification of believers and the righteousness of Christ; for believers were not in Christ, as to the substance of their souls, when he wrought out redemption for them.

vi. *The Calvinistic Theory.*¹ By this is meant the Old School view, fully stated by Turretin, and by the articles of the Westminster assembly. It asserts the responsibility of every man for his depraved heart and sinful action. It supposes that Adam and Christ are set forth in Rom. v. 12 sq., as federal heads or representatives; the sin of the former being imputed to all men directly, and the righteousness of the latter being imputed directly to all the elect.

¹ Turretin (F.) "Institutio Theologiæ Elencticæ," Vol. I. Loc. IV. Qu. IX.; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," Vol. II. p. 192 sq.; "Princeton Essays" (First Series), "Original Sin," p. 109 sq., and "The Doctrine of Imputation," pp. 128-217; Wallace (H.) "Representative Responsibility, a Law of the Divine Procedure in Providence and Redemption"; "Westminster Assembly's Confession of Faith," and "Catechism"; "The Philadelphia Confession of Faith" (Bap.).

To this theory objections may also be made; for example, (a) That it requires us to give a very unusual, if not unexampled meaning to the word "sinned," in Rom. v. 12, that is, "were regarded and treated as responsible for another's sin"; (b) That it makes too little of the real connection between Adam and his offspring, Christ and his people. — (See John iii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 3); and, (c) That it puts justification before regeneration and faith; while the New Testament makes faith a condition of justification, and, therefore, prior to it, in the order of nature.

Something, then, may be said, with apparent justice, against every one of these theories. And evidently the connection of the race with Adam, and of believers with Christ, brings into the problem of the imputation of sin a great part of the difficulty which it offers to the human understanding. Were it not for that connection, a tolerably satisfactory solution might be reached; but that connection is a fact, whether we can ascertain all that it involves or not.

Looking at this subject, for a moment, in the light of human reason and conscience, it may be said, that every man, however depraved at birth, or hardened by wicked conduct, is a moral agent, and, as such, is accountable to God (a) for every voluntary act that is wrong; (b) for the increase of inclination to evil which is produced by that act; (c) for the inclination to sin which is appropriated by that act; (d) for all the evil which may be expected by him to result from that act. All this must be admitted by every thoughtful man, without regard to the instruction of Scripture. For what an amount of sin, then, is every one accountable to whom the gospel is preached! Heart-fellowship with sin is sin; and all mankind in their unrenewed state are guilty of this radical and sin-producing sin.

Many would add to all this, responsibility, (e) for the whole system of moral evil with which the act is seen by him to be connected; and, (f) for the sin of Adam, which is, in principle, repeated by every sinful act of his offspring. But it would be in many respects better to say, that he is accountable for the degree of sympathy which he has for the whole system of evil, and for the disobedience of Adam. If that sympathy is full, whether it be expressed by word or deed or thought, if the whole force of his being is arrayed against heaven, and on the side of hell, it is difficult to limit his responsibility.

A voluntary act, as used in this statement, is any act which is performed by a moral being in his ordinary condition,—any act, or course of action, which reveals his moral character.

But of course it is our duty to take the evidence of Scripture, as well as that of reason; and the evidence of Scripture is formidably strong in favor of the view, that both Adam and Christ acted for others; that, in some true sense, all men suffer the penal consequences of the sin in Eden, being in full fellowship with it, and that all who are in moral union with Christ will enjoy the full benefit of his death.

Yet the Scriptures recognize a difference between personal sin and inherited sinfulness, as appears in their accounts of the final judgment.

VI. PENALTY OF SIN. This topic requires us to consider (1) The proper idea of penalty; (2) The fact of penalty for sin; and (3) What that penalty is.

(1) The first point need not detain us long; for without doubt the primary and leading sense of penalty is, suffering by pain or loss inflicted by the proper authority upon wrong-doers for their wrong-doing. It looks to the past, not to the future; its primary aim is retribution, not reformation. It rests on the postulate, that government ought to make a distinction between crime and innocence, that evil-doers ought not to receive the same treatment as those who do well; and this postulate will be accepted by all who admit the distinction between right and wrong, by all who admit that men are in fact moral beings.

(2) The second point may also be treated with brevity; for although many exclude punishment, properly so-called, from the moral government of God, they do this against the plain teaching of the Scriptures, and have, therefore, been answered in Part II., which proves that teaching to be infallible. If any one urges that the Scriptures reveal the natural consequences of sin, and not its penalty, we reply, (a) That their language will not admit of such an interpretation (Matt. xxv. 30, 41, 46; 2 Thess. i. 8); and (b) That the natural consequences of sin are due to a constitution given to man by his Maker. Hence the working of that constitution may well be regarded as retributive, — carrying into effect the just judgment of God.¹

(3) The third point must be treated with special care; and for two reasons: first, because it is one of no little difficulty in itself; and secondly, because the belief of Christians in respect to it is becoming divided. Some suppose that the penalty of sin is bodily death; some, that it is extinction of conscious being; some, that it is spiritual death; and some, that it is both spiritual and bodily death. Especially active are those who teach that extinction of conscious being is the divinely-prescribed penalty of sin. We must, therefore, spare no pains in trying to ascertain the truth on this point, nor ought we to be surprised if it occupies our attention for a considerable time; for the data to be examined are scattered here and there, through the whole Bible, and may be divided into three parts: — (a) The meaning and use of the terms employed in foretelling the penalty of sin; (b) The intimations as to the time when the penalty takes effect; and (c) The account of it, as suffered by those who have passed beyond hope.

In studying this subject, three facts ought to be borne constantly in mind, namely: That the style of the sacred writers is popular, and very often figurative; that the revelation of religious truth made by them is progressive in clearness and fullness, from first to last; and that comparatively slight attention is given to the doctrine of another life in the Old Testament.

¹ Butler (J.) "Analogy," Part I. ch. 2d.

In the discussion which follows, particular reference is had to the view, so zealously advocated by many,¹ that extinction of conscious being is the penalty of sin.

1. The meaning and use of the principal terms employed by the sacred writers in foretelling the punishment of sin.

The terms are Death, Destruction or Perdition, Lake of Fire, Outer Darkness, Eternal Punishment, and some others of similar import.

(1) The most important of them all is "death"; and therefore it deserves the most careful study.

What then is death? The one comprehensive answer to this question is this: The opposite or negative of life.

And therefore it is necessary to inquire, What is life? And to answer: A great mystery doubtless, yet by no means the same as existence. Life is more than existence; it is a particular kind of existence, — existence plus a mysterious force, which gives a higher form and a greater value to existence. This, if no more, may be premised before looking at the use of terms in the Bible.

Starting with this general view of the meaning and relation of the words "life" and "death," we turn to the Scriptures, and observe the following facts:² —

1. That they recognize an original and important difference between the body of man and his spirit. (Eccl. xii. 7; Gen. ii. 7 (cf. i. 26); Num. xvi. 22; xxvii. 16; Heb. xii. 9; Zech. xii. 1; 2 Cor. xii. 2 sq.; Acts vii. 59; Gen. xxxv. 18; Ezek. xviii. 4; Rom. viii. 16; 2 Cor. v. 1; James ii. 26.)

¹ Dobney (H. H.) "The Scripture Doctrine of Future Punishment"; Whately (R.) "A View of the Scripture Revelation concerning a Future State" — not very decided; Storrs (G.) "Man's Destiny," "The True Source of Life," "The Rich Man and Lazarus"; Hudson (C. F.) "Debt and Grace"; Constable (H.) "Duration and Nature of Future Punishment."

² Hovey (A.) "State of the Impenitent Dead;" Thompson (J. P.) "Love and Penalty;" Bartlett (S. C.) "Life and Death Eternal; a Refutation of the Theory of Annihilation;" Stuart (M.) "Exegetical Essays on Several Words relating to Future Punishment;" Dexter (H. M.) "The Verdict of Reason upon the Question of the Future Punishment of those who die Impenitent;" New Englander for 1871, p. 659 sq., "The Theory of the Extinction of the Wicked;" Krabbe (O.) "Die Lehre von der Sünde und vom Tode in ihrer Beziehung zu einander und zu der Auferstehung Christi."

2. That this original difference between the body of man and his spirit underlies a difference of relation to endless existence (Gen. iii. 22, 23, compared with 1 Cor. xv. 43-47, and the passages cited above). Accordingly, the body of man, as such, was not, even before the fall, adapted to endless existence; but his spirit was. His body, unless changed from an earthly to a spiritual one, must return to dust; but his soul, in its own proper nature, was a single, indissoluble power, adapted to endless being. This seems to be a natural conclusion, from the language of Scripture and from the testimony of consciousness.

Yet, as we shall presently see, the conscious existence of the soul is by no means its life; for the latter depends upon union with God: it is a higher condition of being, due to rational fellowship with the Most High. As the body without the spirit is dead (James ii. 26), so the spirit without God is dead. The connection between the soul and God, though different from that between the body and the soul, is no less essential and life-producing.

“Mors igitur animæ fit,” says Augustine, “cum eam deserit Deus, sicut corporis, cum id deserit anima . . . vivit itaque anima ex Deo, cum vivit bene; non enim potest bene vivere, nisi Deo in se operante quod bonum est.” — “De Civ. Dei,” xiii. c. 2. See also xi. c. 17. Non itaque esset vitium recedere a Deo, nisi naturæ, cujus id vitium est, potius competeret esse cum Deo. Quapropter etiam voluntas mala grande testimonium est bonæ naturæ. To test the correctness of this definition, we must observe with care the use of the terms “life” and “death” in the Scriptures. They are frequently used of the spirit, and signify respectively, —

1. Union with God, and separation from him. This is a natural use of the terms; for man as a spiritual being is not self-sufficient, but dependent, needing fellowship; and his truest life is realized in communion with God. But union with God is secured by faith in Christ; and separation from God, by unbelief. Bearing this fact in mind, the following passages will be seen to justify our definition, namely:—

(1) John vi. 47, 48, 54, 56, 63; xi. 25, 26 (cf. John iii. 16; iv. 14; Rom. v. 1). From these selections, to go no further, it appears that men who have Christian faith have a state of being which has been originated by the Holy Spirit, with the use of Christian truth, and is called by the Saviour life, or eternal life. The possession of true faith proves the existence of this life, even if the one is not identical with the other; and, by virtue of this life, the believer is in Christ and Christ in him. They hold converse with each other, having the same thoughts, wishes, and aims. But this may be made a separate point.

(2) 'John xv. 2 sq.; Eph. i. 1; 1 John v. 20 (cf. Rom. viii. 6–11). These are but specimens of a large class of texts, which represent believers as being in Christ. And this their relation to him is conceived of many times as more than legal and protective, as vital also, through his indwelling spirit. Yet the vitality in question is plainly one of moral disposition,—of thinking and feeling in unison with Christ; it is spiritual life, the normal, unperturbed, unimpeded, healthful action of a rational soul, uplifted by the thoughts of Christ communicated to it.

(3) John i. 4, 9; xv. 1 sq.; xvii. 2, 3; Gal. v. 22. When we observe (a) that the life was the light of men, (b) that the eternal life of men consists in knowing the true God and Jesus Christ, (c) that by vital union with Christ men bear Christian fruit, and (d) that this fruit is love, joy, peace, &c., we are ready to conclude that the life given to men, in Christ and by Christ, is a normal state of the soul, revealing itself in holy action,—a state and action which will never cease (John xi. 25, 26).

(4) John v. 24; iii. 6; 1 John iii. 14, a.; Eph. v. 14; Titus iii. 5; 1 Peter i. 3, 23 (cf. Rom. vi. 2–14; vii. 4–6; viii. 6, 7, 10, 11; Eph. ii. 1, 5, 6, 10; iv. 18; Gal. ii. 19, 20; Col. i. 21, 22; 1 Tim. v. 6). In these passages, the state of men after regeneration is contrasted with their state before it,—the one being called life, and the other death. But the difference between these two states is one of moral disposition and action. In the one case, there is fellowship with God; in the other, there is not. This is the difference, as revealed by experience; and all the accounts of regeneration, pardon, adoption, and union with Christ, found in the Bible, rest on this view.

It is plain that the selections in our parenthesis refer to the same conditions of being as are treated in the leading texts. But in the passages thus indicated, the unregenerate are described as those who are alive in sin, and subject to sin; alive to the flesh, and obedient to its lusts; alive to the law, but enemies to God, or dead to him; accomplishing the wishes of the flesh and of the mind, but darkened in the understanding, and alienated from the life of God, by reason of ignorance and hardness of heart: while the regenerate are described as those who have died to sin and to the law, and been made alive in Christ to God,—the servants of righteousness, a product of God's hand, created in Christ Jesus for good works, and destined to be made holy and spotless and blameless before him.

All this refers, beyond a doubt, to moral character and condition. Fellowship with God in Christ is life; alienation of heart from God is death.

II. Spiritual blessedness and woe. The idea of life includes that of happiness. It is only when life is disturbed, its laws violated, that suffering comes in. If the experience of man does not comport with this idea, he is but too conscious that his life is a failure by reason of sin. Hence, in spite of experience, he includes high spiritual enjoyment in his conception of human life, and applies this term to a blessed existence, by way of distinguishing it from a miserable one. From this point of view, death is misery,—the opposite of true life, or mere existence,—the negative of true life.—(See 1 Thess. iii. 8; Rom. vii. 9; viii. 6.)

Again, true life implies fellowship with God; and fellowship with God is purest enjoyment. Well and fervidly does Secrétan say that, "if feeling is but the echo of the depths within, if happiness is but the consciousness of power, harmony, and truth, as wretchedness is that of emptiness, discord, and falsehood, it is impossible that the love of God, the perfection of goodness, the plenitude of our being, should not also be fulness of happiness. Thus the soul that loves God is rich, free, happy; she is satisfied, moreover, and feels no further want." — (See Ps. xvi. 11; xlii. 1-5; Eph. iii. 19; 1 Peter i. 8.) Hence, loss of communion with God is a loss of blessedness; nay, as conceived of by the sacred writers, it is more than this, — it is the opposite of true life. The spirit of man cannot leave the realm of happiness, without entering that of woe. — (See 1 Thess. iii. 7, 8; Rev. ii. 11; xx. 6, 14; xxi. 8 (cf. Rev. xx. 10; xiv. 10, 11); Luke xvi. 23 sq.; Matt. xxv. 41, 46.)

But against the conclusion now reached, several objections are pressed by those who believe in the annihilation of the wicked. For example: —

1. That death properly signifies extinction of being. When it is predicated of a person, it denotes the end of his personal existence. When it is predicated of an animal, it denotes the end of its animal existence. And, when it is predicated of a plant, it denotes the end of its existence as a plant.

This is not wholly correct, as an account of the use of language among men; for, according to that use, a dead tree may be still in existence, and so may a dead body, or a dead spirit. Existence, in a state of death, is different from existence in a state of life; but it is existence still. The state or condition of being, called life, is terminated by death; and this is all.

2. That Adam must have understood death to be extinction of being; and his view of the evil threatened for disobedience must have been correct. Neither of these assertions can be sustained by evidence; for the Word of God gives no hint of the explanations which Jehovah doubtless made to Adam of the threatening in question, — no hint of the meaning which Adam found in it. The record is very brief, giving, we suspect, the substance of much instruction and warning in a single clause.

Besides, we have no reason to suppose that Adam, any more than his descendants, had an exact or adequate view beforehand of the penalty of sin. The justice of punishment does not depend on its being known by the transgressor, before he disobeys the law.

3. That the Scripture accounts of the dead prove death to be extinction of being. — (See, for example, Ps. vi. 6; xxx. 10; lxxxviii. 11–13; cxv. 17; Eccl. ix. 10; Isa. xxxviii. 18, 19 (cf. Jer. li. 57; 1 Thess. iv. 13 sq). These passages do certainly, at first sight, favor the theory of extinction of being at death. But it should be recollected, in studying them, (a) That the Bible is a progressive revelation. This is true of its treatment of almost every doctrine, and especially of the doctrines of the trinity and the future life; “first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear.” Hence, we must look to the New Testament, rather than to the Old, for the fullest account of the state after death. (b) Poetry should be interpreted by prose, rather than prose by poetry; for poetry makes more frequent use of phenomenal and hyperbolical language than does prose. It is, therefore, more likely to seize upon the visible aspects of death, and describe it by its effects on the body. (c) The sacred writers appear to speak oftentimes of death with reference to the change which it makes on one’s relations to the present world. By it, the plans, enterprises, duties, and joys of time are brought to nought forever. — (See Eccl. ix. 10; Ps. cxlvi. 4; Job vii. 7–10.) (d) The views of uninspired men are sometimes given on this point; and of course their views may be incorrect. Hezekiah was, in all likelihood, uninspired when he prayed; and, though the preacher was inspired when he wrote, he has put on record many of the thoughts which he had when uninspired: we cannot, therefore, rely upon the testimony of either as conclusive. — (See, for example, Isa. xxxviii. 18, 19; Eccl. ix. 10; Job x. 20–22; xvi. 12; xvii. 1.)

(2.) Another term to be considered is "destruction," or "perdition." The Greek noun ἀπώλεια is used in twenty passages of the New Testament; and the corresponding verb is found in more than a hundred. They often denote the utter ruin of an object, and often the entire severance of its (normal) relation to another. — (See Matt. xxvi. 8; Mark xiv. 4; Acts viii. 20; Matt. ix. 17; x. 6, 42; xv. 24; Mark ii. 22; Luke xi. 51; xiii. 33; xv. 4, 6, 8, 9, 17, 24, 32; also xix. 10; John vi. 39; x. 28; xvii. 12; xviii. 9; 2 Peter iii. 6; 2 John, 8 (cf. 11). But if the verb is often used to denote sundered relations, in consequence of which one person or object is worthless to another; if it points to severed relations, and so implies great evil, but not extermination of being, this may well be its meaning, when selected to express the penalty of sin. Besides, it will be observed, that perishing or destruction is affirmed of prophets and good men, as well as of the wicked. (Luke xi. 51; xiii. 33 (cf. Isa. lvii. 1). And, therefore, it cannot be supposed to denote, uniformly, extinction of being, even if it may, in some instances, denote this.

(3.) Another expression to be examined, is the "lake of fire," and its equivalents. — (See Matt. v. 22, 29, 30; x. 28; xiii. 42, 50; xviii. 8, 9; xxiii. 33; xxv. 41; Mark ix. 43-48; Rev. xx. 10, 14, 15; xxi. 8 (cf. Luke xvi. 23, 24). It will be noted, that the expressions, "eternal fire," "furnace of fire," "lake of fire," "fire that is never quenched," "Gehenna of fire," and "Gehenna," appear to be used by Christ as equivalent terms. It will also be observed, that in all these passages, men themselves, or wicked beings, are spoken of directly as being in the fire referred to. It will be still further remarked, that they are not said, unless it be in a single instance, to be destroyed by the fire. And, lastly, it will be observed, that they are generally represented as in a state of great suffering. The fire is conceived of as an unfailing source of pain, not as putting an end to conscious being; and this prevailing view of the office of the fire in question must naturally determine the sense of the word "destroy," in Matt. x. 28; especially, when we compare Mark i. 24, with v. 7.

(4) Another expression employed by the sacred writers is "torment" or "punishment." — (See Matt. xxv. 46; xviii. 34, 35 (cf. viii. 29; Mark v. 7). The word κόλασις occurs in but one other passage of the New Testament, namely, 1 John iv. 18; and the verb κολάζω, from which it is derived, occurs in but three places at most; (namely, Acts iv. 21, 2 Peter ii. 9, and perhaps 2 Peter ii. 4.) The biblical use of the words, therefore, shows that they refer to punishment in the form of conscious suffering; yet it is sufficient to know that, when applied to sinful beings, they signify punishment. The word "tormentors," points also to conscious and great suffering; and the bearing of the passages cited upon the nature of the penalty of sin cannot be doubted. It will be observed in this case, also, that the wrong-doers are referred to directly as men, or evil angels, and not under the figure of an evil tree, or of any other inflammable object.

(5) Still another expression is used to shadow forth the doom of the lost, namely, "The outer darkness." — (See Matt. viii. 12; xxii. 13 (cf. xxiv. 51); xxv. 11, 12, 30 (cf. vii. 23); Rev. xxii. 15.) Expulsion from the presence of Christ into the outer darkness, where there is wailing and gnashing of teeth, can be said to describe no other doom than one of felt misery; and it is plainly a misery in which the ungodly now suffer, though it will not reach its culmination till the last day. It is obvious, likewise, that loss of good, or as Turretin amplifies the thought, separatio a Deo et Christo, privatio lucis, gaudii, gloriæ, felicitatis, is supposed to be a principal part of the punishment suffered by the lost, whether here or hereafter.

Besides these, a few other expressions are found in the Bible which are thought to define the penalty of sin, as "extinction of being."

(6) The wicked are to be "consumed" or "devoured," &c., (for example Isa. i. 28; Ps. xxxvii. 20; Heb. x. 27.) In regard to the first two of these passages, and to many more of a similar tenor in the Old Testament, it may be said, (a) That they probably refer to merely temporal calamities.

(b) That the language is not to be pressed as literal, even with reference to temporal evil (cf. Gen. xxxi. 40; Ps. xxxi. 10, 11; xxxix. 11; lxix. 10; Jer. xiv. 12; Hab. iii. 14; Gal. v. 15; Mark xii. 40). And, in regard to the last passage, it may be said, that it is manifestly a strong figurative expression, and settles nothing as to the precise nature of the penalty of sin.

(7) The wicked are to be "burned up," or the like. — (See Ps. xxi. 10; xcvi. 3; Mal. iv. 1, 3, Eng. ver. (iii. 19, 21, in Heb.)) Matt. iii. 12; xiii. 40; John xv. 6; Heb. vi. 8; x. 27; xii. 29; Rev. xx. 9. But with these passages should be compared, Ps. cii. 4 (cf. Job xxx. 30); 1 Kings viii. 51 (cf. Deut. iv. 20; Jer. xi. 4); Ezek. xxii. 19–22 (cf. 1 Peter i. 7; iv. 12; 1 Cor. iii. 15); Num. xxi. 28; Lam. iv. 11.) It is evident from a careful study of the passages cited, not to mention others of a similar character, (a) That the words "burn" and "burn up," are often used, in a figurative sense, to describe the effect of God's wrath upon sinners. Whether the original words should be translated "burn," or "burn up," depends upon the context, and especially upon the object with which sinners are compared. If they are likened to chaff, or wood, the original terms may be rendered, "to burn up;" but if to a metallic substance, they must be rendered "to burn,"—for the substance is only melted, not dissolved. (b) These figurative expressions are often used to denote vengeance inflicted on those who still exist; and, in such cases, it cannot signify extinction of being. (c) The epithets used in connection with these words, or with the word "fire," denote in some instances long-continued or eternal burning; hence they point to protracted suffering, rather than to sudden extinction of being. We do not, therefore, find in the use of these figurative terms any valid objection to our view of the penalty of sin.

(8) The wicked are to be "cut off." — (See Ps. xxxiv. 17; xxxvii. 9, 22, 28. But compare Isa. liii. 8; Dan. ix. 26; Job vi. 9; Ps. lxxxviii. 17; Matt. xxiv. 50, 51.) The words "cut off" appear to refer in almost all these passages to natural death ; and it seems to us very hasty to infer from them the extinction of the soul along with the death of the body.

(9) The wicked are to "be brought to nought," &c. Such texts as the following are referred to: Ps. xxxvii. 10, 36; Job vii. 21; xx. 8; viii. 22; Obad. 16; Isa. xli. 11, 12; Jer. x. 24. But with these should be compared a few others (for example, Isa. xl. 17; Ps. xxxix. 5; 1 Cor. vii. 19; viii. 4; 2 Cor. xii. 11; Gal. vi. 3; Acts v. 36; Mark ix. 12). It will be observed, that the former passages seem to speak of temporal judgments, and also that the same form of speech is used of the righteous which is applied to the wicked. Besides, it must be borne in mind, that the language of Scripture is very often figurative, and even hyperbolical,—indeed, through and through popular instead of scientific.

(10) The wicked, or their names, are to "be blotted out." And these passages are quoted: Ps. lxix. 28 (cf. Ex. xxxii. 32); Rev. iii. 5. The figure is that of a record-book, containing the names of persons entitled to certain blessings; but the blotting out of the names deprives the persons represented by them of all title to the blessings in question.

Having ascertained that the terms "life" and "death" are often used by the sacred writers to denote, on the one hand, the union of the human spirit with God, and, on the other, its separation from him, as also to denote its blessedness and its woe, and that other expressions employed to indicate the penalty of sin confirm rather than confute this explanation of death, we are now prepared to consider:—

II. The intimations of Scripture as to the time when the penalty of sin begins to take effect. For, if it begins to take effect in this world, it must be mainly, if not exclusively, separation of soul from God, with the consequent misery. The term "death" may signify this; and the circumstances of the case forbid any other meaning. That the penalty of sin begins to take effect in the present world, may be inferred,—

(1) From the language of God to Adam before the fall. That language was very explicit. Gen. ii. 17: "In the day of thy eating of it, thou shalt surely die." The obvious and the only tenable meaning of these words is, that the death of Adam should follow at once his eating of the forbidden fruit; and there is nothing in the narrative of the fall which warrants any other interpretation of them, or authorizes us to say, that God in his mercy postponed the execution of the threatened penalty.¹

Besides, we learn that Adam and Eve hid themselves away from the presence of God, thus relinquishing their fellowship with him; and, that he, in turn, banished them from the garden, and so, as it were, from converse with himself. Some have concluded from his words, as recorded in Gen. iii. 19, that physical death was the punishment provided for disobedience, and that it was postponed a long time in the case of our first parents; but the language of that passage does not show that physical death was even a part, much less that it was the chief part, or the whole, of the penalty of sin. We conclude, then, that Adam and Eve began to suffer the punishment of sin immediately after the fall; and, if so, that their offspring, born in their likeness, suffer it also, to some extent, in the present state.

"To some extent," we say; for as the life of the soul, consisting in its union with God and consequent peace, begins here with regeneration, but culminates hereafter in glory; so does the death of the soul, consisting in its separation from God and consequent woe, begin here with sin, but culminate hereafter in despair. This may be inferred,—

(2) From the language of John the Baptist, preserved in the Fourth Gospel, iii. 36: "The wrath of God abideth on him." (Compare John iii. 18; Eph. ii. 3; Rom. i. 18; Isa. lix. 2.) Meyer supposes that the word "wrath" does not here mean punishment, but rather God's holy indignation. His view is not, however, correct; for the wrath spoken of is represented as being and abiding upon—ἐπὶ—the unbeliever; it is wrath passing over upon its object in just punishment,—being, therefore, a foretaste of "the wrath to come." And the reason why the wrath to come is referred to so much oftener than the wrath now revealed is because the former is so much greater and more enduring than the latter; even as, for the same reason, the future reward of Christians is spoken of far oftener than their present reward. Yet they receive a hundred-fold of good here.

¹ See "State of the Impenitent Dead," p. 99 sq.

(3) From the frequent designation of the present state of unbelievers by the term "death." For the mere fact that this term, chosen by the Most High to denote the penalty of sin, is applied to unrenewed men in this life, supposes them to be suffering that penalty. Death is the penalty of sin. Sinners are dead even here; hence they are bearing, in some measure, the penalty of sin. The onus probandi rests clearly upon those who deny our statement.

(4) From the different language used by the sacred writers in describing the present sufferings of believers and those of unbelievers. (Compare Rom. viii. 28 sq., and Heb. xii. 5 sq., with Rom. i. 18 sq.) In the one case, suffering is reformatory, with an aspect of retribution; in the other, it is retribution, with a glance towards reformation.

(5) From the sufferings which are connected with natural death in this world. The fear and sting of bodily death are not taken from it for unbelievers; and, if such death is included in the penalty of sin, that penalty is suffered in part here.

(6) From the action of conscience, enlightened by the Word of God. Men who read the Scriptures are wont to believe that, by the action of our moral nature and of his providence, God begins to punish the wicked in this life, and sometimes makes that punishment very awful and monitory.¹

(7) From the language of Christ and of Peter concerning the ungodly in Hades. Luke xvi. 23; 2 Peter ii. 9. For, if the punishment of unrenewed men begins before the last judgment, why should it not begin in the present world?

¹ Says Augustine: Si nunquam in præsenti judicaret, non esse crederetur. Si omnia in præsenti judicaret, nihil judicii reservaret," cf. Butler (J.) "Analogy," Part I. ch. 2d prope finem.

Is it not reasonable to believe that its witness to the character of God must be as useful here as there?

We are therefore satisfied that the primary and chief penalty of sin consists in a separation of the soul from God, and the misery consequent thereon, and that it begins in the present state.

The correctness of our view of the penalty of sin may be inferred:—

III. From the Scriptural accounts of it, as suffered by the lost in a future state. These are regarded by some as affording, on the whole, the clearest evidence in respect to the nature of death,—the penalty of sin. Perhaps they do; but this is by no means certain: yet they certainly deserve most serious consideration. And we observe, therefore, that impenitent men are represented:—

(1) As being, immediately after death, in a state of restraint and suffering. (Luke xvi. 23, 24, 25, 28; 1 Peter iii. 19; 2 Peter ii. 4, 9; Matt. v. 25 (cf. Matt. viii. 29). Restraint implies a power of action in those restrained; and suffering, a state of consciousness. If the spirits of bad men are rendered impotent and unconscious by death, so likewise are their bodies; why, then, are not the latter, as well as the former, said to be in prison, or under guard (ἐν φυλακῇ, 1 Peter iii. 19)? The discourse of Christ in Luke, is quite as much to the point in proving the conscious existence of the wicked after death, if it be considered a parable, as it is when interpreted as a representative instance of God's dealings with men; and the language of Peter (2 Epistle ii. 4, 9,) clearly teaches that ungodly men, as well as fallen angels, are kept in a state of punishment until the last day. These passages seem to us very conclusive.

(2) As going away from the final judgment into everlasting punishment (Matt. xxv. 46).¹

(3.) *As being, after the judgment, in "Gehenna," or the "lake of fire."*²

From our study of the subject, thus far, we have learned that "death," when predicated of the soul, signifies its separation from God, and consequent misery; and in these we discover the chief penalty for sin. But having ascertained that the penalty of sin, in its highest form, is spiritual death, we proceed with less confidence to say, that it is also death of body, or natural death. And, by this, we mean a separation of body from spirit, reducing the former to its essential properties. In support of this statement, we appeal to the following facts: (1) Bodily death is fairly comprehended in the meaning of the term "death." (2) It is due to the presence of sin in our race. (3) It seems to have been symbolized by the Jewish sacrifices. (4) It was an indispensable part of Christ's suffering. (Matt. xvi. 21; Rom. iii. 24, 25; Heb. x. 10; xiii. 12 (cf. ix. 22); 1 Peter ii. 24.) (5) It seems to be referred to inclusively in a few passages which speak of the penalty of sin (for example, Rom. v. 13, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, (cf. Gen. ii. 17).

¹ Compare the passages cited after (1), (4). ² Compare passages after (1), (3.)

But it is objected to this view, (1) That Adam and Eve did not suffer natural death on the day of their transgression. We reply that they suffered one form of death, and the most dreadful one; hence, the threatening was fulfilled. For it is not necessary to suppose that the threatening referred to every subordinate form of the penalty annexed, in the purpose of God, to disobedience. (2) The wicked who are alive at the coming of Christ will not suffer natural death. This is not certain; possibly they will. A painful dissolution may be included in the change of their bodies. (3) The righteous, whose sins have been forgiven, suffer bodily death. We reply that a curse may be changed into a blessing (cf. Rom. vii. 24).

It must now be added, that spiritual death is an evil naturally permanent, but culminating in endless separation from God hereafter, and so in endless misery. Natural death, on the other hand, is a transitory evil, hardly worth naming in comparison with spiritual.

Finally, it may be remarked, before leaving the subject in hand, that the theory that the penalty of sin unforgiven is extinction of being is liable to grave objections, besides those suggested by the previous discussion. For (1) It makes the punishment of the most wicked the lightest, instead of the severest. For the penalty is loss of conscious being; and such being is least valuable to the most depraved. But conscience and the Word of God both assure us that the worst men deserve the greatest punishment, and will receive it. — (See Luke xii. 47, 48 and the other passages quoted on p. 107, iv. 3).

But we may go a step further, and say, (2) That it makes the punishment of sin unforgiven a good, instead of an evil; an act of grace, rather than of judgment. For extinction of being is not supposed, by those who believe it the proper penalty of sin, to be an evil to the wicked; it is rather a welcome relief from a life of remorse and despair, which is far worse than no existence at all. Says Socrates in the Phædo: "If death had only been the end of all, the wicked would have had a good bargain in dying; for they would have been happily quit, not only of their body, but of their own evil together with their souls."—Jowitt I., p. 437.

It seems to us, therefore, necessary to adhere to the explanation which we have given of death,—the penalty of sin. This penalty is primarily and chiefly separation of soul from God, with the consequent misery; and secondarily, separation of the body from the soul.

Remark. (a) The penalty of sin has been thought to comprise two elements; namely, a loss of good, and a sense of evil,—pœna damni et pœna doloris, or privatio bonorum et sensus malorum; and this analysis is evidently correct. The latter element is, without doubt, most dreaded by the sinful, but the former by the holy.

Remark. (b) Some look upon the penalty of sin as a positive infliction from without; others, as a natural consequence of wrong-doing. As to the pœna damni, we may say that, Given a moral nature made for the worship of God and for communion with him, sin will bring its own punishment, inflicting the greatest possible loss on that nature,—a loss beginning in time, and continuing forever. And as to the pœna doloris, it may come from within, through the action of the spiritual nature itself, or from within and from without, through the action of all the susceptibilities of the sinner's being, with external circumstances adjusted to his deserts.

It is easy to see that remorse for past sin must unite with a conviction of having forfeited and lost forever great good in filling the soul with woe. To the former Cicero, pro Roscio (67), refers in these words: "Sua quemque fraus, et suos terror maxime vexat: suum quemque scelus agitat, amentiaque afficit: suæ malæ cogitationes conscientiaque animi terrent."¹

VI. RESULTS OF SIN.

All the consequences of sin which are not to be regarded as penal may be considered under this head. But theologians differ from one another as to what should be reckoned among the penal consequences, and what among the non-penal consequences of sin.

For example, the hardness and sterility of the ground may be looked upon as an adaptation of the world to a race of sinful beings, — God foreseeing the apostacy of men, and providing for them a "fit abode" for their period of trial as "prisoners of hope."

Or the world may have been subjected to changes at the time of the apostacy in Eden, which made it bring forth thorns and briers. The former view is perhaps more philosophical than the latter.

But, whatever may be true as to the time and process of preparing the earth for a sinful race, there are good reasons for believing that it has been thus prepared, and that it will be greatly changed, if it is ever made the home of holy beings. (2 Peter iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1 sq.; Acts iii. 21; Matt. xix. 28; Heb. i. 11, 12; Rom. viii. 22–25.)²

¹ (Cf. Shakspeare, "Richard Third," Act V. Scene III.; Milton, "Paradise Lost," B. IV. l. 75–78.)

² On the last passage, see Arnold (A. N.) in "Bap. Quarterly," Vol. I., p. 143 sq.; Pepper (G. D. B.) "Bap. Quarterly," Vol. IV., p. 483 sq.; Hahn (C. von) "Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie," X. s. 511 sq.

While the hardness of the soil, and the reluctance with which it yields to man the food which he needs, have a look of severity, and remind him of God's displeasure at his sins, they are, in fact, a blessing. The cloud is silver-lined. Toil is better than self-indulgence; and self-indulgence would increase if toil were diminished.

Again, a considerable part of the ignorance of mankind is due to their sinfulness. For, however intense a desire for certain kinds of knowledge may exist in the hearts of wicked men, they have an aversion to other kinds of knowledge¹; while holy beings have a strong desire to understand, as far as possible, all the works and ways of God, who is the Father of lights. If mankind had continued upright, they would have made far higher attainments in knowledge than they have made as sinners. Intelligence would have been diffused through all nations and ranks of mankind, and error would be a comparative stranger to the world.

Yet ignorance is not an unmixed evil to a sinful race. There is good reason to suppose that vast knowledge would be a curse instead of a blessing, if it were not accompanied with virtue. For, in that case, it would be certainly used for the gaining of selfish ends, and would thus prove an evil to its possessor, by increasing his guilt; and to the world, by increasing his bad influence.

But may there not be certain moral advantages to the universe from the existence of sin? Is it not possible that God may so deal with sinners as to triumph over their wickedness, add glory to his own name, and augment the holiness and blessedness of his people?

This appears to be, not only possible, but probable. For, in dealing with rebels against his holy government, he has made a clearer exhibition of his moral character — his righteousness and benevolence — than could have been made, so far as we can judge, in any other circumstances. And, if this be so, it is well nigh certain that it must result in greater blessedness for the redeemed than would otherwise be possible.

¹ John iii. 19 sq.

And so a statement made in a previous part of this manual would be confirmed, — to wit, that a world, including in it beings who are capable of sinning, is better, notwithstanding the evil of sin, than it would be without such beings. Such a statement ought not to be perverted so as to seem an excuse for sin on the part of the sinner (Rom. iii. 6–8).

PART FIFTH.

THE DOCTRINE OF SALVATION.

THE economy of man's salvation is an economy of grace, resting upon one of justice. The latter has been considered; and the former, which is the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion, will now engage our attention. It embraces several distinct and important topics: The person and work of Christ, the person and work of the Holy Spirit, the effect of grace upon the character and life of man, and the state of men after this life. Before entering upon a study of the first of these topics, brief reference may be made to the time when Christ appeared in the flesh.

For the apostle declares, that "when the fulness of the time" was come, God sent his Son into the world (Gal. iv. 4); and by "the fulness of the time" must be understood that which filled up the period which was to elapse, according to the counsel of God, before Christ should be born. But Paul does not state in this place the reason why God had fixed the final term of the ante-Christian period at that point of time. It may, however, be inferred from other passages, that he believed it to have been fixed in view of the extreme need of men.¹ As Chrysostom says, "When they were ready to perish, then they were saved" (ad. Eph. i. 10).

It may be added, that the circumstances of the time, in other respects,² were suited to this supreme event in the history of mankind; for (a) The vast Roman Empire offered a broad and accessible field for the spread of the new religion. (b) The Greek language was widely known, and was the best possible medium for imparting to men the truths of that religion. (c) A deep distrust of the "gods many," which their fathers worshipped, had sunk into the hearts of great multitudes of the pagan world. (d) Acquaintance with Oriental nations had stimulated religious inquiry in the West, and had awakened an expectation of new light from the East. (e) Glimpses of spiritual truth had quickened the minds of some among the philosophers of Greece, and had led them to long for clearer light. (f) The tendency to idol worship and polytheism among the Jews had been conquered. And (g) In many hearts a longing for the promised Messiah had been kindled to a fervent heat.¹

¹ Rom. v. 20; Gal. iii. 19, 24.

² Neander (A.) "General History of the Christian Religion and Church," introduction; Westcott (B. F.) "Intro. to the Study of the Four Gospels," cc. I. II.; Tzschirner (M. C. W.) "Der Fall des Heidenthums," Erstes Kapitel; Lutterbeck (J. A. B.) "Die N. T. Lehrbegriffe," I. vol.

CHAPTER FIRST.

THE DOCTRINE OF CHRIST.

I. THE PERSON OF CHRIST, THE MEDIATOR.

In this chapter will be considered : I. The Deity of Christ ; II. The Humanity of Christ ; III. The Personal Oneness of Christ ; IV. The Effect of the Incarnation on His Higher Nature ; and, V. The Effect of the Incarnation on His Lower Nature.

On all these topics differences of belief prevail ; and it is therefore desirable to make the examination as thorough and impartial as possible without prolixity.

I. THE DEITY OF CHRIST.²

Evidence that Jesus Christ, by virtue of his higher nature, was truly God, may be found (1) In the language of the Old

¹ Leathes (S.) "The Religion of the Christ," pp. 1 - 176.

² Liddon (H. P.) "The Supreme Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ"; Parker (J.) "Ecce Deus"; Dorner (J. A.) "History of the Development of the Doctrine of Christ's Person"; Lange (J. P.) "The Life of Jesus," &c.; Bushnell (H.) "The Character of Jesus, forbidding his Possible Classification with Men"; Schaff (P.) "The Person of Christ the Miracle of History"; Malan (C.) "Jésus-Christ est L'Éternel-Dieu manifesté en chair"; Stuart (M.) "Miscellanies"; "Letters to Dr. Channing on the Trinity."

Testament. (a) In respect to the angel of Jehovah; and (b) In respect to the Messiah to come. (2) In the language of Christ concerning himself, as recorded, (a) In the Synoptical Gospel, (b) In the Fourth Gospel, and (c) In the book of Revelation. (3) In the language of the New Testament writers concerning him, as found (a) In the first three gospels, and in the Epistles of James, Jude, and Peter; (b) In the writings of Paul, including the Epistle to the Hebrews; and (c) In the writings of John, — Gospel, Epistles, and Revelation.

(I.) IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.¹

(1) In respect to the angel of Jehovah. For it appears from several passages, (namely Gen. xvi. 7, 10, 13; xviii. 1, 2, 3, 13, 17, 20 sq. (cf. xvii. 1 sq.); xxxi. 11–13 (cf. xxviii. 11, 22); xxxii. 25–31 (cf. Hos. xii. 4); xlviii. 15, 16; Ex. iii. passim; xxiii. 20–23 (cf. Isa. xlii. 8); xxxii. 34; xxxiii. 3, 14 (cf. 2 Sam. xvii. 11; Deut. iv. 37; Isa. lxiii. 8, 9), that “the angel of Jehovah,” “the angel of God,” “the angel that wrestled with Jacob” and “redeemed Israel from all evil,” “the angel in whom is God’s name,” “the angel of his presence,” and “his presence,” are appellations of a being who is also called by himself, or by the sacred writers, “God,” “Jehovah,” and “I am that I am;” and therefore it may be inferred that the two expressions are substantially equivalent.

The argument has been summed up as follows:—

“(1) The Malak Jehovah expressly identifies himself with Jehovah; (2) Those to whom he appears own, designate, and worship him as true God; (3) He accepts of sacrifices and prayers without protesting against such acts of worship; (4) Biblical writers frequently designate him as Jehovah.”²

Lange in “Herzog,” says that “The Theophany or Christophany of the Scripture is the manifestation of the future Christ, represented by the angel of Jehovah (Gen. xvi. 7, and often) the angel of the Presence (Ex. xxxiii. 14; Isa. lxiii. 9), the angel of the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The view of those who see in the angel of the Lord merely a created angel pierces, in our opinion, the very heart of the Old Testament doctrine of revelation, and disturbs, fundamentally, the whole organic development of the revelation of God from its beginning to its fulness in the incarnation."¹

¹ Hengstenberg (E. W.) “Christology of the Old Testament”; Smith (J. P.) “Testimony of Scripture to the Messiah.”

² Kurtz (J. H.) “History of the Old Covenant,” I. p. 196; Oehler (G. F.) “Theology of the Old Testament,” sects. 59, 60.

It has indeed been inferred from other passages in the Old Testament, and from some in the New (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxviii. 18 (cf. Ex. xix. 18; xx. 1); see also Acts. vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2; Acts vii. 38; Heb. xiii. 2; Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21; x. 13, 21; xii. 1; Matt. i. 20; ii. 13; Luke i. 11, 19, 26), "that Jehovah presents himself in the Malak by the medium of a finite spirit, but as a person in this personal, living, and finite spirit. Jehovah is not without, but in the angel, who is the medium of God's revelation of himself. . . . And the manifestation of God is much more transparent in an angel than in a prophet, inasmuch as the former is a purely spiritual and sinless being."²

But the view that the angel of Jehovah was an actual theophany, or appearance of God to man, is most naturally suggested by the language of the Old Testament, and should therefore be accepted as true.

Moreover, there are indications sufficiently clear that the angel of Jehovah was, in fact, the pre-incarnate Word. For (a) Christ is called "apostle," or "messenger," in the New Testament (Heb. iii. 1). This name, it is true, is given to him but once; but the corresponding verb is frequently applied to him (John iii. 17, 34; v. 36; vi. 29, 57; vii. 29; xvii. 3, 8, 21, &c.). (b) The angel of Jehovah and the pre-existent Word appear to be identified by some of the New Testament writers. (Luke i. 15-17 (cf. Mal. iii. 1-24); 1 Cor. 10-4 (cf. Ex. xxiii. 20-21; Jud. ii. 1-5.)) (c) The work of the incarnate Word was to reveal the invisible God and save his chosen people; and that work was essentially the same as that of the angel of Jehovah.

¹ Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, s. v. "Theophanie."

² Delitzsch (F.) "Einleitung und Commentar zur Genesis," s. 256.

III. In respect to the Messiah, as divine. In this connection, it is necessary to study the four great Messianic Psalms, together with several paragraphs in the writings of Isaiah, Micah, Zechariah, Malachi, and Daniel.¹

(1) The second Psalm represents the wicked as conspiring against Jehovah and against his anointed. This Christ, on the other hand, is set forth as begotten by Jehovah, invested by him as king in Zion with the moral government of mankind, sure to subdue all his foes, entitled to the homage of all men, however high their rank, and a source of blessing to those who put their trust in him. The New Testament writers apply the words of this psalm to Jesus Christ. (See Acts iv. 24, 27; xiii. 33; Heb. i. 5; v. 5.) The internal peculiarities of it require such an application; and the ancient Jews ascribe to it the same Messianic character. Perowne believes that it had primary reference to some Jewish monarch, as Solomon, perhaps; but this monarch was so conceived of and described as to be a type of Christ. Such a view of its meaning does not detract from its value as evidence for the Godhead of Jesus.

(2) The forty-fifth Psalm celebrates the righteousness, power, glory, and happiness of the Messiah. His reign is to be perpetual. He is addressed as God; and his spouse, the object of his love, is urged to forget her own people and father in her regard for him. In favor of the Messianic interpretation of this psalm may be urged the authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews (see i. 8, 9) — which is of itself decisive, — and also the admission of the psalm into the canon of the Old Testament by the Jews; for, as a royal epithalamium, it must be pronounced extravagant, and even impious. Only by interpreting it of Christ and his Church (cf. Eph. v. 23 sq.) can its right to a place in the canon be vindicated; and we know of no valid objection to this interpretation. Yet we do not mean to assert, that it could not have had respect, primarily, to some Jewish monarch, who was made by the spirit of God a type of Christ to the sacred writer.

¹ Reinke (L.) "Die Messianische Weissagungen bei den grossen und kleinen Propheten des Alten Testaments"; Leathes (S.) "The Witness of the Old Testament to Christ"; Smith (J. P.) "Testimony of Scripture to the Messiah," vol. I.; Higginson (E.) "Ecce Messias"; Oehler (G. F.) "Theology of the Old Testament," II. sects. 230-234; Leathes (S.) "The Religion of the Christ," Lectures II., III., IV.

(3) The seventy-second Psalm represents the Messiah under the figure of a king's son, who is also king, and whose reign is righteous, universal, peaceful, beneficent, and perpetual. Though the psalm is not expressly quoted in the New Testament, the terms which it employs are so extravagant, if meant for an earthly monarch, and so exactly pertinent to the Messiah, according to other descriptions of his reign in the Old Testament, that every just principle of interpretation requires us to look upon it as relating to him, either typically or directly; and, if so, the seventeenth verse teaches his divinity, — "His name shall be forever; before the sun shall he continue his name; and they shall bless themselves in him: all nations shall pronounce him blessed."

(4) The one hundred tenth Psalm represents the Messiah as co-regent with Jehovah, — as an eternal priest-king, and as subduing all his foes. The psalm is very often quoted in the New Testament, and always as descriptive of Christ; and its language is obviously inapplicable to a merely human being. One who is a sunthronos with Jehovah, and a regal priest forever, can hardly be less than God. This remarkable psalm is most naturally understood as a simple and direct prediction of Christ; yet some prefer to regard it as describing typically his reign.

(5) The words of Isa. ix. 5, 6, seem to pass entirely beyond the limits of any even poetic description of a simply human ruler, and must be interpreted of Christ. Consider them: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called, Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace. And to the increase of his government and to peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom, to establish it, and to uphold it in judgment and in righteousness, from this time and to eternity." This language ascribes to the Ruler in question a nature and office truly divine; and it may therefore be relied upon as teaching the deity of Christ.

(6) The words of Micah, v. 2-5, may be translated thus: "And thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, too small to be among the thousands of Judah, from thee for me shall one come forth to be a ruler in Israel; and his comings forth are of old, — the days of eternity," &c. In this remarkable prediction, the Messiah is represented as one (a) Whose places of coming forth had been "of old, — the days of eternity"; (b) Whose place of coming forth hereafter should be Bethlehem, — a small village in Judea; (c) Who should be born of a woman; (d) Who should be a ruler in Israel; and (e) Who should rule as a shepherd in the strength and name of Jehovah.¹

(7) The passage in Zech. xiii. 7, reads thus: "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man, my associate, saith Jehovah of hosts!" The word rendered "associate" occurs in several other places (for example, Lev. v. 20; xviii. 20; xix. 11, 15, 17; xxiv. 19; xxv. 14, 15, 17), and signifies "union" or "fellowship"; and the "man of my union" can only signify the man with whom I am united, — that is, my associate, companion, fellow. That it should be used by Jehovah of an earthly king seems very improbable. It reminds one of several expressions in the New Testament which confirm the view we have taken (for example, John xiv. 9; Phil. ii. 6; Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3; Rev. xxii. 1, 3).

(8) The words of Malachi iii. 1, "Behold, I am sending my messenger; and he shall prepare the way before my face: and the Lord whom ye are seeking shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in," &c. The speaker in this prophecy is Jehovah of hosts; the messenger sent before is his messenger, preparing his way; and the Lord, the messenger of the covenant, in whom the people profess to delight, and who is about to come to his temple, and sit as a refiner and purifier, must certainly be Jehovah himself, but in the person of Christ.

¹ See Hengstenberg (E. W.) "Christology of Old Test." I. p. 475 sq., 2 ed. Eng. transl. Commenting on the arbitrary changes in the text proposed by Hitzig, Maurer says, "Deprecamur omnipotentem istam superioris temporis exagesin; deprecamur iidem male sanam Hitzigii criticen."

(9) Daniel "saw one like a son of man," who "came with the clouds of heaven," even to the Ancient of days. "And there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away," &c. (vii. 13, 14.) This vision was manifestly typical of the kingdom and reign of Christ; and, if it represents without exaggeration the greatness and duration of that kingdom, he must be divine; for the true God will not give his glory to another.¹

II. IN THE LANGUAGE OF CHRIST HIMSELF² as recorded (1) In the Synoptical Gospels. For according to the plain meaning of his words and conduct, as here represented, he claimed (a) To have superhuman knowledge, and particularly a knowledge of future events contingent on the free agency of man (Mark xi. 2-6; Luke xix. 30-34; Matt. xxvi. 31-35; Mark xiv. 27-31). (b) To work great miracles, such as raising the dead, and feeding the multitudes with five loaves and two small fishes (Matt. xiv. 19-21; Mark vi. 41-44; Matt. xi. 5; xv. 30, 31; Luke viii. 41-56; vii. 11-17). (c) To empower others to work miracles, or to perform them himself at their word, though he was not with them (Matt. x. 8; Luke ix. 1, 2; Mark vi. 7, 12, 13). (d) To forgive sins as if with divine authority, implying certainly a knowledge of the heart, and a right to speak as God, or for God (Matt. ix. 2-6; Mark ii. 5-12; Luke v. 20-26). (e) To rule over all things,—at least, in behalf of his people,—and to be present with them in all their places of worship (Matt. xi. 27; Luke x. 22; Matt. xxviii. 18; Matt. xviii. 20). (f) To know the Father directly and fully, as no one else can (Matt. xi. 27; Luke x. 22). (g) To be the Son of God, in a peculiar and eminent sense, implying sameness of nature (Matt. x. 32, 33; xi. 27; xvi. 17, 27). And (h) To be the final Judge (Matt. vii. 21-23; xiii. 41-43; xix. 28, 29; xxv. 31 sq.; Mark xiv. 62; Luke ix. 26; xxii. 69, 70).

¹ See "Excursus on the Messiah," in the Speaker's Commentary; Hengstenberg (E. W.) "Christology of the Old Test.," III. pp. 82-92; "Smith's Bible Dict.," art. "Son of Man"; Schultze (L. T.) "Vom Menschensohn und vom Logos," Erster Abschnitt.

² Gess (W. F.) "Die Lehre von der Person Christi entwickelt aus dem Selbstbewusstsein Christi und aus dem Zeugnis der Apostel"; Rougemont M. "Christ et ses Témoins"; Schmid (C. F.) "Theology of the N. T.," sec. 22 sq.; Weiss (B.) "Theologie des N. T." ss. 57-67.

(2) In the Fourth Gospel.¹ The language of Christ in this gospel is often remarkable, and sometimes difficult to understand; but it evidently claims for him (a) To be from above, where he had been with the Father in glory, before the world was (iii. 13; vi. 38, 50, 51, 62; xvii. 5); (b) To be, in a distinctive sense, the Son of God, knowing perfectly the way of the Father, and doing always what the Father did (v. 17-27, 36, 43; vi. 40; x. 37, 38); (c) To be possessed of divine attributes and prerogatives (iii. 13; viii. 58; xiv. 9; xvi. 15; xvii. 10); and (a) To be the source of light and life to men (xii. 35, 36, 45, 46; xi. 25; xiv. 10).

The language preserved in the fifth chapter is certainly very profound. By it, Christ represents himself as knowing all that the Father performs, and as doing the same things which the Father does, in the same way in which the Father does them. Nay, more; by it, Christ affirms the impossibility of his doing any thing apart from the Father. The two were inseparable in action; and their activity was divine, having its source in the Father's will.

With this language should be connected his declaration in the tenth chapter, showing that his followers could not be wrested from him, because his own power and action were those of the Father as well, — "I and my Father are one";²

¹ Leathes (S.) "Testimony of John to Christ"; Messner (H.) "Die Lehre der Aposteln," ss. 316-360; Weiss (B.) "Biblische Theologie des N. T.," ss. 656-695; Sears (E. H.) "The Heart of Christ."

² Bengel, ad loc. "Unum, non solum voluntatis consensu, sed unitate potentiae, adeoque naturae, nam omnipotentia est attributum naturale: et sermo est de unitate Patris et Filii . . . Per sumus refutatur Sabellius: per unum, Arius."

and also his words to Philip and the other disciples, recorded in the fourteenth chapter, — “He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou, show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words which I speak to you, I speak not from myself, but the Father abiding in me himself doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father and the Father in me, but if not, on account of the works themselves believe.” It was difficult for even the eleven disciples to receive the truth as to the absolute unity of Christ and the Father, — a unity which made every act of Christ an act of the Father also.

It was clearly no part of Christ's object to convince the Jews or his disciples of his own deity, apart from the Father. This would have been to convince them that there were two Gods for them to worship; but his object was to show them that he was one with the Father, in such a sense that all his working and teaching were the working and teaching of his Father. He knew that the expression, “the Father,” would be understood by all to denote the true God; and therefore, in order to emphasize the fact that his works were truly divine, he ascribed them to the will of the Father, as their first cause; but his own will was in absolute accord with his Father's will. His own wisdom and action were a perfect manifestation of his Father's will and action.

The language of Christ appears, no doubt, to give a certain precedence to the will of the Father; but it is not easy for us to define that precedence, or to determine how much his discussion of the matter was influenced by the state of mind which he saw in his hearers. One thing is certain: He acknowledged the deity of the Father; and, if he was to win their confidence at all, it must be by showing them, not that he was personally the Father, but that he recognized and honored the Father, and was one with him in word and deed.

But his sayings went beyond the idea of moral unity, such as might exist between a creature and the Creator, and suggested, on the one hand, the idea of a proper sonship, implying the same kind of nature in him and the Father;¹ and, on the other hand, the idea of mutual interpenetration or indwelling, which again deepens into that of identity at the very root of being and power, so that the activity of the one was also the activity of the other. And this last view agrees best with the unity of God, and with the passages in which Christ claims divine attributes (for example, John iii. 13; viii. 58; xvi. 15).

Says Olshausen (H.) "In the Father, things are shut up and hidden which manifest themselves in the Son; therefore, all things which the Son has belong to the Father: but, in the Son, the properties of the Father are revealed to men, in order that his name may be celebrated with praise. Life thus lying concealed with the Father in the beginning was manifested to men in the Son; so that when the Father is manifested, the Son is to be seen." — (Opuscula, quoted by Fairbairn on 1 Tim. vi. 19.)

(3) In the book of Revelation. The words of this book, which may be regarded as the testimony of Christ himself, show, (a) That he is the Son of God, in a sense which makes him truly divine (ii. 18). (b) That he is the first and the last and the living; or, in other words, eternal (i. 17, 18; ii. 8; xxii. 13). (c) That he is the Word of God, the King of Kings, and the Lord of Lords (xix. 11–16). (d) That he is worshipped by the heavenly hosts with supreme adoration (v. 12–14). And (e) That he is associated with God as the source of life and light and joy in the heavenly world (xxi. 22, 23; xxii. 1, 3, 5).

III. IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE WRITERS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT CONCERNING HIM, as found: —

(1) In the Synoptical Gospels and the Epistles of James, Jude, and Peter. Without entering into any discussion of the objects specially sought by the several writers of these books,² it is perfectly evident that they looked upon Jesus Christ as being (a) One who knew the thoughts of men, — at least of all those whom he met or taught (Matt. xii. 25; Mark ii. 8; viii. 17). (b) One who was in a peculiar and eminent sense the Son of God (Matt. xvi. 16; Luke i. 32, 35; Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 15; Mark ix. 7; 2 Peter i. 17; 1 Peter i. 3). And (c) One who was the Head and Lord of all Christians, worthy of perfect obedience and religious homage (James i. 1; ii. 1; 1 Peter i. 8; iii. 15, 22; 2 Peter i. 1, 8, 11, 14; ii. 1, 20; iii. 18; Jude 1, 4, 17, 21, 25). It is difficult to believe that they could have looked upon him thus, without holding him to be in nature divine.

¹ On the question as to the Eternal Generation or Sonship of the Logos, see Stuart (M.) "Letters to Dr. Channing on the Trinity," and "Letters to Dr. Miller on the Eternal Generation of the Son of God"; Miller (S.) "On the Eternal Generation of the Son of God"; Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, "The Sonship of Christ"; Wardlaw (R.) "Systematic Theology," vol. II.

² Westcott (B. F.) "Introduction to the Study of the Four Gospels," cc. 4–8.

(2) In the writings of Paul, together with the Epistle to the Hebrews. Of the many statements in relation to the higher nature of Christ in this part of the New Testament, only a few can be mentioned. By some of them, Christ is represented, (a) As being along with the Father the original source of grace, mercy, and peace to all believers (Rom. i. 7; viii. 9; xv. 18, 19, 29; xvi. 21, 24; 1 Cor. i. 3; xvi. 23; 2 Cor. i. 2; xiii. 14; Gal. i. 3; vi. 18; Eph. i. 2; iii. 19; vi. 23, 24); (b) As being the possessor and giver of the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; 2 Cor. iii. 17); (c) As having supreme authority in the church, and over all things for the church (1 Cor. i. 1; v. 4; vii. 12; xv. 24, 25; 2 Cor. iv. 4, 5; v. 20; xi. 8; Eph. i. 21, 22; ii. 20 sq.; v. 5; Col. i. 18; Heb. iii. 3, 6); (d) As the One by whom and for whom all things have been made and are sustained (1 Cor. viii. 6; Col. i. 16, 17; Heb. i. 2, 3, 10); (e) As the final judge of all mankind (1 Cor. iv. 5; 2 Cor. v. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 15–17; 2 Thess. i. 6–10; 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8); (f) As the true and perfect image of God (Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3; Col. i. 19); (g) As the own and beloved Son of God (Rom. i. 3, 4, 9; viii. 3, 29, 32; 2 Cor. i. 19; xii. 31; Gal. ii. 20; iv. 4; Eph. iv. 13; Heb. i. 2, 5, 8; iv. 14; v. 8; vi. 6; vii. 3); (h) As being in the form of God before incarnation, and as being God the Creator and Supreme Mediatorial King (Phil. ii. 6; Rom. ix. 5; Heb. i. 8, 10; Col. ii. 9 (cf. 1 Cor. ii. 8, 16; x. 21, 22; xi. 27; 2 Cor.

xii. 8); and finally (2) As being addressed in prayer, and made the object of religious worship (1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Tim. iv. 18, 22).

Meyer assigns three reasons for believing that the last clause of Rom. ix. 5 cannot refer to Christ, but must be a doxology to God the Father. Briefly, they are these:—

First, Paul nowhere else denominates Christ, God; and therefore he cannot be supposed to give him that name here. It is the name which he always applies to God the Father, who is naturaliter divine. But it must be said, in response to this, that Paul certainly teaches, that Christ once existed in the “form of God” (Phil. ii. 6), and that in him dwells “all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.” Why then might he not call him God once, or a few times, though for distinction’s sake he generally gave this name to the Father? Besides, Meyer admits that John calls the higher nature of Christ, God,—once, at least; and he says, but once. The case of Thomas is also paralled.

Second, that nowhere in the apostolic writings is there a doxology addressed to Christ. He admits, indeed, that the doxology in 2 Tim. iv. 18 refers to Christ; but he adds, that this is to be reckoned “with the traces of its post-apostolic composition.” There is, however, no sufficient reason to doubt the Pauline authorship of the Second Epistle to Timothy.¹ Nor is there any good reason for supposing that he would not use similar language here.

Third, that the words “over all” could not have been used of Christ as God. But surely if Christ could be denominated God, he could be described as “God over all;” since no one would dream that God the Father was embraced in the meaning of the word “all.” In another place, Paul asserts that God “gave him to be head over all things to the church.”² clause to Christ, may be urged, (a) its naturalness in the connection, (b) the position of the adjective "blessed" after the word "God," and (c) the presence of the Greek participle, translated "is." For this participle appears to be superfluous, if the clause is a doxology; while the adjective regularly precedes the noun in a doxology, but follows it, as here, in a description. (Compare Luke i. 68; 2 Cor. i. 3; 1 Peter i. 3; Gen. xiv. 20; 2 Sam. xxii. 47; Ps. xviii. 46; lxvi. 20; lxxii. 19; cxix. 12; Ezek. iii. 12; Dan. iii. 28, 33); ("Prayer of the Three," in the LXX.) with Rom. i. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 31.) The only apparent exception to this rule is in the Sept. version of Ps. lxviii. 20, where the order of words in the Hebrew is regular. Meyer conjectures that the Hebrew word for "blessed" was repeated in the manuscript used by the LXX.

In favor of the ordinary interpretation, which refers the

¹ See also 2 Pet. iii. 18; 1 Pet. iv. 11.

² Eph. i. 22. See also an instructive Article on this clause in the “Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie,” 1868, s. 462 ff., by Schultz (H.), who believes that the words must refer to Christ, though without teaching his equality in nature with the Father. No one, probably, ever doubted the proper rendering of the clause, who was not influenced by dogmatic reasons.

The best authorities require the word "who" to be substituted for the word "God," in 1 Tim. iii. 16. Whether "the Lord" should take the place of "God," as the original reading, in Paul's address to the Ephesian elders (Acts xx. 28), is still doubtful. Neither of these passages, therefore, can be associated with Rom. ix. 5, by way of argument.

The same may be said, though for other reasons, of Eph. v. 5. and Titus ii. 14. It is by no means certain, that the word "God" refers, in either of the passages, to Christ; yet a preponderance of evidence favors the view that it does, especially in the second. For, in respect to the first, it is to be borne in mind, that both "God" and "Christ" are used either with or without the article in the writings of Paul; and in respect to the second, that the words "coming," "appearing," and "revelation" are used exclusively of Christ,—that is, when they refer to his second advent. But it is also to be considered, that it is "the appearing of the glory of the great God," &c., which is spoken of here; and therefore, Matt. xvi. 27, and Mark viii. 38, must be compared.

Yet, even in the expression recorded by these two evangelists, prominence is given to Christ as the leading figure; for he is to "come in the glory of his Father, with his angels," or "with the holy angels"; while in other passages he is said to come "in his own glory" (Matt. xxv. 31; 1 Peter iv. 13); but if the words "great God," in Titus ii. 14, refer to the Father, the leading place at the second advent seems to be assigned to the Father, or to his glory. It seems probable, then, that Christ is here called "the great God." If not, his glory must be conceived of as blended with, and of the same nature with that of the Father, though taking here a secondary place.

(3) In the writings of John. The beloved disciple appears to have been led by the Spirit of God, in view of errors which had begun to appear in the churches, and also, perhaps, in view of his own spiritual insight and predilection of heart, to set forth with uncommon fulness the doctrine of Christ's theanthropic nature; yet he was led to do this, for the most part, by putting on record the teaching of Christ himself, which has been already examined. His own language, however, will be found to repay careful study, whether it be regarded as merely interpreting that of his Lord, or, also, as adding somewhat to the teaching of the latter.

For he teaches distinctly, (a) The existence of the Word, or higher nature of Christ, in the beginning; and he uses a word to signify that existence which appears to exclude all thoughts of origin (John i. 1; 1 John i. 1, 2). Observe the use of ἦν in speaking of the Word, while ἐγένετο is used of John the Baptist and of the incarnation (John i. 6, 14 (cf. viii. 58); (b) The Word, or higher nature of Christ, was with God in the beginning, and with him, as the Greek preposition suggests, in the way of rational affection and fellowship,—(see the same passages as above); (c) By the Word, according to the will of the Father, all things were brought into existence (John i. 3); (d) He was also the source of all life not strictly divine, and, through it, of all knowledge of God among men (John i. 4, 5; 1 John i. 2 (cf. i. 9, 14, 16); (e) The incarnate Word, while on earth, was in most intimate and loving communion with the Father whom he revealed, and whom he was able to reveal, because of that communion (John i. 18, 14); (f) He knew, therefore, the mind of God, and at the same time the hearts of all the men with whom he had to do (John ii. 24, 25; v. 6; vi. 61, 64; xi. 13, 14); (g) He was the only-begotten Son of God, if not as to his higher nature in eternity, at least as to his divine human being and personality in time (John i. 14, 50; iii. 16-18, 35, 36; 1 John i. 3; ii. 23; iii. 23; iv. 14, 15; v. 5, 10, 11, 12, 13, 20); and (h) By virtue of his higher nature, he was truly God (John i. 1; xx. 28; 1 John v. 20 (cf. John i. 18).

A few remarks may be added in explanation of certain passages referred to under (h).

The substance of Meyer's note on the last clause of John i. 1, is embraced in the following statements: First, that θεός (God) must be the predicate of the sentence; since, if it were not, this declaration would contradict the preceding one, by identifying God and the Word, who are there distinguished. Second, that the predicate precedes the subject, because the former is to be emphasized; for the progress of thought, "he was with God, and he was (not, perhaps, a person of inferior kind, but) of divine nature," requires the emphasis to fall on the added fact. Third, the omission of the article before θεός was necessary, for ὁ θεός after the foregoing πρὸς τὸν θεόν would have ascribed to the Word identity of person with the Father, which would have been inconsistent with the distinction of person just expressed; while the noun without the article adds to the assertion of distinction in person,—an assertion of unity in essence and nature. Meyer quotes from Luther the pithy remark, that "the last proposition,—the Word was God,—is against Arius; the other,—the Word was with God,—against Sabellius."

There is also force in Green's remark, "that a term cannot be fully effective, in virtue of its inherent signification, when encumbered with the article" (p. 47). Thus in Heb. i. 1, "had the words been ἐν τῷ υἱῷ, they would merely have called to mind the person already familiarly known under the title of the Son of God, without pointing attention to the inherent meaning of the title" (Ib. cf. John iv. 24). In John i. 1, last clause, "θεός is the predicate,—that is, all that is involved in the notion of θεός is predicated of the Word; namely, the proper nature and attributes of God" (p. 37, Green's (T. S.) "Grammar of the N. T.").

It has been thought by some, that John borrowed the term "Logos," from Philo; but this is scarcely probable: certainly he gave the term a meaning very different from that which it has in the writings of the Alexandrian philosopher. After examining the evidence on this point, de Pressense uses the following language ("Jesus Christ, Times, Life, and Work," p. 83, transl.): "A judgment may now be formed of the assertion, so lightly thrown out, that Philo is the elder brother of Jesus, and the inspirer of John. For my part, I know no contradictions in the history of human thought more flagrant than those which exist between the doctrines of these two. The first rests wholly upon the negation of moral evil; the starting-point of the second is the deep and bitter consciousness of sin. Alexandrine theosophy admits no redemption; the Gospel is nothing without this article. Philo proclaims the impossibility of Deity uniting himself directly with the human creature; while the incarnation is the grand theme of St. John. The one sees in the Word only the abstract generalization of divine ideas; the other adores in him 'the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father.' Philo's ultimatum is this: Deity cannot touch that which is material. The Fourth Gospel is summed up in this expression of its prologue: The Word became flesh. The antithesis is absolute; for that which is with St. John a capital truth would be to the Jew of Alexandria appalling blasphemy. If, then, Christianity must, at all costs, be linked with an antecedent system, this precursor must be sought elsewhere than in the synagogues of Egypt."

John xx. 28: "My Lord and my God!" These words were addressed to Christ: hence, they pronounce him God, and teach his deity. But some reject the full sense of this expression, on the ground that Thomas was carried away by his feelings, and made use of extravagant language. We see no evidence of this; yet we hesitate to take the words of Thomas at this time, as by themselves proof of the deity of Christ; for the Holy Spirit had not yet been given, to guide the disciples into all the truth. But his words do not stand by themselves. Christ seems to approve them; and John, whose chief object in writing was to set forth the nature and claims of his Master, records them.

"The unbelief of Thomas," says Leathes, "rose to a height of daring obstinacy, which cannot frequently, if in any case, be equalled. It is plain, not only that he must have had evidence of the very nature that our modern doubters ask for, and such as they cannot have, but also, that every single convert whom Thomas brought to Christ must have believed, upon less evidence than he himself had fixed as the limit on which alone he would believe."¹

And, on the other hand, his recognition of the very deity of Christ was as remarkable and unqualified as had been his unbelief. "His soul lifts itself, by a sudden mighty sweep, from the unbelief of hopeless melancholy to that highest word of belief."—(Luthardt.) "The exclamation of adoration by Thomas: 'My Lord and my God!' in which the faith of the most incredulous of the disciples suddenly takes the most daring flight, and attains the height of its aim, such as is announced in the prologue, brings the narrative to a conclusion. It is thus that the end unites with the starting-point."—(Godet.)

1 John v. 20: "This is the true God, and eternal life." This clause relates to Christ, for three reasons: (1) The pronoun "this" is most naturally referred to Jesus Christ, the nearest antecedent. (2) John is wont to represent Christ, and not the Father, as "the Life," or "the Eternal Life."—(See John i. 4; vi. 48; xi. 25; xiv. 6; and 1 John i. 2; v. 11, 12). (3) The Son is declared in the former part of this verse to be essentially one with the true God, by the assertion, that we are in the true God by being in him.

The use of the adjective *ἀληθινός*² before θεός can be no objection to a reference of the clause to Christ ; for, if Christ was God at all, he was God in reality, not in appearance merely.¹ And, if he was entitled to the designation "true God," there is no reason why it should not be given him here; if it belonged to him as well as to the Father, this was a very suitable place in which to apply it to him.

¹ "The Witness of John to Christ," p. 125.

² Kluge (Dr.) "Der Begriff des ἀληθινόν," Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie XL s. 333 ff.

But the use of the article makes a difficulty, though not, in our judgment, insuperable. For the object here is to emphasize the fact of the Christian's intimate fellowship with God ; since being in Christ was being in God. The thought appears to be this : We are in the true God, by being, as we all know that we are, in his Son, Jesus Christ ; for Jesus Christ, as well as the Father, and because he is in essence and nature one with the Father, is the true God and eternal life.

Neither the Father, nor the Son, nor the Holy Spirit can be said to comprehend all that is God, — the entire Godhead ; but if they are one in nature and essence, one at the very root of being, it would seem that each of them must be in nature and in his appropriate action the true God to Christians, — the true God, that is, in distinction from all false gods.²

Reference is made to John i. 18, under (h), because there is important manuscript authority for reading μονογενὴς θεός instead of ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός. The reading is adopted by Tregelles, and ably defended by Dr. Hort.³ The four best uncials, א B C L, and 33, a very important cursive manuscript, sustain it. If this reading be correct, the words may be translated : "God, only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he declared him." But the proposed reading, though so well supported, cannot be relied upon in establishing a doctrine of Christ's person.

¹ Tittmann, Synon, N. T., p. 155, thus defines ἀληθινόν : "qui non tantum nomen habet et speciem, sed veram naturam et indolem, quæ nomini convenit, notioni nomine significatæ omni ex parte respondens, germanus, genuinus."

² See Kahnis (K. F. A.) "Die lutherische Dogmatik historisch-genetisch dargestellt," I. s. 354. The view which we have taken of this passage is supported by such interpreters as Luther, Calvin, Beza, Episcopus, Spener, Bengel, Olshausen, Thomasius, (II. 20), Tholuck (See John xvii. 3), Stier, Ebrard, Köstlin, Hahn, Braune, Schultze, Liddon, Weiss, and others.

³ Hort Dr. (F. J. A.) "Two Dissertations," 1876. Compare Abbot (E.) in the "Bib. Sac." for Oct. 1861.

In conclusion, it may be remarked, that the undeniable and frequent application of the title κύριος,¹ with or without the article, to Christ by the apostles, proves that they believed him to be God; for, in the Septuagint, this word represents the Hebrew name, Jehovah; and, in its religious use in the New Testament, is restricted to God and Christ. In several passages of the Epistles, it is difficult to say whether it means God the Father; or Christ Jesus. It was certainly applied to Christ in a religious sense, and was probably used instead of the term "God," for two reasons: first, because the Word was supposed to have been the Jehovah of the Old Testament theophanies; and, second, because it was desirable to avoid designating the Father and the Son by the same word, unless in rare instances, and for special reasons.

Any statements of Scripture which seem inconsistent with the doctrine that Christ, by virtue of his higher nature, was truly God, may be examined to better advantage after considering the evidence for his humanity and the effect of the incarnation on the condition of the Word, than in this place.

II. THE HUMANITY OF CHRIST.

Inasmuch as the humanity of Jesus Christ is admitted at the present day by all those who believe in him at all, the discussion of this topic may be made very brief, while it is not deemed unimportant.²

We are taught that Christ, in his lower nature, is truly man, by such passages as the following:—

(1) Those in which he is denominated man (John viii. 40; Rom. v. 15; 1 Cor. xv. 21; Phil. ii. 7, 8; 1 Tim. ii. 5). In the first three of these passages, there is no reason for supposing ἄνθρωπος to be employed in a restricted or uncommon sense. In the fourth, Christ is said to have appeared in the likeness of men, and to have been found in form as a man; not because his human nature was only apparent, or at best defective, but because it was not all, or even the chief part of him. He was not simply man, but God and man. In the fifth, he is denominated man, because he performed the work of mediation in human nature.

¹ See Stuart (M.) "On the Meaning of κύριος in the New Testament," "Biblical Repository," vol. I. p. 733 sq.

² "Ecce Homo;" Bruce (A. B.) "The Humiliation of Christ in Physical, Ethical, and Official Aspects."

(2) Those in which he is called the Son of man (Matt. viii. 20; ix. 6; xxvi. 64; Mark ix. 9; Luke ix. 22; John v. 27; Acts vii. 56). This title is used upwards of eighty times by Christ, once by Stephen, and twice in the Apocalypse. It may be traced back to Dan. vii. 13, and characterizes Jesus as the true Messiah; but, in the last analysis, it is a descriptive title, derived from the human nature of Christ (Matt. i. 1, 21, 25; xii. 23; xxi. 9; Mark xii. 35; Luke xx. 41; Rom. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 8).

(3) Those in which human properties and susceptibilities are ascribed to him (Matt. iv. 1 sq.; xxvi. 37; Luke ii. 52; John xi. 33, 35; Heb. ii. 17; iv. 15 (cf. v. 2). Accordingly, Christ possessed the spiritual as well as bodily nature of man. Heb. ii. 17 pronounces him to have been, in all respects, like his brethren; though a limitation is expressed in iv. 15. — (See Van Oosterzee on "The Temptation of Jesus," Am. and Presby. Rev. 169, p. 753 sq.)

(4) Those in which his lower nature is called flesh, &c. (John i. 14; 1 John iv. 2; 2 John 7; Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ii. 14). The word "flesh," as used in the first four passages, is held by most interpreters to signify man, or human nature. Precisely how much is implied by it in any passage must, however, be learned from the context (cf. Luke iii. 6; John xvii. 2; Acts ii. 17; Matt. xxiv. 22; Rom. iii. 20). The terms "blood and flesh," used in Heb. ii. 14, signify human nature, regarded, perhaps, as frail and mortal (cf. Gal. i. 16; Eph. vi. 12). Thus we find a name, strictly applicable to but one factor of Christ's lower nature, chosen to designate the whole of it.

(5) Those which describe his official work, and suggest the fitness, if not necessity, of his being man, as well as God. For, as such, —

(a) He could be truly under the law of God, and honor the same by perfect obedience. This evidently was looked upon as at least a part of his work, and indispensable to the rest (Rom. v. 19; Gal. iv. 4).

(b) He could suffer as an expiatory sacrifice; and by his own language it is clear that he must needs suffer in that way (Heb. ix. 24-28; 1 Peter ii. 24).

(c) He could sympathize with men in weakness and trial. This also is treated by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, as if it were an important qualification for his work (Heb. ii. 17; v. 7-10).

(d) He could raise men into fellowship with God. This certainly was accomplished in his own person,—if he was truly man; and the same he is to accomplish for all who trust in him. He is the first-born among many brethren; and this he could not be, were he not, by virtue of his true humanity, their brother.

III. THE PERSONAL ONENESS OF CHRIST.

The evidence which has been adduced in proof of the deity of Christ, on the one hand, and of his humanity, on the other, must be understood to refer to the two sides of his being,—to the two natures brought together in his person. Yet his being was not bipersonal, but unipersonal; he had, strictly speaking, but one consciousness,—but one will.

In the early churches, an important controversy arose on the question, whether Christ had but a single will, or both a human and a divine will. The parties were denominated Monothelites and Diorthelites. The controversy was apparently terminated in favor of the second party; but it has been renewed from time to time down to the present day. In A. D 680, the first Trullan (Constantinople) Council decided that "one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, is to be recognized in two natures, unmixed, unchanged, inseparable, indivisible; the difference of natures by no means being destroyed by the union, but rather the peculiarity of each nature being saved, and running together into one person and one hypostasis. We also preach, in like manner, according to the teaching of the holy fathers, that there were two natural wills or voluntary faculties in him, and two natural energies, inseparable, unchangeable, indivisible, and unmixed ; and that the two natural wills were not opposed (God forbid!) as the impious heretics say, but his human will followed, not resisting or struggling against, but rather being subject to, his divine and omnipotent will."

The decision of this council was doubtless correct in pronouncing the two natures in Christ to be unmixed and inseparable, and in saying that they were united in one person and one hypostasis ; but it was incorrect in ascribing two wills to the one person.

Many of the creeds, formed soon after the Great Reformation, distinctly assert the unity of Christ as a person. "Two natures in one and the same person" may be called their motto on this subject ; but it must not be inferred from this that they pronounced his consciousness and his will single. It was enough to say that he was truly one person.

In proof of the personal unity of Christ, as explained in the first paragraph of this section, reference may be made.

(a) To his conception and birth. For the simple fact that the human and the divine were brought into union in this way points to a single person as the result. Had the connection been established at the time of Christ's baptism, it would have been naturally regarded as similar to a possession. The Word might have been given to Jesus, as was the Spirit, without measure ; but the union would not have been personal.

(b) To the use of the pronoun "I," in speaking of himself. If we may regard the gospels as fairly representing his custom in this respect, he was wont to speak with great uniformity in the first person singular ; and the language of sincerity is the language of consciousness. Had the Saviour been conscious of two personal centres, of two egos in himself, he would doubtless have revealed that consciousness by a frequent use of the pronoun "we."

(c) To his resurrection and visible ascension into heaven.

The Scriptures lead one to suppose, that the union of the human spirit with the Word was not severed by his death on the cross; that he resumed by resurrection the same body which was laid in Joseph's tomb; and that, as the God-man, he ascended into heaven, and sat down on the right hand of power. His resurrection is treated as a type and pledge of the saints' resurrection; hence deity and humanity are united in him forever. All this points to a personal union and oneness.

(d) To his habit of predicating of himself that which depended on his divine nature, and that which depended on his human nature, — the one as freely as the other, — in precisely the same way as an ordinary man predicates of himself color and weight, hunger and thirst, as well as will and purpose, reason and affection, memory and hope (Matt. xii. 25; xvii. 27; John ii. 25; iii. 13; xxi. 17; viii. 58; and Matt. iv. 2; xxi. 18 sq.; Luke ii. 52; Mark xiii. 32; Matt. xxvi. 38; John xi. 5, 33, 35; Heb. ii. 17).

It may be remarked in this place that, in consequence of the personal unity of his being, whatever Christ did or suffered, by virtue of either of the natures united in him, received character from the other also. This remark will need to be borne in mind, when considering the value of his atoning death.

IV. EFFECT OF THE INCARNATION ON THE HIGHER NATURE OF CHRIST.

The subject to be discussed in this section is one of peculiar difficulty; and none but a cautious and reverent treatment of it will be likely to result in good. We propose to notice some of the leading theories that have been promulgated by Christian teachers, before stating the view which is supposed to approach nearest the truth.

(1) Theory of Apollinaris. This was substantially as follows: In the person of Christ, the divine Word took the place of a human mind or rational spirit, so that his person comprised a human body, an animal soul or life, and the infallible

Word. Three things were thought to be gained by this theory: first, the personal unity of Christ; second, the moral immutability of Christ; and third, the suffering of God in the person of Christ.

But it may be urged against this theory, first, that a mutilation of human nature in Christ cannot be proved necessary, in order to secure unity of person, or stability of moral character in him; and, secondly, that the absence of a genuine human soul in Christ must have rendered him inaccessible to temptation, as well as unchangeable in purpose.

The theory, as broached by Apollinaris, has no advocates at the present time.

(2.) Theory of Nestorius. This was an attempt to assert the completeness of the human nature, as well as of the divine in Christ. According to Hagenbach, "Nestorius supposed that the divine and the human natures of Christ ought to be distinctly separated, and admitted only a junction (συνάφεια) of the one and the other, an indwelling (ἐνοίκησις) of the Deity." The union was regarded as ethical, rather than physical.¹

Objections to this theory may be found in the evidence which has been already presented of the personal oneness of Christ; yet it must be freely admitted, that Nestorius did not mean to deny the unity of Christ's person.

Theodore, a leader of this school, says, "In respect to the union of divinity and humanity, we recognize one person, just as it is said of husband and wife that they are one"; and such a statement condemns the theory which would lead one to make it.

(3.) Theory of Cyril. This was a reaction against that of Nestorius; and it laid special emphasis on the unity of Christ. The oneness of the natures was said to be physical. All the bodily sufferings of man were felt by the incarnate Word. But the higher nature of Christ remained omniscient; though, for the sake of acting in congruity with its condition, ignorance of some things was professed. The tendency of this view was to find in Christ a resultant of forces, human and divine; though the divine were so superior as to be in constant danger of absorbing the human. Says Dorner, "We may call the view of Cyril (according to which the human is changed into the divine) the magical aspect of the union; and that of Nestorius (according to which the two natures are only joined together) the mechanical." There appears to be no tendency to revive the doctrine of Cyril.

¹ Dorner (J. A.) "Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi," II. s. 24 sq.; Hagenbach (K. R.) "History of Doctrines," I. s. 100; Bruce (A. B.) "The Humiliation of Christ," p. 61 sq.

(4.) Theory of Leo. This was expressed in the confession adopted by the Council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451. It confesses Jesus Christ to be "perfect in deity, perfect in humanity, truly God and truly man; of reasonable soul and body; of the same substance with the Father as to his divinity; of the same substance with us as to his humanity; in all things like to us, except sin; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, manifested in two natures, without confusion, without conversion, indivisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means abolished by the union, but rather the property of each, preserved and combined into one person and one hypostasis; not one severed and divided into two persons, but one and the same Son and Only-begotten, namely, God Logos, Lord Jesus Christ."

This statement represents the cardinal facts truly; but it does not attempt to show in what the humiliation of the Logos consisted.

(5.) Theory of Gess. This theory, which has found several advocates¹ in modern times, asserts that the eternal Word became human in his personality and experience. To be more specific, it is said, that the Logos became totally unconscious in the womb of Mary; that he awoke to consciousness as does a newly-born human soul; that his knowledge was obtained and increased in the same manner substantially as that of other men; that, during his whole earthly life, his consciousness, knowledge, and power were strictly finite; that his miracles were not wrought by his own might, but by the power of the Father and the Holy Spirit dwelling in him,—in a word, that he became human, having all the divine attributes, but in a latent condition, their natural action being suspended, the divine consciousness kept in perfect abeyance, and the Logos exercising his energies within the limits appropriate to mere humanity.

¹ Gaupp (Dr.) "Die Union," 1847, pp. 112-117; Hahn (G. L.) "Die Theologie des N. T.," I. pp. 195-210; Schmieder (Dr.) "Das hohepriestliche Gebet unsers Herrn Jesu Christi"; Reuss (E.) "History of the Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age," II. 96 sq., in the original, or B. IV. ch. 10; Godet (F.) "Commentaire sur l'Evangile de Saint Jean," I. pp. 247-265; Liebner (T. A.) "Christologie," &c.; Beecher (H. W.) "Life of Christ," I. p. 49 sq.

This theory revives that of Apollinaris, by teaching that Christ had no rational soul in addition to the incarnate Word, but differs from it by teaching that the incarnate Word in his actual experience was a human soul. In essence, the Word remained divine; but, in attributes, he became human.

In support of this theory, reference is made (a) To the words of John i. 14, and of Paul, Phil. ii. 6, which are said to teach the doctrine of this theory expressly. For, by emphasizing the words, became flesh (σὰρξ ἐγένετο), and emptied himself (ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν), the thought comes out distinctly, that in the act of becoming man, the Word depotentiated himself, or changed the properties of his divine nature into those of human nature.

But it may be doubted whether much stress is to be laid on the literal sense of these two expressions. For the verb employed by John is used by Paul (Gal. iv. 4) in the sense "was begotten" or "was born." And the language of John may signify no more than that of Paul. This is rendered more certain by the expression used by John in his First Epistle, iv. 2; for, "to come in flesh" is scarcely equivalent to coming as flesh. Still further, the words of the next clause, "and dwelt (or tented, ἐσκήνωσεν) among us," may be supposed to imply a reference to his human nature, as the tent in which the Word dwelt on earth. On the whole, it does not appear to be safe to infer, from John i. 14, that the Word became flesh by changing his own attributes into those of flesh, even if essence and attributes are not inseparable, in such a sense that the essence would be no longer the same if the properties were changed.

Equally uncertain is the meaning assigned to "emptied himself," in Phil. ii. 7. For if the act referred to be interpreted by the clauses that follow, it consisted in "assuming the form of a servant," in "coming to be, (or being born) in likeness of men"; and the word "form" points rather to condition and manifestation than to attributes. If it be urged that the words, "emptied himself," naturally signify, that, by an act of his own, he parted with the very forces of his being,—the inner powers of his deity,—it must be considered, on the other hand, that change of "form" naturally signifies the opposite of this. Says Dr. Hackett, "Taking the form of a servant," states in what the act expressed by ἐκένωσε consisted; namely, in exchanging the form (or glory) in which he existed as God for that in which he existed as a servant. The difference between μορφή, form, manifestation, and ψυχή, soul, or οὐσία, nature, substance, becomes important here; for we can understand how Christ, as the pre-existent Logos, could exchange one mode or manifestation of existence for another, but not how he could divest himself of his original divine nature."

(b) To the language used in Acts i. 2; John xiv. 10 (cf. Matt. iii. 16; Luke iv. 1; John iii. 34). These passages teach, it is said, that the knowledge of Christ was limited, inasmuch as it could receive addition from the Father by the Holy Spirit. But, if it is borne in mind that the human nature of Christ was sanctified at conception by the personal agency of the Holy Spirit, it is natural to suppose the symbolical descent of the Spirit upon him at his baptism, in the form of a dove, significant of a larger, miraculous working of that Spirit in his human soul. And it has been thought by some, that all the miraculous action of the Spirit during the ministry of Jesus was confined to his person, or communicated to others from his person.—(See John vii. 39.) As it is the special work of the Spirit to prepare the faculties of the human soul to discern spiritual truth, to receive revelations from God, and to impart these to men, it is reasonable to conclude that he rendered a like service to the human soul of Christ, enabling it to receive all needed truth from his higher nature, — the Word.

(c) To the language used in John v. 19, 20, 36; and Acts ii. 22; x. 38, which teach, it is said, that Christ's power was limited in the same way, and to the same extent, as his knowledge. In reply to this, we remark, that his miracles of power appear to have been wrought by Jesus himself, but not apart from the Father and the Spirit, even as the world was made by the Logos at first, but not apart from the Father and Spirit. It was doubtless Christ's aim, in the passages cited from John, to emphasize the inseparable unity of the Father and himself, and the utter absurdity of the Jewish charge, that he was speaking and acting without God, or apart from God. This he denies the possibility of.

As a general objection to this view, we remark, that it supposes no proper union of deity and humanity in the person of Christ. He was God, and he was man: God, by virtue of the deity of his original nature; man, by virtue of the human properties and limitations which that nature took for a time in lieu of the divine. According to this theory, it is scarcely proper to say, that he was God and man, or God plus man; for, as a whole, he was God in a certain sense; and, as a whole, he was man in another sense: but he was neither God nor man, in the full meaning of these words. As another objection to this view, we observe, that it affirms a change in the Logos, which seems to be incompatible with his deity, and, if really so, is incredible. It is true, that great caution should be used in reasoning about the nature of God; but we are unable to deny all force to this objection.

6. Theory of Thomasius. This differs from the foregoing, by teaching that, along with the depotentiated Word, Christ had a human soul, like that of any other man, sin excepted. Thus his human nature was complete; and the two souls, mysteriously united in one person, advanced pari passu in knowledge and grace until the hour of his death on the cross. Nearly the same arguments are adduced in support of this theory and of the preceding; and nearly the same replies must be made to them.

But to these may be added several positive objections to them both. And (1) They appear to be inconsistent with the claims of Christ while on earth; for example, with his claim of knowledge (Matt. xi. 27; John v. 20); of power (Matt. xi. 27; John v. 19, 21); of authority (Matt. ix. 2-6); and of timeless being (John viii. 58).

(2) They appear to be inconsistent with any resumption of divine attributes by Christ, until his mediatorial work is accomplished; for a resumption of divine attributes must be equivalent to laying aside human attributes, which will not take place before "the end," nor even then (John v. 22, 23, 27; Heb. ii. 18; iv. 15; Rev. xxii. 1).

(c) They appear to be inconsistent with any proper idea of the relation between essence and attributes. The doctrine of transubstantiation is no more incredible than this view of the humiliation of Christ; for the doctrine of transubstantiation simply asserts, that the essence is changed from the natural to the divine, while the attributes or accidents remain unchanged. Very suitably may such theories be characterized as "magical." It is better to have no theory than to accept one of these.

(7.) Theory of Dörner. This distinguished theologian holds that the incarnation was gradually accomplished. The divine Word at first communicated himself partially to the human nature of Jesus, and then in ever larger measure as that nature became able to receive him.

At the outset, the will of the Logos was directed to the production of a theanthropic or holy nature, which should be called "Son of God";¹ and thenceforth, united with that nature, he knows and wills every act of it as his own.

¹ "Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi," Zweiter Theil. s. 1271 sq. The passage is near the end of the last volume of the translation into English.

The eternal Word did not put himself, by the act of incarnation, into a kind of swoon, from which he at last awoke to a simply finite and human consciousness; but he entered and made his own the life of human nature in Christ, enlarging the sphere of conscious fellowship and oneness pari passu with the development of that human nature.

These are some of the theories which have been proposed concerning the incarnation and its effect upon the higher nature of Christ. They are none of them altogether satisfactory; though we are inclined to believe that the view of Dorner is less objectionable than any of the others, unless it be that of Leo.

It may be hazardous to say more; but we are partially satisfied with the following statement:—

8. The divine Word so entered into personal union with human nature in Jesus Christ, that his theanthropic consciousness and experience embraced the action of both divine and human powers and susceptibilities.

If his lower nature was truly human, it was finite, and therefore capable of growth; and the limits of his human intelligence must have been present to the consciousness of Jesus, as well as the perfection of his divine intelligence. What then may have been the law of his action as mediator between God and man?

Possibly this: (a) That both his divine and his human faculties were concerned in whatever he did as the God-man. If so, the action of his higher nature was confined within the limits in which the action of the lower could take part. (b) That, in particular, the human intelligence of Christ apprehended all that he taught; for he taught as a theanthropic being. (c) That the human faculties of Jesus shared the knowledge of the divine, as to all that his Messianic work required at any stage of its earthly progress.

A view similar to this is suggested by Dr. Schaff, in Lange's "Commentary" on John iv. 18,— "Not that Christ was strictly omniscient in the state of humiliation (he himself disclaimed this, Mark xiii. 32); but, wherever it was needed for his mission of saving sinners and the interests of his kingdom, he could, by an act of his will, and in virtue of his vital and essential union with the omniscient Father, unlock the chambers of the past, or penetrate, by immediate intuition, to the utmost secrets of the human heart, and read the history which is indelibly recorded on the pages of memory."

In support of this view may be mentioned the following considerations:—

(1) It agrees with the prima facie import of many passages of the New Testament (for example, Matt. xi. 27; John v. 17, 19, 20, 21, 26; viii. 58; x. 28–30; xiv. 9). The first of them is thus translated by Alford: "All things are delivered unto me by my Father; and none certainly knoweth the Son but the Father; neither doth any fully know the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son is minded to reveal him." The verb ἐπιγινώσκω is properly translated, to know fully; for in the New Testament the simple verb is made intensive by the preposition. The second reads: "My Father worketh until now, and I work," referring to supernatural action, like the cure of the impotent man. The third declares the action of the Father and the Son inseparable: "The Son can do nothing of himself, save what he seeth the Father doing; for what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son in like manner." The fourth teaches that "the Father sheweth the Son all things that himself doeth"; and the fifth, that the Son giveth life as truly as the Father; "for like as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." The sixth affirms that, "as the Father hath life in himself, so did he give to the Son also to have life in himself." Says Prof. Gess, an able advocate of theory No. 5, described above, "If this word of Jesus refers to his earthly life no less than to that which preceded and followed it, the Son did possess the life of God while on earth; and all that we have said about the self-examination of the Logos in becoming flesh would be overthrown." It seems to us perfectly plain that this word of Jesus does refer to his earthly life, and overthrows the doctrine taught by Gess. The next passage, as we have seen, declares the conscious life of Christ to be, in some way, unoriginated and timeless. It is a remarkable declaration, "Before Abraham was, I am"; and it seems incompatible with the theory of a merely human consciousness in Christ. There was a divine side to his consciousness, flashing its glorious light on certain truths for the human side, that the God-man might testify directly of his higher life. Equally conclusive are the other texts, quoted above; but it is unnecessary for us to notice them separately.

(2) It ascribes to Christ a truly theanthropic experience. It supposes that in him the divine Word, as such, and with all his powers unabridged, entered into conscious, personal union with human nature, — Totus in suis, totus in nostris. And in no other imaginable way could a being truly divine have personal experience of human weakness and woe. To drop the divine consciousness and become human, and then to drop the human and become again divine, gives no such experience or fellowship; and this circumstance alone raises the theory before us to an immeasurable height above many of the preceding.

(3) It offers itself to the mind more readily than any other view. This might be proved; we think, by an appeal to the history of the Christian faith; but we are willing to have every one test it, by recalling the action of his own mind on the subject.

To this last theory we look as the best expression yet given to the doctrine of the nature of the union of deity and humanity in the person of Christ.* But we do not claim to understand fully the miracle of the incarnation, nor do we suppose that the view accepted by us as approximately correct can be applied with perfect ease to all the sayings of Christ and his apostles. It denies any mutilation of the human, any latency or paralysis of the divine in Jesus Christ. This seems to be a great excellence, if the Scriptures agree with it; and it affirms the unity of his person, which is equally important, if taught by the Scriptures. Both the denial and the affirmation seem to us scriptural; though single expressions may be cited which seem at first inconsistent with one of them.

V. EFFECT OF THE INCARNATION ON THE LOWER NATURE OF CHRIST.

This topic may be treated with more brevity than the preceding; yet it cannot be passed by in silence. For (a) The marvellous perfection of Christ's character and development as man was due beyond question in some measure to the personal union of his human nature with the divine Word, And (b) Everything which relates to the genuineness of his humanity is singularly interesting to a large class of thoughtful men at the present time.

It must, indeed, be admitted that religious speculation has tended, of late, to an almost exclusive consideration and assertion of the true humanity of Christ; but this is a reason for, rather than against, giving to it all the prominence which it deserves; and a reason for, rather than against, attempting to show how that humanity was affected by the incarnation.

The following statements are suggested by the language of the sacred writers:—

(1) That the human nature of Jesus, though derived from Mary, was purified from all moral evil, or bias to moral evil, by the Holy Spirit, at the moment of its union with the divine Word. This appears to be no more than a just inference, from the prediction of the angel Gabriel to Mary, as recorded by Luke i. 35: "The Holy Spirit will come upon thee, and the power of the Most High will overshadow thee; wherefore the holy one that is to be born will be called the Son of God."—(Noyes.)

But the immaculate conception of Christ does not, in the least, presuppose the immaculate conception of his mother. For, if the nature of Jesus could not be spotless without having a spotless mother, neither could the nature of Mary be spotless without having a spotless mother; and so on, back to Adam. But if it was possible for his mother to have been conceived and born from sinful parents, without any taint of moral evil, then it was certainly possible for Jesus to be conceived and born of Mary, though she was herself sinful, without any taint of moral evil; and, of his immaculate conception, the words of Gabriel are sufficient proof, especially when taken in connection with the story of his life, and with the ample testimony to his freedom from all personal sin: while, of his mother's immaculate conception, the Scriptures afford no proof whatsoever.

The doctrine of Edward Irving, that the Logos entered into personal union with human nature in its fallen state, having a bias to moral evil, is also to be rejected as unscriptural. Yet three arguments are alleged in support of it; namely (a) That it is directly taught by Paul, in Rom. viii. 3: "God having sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh." If Paul's language were "in sinful flesh," the Irvingite theory would be plainly taught: but that is not his language; and the words which he does use may very well signify, that "the flesh of Christ was like flesh of sin, inasmuch as it was flesh, but unlike, inasmuch as it was not affected with sin." Says De Wette, "σὰρξ ἁμαρτίας is flesh (or human nature) possessed with sin; the apostle could not then have said in flesh of sin, without making Christ partaker of sin; nor could he have said merely in flesh; for then the bond between the manhood of Jesus and sin would have been wanting. He says, then, in likeness of flesh of sin; meaning by that, he had a nature like sinful human nature, but had not himself a sinful nature."

(b) That it is clearly implied in the susceptibility of Christ to temptation, and especially in his knowing by experience how to succor those who are tempted, — the latter being sinners.¹ The argument is plausible, but not conclusive; for, if it be necessary to have a depraved nature, in order to feel the force of temptation, Adam and the angels must have been created with depraved natures. And, if it be necessary to have been in the moral condition of sinners who are tempted, in order to know how to succor them, Christ must have had not only a sinful nature, but also a habit of sinning, to qualify him for his work; but this no one will assert.

¹ Heb. ii. 17, 18; iv. 15.

(c) That it is implied in a correct view of the atonement. For human nature in its fallen state was summed up in the humanity of Christ, and in that humanity paid the just penalty for all its sin. But the idea that the human nature of Christ was the whole of human nature, in any other sense than that in which human nature is entire in any other man, is a mere fiction of the imagination. If he bore the penalty of sin at all, it was not the penalty of his own personal sin, or sinfulness, but the penalty due to others for their sins. Bearing the penalty of his own sinfulness would not help them, unless it were to bear in turn the penalty of their sinfulness. This is self-evident. If there was any thing vicarious in his suffering, it presupposes his holiness rather than his sinfulness.

(2) That the human nature of Jesus was favored by the special presence of the Holy Spirit during his public ministry. This is proved by several expressions of the sacred record.¹ Just what the relation of the Spirit's work in the soul of Christ may have been to that of his higher nature is unrevealed; but from the office of the Spirit in the economy of salvation, — renewing, sanctifying, and preparing men for the reception of truth, — it may be inferred, with some probability, that the human soul of Christ was moved by the Spirit to desire and seek the very things which the incarnate Word desired and sought, thus contributing to the perfect unity of aim and spirit that distinguished Christ from all other men.

(3) That the human nature of Jesus was helped forward in knowledge and virtue, by light which his divine nature imparted. This may be inferred from the circumstance, that it was the Word, the Revealer of truth, with whom this human nature was in personal union. The same consciousness which felt the needs and trials of his finite soul was illuminated by divine light from the Word. Most surely then would the Logos impart to the human faculties all the light which they needed at any time for intelligent participation in the work to be done, or the suffering to be borne. This may be nearly what Dorner means by a gradual incarnation, or communication of himself to his humanity.

¹ Matt. iii. 16; iv. 1; Luke iv. 1; John iii. 34; Acts i. 2.

In view of what has now been said of the effect of the incarnation on the divine and human natures of Christ, respectively, such passages as Mark xiii. 32; Luke ii. 52, and several others, do not appear to be altogether inexplicable. In his theanthropic work, both natures in the person of Christ were to participate; and therefore the possibilities of appropriation by the lower nature furnished a moral limit to the action of the higher. That he should reveal his glorious perfections, on a scale determined by the ability of a holy human soul to appreciate his work, was, therefore, embraced in the humiliation of the divine Word.

II. THE WORK OF CHRIST AS MEDIATOR.

This part of theology may be divided into three separate topics, namely:—

I. Propitiation by Christ: especially the Saviour's death, as related to the attitude and action of God towards sinners.

II. Revelation by Christ: especially the moral influence of his humiliation and death on sinners.

III. Government by Christ: especially redemption and judgment, as administered by him.

I. No part of theology requires more profound and devout study at the present time than the first of these three topics: PROPITIATION BY CHRIST.

For there are many who utterly deny that the death of Christ has any thing to do with God's readiness to save sinners. They reject the doctrine of a vicarious atonement as absurd.¹

¹ Martineau (J.) "Studies of Christianity," p. 83 sq.; Ellis (G. E.) "A Half-Century of the Unitarian Controversy," p. 157 sq.; Ritschl (A.) "Reconciliation and Justification"; Bushnell (H.) "The Vicarious Sacrifice grounded in Principles of Universal Obligation," "Atonement and Forgiveness"; Young (J.) "Life and Light"; Robertson (F. W.) "Sermons," vol. I. p. 163 sq.; vol. II. p. 327 sq.

There are others, and not a few, who admit that the death of Christ has much to do with God's readiness to save sinners, while they fail to see any reason why it should have such an influence. These accept the doctrine of the atonement, but as a deep mystery, as a divine expedient.¹

And there are others still who claim to see the best of reasons why the death of Christ should have the influence in question. These declare the doctrine of a vicarious atonement to be at once true and reasonable.²

To ascertain which of these three classes of writers is correct, and to answer the question, whether the death of Christ was necessary, on God's part, in order to the gift of the Spirit and to the pardon of sins upon repentance, it will be desirable to consider a previous question, namely: Are righteousness and benevolence one and the same in God?

The theory which identifies them must be rejected for the following reasons:—

1. This theory is inconsistent with the common language and judgment of mankind. Everywhere men speak of uprightness and benevolence as distinct qualities of character. There is probably no language which fails to express these qualities by different terms, no people which regard justice as one with grace.

¹ Park (E. A.) "Atonement," a number of treatises by different authors, in one volume; Campbell (J. McLeod) "The Nature of the Atonement and its Relation to the Remission of Sins, and Eternal Life"; South (R.) "Sermons," I. p. 493; Dale (R. H.) "The Atonement"; Schoeberlein (L.) "Die Grundlehren des Heils entwickelt aus dem Princip der Liebe." These works do not belong together as defending the same view; nor do they represent exactly the general statement of the text; yet they may be profitably read in connection with that statement.

² Anselm (St.) "Cur Deus Homo," translated in "Bib. Sac.," vols. XI. XII; Magee (W.) "On the Scriptural Doctrine of Atonement and Sacrifice"; Alexander (A. A.) "The Atonement"; Symington (W.) "The Nature, Extent, and Results of the Atonement"; Sweaton (G.) "The Doctrine of the Atonement as taught by Christ himself," "The Doctrine of the Atonement as taught by the Apostles"; Crawford (T. J.) "The Doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the Atonement"; Shedd (W. G. T.) "The Atonement a Satisfaction to the Ethical Nature of both God and Man," "Bib. Sac." vol. XVI.; Turretin (F.) "Disputatio de Satisfactionis Christi Necessitate et Veritate," IV. p. sq.

2. This theory is inconsistent with the customary language of Scripture. For this language makes a clear distinction between righteousness and goodness, — a distinction which is applied in almost numberless places to the attributes of God, and not unfrequently to those of man. — (See Rom. ii. 2-13; v. 7.) But it may be objected to this, that Christ himself refers the whole law to the one requirement of love. This is true; and he could do it, because the law was given for a practical purpose simply, the great obstacle to perfect virtue in men being a want of that love which the law requires. This he could do, not because love comprises, but because it conditions, all right actions.

3. This theory is inconsistent with the clearest decisions of our moral judgment. The law of right, as revealed by conscience, recognizes a principle of obligation distinct from love; it requires justice before generosity. Suppose that A, B, and C are the only persons in the world; that A has a certain amount of property, which he can spare; that he owes it to B; but that C is in greater need of it. Love in the form of compassion says, help the most needy; but the intuition of right says, pay the debt; suum cuique. Moreover, if there were but one created being in the universe, and that being were to do wrong, God would condemn the wrong; he cannot be supposed to look upon sin as he would look upon mere calamity.

Starting with these principles, we add the following preliminary remarks:—

(a) God's opposition to sin is set forth, without exaggeration, by the penalty which he has affixed to it. A lighter penalty would not have agreed so well with his estimate and sense of the demerit of sin, and hence would not have so truly revealed his moral character to men.

(b) God's moral nature is altogether good and right; and therefore his opposition to sin must always be perfectly right, both in feeling and in expression.

(c) Hence his estimate and sense of the guilt of sin cannot diminish; nor can his expression of these be enfeebled; for he will not deny himself, by exchanging an expression once chosen for a feebler and less adequate one.

(d) Yet he may, without absurdity, be supposed to exchange one expression for another which exhibits with equal force and clearness his opposition to sin, and perhaps for one which sets forth this opposition with new and greater energy.

(e) The only substitute which seems at all adapted to the case is the suffering of another in behalf of the sinner; and so far as we can judge, in order to make the substitution right, this vicarious suffering must be endured voluntarily by a sinless being, and must not authorize the sinner's pardon except on condition of repentance, and good security of future obedience.

(f) The amount of vicarious suffering required in such a case may, perhaps, depend, in some measure, on the excellence of the sufferer in the sight of God. Should the Most High be pleased to connect this suffering in any way with his own person, its significance would thereby be vastly enhanced.

(g) Christ suffered, according to the Scriptures, in such a way as to fulfil all these conditions. Hence, so far as we are able to see, his suffering may be a proper substitute for the sinner's death. Reason has nothing decisive to urge against this conclusion.

Says Dr. Shedd, "In the voluntary, the cordially offered sacrifice of the incarnate Son, the judicial nature of God, which by a constitutional necessity requires the punishment of sin, finds its righteous requirement fully met. Plenary punishment is inflicted upon One who is infinite, and therefore competent; upon One who is finite, and therefore passible; upon One who is innocent, and therefore can suffer for others; upon One who is voluntary, and therefore uncom-pelled."¹

These remarks will remove, it is hoped, from the mind all decided prejudice against the doctrine of propitiation by Christ; or, in other words, against the doctrine of an atonement, which was prerequisite in the mind of God to the bestowment of renewing and forgiving grace upon sinners.

¹ "Bib. Sac." vol. XVI. p. 743, 4.

But whether this be the result or not, whether the philosophy of the atonement be comprehended or not, it is necessary for us to examine the testimony of Scripture as to the fact.

And the sacred writers testify :—

1. That propitiation was made for the sins of men by Christ in his blood or death (1 John ii. 2; iv. 10; Heb. ii. 17; Rom. iii. 24–26 (cf. Luke xviii. 13).

What is meant by “propitiation”? Does it refer to the influence which the death of Christ has upon God, or to the influence which it has upon men? In answer to this question, we appeal :—¹

(1) To the classical use of ἱλάσσομαι, or propitiate. In classic writers, Josephus included, this verb signifies, to appease or make propitious, whether by sacrifice, or gift, or song; and the object of it is almost always a god. Herodotus, indeed, speaks of propitiating men, but only those whom one has injured, and only by paying them divine honors after death. Notice, however, that it is always the party which has been wronged and incensed that is said to be propitiated or placated.

(2) To the use of this verb and its derivatives by writers of the New Testament. From the connection in which these words are employed, it is plain that God was conceived of as rendered propitious by the death of Christ; or that the exercise of his grace towards the guilty was secured by that death.

¹ Funke (G.) “Bezieht sich die Versöhnung allein auf den Menschen oder auf Gott und den Menschen?” in St. u. Kr. 1842, 297 ff.; Schweitzer (A.) “Die Lehre des Apostel Paulus vom erlösenden Tode Christi von Gal. iii. 13, 14 aus betrachtet,” in St. u. Kr. 1858, 425. ff.; Munchmeyer (A. F. Q.) “Ueber den Zweck des Todes Jesu,” in St. u. Kr. 1845, 310 ff.; Reich (G.) “Ueber die Satisfactio Vicaria,” in St. u. Kr. 1844, 185 ff.; Schöberlein (L.) “Ueber die christliche Versöhnungslehre,” in St. u. Kr. 1845, 267 ff.; also s. v. “Versöhnung” in Herzog Real-Encyklopädie, and “Die Grundlehren des Heils, entwickelt aus dem Princip der Liebe”; Thomasius (G.) “Christi Person und Werk,” 3 Theil.; Ebrard (J. H. A.) “Die Lehre von der stellvertretenden Genugthuung in der heiligen Schrift begründet”; Gess (W. F.) “Zur Lehre von Versöhnung,” Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie Bde. III. IV.

Note the language of 1 John ii. 2; iv. 10. No one surely can suppose that the Advocate is with the Father, as a propitiation, in order to render sinners favorable, gracious, or even loyal to God. Nor can any one rationally affirm, that the sacrifice of Christ renders all men well-disposed towards the Supreme Ruler; but everywhere in the Scriptures God is represented as displeased with men for their sins. The language which is used to express this displeasure is fearfully strong. Yet he loves them still, and offers them his favor in view of the death of Christ, which he accepts as a reason for turning away his wrath, and imparting his grace.

In Heb. ii. 17, the verb is used in the middle voice but with an active sense, and is translated "to make reconciliation," namely, "for the sins of the people"; and this may be explained, with Winet, as an elliptical expression, meaning "to propitiate God for the sins of the people." Moll observes correctly, that the sacred writers employ the word in question to denote an expiation which interposes between wrath and sin, so that "the latter is covered over."

But the language of Paul in Rom. iii. 24-26, is worthy of special study. It should be translated as follows: "Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth as a propitiation, through faith, in his blood, for the exhibition of his righteousness, because of the passing by of the sins formerly committed, in the forbearance of God, for the exhibition of his righteousness in the present time, that he may be just, and the justifier of him who is of faith in Jesus."

This passage has been called the "Acropolis of the Christian faith"; and it teaches, (a) That Christ was set forth in his blood by God as a propitiatory sacrifice; (b) That this was done to illustrate the righteousness of God; (c) That his righteousness must be thus illustrated, (1) because he had passed by, in his forbearance, sins committed before the coming of Christ; and (2) because he would justify all who should henceforth believe in Christ.

Now it is obvious to every reader, that the setting forth of Christ in his blood is not here represented as propitiating men to God. It is conceived, rather, as something required to justify his propitious bearing towards sinners, as so conspicuous an illustration of his righteousness that this would be forever unclouded, though he had forborne to inflict upon sinners the just penalty of their sins.

According to the passage in Luke xviii. 13, the publican did not pray that his own heart might be changed and made friendly to God, but rather that God would be gracious to him, though a sinner. He assumed that God must be reconciled to the sinner, and not (merely) the sinner to God. Besides, if the place and the result of his prayer are duly considered, it will be natural to paraphrase it thus: "O God, be thou propitiated to me a sinner, by the sacrifices for sin offered in this thine house!"

(3) To the use of this and similar terms, with reference to sacrifice, in the Old Testament. The word ἱλαστήριον which is translated "propitiation," in Rom. iii. 25, is employed by the Seventy to denote the lid of the ark, which was sprinkled with blood on the great day of atonement. The Hebrew name of this lid was Kappôreth, or cover; and the Hebrew verb from which it was formed signified, literally, to cover, but was translated ἐξιλάσκομαι, by the Seventy, the preposition ἐκ being simply intensive.

It may then be assumed, without argument, that the act of covering, expressed by the Hebrew verb when applied to sacrifice, was not physical, but moral or spiritual; and that, if the Seventy did not wholly mistake its import, it served in some way to render God propitious to his sinful subjects, or his sinful subjects well-disposed to God. Is it necessary to prove that the former was its true meaning? It would seem as if no man who had read the Pentateuch could entertain a doubt of this.¹

¹ Oehler (G. F.) I. p. 413 sq.; II. p. 36 sq.; Fairbairn (P.) "Typology of Scripture"; Riehm (F.) "Der Begriff der Sühne im Alten Testament," in the "Studien und Kritiken," erstes Heft, 1877; Kurtz (J. H.) "The Sacrificial Wor-

Yet it will be wise to study the use of the Hebrew verb by means of several texts. There are two passages, at least, in which it appears to have a sense analogous to that which it has in sacrifice, though without any religious bearing—(Gen. xxxii. 21; Prov. xvi. 14). And there are many places where it is used to describe the grace of God, or the effect of acts or sacrifices not embraced in the prescribed worship of the temple. This uncereemonial or extra-cereemonial application of the word is instructive (Ps. lxxviii. 38; 1 Sam. iii. 14; Isa. vi. 7; xxii. 14; xxvii. 9; Dan. ix. 24; Prov. xvi. 6; Jer. xviii. 23; Ps. lxxix. 9; Ezek. xvi. 63; Num. xv. 30 sq.; xxxv. 33; Deut. xxi. 8; xxxii. 43; 2 Sam. xxi. 3; Ex. xxxii. 30; Num. xxv. 13; Ex. xxx. 11–16; Num. xxxi. 50; 2 Chron. xxix. 24; xxx. 18).

With the foregoing should be compared those passages which describe by this word the aim of the bloody sacrifices prescribed for the temple service of the Israelites (Lev. xvii. 11; ix. 7, 8, 15; xvi. 16, 18, 20, 33).

And also the passages in which this term is employed to signify the effect of sprinkling the blood of the sin-offering on the horns of the altar, or on the mercy-seat (Lev. xvi. 6, 11, 17, 24; iv. 20, 26, 31, 35; v. 13, 18; xix. 22; Ex. xxix. 36, 37; xxx. 10; Lev. viii. 14, 15).

From Lev. xvii. 10, 11, it appears that propitiation through sacrifice was ordained by God for his people, and was accomplished by covering ritually the object affected by sin. The blood of an animal, slain for the purpose, was chosen for this emblematical cover; because the blood is the seat of life, and shed blood a natural sign or symbol of death (Lev. xvii. 11).

That the death of the animal was included in the ritual act, and presupposed in the effect of the sprinkled blood, may be inferred from two circumstances; namely, (a) That the slaying of the animal is often and formally prescribed, as only an important part of the sacrificial rite would be; and (b) That, ship of the Old Testament," translated in "Clark's Foreign Theol. Library"; "Bib. Sac." vol. XIX. p. 1 sq. "Jewish Sacrifices with Particular Reference to the Sacrifice of Christ."

by partaking of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, Christians declare the death of Christ; yet Christ was made an offering for sin, and his propitiatory sacrifice was typified by the sin-offering of the Mosaic ritual.

But against this view it has been objected, (a) That the word by which the slaying of the victim is expressed is not the proper one to denote judicial punishment; it means to slaughter, rather than to put to death.

This objection appears to have little force; for certainly the life of the victim was taken; and the word employed is the one commonly used to signify the killing of an animal. In like manner the Saviour is said to have been "crucified," rather than "put to death." He "gave his life a ransom for many," yet he "died for all."

(b) That the slaying of the animal was executed by the sinner himself, rather than by the priest who was the representative of the punishing God, and must have performed this act if it had stood for the penalty of sin.

This objection is by no means conclusive. For the penitent sinner might well confess the justice of the divine law by inflicting its penalty on his substitute. Even Christ died by the hands of sinners, and he was the great sacrifice; yet this was done by "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" (Acts ii. 23).

(c) That the slaying of the victim is not made so prominent as it would have been, had it been the essential act in the propitiation.

But it is very often mentioned, and was always attested by presenting the blood before God. The blood was the sign of life given up in death.

In confirmation of our view, the following particulars may be enumerated: (1) That this offering was always brought for sin, and often for a particular sin; (2) That it was named "Sin," because of its exclusive reference to the same; (3) That the offerer, before slaying his victim, laid his hands on its head, in token of imparting to it his sin; (4) That more prominence was given in this kind of sacrifice to the sprinkling of the blood than in any other; and (5) That the end secured by this propitiation was the forgiveness of the offerer's sin (Ex. iv. 5).

Penitence and confession were not enough; the sin-offering must be presented, and then the sin could be forgiven. The displeasure of God ceased when that was offered.

Moreover, it is admitted by Oehler and Riehm that the idea of vicarious punishment was included in bloody sacrifice apart from the temple worship. "Evidently the punishment of death incurred by the manslayer is executed symbolically on the heifer," says the former, on Deut. xxi. 1-9.

Nearly all interpreters agree, that the blood of the sin-offering is conceived of as interposed between God and the sinner; so that, looking on the blood, God is gracious to the sinner. The propitiation, therefore, affects the attitude of God towards the sinner.

But it must be borne in mind, that the Mosaic sacrifices for sin had no respect to violations of the moral law, as such. There was no provision for pardon through sacrifice for such sins as idolatry, blasphemy, murder, cursing of parents, man-stealing; or for heart-sins, such as anger, malice, hatred, pride, avarice, want of love to God and man. The bloody offerings of the Jewish religion only availed to secure pardon for infractions of the civil or ceremonial law. They only "sanctified to the purifying of the flesh."¹

Thus they illustrated, within the sphere of temporal relations and an earthly kingdom, the principles of the divine government within the sphere of eternal relations and a spiritual kingdom. Thus principles were taught, hopes inspired, and moulds of language prepared which belong to a higher economy, but no more: the shadow could not give the substance, though it may help us to understand the substance. And the fact that, in the sin-offering, the death of the animal took the place of the death due to the offerer, for his sin, so meeting and ratifying the claims of righteousness, proves that the same is true on a higher plane of the death of Christ; as sacrificial, propitiatory, it took up into itself and met the claims of eternal righteousness for sinners. And so we are led to say:—

¹ See Heb. ix. 13, 14.

(2.) *That propitiation was effected by the death of Christ, because this was an illustration of the righteousness of God.*¹

Reference must be made once more to Rom. iii. 24–26. The language of this passage renders forever vain any attempt to limit the need of the atonement to its moral influence over men; for the apostle distinctly specifies the exhibition of God's righteousness as a proximate end of Christ's death. And he declares that this exhibition was rendered necessary by God's treatment of sinners both before and since the time of Christ, by his forbearing to punish sins committed before the death of Christ, and by his accepting as righteous, since that event, sinners who believe in Jesus,—a course of action which must be complemented by the atonement, in order that God may be, and may be known to be, a righteous moral governor of men.

We conclude, then, that the atonement took up into itself and expressed the judicial righteousness, as well as the love of God. And, if the sufferings of Christ were distinctively an exhibition of God's righteousness, they must have been in some way an exercise of it. They must be traceable to his love of moral rectitude and opposition to sin, as they cannot be traced to his mere wisdom, or benevolence, or power. Says Dr. Hodge: "The atonement is an exhibition of God's purpose to maintain his law and inflict its penalty, . . . because it involves the execution of the penalty. It is this which gives it all its power. It would be no exhibition of justice, if it were not an exercise of justice; it would not teach that the penalty of the law must be inflicted, unless it was inflicted."² The word "illustration" seems to unite the two ideas of "exercise" and "exhibition," in the case of a divine attribute; and we have therefore made use of it in our second proposition.

¹ We refer also to the following discussions of the atonement: Wardlaw (R.) "Systematic Theology," Vol. II. 332–483; "New Englander," 1864, "Atonement," and 1865, "Atonement as the Basis of Redemption"; "Methodist Quarterly," 1871, "Vicarious Atonement."

² "Princeton Essays," "First Series" p. 319; Gurlitt. (J. F. R.) "Studien zur Erklärung der ἐνδειξις τῆς δικαιοσύνης, Rom. iii. 25" in St. u. Kr. 1840, 930 ff.

It may be added, in this place, that the atonement is none the less an illustration of the benevolence of God, because it is an illustration of his righteousness; for, had it not been for the benevolence of God, he might have illustrated his righteousness by inflicting on men the just punishment for their sins, without the death of his Son; just as, on the other hand, he might, had it not been for his righteousness, have illustrated his benevolence by renewing, pardoning, and saving guilty men, without the death of his Son. Hence the whole force of Christ's passion goes to reveal both the righteousness and the benevolence of God. The end sought proves the latter; the means employed, the former.

"If the question were, Why did God give his Son to die for sinners, rather than leave them to perish? . . . The answer would be, Because he loved them. But if the question be, Why did he give his Son to be an atonement for sinners, rather than save them without one? The answer would be, Because he loved righteousness.¹

(3.) That propitiation was effected by the death of Christ; because this was suffered by him voluntarily, as the penalty due to men for their sins. In support of this proposition, we appeal:—

(1) To those passages of Scripture which affirm the necessity of Christ's death (Matt. xvi. 21; xvii. 12; Mark viii. 31; Luke ix. 22; xxiv. 46; xxii. 37; Heb. viii. 3 (cf. ix. 12–14); Matt. xxii. 28; Rom. viii. 32). By simply putting together the two facts, that death is the penalty of sin, and that Christ, though holy, must needs die in order to save sinners, we are led to the statement just made. Or rather the singular emphasis laid by the sacred writers on the death of Christ, when put side by side with the biblical doctrine of death being the divinely-ordained penalty of sin, confirms our proposition.

¹ Fuller (A.) "Works," Vol. II., p. 696; Says Zwingle (U.) "Justitia requirebat expiationem, misericordia veniam, venia novam vitam. . . Mixtæ sunt igitur jñstitia et misericordia, ut hæc hostiam daret, illa vero acciperet pro universorum scelerum expiatione." Niemeyer (H. A.) "Collectio Confessionum," &c., pp. 40, 41.

(2) To passages which speak of the death of Christ as being the death or penalty of those for whom he died (2 Cor. v. 15, 21; Gal. iii. 13). The first of these passages should be translated: "If One died for all, then all died;" meaning that, in the person of their representative and substitute, they had suffered the penalty of sin prescribed by the law; and it only remained for them to accept the act of their substitute in humble faith.

"We must remember," says Usteri on the next passage, "that Paul looked upon death as the penalty of sin; and therefore the death of the sinless Christ must appear to him an assumption of our punishment."

The word "curse" in the third passage, evidently refers to the punishment of sin denounced by the law, even as the apostle had just testified: "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." Hence these passages warrant our fourth statement.

And they are confirmed by such as follow (namely, 1 Peter iii. 18; Rom. iv. 25; Gal. i. 4; 1 Cor. xv. 3). The apostles had in mind, without doubt, actual sins. They were not thinking of the moral influence of Christ's death upon the hearts of men, but upon the relation of that death to sins already committed: for they do not say that Christ was delivered for our regeneration, but rather for our offences; they do not teach that he died for our sanctification, but rather for our sins.

(3) *To passages which teach that Christ in his death bore the sins of men*¹ (Heb. ix. 28; 1 Peter ii. 24; Isa. liii. passim; (cf. Lev. v. 17; xxiv. 15; Num. xiv. 34). The phrase "to bear sins" is used in the Old Testament figuratively, to express the idea of responsibility for them, and so of suffering the penalty which they merit. Many of the best authorities make it signify "to feel the guilt, or bear the punishment of sin:" but we would not separate these two; they naturally go together.

¹ "Bib. Sac." XXXII., pp. 475-497, "The New Testament view of Christ as bearing sin"; "Bib. Sac." XXX., pp. 422-429, "The Meaning of נָשָׂא," both articles by W. H. Cobb.

In the second passage cited by us, the expression, "in his body," points to that part of his nature as suffering death on the cross, but not in such a way as to exclude mental agony (cf. 1 Peter iv. 1). With the first two may also be compared John i. 29; 1 John ii. 2; Rev. v. 9.

The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is descriptive of Christ's mediatorial work. Portions of it are applied to Christ in the New Testament; and it is impossible to find any other object of which this language is, from first to last, descriptive. Again, this prophecy represents the suffering of Christ as vicarious, expiatory. Its language admits of no other satisfactory explanation. Moreover, this meaning is found in it by nearly all who refer it to Christ. And, lastly, the fact and principle of vicarious suffering are taught here by the admission of many who do not concede any reference to Christ; for example, Knobel.

It may be added in confirmation of the general view of Christ's death which has been taken, to wit, that it conditions, as well as reveals God's grace to men:—

(4) *That the propitiation effected by the death of Christ removes an obstacle existing in the mind of God to the exercise of his saving grace.*¹ In support of this position, we refer:—

(1) To passages which represent Christ as the source of salvation to men (for example, Acts iv. 12; John iii. 36; x. 7–18). The first of these passages is very clear,—“And the salvation is not in any other; for neither is there any other name under heaven, which is given among men, in which we must be saved.” It is quite evident that Peter intends to affirm the dependence of all mankind upon Christ for salvation. He addresses the Sanhedrin, saying, in his name we must be saved; "this is the only alternative, for God has appointed no other way of salvation" (Hackett, nearly) for any of the race of mankind to which we belong.

¹ Pendleton (J. M.) “A Treatise on the Atonement of Christ”; Jenkyn (T. W.) “The Extent of the Atonement in its Relation to God and the Universe.”

Can the apostle be supposed to mean that the moral influence of Christ is the only saving power? Did that influence beget faith in the ancient patriarchs? Did it heal the man at the gate Beautiful of the temple,—an event which suggested the great salvation given by him, and by him only? This view of the expression seems to us untenable; and the only other view that merits a thought is the one which recognizes Christ as having done and suffered that in consideration of which repenting sinners can be saved. The other passages can only be explained satisfactorily in the same way.

(2) To passages which represent Christ as the source of repentance (for example, Acts v. 31): "Him God exalted as a Prince and a Saviour to his right hand, to give repentance unto Israel," compared with Acts ii. 33: "Therefore, having been exalted to the right hand of God, and having received the promise of the Holy Spirit from the Father, he hath poured out this, which ye now see and hear." Doubtless "pouring out the Spirit" and "giving repentance to Israel" were closely connected in the apostle's mind,—the former pointing out the special agency employed by the Saviour, and the latter, the chief result of that agency. No direct reference is made in either of them to the moral power of Christ's earthly life, as producing repentance, or to the story of his patient death, as subduing rebellion in the selfish will.

(3) To passages which represent Christ as the source of pardon for sins (for example, Acts v. 31; xiii. 38; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14). Comment is unnecessary to show that the forgiveness of sins was inseparably connected, according to the belief of the apostles, with Christ, and indeed with his blood. Was it because they put the persuasive power of the cross so high? This view of the case is not brought forward by them.

Besides, pardon is distinguished in the first two passages from repentance and faith; and the latter are conceived of as antecedent to and conditions of the former. Those who repent and believe are forgiven. By separating the inward change in man from the pardoning act of God, and tracing the latter, as well as the former, to Christ, they teach that his atonement was more than a moral influence on the hearts of men, — that it was a reason why God should forgive the penitent.

Moreover, the sacred writers speak almost always of a remission or forgiveness of sins, using the plural and not the singular; had they been thinking of a work on the heart, they would certainly have used the singular.

(4) To passages which represent Christ as the source of justification (for example, Acts xiii. 39; Rom. v. 8, 9, 19; iii. 24, 26). Justification is a judicial act, declaring one to be rectus in curia, absolving him from the charge of guilt. To prove this we appeal to such passages as the following (Deut. xxv. 1; Isa. v. 22, 23; 1. 8; Prov. xvii. 15; 1 Kings viii. 31, 32; and Matt. xii. 36, 37; Rom. ii. 12, 13, 16; 1 Cor. iv. 4; Rom. viii. 33; also Luke x. 29; xvi. 15; viii. 29, 35; Matt. xi. 19). And if God is one who “justifieth the ungodly,” and Christians are “justified in the blood of Christ,” — that is, have in his blood the source of their justification, — it follows that their moral excellence or obedience is not that in consideration of which they are acquitted and accepted of God, but rather the atonement of Christ; and therefore his atonement has a Godward as well as a manward efficacy.

(5) To passages which represent Christ as interceding with God for his people (for example, Rom. viii. 34; 1 John ii. 1, 2; Heb. vii. 25; ix. 25). According to these testimonies, the sacred writers looked upon the presence of Christ in heaven as a constant plea for the favor of God to believers, as an all-sufficient reason for the bestowal of grace upon the followers of Jesus; and they saw in Christ such a plea, because he had offered himself a sacrifice for the sins of the people. This of itself is decisive as to the Godward influence of the atonement.

(6) To passages which teach that, by the death of Christ, the human race was put in such a relation to God that he could treat it with favor, instead of wrath (for example, Rom. v. 9, 10; 2 Cor. v. 19, 20). The former of these reads thus: “Much more then, having now been justified in his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, having been reconciled, shall we be saved in his life." The second of these verses manifestly reproduces and confirms the argument of the first; but the first speaks of justification, not as being found or founded in repentance, but rather in the blood of Christ, and of salvation from the wrath to come as the sure result of justification in that blood. For salvation is not rooted primarily in human action, but in divine grace.

The apostle then confirms this statement by another in the same line of thought: "For if, when we were the objects of God's wrath (like rebels whom the king counts as enemies), we were put in a condition to receive his favor, by the death of his Son, how much more, having been put in that condition, shall we be saved in his life." — (For the sense of the word "enemies," see Rom. xi. 28; and for the sense of the word "reconciled," Matt. v. 24; 1 Sam. xxix. 4, Jos. Antiq. v. 2, 8.)

In the second passage, the message given to the apostles for man is summed up as showing "How that God in Christ reconciled the world to himself, not imputing to them their transgressions," &c.; that is, by the death of his Son, God has removed every obstacle on his part to harmony between himself and mankind, and now calls upon them to accept his grace. If there be any more separation, it must be due to their rejecting peace, and choosing wrath.

(7) The result we have gained receives further confirmation from the prominence given by the apostles to faith in Christ, as the subjective condition or medium of justification (John iii. 15, 16, 18, 36; Acts xvi. 31; iii. 16; xxvi. 18; Rom. i. 17; iii. 22, 25, 28; v. 1; Gal. ii. 16; iii. 8, 24, 26).

We remark:—

(1) By requiring men to have fear, or repentance, or faith, or love, the word of God requires them to have all these; for the exercise of any one of them implies a moral nature disposed to exercise them all.

(2) The relative prominence given by the word of God to one or another of these subjective conditions of life will be found to vary somewhat with the amount and character of the truth already revealed at any particular time.

(3) The instructions delivered by Christ and his apostles may be presumed to lay special emphasis on that which is most essential and fundamental in piety.

(4) These instructions assign a very marked pre-eminence to faith in Christ crucified, as the condition of pardon and life. To illustrate, the following table shows in the first column how many times μετανοέω and μεάνοια together occur in each book of the New Testament, and in the second column how many times πιστεύω and πίστις occur.

Matt.	7	19	John	0	98	1 Cor.	0	16	Eph.	0	11
Mark	3	20	Acts	11	52	2 Cor.	3	9	Phil.	0	6
Luke	14	20	Rom.	1	58	Gal.	0	20	Col.	0	5
1 & 2 Thess.	22		Tit.	0	8	James	0	19	Jude	0	7
1 Tim.	0	22	Philem.	2		1 & 2 Pet.	1	11	Rev.	12	4
2 Tim.	1	9	Heb.	3	33	1 & 2 John	0	11	Total	56	482

For these reasons, we believe that the atonement is revealed to us by the Word of God, as that in consideration of which renewing and forgiving grace is bestowed on all who are saved.

Bishop Butler, in general but unambiguous language, indorses this view of the atonement as scriptural: "The doctrine of the gospel appears to be, not only that he taught the efficacy of repentance, but rendered it of the efficacy which it is by what he did and suffered for us, that he obtained for us the benefit of having our repentance accepted unto eternal life; not only that he revealed to sinners that they were in a capacity of salvation, and how they might obtain it, but moreover that he put them into this capacity of salvation by what he did and suffered for them." — "Analogy," II. c. v., p. 213.

But against the doctrine which has now been set forth, and which puts such stress upon the propitiatory death of Christ in its relation to the grace of God, it has been objected:—

(1) That his own words show that his work was finished before his death. — (See John xvii. 4; xix. 28–30.) In reply to this objection, it may be said, that Jesus refers in the language preserved in the former passage to his work in educating the disciples ; and that he declares in the words of the latter the last prophecy concerning himself to be fulfilled, and, perhaps, the anguish of death to be past. As he uttered the words, "It is finished," he ceased to withstand by divine power the causes which would bring death, and passed, by the separation of soul and body, into rest. From that moment his relation to dying was passive ; his proper work was done.

Against our doctrine it has been urged (2) That death, the penalty of sin, is chiefly spiritual, being a loss of blessed fellowship with the Most High, together with a sense of his displeasure, aggravated by remorse and despair, and that Christ could not have experienced these. This objection once appeared to us insurmountable ; but for a long time it has ceased to have that appearance ; and for the following reasons : —

(1) It is not biblical, but purely rational. It rests for support on the assumed fact, that remorse can only be felt for one's own sin. But this fact is not a self-evident truth, nor can it be established by any process of demonstration ; for it pertains to the realm of actual life in which there are mysteries and seeming contradictions unknown to the realm of pure thought.

(2) Beings who have a like spiritual nature can realize and bear the spiritual sufferings of one another. And "bearing another's woe" is sympathy or compassion, when either of these words is used in its deepest sense ; it is suffering with another, — enduring what his spirit endures, sharing, not his bodily ill, but the feeling which that ill excites ; not his sin and guilt, but the spiritual state, the remorse and fear consequent upon them. Owing to the imperfection of their knowledge and love, the sympathy of men with one another is only partial, and not at all commensurate with that of Christ.¹ For —

(3) Christ's human nature was virtually perfect in knowledge and love. It had not, to be sure, all knowledge ; but it had at every moment all the knowledge requisite to the complete performance of its work for that moment. And, for practical ends, this was as good as omniscience. His love, too, was equal to his knowledge; so that all the conditions for absolute sympathy met in his person. When, therefore, we read of his agony of soul in the garden and on the cross, culminating in the feeling expressed by the cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" it is not difficult to believe that he experienced the bitterness of remorse and the horror of being deserted of God.¹

¹Herzog "Real-Encyclopädie," s. v. Versöhnung, Bd. XVII. s. 128 ; Stroud (W.) "The Physical Cause of the Death of Christ."

Without professing to have set forth the way, and the only way, in which Christ actually bore the penalty due to men for their sins, — without asserting that Christ bore just the amount of suffering which awaited sinners; unredeemed, in eternity, and without overlooking the dignity of his person, which gave inestimable value to his death, we think a way has been indicated by which he could have borne penal woe; and if so, however different in some of its elements may have been the actual suffering of soul endured by him from that which we have suggested, the objection to our doctrine has been sufficiently met.

The following words of Dr. Bruce deserve to be quoted in this place: "Looking, then, into the Scriptures with unbiased mind, in order to find out the elements of value in our Lord's atoning work, as estimated by the wisdom of the omniscient Spirit, we observe that emphasis is laid on at least four things: first, the dignity of the sufferer; second, his obedience to his Father's will; third, his love to sinners; and fourth, his sufferings themselves." "The value of Christ's sacrifice was equal to his divine dignity, multiplied by his perfect obedience, multiplied by his infinite love, multiplied by suffering in body and soul carried to the uttermost limit of what a sinless being could experience."

But a further question may now be raised, namely: Was the holy life of Jesus co-ordinate in efficacy with his atoning death, or only prerequisite to the worth of the latter? In other words, Was his active obedience vicarious, as well as his passive? Both Lutheran and Calvinistic theologians of the old school pronounce his active obedience vicarious; while the new school theologians generally deny this, and regard his holy life as strictly personal and prerequisite to the efficacy of his suffering for others.¹ The view of the former is clearly stated by Marsh on the "Evidence and Nature of the Christian Religion." "Christ chose to do all that it became us to do before we had fallen, and to suffer all that it became us to suffer after we had fallen; and thus, in both respects, though in no way bound by it, to exhibit a perfect and living example of what the law of God requires from his creatures."

¹Schöberlein (L.) "Die Grundlehren des Heils entwickelt aus dem Princip der Liebe," s. 92 ff.

In favor of the view that his active, as well as passive obedience was vicarious, reference may be made:—

1. To passages which emphasize the voluntariness of Christ's death (for instance, Phil. ii. 8; Heb. v. 8; x. 5 sq.; John x. 17, 18; 2 Cor. v. 14; Gal. i. 4; ii. 20); for, by emphasizing the voluntariness of his death, they justify the old dictum, "Actio ejus fuit passiva et passio activa."

2. To the plain declaration of the apostle in Rom. v. 19: "For, as by the disobedience of the one man, the many were made sinners, so also by the obedience of the one the many shall be made righteous." At first sight this language appears to be conclusive; but it should be borne in mind, that the act of obedience here meant was the voluntary death of Christ, and that the word "obedience" may have been chosen to denote this act because of the fine antithesis which it makes to "disobedience."

3. To passages which assert the union of believers with Christ (for example, 1 Cor. i. 30; Eph. iv. 15, 16; John xv. 1 sq.); for they seem to make Christ the representative of ¹See Hodge (A. A.) "Outlines of Theology," p. 300; Knapp (G. C.) "Lectures on Christian Theology," Lec. CXV. p. 405 sq.; Park (E. A.) "Atonement," including several treatises by adherents of the New England Theology; Heppe (H.) "Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformirten Kirchen," s. 325; Thomasius (G.) "Christi Person und Werk," III. 1, s. 69 sq.

Christians in obedience, and the source of their holiness. These statements of the Word of God strongly support the view in question, and justify us, perhaps, in regarding it as true.

Still another question must be briefly considered in this connection: For whom did Christ make his life a propitiatory offering? For all mankind, or for all the elect? Or did he suffer, with different ends in view, for the elect, and for all men?¹ Turning to the Word of God for light, we learn that Christ died, —

I. To effect the salvation of all the elect. His suffering was to be specially rewarded by their eternal purity, love, blessedness, and homage (John x. 11, 15, 26–28; xi. 52; Eph. v. 25; John xvii. 19; Rom. viii. 32; John vi. 39, 40; xvii. 2; Eph. i. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 10).

Hence (1) God purposed from the first to save certain persons of our race. (2) These persons were given to Christ, in a special sense, to be his flock; and (3) he had their actual salvation particularly in view when he laid down his life.

II. To remove every objective hinderance to the salvation of mankind in general. In other words, to provide for their pardon on condition of faith (1 John ii. 2; 1 Tim. ii. 1–6; Heb. ii. 9; 2 Cor. v. 15, 19, 20; 2 Pet. ii. 1; John iii. 16, 17).

Notes. 1 John ii. 2 (cf. iv. 14; 1 Tim. iv. 10; and John i. 29; vi. 51): ἵλασμός, propitiation, refers to Christ as himself the atoning sacrifice for sin. The phrase, “for the whole world,” is equivalent to “for the sins of the whole world”; and the expression, “whole world,” must here signify all mankind; (1) because κόσμος, used of men, naturally includes all, unless its meaning is in some way restricted; (2) because ἡμετέρων and κοσμοῦ are here contrasted, — the one referring to Christians, and the other to all men; (3) because the adjective ὅλον is manifestly emphatic.

¹Jenkyn (I. W.) “The Extent of the Atonement”; Barnes (A.) “The Atonement in its Relations to Law and Moral Government”; Griffin (E. D.) “An Humble Attempt to reconcile the Differences of Christians respecting the Extent of the Atonement”; Park (E. A.) “Atonement: Discourses and Treatises,” giving for the most part what is sometimes called the New England Theory of the Atonement. The writers, besides Dr. Park, are Jona. Edwards, the younger; J. Smalley, J. Maxcy, N. Emmons, E. D. Griffin, C. Burge, and W. R. Weeks.

Heb. ii. 9: παντός; must here signify every one of our race, or every believer of our race. The former is the natural meaning, and should therefore be preferred. 2 Peter ii. 1 (cf. Luke vii. 30; xix. 44; Acts xiii. 46; 2 Cor. ii. 15). For the meaning of ἀγοράζω with a personal object, see 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; Rev. v. 9; xiv. 3, 4. The participle with its object is prefixed to δεσπότην, in order to emphasize their guilt; and it shows that Christ purchased by his blood some who will deny him and perish. And, if he purchased some of this class, he did all, according to the obvious sense of the other passages cited by us.

2 Cor. v. 15 (cf. v. 20, 21; and Rom. v. 18, 19): If we have rightly explained this verse in speaking of the atonement, the word πάντων evidently signifies all mankind. Besides, verses 20 and 21 are understood by the best interpreters as an epitome of Paul's preaching to a promiscuous assembly; and, if so, he was wont to exhort men indiscriminately to be reconciled to God, affirming virtually that there was no obstacle to this out of their own hearts, since God had made the sinless Christ to be sin for them.

Matt. xxiii. 37 (cf. Rom. x. 21; Rev. xxii. 17; Ezek. xviii. 32) It is plain, we think, from the language of Jesus, that the people of Jerusalem did not perish for want of a Saviour. — Compare John Howe, "The Redeemer's Tears wept over Lost Souls." But, if Christ was ready to save them, he must be equally ready to save all who perish.

These and similar portions of the Word of God indicate, not merely that the atonement is sufficient for all men, but also that it has been made so intentionally; that God designed, by means of the atonement, to make provision for the pardon of all men,—to give them all a fresh probation and offer of life, by the economy of grace, as well as to lead some to repentance by the renewing power of his Spirit. Any other view of these passages seems to me unnatural, and therefore erroneous.

If there were explicit statements in the Word of God, to the effect that Christ suffered for the elect only, — that he did not suffer for those who will be finally lost, — it would certainly be necessary for us to look for a different explanation of these passages; but we are not aware of any such statements, and therefore abide by their obvious import.

At this point it may be proper to notice the relation of the propitiatory death of Christ to children who die in infancy. So far as now appears, such children are put in no practical relation to the atonement, unless it be by the secret and renewing work of the Spirit. Assuming, as we must, that this life is the only period of grace for mankind as sinners, and that the death of Christ was in some way for all our race, it follows that dying infants are regenerated by the Holy Spirit given by Christ. Says Henry Wallace, "Infancy is but a period in every human life; and the moral constitution of the race embraces the whole life of every member of it. Our relation to Adam is not restricted to adult life, but to all periods. Nor does this doctrine suppose or imply that children dying in infancy necessarily die under the guilt of Adam's first sin; for there is a second Adam revealed from heaven, whose redemption, by a representative constitution also, embraces all periods of life, from unconscious infancy to old age." — ("Representative Responsibility," p. 801.)

The same inference may be made from the language of Scripture concerning the love and mercy of God. Judgment is his "strange work." How much reliance is to be placed on a general statement of this kind, in judging of a particular case like the one in question, may be doubtful; but it surely has some bearing on it, and should therefore be mentioned.

And a similar inference may be drawn from the want of anxiety in respect to those who die in infancy, which seems to characterize the good of every age and nation. David was not apparently concerned about the spiritual condition of the infant for whose life he had so earnestly prayed in vain.

The next topic in course is, —

II. REVELATION BY CHRIST: and especially the moral influence of his humiliation and death upon sinners.¹

According to the prologue of John's gospel, the pre-existent Word was the source of life for the world; and that life originated by him was the light of men. From the beginning, therefore, the Word has been the revealer.

By creating man in the image of God, he made the very nature of man a means of knowledge in respect to the Most High, so that man could not use his own powers, and study his own constitution, without being reminded of him who is the "First and the Best."

And by surrounding him with numberless beings, inferior to himself, but of wonderful instincts and organs, he gave to him still further light concerning the eternal power and Godhead of his Maker. Every form of life was a ray of light from the divine Word; and, had man continued holy, there is little reason to suppose that he would have needed any better revelation of God.

But sin entered; and the light became darkness, for the eye of the soul was closed. Man read neither the lessons of his own constitution, nor those written on the face of "animated nature." In his self-will he turned the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped the creature more than the Creator.

Yet the Revealer did not utterly forsake the world of mankind. There were some to whom he made himself known in a miraculous way. He appeared to holy men in dreams and visions; he caused them to hear his voice, and proclaim to others his will. He was the Angel of Jehovah, who spoke from the burning bush. He led his people by the hand of Moses to the foot of Sinai, and gave them the Law.

This prophetic work of the Logos was continued through the whole Mosaic period, down to the time of Christ; the last and greatest messenger of the Word being John the Baptist, who came for a witness, that he might bear witness of the true light (John i. 7).

¹Wayland (F.) "Discourses," "Moral Efficacy of the Atonement"; Bushnell (H.) "The Vicarious Sacrifice."

Then the Word became flesh; and the apostle testifies, "We beheld his glory, — the glory as of an only begotten from (παρά) the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). He was himself a bright revelation of the Father. His spirit, his teaching, his working, were in absolute harmony with the Father's will. He was in the Father, and the Father in him. Every miracle, every parable, every rebuke, every invitation, was full of divine power, holiness, and love.

But the revelation of God made by him reached its highest point in his atoning death. By this more vividly than by any thing else in the days of his flesh was made manifest the very "heart of Christ"; and the heart of Christ was also that of God.

"Here the whole mystery is known;
Nor dares a creature guess
Which of the glories brightest shone,
The justice, or the grace."

After his ascension into heaven, the Saviour continued his prophetic work by means of his disciples, and especially by the inspired ministry of the apostles. These repeated and put on record his sayings, described his wonderful works, recounted the story of his crucifixion, and bore witness to his resurrection. More than all, they expounded the meaning of his death as sacrificial, propitiatory, vicarious; and indeed, as necessary, in order that God might be just, and the justifier of him that trusts in Christ (Rom. iii. 26).

By this prophetic work of the Saviour, continued down through the ages by the written word, and by the testimony of Christians, the moral power or manward efficacy of the atonement is realized. Thus the preaching of Christ, and him crucified, is found to be the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

As an exhibition of the divine character, the atonement tends to beget sorrow for sin and trust in the Redeemer. As a practical demonstration of Jehovah's love, paying homage to righteousness, and yet reaching out its hand to recover the lost, it makes the strongest imaginable appeal to man's religious nature. For, plainly, a love which meets the claims of divine justice, as well as the needs of sinful humanity, must be more powerful, as a motive, than a love which has nothing to do with the former while accomplishing the latter. Whatever emphasizes the holiness and justice of God — his sense of what is due to the sinner as a fit penalty for his sins — emphasizes at the same time his love in providing a way of escape from that penalty.

In proof of the moral power of the Saviour's death, we appeal:—

1. To the contrast between the effect of preaching before and after that death. The signal effect of the gospel on the day of Pentecost and subsequently, though due in part to a wonderful outpouring of the Spirit, was also due in a great measure to the saving truth which was now preached with unprecedented clearness.

2. To the description given by Paul of the gospel which he preached (1 Cor. i. 23, 24; ii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 20, 21; Gal. iii. 1). It is certain, from such passages as these, that the preaching of Paul had, for its principal theme, not the holy life, but the sacrificial death of Christ. He relied upon this as most likely to reach the conscience and the heart, whether of the unbeliever or of the believer.

3. To the account which the apostles give of the influence of Christ's dying love on their own hearts. 2 Cor. v. 15; Gal. ii. 20; 1 John iv. 19 (cf. 1 Cor. i. 23, 24; ii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 20). The language of these passages is remarkably simple, yet forcible: "For the love of Christ constraineth us, since we thus judged that if one died for all, then all died; and he died for all, that the living might no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again."—"I am crucified with Christ; and I live no longer myself, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by faith which is on the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."—"We love him, because he first loved us."¹

4. To the history of the Christian religion in every land where it has prevailed. It needs but a slight acquaintance with that history to know how much depends on preaching Christ and his cross, — how little real piety there is if the latter is neglected, and how poorly missionaries succeed who say little of the atonement.

¹ Compare 1 John iv. 9, 10.

It is worthy of consideration, that the moral power of the atonement made by Christ is due to the union of deity and humanity in his person. Had Jesus been only a perfect man, he might have shown very clearly how much God would have a subject of his moral government do or suffer for the benefit of others, but not how much the Supreme Ruler himself would be pleased to do or suffer for such an end. Yet it is this which the heart of man longs to know; it is the latter, and not the former, which will touch the deepest chords of his spiritual nature. — (See Rom. viii. 32; John xiv. 9.)

III. GOVERNMENT BY CHRIST: and especially redemption and judgment as administered by him.¹

1. The Scriptures teach that Jesus Christ is now acting as mediatorial King, subduing the world to himself (Ps. ii. ; xlv. ; lxxii. ; cx. ; Acts ii. 33; Heb. i. 3, 4; viii. 1; Isa. ix. 6, 7; Luke i. 32, 33; John viii. 36; x. 27, 28; xviii. 36; Rom. xiv. 9; Eph. i. 22, 23; v. 23; vi. 5-9; Phil. iii. 20, 21; Col. i. 18; Heb. iii. 6; 1 Pet. iii. 22).

2. They teach that the Holy Spirit is given by him as mediatorial King (John xiv. 16; xv. 26; xvi. 7-15; Acts ii. 33; Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; Phil. i. 19; 1 Peter i. 11).

3. They teach that he imparts to believers their spiritual life (John xiv. 6; vi. 35; xv. 1, 4; Rom. xii. 5; vi. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 27; 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11; v. 17; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. ii. 10; iv. 15, 16; v. 29, 31; Col. iii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 12; Gal. iii. 16).

4. They teach that he is their patron or advocate with the Father (Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25; ix. 24; 1 John ii. 1).

5. They teach that he is to be the final judge of all men. — (See Matt. xvi. 27; xxv. 31-46; Acts x. 42; xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10-15.)

¹Steward (G.) "Mediatorial Sovereignty."

CHAPTER SECOND.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

A. THE PERSON OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.¹

Three subjects may be investigated in this section, namely: The Deity of the Holy Spirit; the Personality of the Holy Spirit; and the Identity of the Holy Spirit, and the Spirit of God.

I. DEITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

As the deity of the Holy Spirit is not often denied at the present time, it seems unnecessary to examine very fully the evidence for it. It will be sufficient to refer to certain passages of Scripture:—

1. Which ascribe to him divine attributes or actions (for example, Acts xxviii. 25 (cf. Isa. v. 8 sq.); Heb. x. 15 (cf. Jer. xxxi. 33; and x. 1); 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11; John iii. 5, 6 (cf. i. 13).
2. Which associate him in religious acts with the Father and the Son (Matt. xxviii. 19; 2 Cor. xiii. 13; 1 Peter i. 2).
3. Which call him God, either directly, or by implication (Acts v. 3, 4; 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 22; 1 Cor. vi. 19).

II. PERSONALITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

It will be found, upon examination, that the amount of evidence for the personality of the Holy Spirit is much less than that for the divinity of Christ. But it is to be borne in mind, that, if the deity of Christ and his personal distinction from the Father be admitted, the whole mystery of personal distinctions in the one God is admitted. Triunity is no more ¹Owen (J.) "On the Holy Spirit"; Buchanan (Jas.) "On the Office and Work of the Holy Spirit"; Bickersteth (E. H.) "The Spirit of Life"; Heber (R.) "The Personality and Office of the Comforter"; Hare (J. C.) "Mission of the Comforter"; Kelly (W.) "The New Testament Doctrine of the Holy Spirit"; Jenkyn (T. W.) "The Union of the Holy Spirit and the Church"; Walker (J. B.) "The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit"; Barrow (I.) "De Spiritu Sancto," "Works," Vol. III.; Kahnis (K. F. A.) "Lehre des heiligen Geistes"; Pearson (J.) "On the Creed," Art. VIII. p. 459 sq.; Parker (J.) "The Paraclete."

incredible than biunity; and, the latter being proved, there is no logical or philosophical objection to the former.

In proof of the personality of the Holy Spirit, reference may be made, —

1. To the language of Christ. According to Matt. xxviii. 19, the risen Saviour commanded his disciples to baptize those who should believe in him unto “the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.” And, as the Father and the Son are certainly conceived of as personally distinct, the Spirit must also be personally distinct from both; for it would be very unnatural to associate an operation or influence with persons, in such a formula.

Again, in his discourse to his disciples, before he repaired to the garden of Gethsemane, he promised to send them “another helper,” or advocate, namely, The Holy Spirit; and, by calling him “another helper,” he at once distinguished him from, and associated him with himself (John xiv. 16; xv. 26; xvi. 7–15).

Besides this, he designated him several times by the masculine pronoun, “he,” — ἐκεῖνος — thus persisting in the personal characterization. It is also true that he used the neuter pronoun “it,” in speaking of him; but this is probably due to the circumstance that the word signifying “Spirit” is neuter in the Greek language. — (See John xvi. 7, 8, 13; and xv. 26.)

The Lord also declared that the coming paraclete would “not speak from himself”; which certainly implies that he could do so, or might be conceived of as able to do so. Says Meyer, “This is the denial of something conceivable; and it serves to represent fully the harmony of the Spirit’s teaching with that of the Lord.” If the Holy Spirit was understood to be a divine energy, or influence, or mode of action, the apostles could hardly have needed this declaration. Independent action would have been quite out of the question. But, if he was to come as a person, the remark was pertinent, and important. — Compare John v. 19.

Still further, Christ assured his disciples that the Spirit would be “sent” by the Father, and by himself; that he would “come” from the Father and “abide” with them; that he would "speak" what he "hears," and "announce" what he "receives"; that he would "teach" the disciples all things, and "guide" them into all the truth; that he would "bring to their remembrance" the Saviour's word, and "reveal to them things to come." If this be personification only, it is very bold, and persistent, and astonishing personification!

In estimating the weight of these expressions, it must be remembered, that they are taken from a discourse which was eminently solemn, deliberate, and even doctrinal. John may be called the ontological evangelist; and the words of Christ preserved in his gospel are full of truth concerning the being of God.

2. To the language of the New Testament writers. For by their language he is associated with the Father and the Son (2 Cor. xiii. 13; Matt. iii. 16, 17; Eph. ii. 22; 1 Peter i. 2; Rev. i. 4, 5; v. 6 (cf. Zech. ch. iv.); 1 Cor. xii. 4-6; Matt. iii. 16, 17); is represented as willing and feeling (Rom. xv. 30; 1 Cor. xii. 11; Eph. iv. 30); and is spoken of as if he were a personal agent. 1 Cor. xii. 8-11; Acts vii. 51; xiii. 2, 4; xxviii. 25; Eph. i. 14; (cf. Phil. iii. 3; Acts xxi. 11; 1 Tim. iv. 1; Rev. xiv. 13; ii. 7; iii. 6 and often.)

These passages, in themselves wholly unambiguous, ascribe choice, feeling, will, to the Holy Spirit. According to one of them, extraordinary gifts were bestowed by him, and at his pleasure; according to another, he can be grieved by worthless speech on the part of believers; and, according to a third, he can be provoked to anger by their rebellion. It must also be observed, that the relative pronoun, ὃς, in Eph. i. 14, represents the Spirit as a person. This reading is retained by Tischendorf, Tregelles, Meyer, Ellicott, and is undoubtedly correct. Had Paul regarded the Spirit as a mere influence, I think he would have used the neuter relative.

Hence the Holy Spirit cannot be simply a power or energy emanating from God the Father; for such an energy has no will of its own, but is directed by him who puts it forth.

We conclude, therefore, from these texts, that there is a personal distinction between the Father and the Holy Spirit.

But against this conclusion it has been urged, —

1. That God the Father is declared to be the efficient cause of all extraordinary powers and works (for example, 1 Cor. xii. 6).

Reply. We think the essential unity of the Godhead a sufficient reason for this. The one infinite Being operates with undivided energy in each person of the Trinity. The Father is not idle in the economy of salvation, but works in and through the Son and the Spirit, who are officially subordinate to him. Hence all their working may properly be referred to him, without denying their free, personal, omnipotent agency.

2. That the Holy Spirit is often called the Spirit of God (for example, 1 Cor. xii. 3).

Reply. So, too, is he called the Spirit of Christ (for example, Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; 1 Peter i. 10, 11; Acts xvi. 7; Phil. i. 19). He may have been designated by the term, "Spirit," because of the special work which he performs in the hearts of men. Moreover, we cannot say that the phrase, "Spirit of God," indicates a more perfect union or identity of the Father and the Spirit than really exists according to the Trinitarian hypothesis. But this objection suggests that the Being who is often called Holy Spirit in the New Testament may be the same who is called Spirit of God in the Old Testament.

3. That the Holy Spirit is represented as being the same to God which man's spirit is to man (for example, 1 Cor. ii. 11).

Reply. We believe this statement too strong. Paul asserts that God is fully known by his Spirit only, — just as a man is known by his own spirit. This is the particular resemblance insisted on by the apostle; and we are not authorized to enlarge it by affirming that God's Spirit bears the same relation in other respects to the divine nature which the spirit of a man does to human nature.

We see no good reason, therefore, to doubt the correctness of our conclusion, as stated above.

In regard, however, to the whole doctrine of the Trinity, it may be well for us to take the advice of Augustine to Consentius, ii. p. 458, ep. 120: "Nunc vero tene inconcussa fide, Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum esse Trinitatem, et tamen unum Deum; non quod sit eorum communis quasi quarta divinitas, sed quod sit ipsa ineffabiliter inseparabilis Trinitas. . . . Et quidquid tibi, cum ista cogitas, corporeæ similitudinis occurrerit, abige, abnue, nega, respue, abjice, fuge. Non enim parva est inchoatio cognitionis Dei, si antequam possimus nosse quid sit, incipiamus jam nosse quid non sit."

Yet it is possible to deny too much, as well as to affirm too much, in respect to the Trinity. The Rev. Joseph Cook errs, perhaps, in the former direction. His definition of the Trinity is as follows: "1. The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are one God. 2. Each has a peculiarity incommunicable to the others. 3. Neither is God without the others. 4. Each with the others is God." This definition is in itself unobjectionable on the positive side; but it allows of the following denials, which seem to us out of harmony with the New Testament: "In God are not three wills, three consciences, three intellects, three sets of affections."—"He is one substance, and in that substance are three subsistencies; but the subsistencies are not individualities." We do not like the word individualities, as applied to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; but we are satisfied that the New Testament represents them as personal beings. It shows that the distinction between them is of a personal nature. For it teaches (a) that the personal pronouns—I, thou, he, we, they—are applicable to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit,—separately or collectively,—three egos, or consciousnesses. (b) That the Son is said to do the will of the Father, and the Spirit to be sent by the Father and the Son,—three centres or faculties of voluntary action. (c) That the Father knows the Son and all that he does, while the Son knows the Father and all that he does; and the Holy Spirit knows the very depths of God,—three centres of knowledge. (d) That the Father loves the Son, and the Son the Father; while the Holy Spirit is grieved at the coldness of Christians,—three sets of affections. Here, then, we are taught that the Father, Son, and Spirit do have personal distinctions, — three faculties of will, three faculties of knowing, three sets of affections ; or, in a word, three personal centres, three consciousnesses. Objectively, and in respect to the universe, their knowledge, will, conscience, and affection are one in comprehension and aim ; subjectively, each is personally, though not in substance, distinguishable from the other.

III. IDENTITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT AND THE SPIRIT OF GOD.¹

We infer that the terms, "Holy Spirit," and "Spirit of God," as used by the sacred writers, are frequently, and perhaps generally, equivalent, from those passages :—

1. Which interpret the latter appellation by the former (for example, Acts ii. 16, sq. (cf. Joel iii. 1–5) ; (Acts x. 38 ; (cf. Luke iv. 18 ; and Isa. lxi. 1, 2) ; see also Mark xii. 36).

2. Which ascribe the same functions to the Holy Spirit, and to the Spirit of God. For example,—

(1) That of quickening the understanding of men for important service (John xi. 51 ; Rom. xii. 6–8 ; 1 Cor. xii. 28, (cf. verse 7) ; Ex. xxxi. 3, 6 ; xxxv. 31, 35 ; 1 Kings iii. 7–12 ; iv. 26 ; Jud. iii. 10 ; vi. 34 ; 1 Sam. xi. 6 ; xvi. 14).

(2) That of inspiring men to teach the will of God. (John xiv. 26 ; xv. 26 ; xvi. 13 ; Luke i. 67 ; Acts xxi. 11 ; 2 Peter i. 21 ; 2 Sam. xxiii. 2 ; 2 Chron. xx. 14 ; Ezek. xi. 5 ; Micah iii. 8 ; and Jud. vi. 34 ; 1 Chron. xii. 18 ; 2 Chron. xxiv. 20 (cf. Luke xxiv. 49).

(3) That of working directly in their hearts, to sanctify them (Rom. v. 5 ; xv. 16 ; John xvi. 8–12 ; iii. 3–8 ; Ps. li. 8–14).

R. It would, perhaps, be going too far, were we to affirm that the phrase, "Spirit of God," as used in the Bible, refers uniformly and distinctively to the Holy Spirit. It may be employed in some instances without any reference to personal distinctions of the Trinity; and it was doubtless generally employed by the Old Testament prophets without any definite idea of its reference to a particular person of the Godhead.

¹ Kleinert (P.) "Zur alttestamentlichen Lehre vom Geiste Gottes"; "Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie," XII s. 3 ff. ; Kahnis (K. F. A.) "Die biblische Bedeutung des Wortes Geist"; Wörner () "Das Verhältniss des Geistes zum Sohne Gottes"; "Die Bedeutung des heiligen Geistes bezüglich der Auferstehung des Leibes und des ewigen Lebens"; Guers () "Der heilige Geist nach seiner Lehre und nach seinem Werk."

B. THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Some theologians, founding their arrangement of topics on the doctrine of the Trinity, characterize the present dispensation as that of the Spirit; and under "The Work of the Spirit" treat of conviction, regeneration, sanctification, and the means of grace. But objections to this analysis may be found (a) in the fact that justification was not regarded by the apostles as distinctively a work of the Spirit; (b) in the prominence which was given by them to the preaching of Christ and him crucified, as leading to repentance and faith; and (c) in the position which they assigned to Christ as the actual Head of the kingdom of grace.

Yet it will be seen at a glance that if the actual redemption of the elect is not discussed under "The Work of the Holy Spirit," this topic may be treated very briefly; since nearly all that may properly be said upon it has either been anticipated in speaking of the divine authority and inspiration of the Scriptures, or will be embraced necessarily in a discussion of the subjects comprehended in "the doctrine of redemption," — the word "redemption" being used to signify the application of the atonement to those who are saved.

It will therefore be sufficient to mention in this place the several topics that belong to a full discussion of "The Work of the Spirit"; while the treatment of them will be found under other heads. These topics are as follows: The Work of the Holy Spirit, —

I. In Conviction. John xvi. 8–11; Rev. xxii. 17; (cf. Gen. vi. 3; Acts vii. 51).

II. In Regeneration (John iii. 5, 6, 8; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Peter i. 2).

III. In Sanctification (Gal. v. 22; Rom. xii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3, 9; Rom. viii. 13).

IV. In Inspiration (Num. xi. 24-29; Jud. iii. 10; vi. 34; Micah iii. 8; John xvi. 13).

V. In Imparting other Gifts. 1 Cor. xii. 8-11; xiv. 1-34; (cf. Ex. xxxi. 2, 3; xxxv. 31 sq.; 1 Sam. xi. 6).

CHAPTER THIRD.

DOCTRINE OF REDEMPTION.

THE topics to be considered in this chapter are three; namely, Regeneration, Justification, Sanctification.

I. REGENERATION. In studying this subject, we shall endeavor to ascertain from the Scriptures the nature of the spiritual change called regeneration, the author of that change, the means with the use of which it is effected, the antecedents to it in the human soul, and the first fruits of it in experience.¹

I. THE NATURE OF REGENERATION.

Before attempting to define the change in question, it will be necessary to examine some of the terms which are used by the sacred writers to denote it.

(1) The word παλιγγενεσία employed by Paul in Titus iii. 5, is derived from παλιν and γένεσις, and signifies a "new birth," "another birth"; setting forth the event of birth, however, in a perfectly general, abstract manner, as another coming to be, without any reference to father or mother. The word ἀναγεννάω, used in 1 Peter i. 3, 23, is from ἀνά and γεννάω, and signifies, properly, "to beget again," of course as a father; yet this definite sense sometimes gives place to the more general one of bringing a child into existence. The word γεννάω, used in John i. 13; iii. 3, 5-8; 1-John ii. 29; iii. 9; iv. 7; v. 1, 4, 18, signifies, properly, "to beget, as a father"; but it is also predicated of a mother, though rarely, — meaning, "to bring a child into being," — "to bring forth" (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 15; Gal. iv. 19). Joined with ἀνοθεν, ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος, ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ,¹ it denotes the new birth. Hence these three words affirm, in the passages cited, the origination of a new or second life of man, — a life on which he never enters by natural birth. As to this particular life, they presuppose him to have been previously non-existent.

¹ Owen (J.) "On the Holy Spirit," B. III.; Hodge (C.) "Essays and Reviews," p. 1 sq.; Wines (E. C.) "On Regeneration"; Phelps (A.) "The New Birth"; Fuller (A.) "Works," Vol. III. 776; Vol. II. 411, 461, 463, 515, 518; Woods (L.) "Works," Vol. III. p. 1 sq.; Witsius (H.) Part I. cc. 5, 6; Charnock (S.) "Works," Vol. II. p. 1 sq.; Winer (B.) "The Creeds of Christendom," p. 145 sq.; Anderson (W.) "Treatise on Regeneration," Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, "Regeneration," p. 267, sq.; Bunyan (J.) "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners"; "Pilgrim's Progress," and "Holy War."

(2) But this is not the only view taken by the sacred writers. Sometimes the previous state is represented as one of death; and the event in question as bringing the dead to life. — (See Rom. vi. 4, 5, 8, 11, 13; Eph. ii. 5, 6; Gal. ii. 19, 20.) In the passages cited from his Epistle to the Romans, Paul speaks of Christians as walking in "newness of life, — καινότητι ζωῆς; and as "alive from the dead," — ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας. In the one from his letter to the Ephesians, he says that "God made us, being dead in sins, alive with Christ," &c. The moral quickening of believers is here conceived of as involved in the reanimation of Christ (cf. Rom. viii. 29, 30; 2 Cor. v. 15), as also their resurrection and exaltation in his (cf. Rom. i. 4). In the one from his Epistle to the Galatians, he refers to the change in question as double, — as dying to the law; that is, to self-righteousness, self-confidence, or self as supreme, and as coming into possession of a new life, which has God for its end, and Christ, instead of the human ego, as supreme. His language agrees with the view, that, in the unrenewed heart, self holds the place which belongs to God. The passage in his Epistle to the Romans, vi. 2–14, also refers to this double change in regeneration, or rather to the two aspects or sides of the change.

(3) Still another view of the apostle deserves attention. He represents the event before us as a creation, and the result of it as a new creature, — (See 2 Cor. v. 17): "So that, if any one is in Christ, he is a new creature (καινὴ κτίσις); the old things passed away: behold all things have become new" (cf. Gal. vi. 15; also Eph. ii. 10). — "For we are his workmanship (ποίημα), created (κτισθέντες) in Christ Jesus unto good works (ἔργοις)." And iv. 24: "Put on the new man, who was created after God (τὸν κατὰ θεὸν κτισθέντα) in the righteousness and holiness of truth." So likewise in Col. iii. 9, 10: "Lie not one to another; seeing that ye put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new, who is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of Him who created him," — κατ' εἰκόνα τοῦ κτίσαντος αὐτόν.

¹ John iii. 3, 6; 1 John iii. 9.

(4) No less instructive is another view of the apostles. They teach that, by regeneration, men pass from a state of darkness or blindness to one of light or vision. Thus 1 Peter ii. 9: "But ye are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for a possession; that ye should show forth the virtues of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." And in Eph. v. 8: "For ye were once darkness, but now light in the Lord: walk as children of light." Also in Acts xxvi. 18: "To open their eyes, that they may turn from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." (cf. 1 John ii. 9, 10).

(5) Another view is that of men being drawn or called to Christ. Thus John vi. 44: "No one can come to me, except the Father, who sent me, draw him" (cf. xii. 32). And 1 Cor. i. 24: "But to those who are the called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (cf. ver. 26, and Rom. viii. 28, 30). The calling referred to in these and similar passages is internal and effectual (cf. John v. 25-29; xi. 43).

According to the passages which we have examined, the change in question certainly takes place in the spirit of man, originating what is absolutely new in that spirit, — what is vital, active, powerful; what is morally right and good, like the Holy Spirit, or like God; what appreciates God and truth, swaying the soul to him as the supreme good. We know not how to describe this new element of life in the spirit better than by calling it a holy disposition, or a disposition to holy action; for it renders obedience to the holy will of God spontaneous and delightful.

Hence regeneration may be described as a change in the soul of man, by which a disposition to holy action is originated, and in which such action begins.

Some would prefer to describe it as a change by which a predominant love of God takes the place of a predominant love of self. And others would prefer to consider it a fundamental and permanent choice of the soul, by which the glory of God is made the great end of life.

But the first and second definitions are preferable to the third. (a) Because moral renovation is often described by the sacred writers as a change of heart or affection (Deut. xxx. 6; Jer. xxiv. 7; xxxi. 33; Ezek. xi. 19; xviii. 31; xxxvi. 26; Heb. viii. 10). (b) Because sin and holiness are both traced to the heart as their source (Ps. lxxviii. 18, 37; Matt. xxii. 37; Rom. x. 10; Ps. xcv. 10; Matt. xv. 18, 19; Acts v. 3; viii. 21; Rom. xiii. 10; Ps. xxiv. 4; Matt. v. 8; 1 Tim. i. 5; 1 Peter i. 22; 1 John iv. 7, 8). (c) Because it best accounts for the sudden change in the balance of our affections at conversion (1 Peter i. 3, 22, 23; 1 John iii. 9; ii. 29; iv. 7; v. 1, 4, 18; John iii. 3-8; Eph. ii. 8, 10; John i. 12, 13).

All these passages, unless John i. 12, 13, be an exception, suppose that regeneration is followed by the new affections. In this single instance, the usual order of sequence is apparently reversed, and faith is supposed to be made the condition of regeneration, and therefore prior to it. But if ἐξουσίαν here signifies the right or privilege of sonship, it is a right which may presuppose faith as the work of the Spirit in regeneration, — a work apart from which no genuine faith exists in the soul.

But it is possible that John means to say that, in the case of all who received Christ, their power to believe was given to them by him. Note the order of the words in the original passage, by which the emphasis falls on the word gave. Yet the former interpretation is perhaps preferable to the latter, though the position of the word "gave," and the tenor of the whole passage, require us to suppose that divine grace was the great fact which filled the writer's soul.

We have put in our definition the words, "and in which such action begins," because the first exercise of a right moral disposition takes place, as a rule, at the very instant of its origin. But we do not know that this is true in the case of those who are regenerated in infancy. The change may, indeed, be effected just when the spirit is leaving the body, and opening its eye to the realities of another world. We are not, however, aware of any good reason for believing this to be the fact; nor, on the other hand, are we aware of any good reason for believing it not to be the fact.

II. THE AUTHOR OF REGENERATION.

1. The Scriptures affirm, that, as a matter of fact, God is the author of the change in question (1 Peter i. 3; James i. 18; John i. 13; Rom. xii. 3; 1 John iii. 9; v. 1, 18; Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26; Jer. xxiv. 7; xxxi. 33; Deut. xxx. 6). The testimony of these passages, taken with that of others referred to in speaking of the nature of regeneration, is too exact and clear to admit of any doubt! It is not, then, by an act of his own will that any man is truly renewed in the temper of his mind, but by the will and grace of God.

2. Again the Scriptures affirm, that the change in question is effected by the Holy Spirit. (John iii. 5, 6; Tit. iii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 3, 9, 13; Rom. viii. 2-11; Gal. v. 5 (cf. Rom. xi. 3; 1 Peter i. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 13). And the fact that it is often ascribed to God is no valid objection to the view that it is always wrought by the Holy Spirit; for the Holy Spirit is God. In like manner creation is ascribed to God; while it appears from several unequivocal declarations of Scripture that all things were brought into existence by the immediate agency of the Word.

(a) There can be no appreciable period in any man's life when he is neither for Christ nor against him,—when his religious state is strictly neutral. Hence the work of regeneration must be pronounced instantaneous. There must be a moment when the new life begins,—a point of time before which it was not, and after which it was.

(b) The Holy Spirit is not perceived by the consciousness of man at the instant of regeneration ; or, indeed, at any other time. The effect of his presence is perceived ; and that effect is of such a nature as to be referred with full confidence to his working. Penitence for sin, trust in Christ, and joy in the Lord are represented as fruits of the Spirit ; and one who is conscious of these feelings may be sure that the Spirit is at work in his soul.

(c) All resistance of the Spirit may therefore be defined more exactly as resistance of those truths, views, convictions, or feelings which are known to be from him. One who resists his messengers rejects him ; one who attempts to smother feelings or convictions which may be rationally ascribed to his action does the same.

(d) There is no reason to believe that the regenerating action of the Spirit is assisted by the will of man. The subject of this saving change never co-operates with God in originating it, though some have asserted that he does. In other words, the synergistic theory is unscriptural.

(e) Yet the action of the Holy Spirit in regeneration does not conflict with the freedom of the human will, does not violate the laws, nor abridge the liberty of the soul, any more than did the action by which it was brought into existence. Indeed, we suppose that the soul is, in most instances, intensely active at the time of regeneration, — active with reference to the work of Christ, or its own sinfulness, or the love of God. It sees the evil of sin ; it cries for mercy ; it trusts in Christ ; and it does all these freely or voluntarily, under the influence of the Spirit.

III. Relation of Christian Truth to Regeneration.

This is a topic of no little difficulty, and must be carefully examined. There are a few passages, —

1. Which speak of truth as the means employed in effecting this spiritual change (for example, 1 Peter i. 23 ; James i. 18 ; 1 Cor. iv. 15). The first of these may be translated thus : “ Being born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." Here the term "seed" may refer to the Holy Spirit, and the term "word" to the gospel. In favor of this interpretation may be urged (a) The difference between the prepositions translated "from" and "through"; (b) The use elsewhere of another word from the same root as the term translated "seed," to denote the Holy Spirit, or the holy disposition which is sustained by his action in the soul. — (See 1 John iii. 9). And (c) The analogy of other statements concerning regeneration. If this passage represents the "word" as the source from which regeneration proceeds, it stands alone.

Dorner (J. A.) favors the opinion, that, by "the word of God" is here meant Christ himself, who is conceived of in this clause as the one by whom regeneration is effected. He is called the Word of God, because he is the One by whom God has revealed himself. To him the participles "living" and "abiding" are of course applicable in a literal sense.¹

The second passage may be translated strictly: "Of his own will, he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures." The word of truth is here represented as the means by which the new birth is completed; and the new life is conceived of, we think, as having its source in God, or the will of God, but as brought into conscious being by the word of truth. This interpretation accords with the use of ἀποκύει in verse 15, where it refers to the very last stage of the process of generation or birth.

1 Cor. iv. 15: "For in Jesus Christ I begot you through the gospel." Here the words, "in Christ Jesus," point to the source of the new birth; "through the gospel," to the means by which it was accomplished; while the pronoun "I" refers to the agent who used the means.² The quickening element or power in which the spiritual generation was effected was Christ, or the Spirit of Christ;³ but the new life was not brought to light without the gospel.

¹ See "History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ." Introduction.

² Cf. 1. Cor. ii. 4, 5; Gal. iv. 19.

³ Cf. Rom. viii. 9, 10.

There are also passages :—

2. Which seem to imply that truth is the means of regeneration (for example, Rom. x. 17; Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15).

The last two verses referred to are not indeed very definite, and would prove no more than this, that the gospel must be received in faith by all who are saved through Christ. And this might be true, if regeneration were effected by the direct and single agency of the Spirit. But the first seems to go a little further,—"So, then, faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of God." There can be no reason to doubt that Christian faith is always dependent on Christian truth as its proximate cause or occasion; and this is all that the apostle's language teaches.

It is, then, a doctrine of Scripture, that religious truth is, in some sense, a means of the new birth, and in a sense obvious and certain a means of faith, love, hope, and every Christian feeling.¹

Hence it is held by many that the Holy Spirit does not act directly on the soul of man, but only mediately through the truth. The heart is really changed by the word, which the Spirit applies with infinite skill.

Another view is, that the Holy Spirit energizes the word of truth,—makes it vital, infuses into it a mysterious power to pierce and purify the soul.

But neither of these views is altogether satisfactory. We object to the former; namely, that the Spirit simply preaches the truth with infinite skill, (a) because it appears to have no clear support in the language of Scripture. The word of God is indeed called "the sword of the Spirit" (Eph. vi. 17); but the meaning of the apostle is, that "the word of God" is to be used by Christians as a sword given to them by the Spirit (Rom. x. 17; 1 Cor. iv. 15). Whether the Spirit himself uses it, he does not say. But the language of Luke, in Acts xvi. 14, suggests that it is the work of the Spirit to open the heart to receive the gospel as preached by men. (β) Because the sinfulness of men is not due to their ignorance of the truth, but to their rejection and hatred of it and of its holy author (Rom. i. 18, sq). (γ) Because the Christian has no such knowledge of the process of regeneration as this theory would suggest. He is conscious of the change, but not of its being wrought by the force of truth. (δ) Because men are not generally conscious of any peculiar combination, or skilful application of truth to their minds, at the moment of conversion. It is often an old and common truth, which engages their thought, uttered perhaps by a friend's voice, or recalled and pondered in the field.

¹ Müller (J.) "Abhandlungen," IV. "Das Verhältniss zwischen der Wirksamkeit des h. Geistes und dem Gnadenmittel des göttlichen Wortes," 127-277; Woods (L.) "Works," Vol. III., p. 1 sq.; Wardlaw (R.) "Systematic Theology," Vol. III.; Phelps (A.) "The New Birth; or, the Work of the Holy Spirit," p. 103 sq.; Owen (J.) "A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit," p. 135 sq.; Hodge (C.) "Systematic Theology," II. 639 sq., III. 3 sq.; Dagg (J. L.) "Manual of Theology," p. 277 sq.; Baird (S. J.) "The Elohim Revealed," p. 863 sq.

As to the second theory, that Christian truth is filled with divine energy by the Spirit dwelling in it at the moment of regeneration, the following may be said:—

(a) That it is impossible to conceive of truth as charged with any other power than that which it has as truth. But if it were charged with a power distinct from its own, that power must act in its own way on the soul; it cannot change the nature of truth, or give to it more than its own efficiency.¹

(β) That the effect of Christian truth on a human soul, at any time, must depend on the permanent nature and momentary condition of that soul, together with the adaptation of the truth to its nature in that condition.

(γ) That any thing which predisposes the soul to heed or believe that truth may be said to co-operate with it, and impart to it an effectiveness which it would not otherwise have.

¹ Says Dr. Wardlaw, "That it (the influence of the Spirit) must be upon the mind, and not upon the truth, is quite evident. The latter description of influence is utterly unintelligible,—words without meaning. The truth is the truth,—incapable of alteration, incapable of being affected by any, even a divine influence. It must be on the perceiving mind that the influence comes."—"Sys. Theol." III. p. 24, 25.

(d) That the earnestness, sincerity, and love of the human preacher do often thus co-operate with divine truth, making it more effective than it would otherwise be. In other words, the manifest effect of truth on the speaker's heart may enkindle interest and awaken confidence in that truth on the part of the hearer. But this is something quite different from an energizing of the truth itself; and it wholly fails to justify the statement of Prof. Phelps, that "truth energized by the Holy Spirit may take possession of a man impetuously; so that, whether he is in the body or out of the body, he cannot tell."¹

How, then, is the instrumentality of truth in regeneration to be reconciled with the direct agency of the Spirit in effecting it? It has been supposed, —

1. That regeneration is effected by the joint action of the Holy Spirit and of Christian truth. This truth, when it enters the mind of a moral being, has, it is said, a certain tendency to give it a right moral bias or disposition; but its force is not sufficient to overcome the resistance which is encountered in the depraved heart of man. Hence the need of some further and greater influence from without; and this is afforded by the agency of the Spirit, co-operating with the truth. Both act in the same way for the production of exactly the same thing; namely, a right disposition. This view is certainly plausible; but it does not satisfy us.

(a) Because it co-ordinates the action of Christian truth with that of the Holy Spirit; while the Scriptures represent truth as only a means or instrument, but the Spirit as a generator or source of the new life.

(b) Because the action of truth is under the eye of consciousness, while that of the Spirit is not. It is, therefore, difficult to believe that they act in the same way. One convinces, persuades; the other works graciously in the unseen depths of the soul.

(c) Increase of religious knowledge appears to have in itself no tendency to change hatred of God into love. God as a holy

¹ "The New Birth," p. 131. — Compare Rev. i. 10; iv. 2; xvii. 3; Ezek. ii. 2; iii. 12, 14, 24; xi. 24, which ascribe such an effect to the Spirit, but not to truth.

Sovereign, Christ as a vicarious sacrifice, and pardon as an unmerited favor are offensive to an unregenerate mind. We do not deny that truth has power to rouse the conscience, to awaken human sympathy, and to lead men to much that is commendable in human conduct; but it does not make them hate sin as such, nor love God as a holy Sovereign, nor delight in pardon on terms that humble self.

2. That regeneration, or the new birth, includes the first conscious working of the new life; that it has a conscious as well as an unconscious side, both of which are necessary to its completion. The principle of life, the new disposition, is given by the Holy Spirit; but the action of this bias, or spiritual life, as required by God, and experienced by us, is absolutely dependent on truth. There can be no holy desire, affection, or volition, except in view of truth. The conscious image of Christ in the soul is produced by the word of God. The Holy Spirit makes the soul sensitive to the light of truth at the very instant when that light, pouring in upon it, originates as a means the visible image of Christ, — the new life of faith and love. It is the action of the spirit which prepares the plate; it is the influence of truth which brings out the picture. The soul must be made susceptible, or the light of truth falls upon it in vain. The work of the Spirit is the logical antecedent of that of the word: both, however, act at the same time.¹

This view seems to be correct, — supported by Scripture, and reason, and experience.

Note. — The divine side of the change in question might have been called "regeneration"; the human side, "conversion"; and both united, "change of mind," — that is μετάνοια; but the sacred writers made use of popular language.

But we must consider another point. Many believe that regeneration is effected by, or in baptism, regarded as a sacrament. According to the Council of Trent, Sessio VII., "the most holy sacraments of the Church" are the means "per quæ omnis vera justitia vel incipit, vel cæpta augetur, vel amissa reparatur." Moreover, an anathema is pronounced on every one who affirms that the "sacramenta novæ legis non continere gratiam, quam significant, aut gratiam ipsam non ponentibus obicem non conferre, quasi signa tantum externa sint acceptæ per fidem gratiæ vel justitiæ," &c. So, too, an anathema is pronounced against every one who says that "children, because they do not exercise faith, are not, when baptized, to be reckoned among the faithful," &c.¹

¹ See Principal Cunningham's "Historical Theology," Vol. I. p. 350.

According to the Augsburg Confession, the Lutherans "de baptismo docent, quod sit necessarius ad salutem, quodque per baptismum offeratur gratia Dei: et quod pueri sint baptizandi, qui per baptismum obliti Deo recipiantur in gratiam Dei. Damnant Anabaptistas, qui improbant baptismum puerorum et affirmant pueros sine baptismo salvos fieri."²

In the Liturgy of the Church of England for the public baptism of infants, the minister, after baptizing the infant, is required to say, "We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock": and still further, "Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church, let us give thanks unto Almighty God for these benefits," &c.³

It seems to us evident that the Evangelical or Low Church wing of the English Episcopalians holds a false position, and is losing influence year by year, as compared with the High Church wing, and no less so as compared with the advocates of the Broad Church theory. The language of the Liturgy teaches plainly the doctrine of baptismal regeneration; and those who maintain it have an advantage, in the Church of England, over those who oppose it, — similar to that which

¹Cf. "Catechismus Romanus," p. 2, c. II. s. 5; Perrone (J.) "Tractatus de Baptismo," in "Prælectiones Theologicæ"; Verriën (E.) "Infant Baptism in case of Danger"; the work is in French, and treats especially of ante-natal baptism, as authorized and practised by Romanists.

²Cf. "Catechismus Minor," IV. 6, 12.

³"Tracts for the Times," Vol. II. No. 76; III. 76; Wilberforce (R. I.) "The Doctrine of Holy Baptism," &c.; Goode (W.) "The Doctrine of the Church of England as to the Effects of Baptism in the case of Infants"; Mozley (J. B.) "The Primitive Doctrine of Bap. Regeneration."

Baptists have over those who reject their view of apostolic baptism.

Before considering the passages which are alleged in support of this belief, it will be proper to weigh the following facts, namely :—

1. In the apostolic age, baptism was preceded by repentance, faith, &c. — (See Acts ii. 37–41 ; viii. 12 ; xvi. 14, 31–33 ; xviii. 8 (cf. Matt. xxviii. 19 ; Mark xvi. 16 ; Matt. iii. 1–11 ; Mark i. 4, 5 ; Luke iii. 8.) For the import of the expression, “works or fruits meet for repentance,” see Acts xxvi. 20, and compare Luke xxiii. 41, and 2 Macc. iv. 25.

2. Persons were sometimes filled with the Holy Spirit, — that is, baptized in the Holy Spirit, and so endowed with miraculous gifts before baptism (Acts x. 44–48). These gifts, as a rule, presuppose regeneration, and furnish credible evidence of it ; hence they were said to justify baptism.

3. Baptism is described by the apostle Peter as “the answer of a good conscience” (1 Peter iii. 21) ; but a good conscience is a fruit of regeneration (1 Tim. i. 5, 19 ; iii. 9 (cf. 2 Tim. i. 3) ; Heb. ix. 14 ; x. 22 ; xiii. 18).

4. Administering the ordinance of baptism was esteemed by Paul subordinate to the work of preaching (1 Cor. i. 17, 18, 21). This is very evident, not only from the language found in the verses here cited, but also from the way in which he generally refers to the work of preaching.

5. This apostle claims to have begotten the Corinthian Christians by the gospel ; while he disclaims baptizing them, except in a few instances. — (See 1 Cor. iv. 15 ; i. 14, 15.) This is decisive.¹

With these facts before us, we turn to the passages which have been supposed to teach the doctrine of baptismal regeneration (namely John iii. 5 ; Tit. iii. 5 ; Eph. v. 26 ; and 1 Peter iii. 21 ; Acts xxii. 16). On the first three of these texts, we remark :—

¹ “Baptist Quarterly,” Vol. IV. pp. 239, 240 ; Mellor (E.) “Priesthood in the Light of the New Testament,” p 32 sq. ; “Ecclesia : Second Series,” “Baptismal Regeneration.”

(1) If they refer at all to the rite of baptism, they do not prove the doctrine of baptismal regeneration; for it may be truly said that baptism is the symbol of regeneration,— the prescribed expression for it; and no true Christian of the first age could have thought of any substitute for it in acknowledging the change which had been wrought in his soul. The inward change and the outward expression of it must have been very closely united in the minds of Christians. Each would suggest the other; and forms of speech would be transferred from one to the other.

Hence Christ, in his discourse with Nicodemus, virtually said, "To be a true member of my earthly kingdom, you must be born again, ritually and spiritually; you must submit to the rite of baptism, and experience a renovation of heart by the Spirit of God; you must not only confess me openly in the prescribed way, which you are unwilling to do, but must also be the subject of a great spiritual change effected by the power of God" (cf. Rom. x. 9 for the same order of thought; it is the rhetorical instead of the logical order).

In the Epistles to Titus and the Ephesians, Paul blends the inward change with the outward expression of it, even as he does also in Rom. vi. 2 sq., and Col. ii. 11, 12. The two he regarded as practically inseparable: true belief in Christ involved the prescribed expression of it, and vice versa.

If this be the correct interpretation of these passages, they agree in sense with 1 Peter iii. 21, and Acts xxii. 16. Prof. Hodge remarks, that, "when any declaration or service is the appointed means of professing faith or obedience, making such declaration, or performing such service, is said to secure the blessings which are promised to the faith thereby professed" ("Way of Life," p. 267). To understand such language, it is only necessary to bear in mind, that, in the apostolic age, it was, as a rule, indispensable, (1) To be baptized in the name of Christ, in order to confess him before men; and (2) to confess him before men, in order to be saved by him.— (See Matt. x. 32, 33; xii. 30; Luke xiv. 26, 27, 33.)

By the limiting clause, "as a rule," we design to accept such cases as follow: (a) those who had not bodily health or strength to be baptized; (b) those who could not find a suitable person to baptize them; (c) those who were prevented from receiving it by their parents; (d) those who were prevented solely by a distrust of their own piety. Baptism has never been a prerequisite to salvation, except as obedience to the known will of Christ is such a prerequisite.

(2) It is not certain that either of the first three passages refers to baptism. Neither of them contains the word which commonly denotes this rite. It may be that the work of the Spirit in regeneration is characterized figuratively as a cleansing, purifying work by the words "water," "bath," and "bath of water." This is a very obvious and natural interpretation of the passage in Titus; and scarcely less so of the words of Christ in John, and of Paul in his letter to the Ephesians.

IV. The Antecedents on the part of man to Regeneration.

These cannot be pointed out with entire accuracy; for no man who is a Christian can be sure as to all that preceded and accompanied regeneration in his own soul; yet experience, observation, and the word of God suggest a few things which commonly precede this radical change. They authorize us to say, that but few are regenerated save those, —

1. Who have some knowledge of the gospel. This may be inferred from the great commission (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15, 16), from the language of Paul (Rom. x. 17, 18), and from the history of mankind. We do not say that no man has been regenerated without hearing the gospel; but there is reason to suppose that comparatively few have been. The state of the heathen is deplorable.

2. Who give earnest heed to the gospel. God does not often impart the new life to a careless soul, — to one who pays no serious attention to the truth. It may be only for a short time; but generally, if not always, the unrenewed man takes hold of the word seriously before the decisive change.

3. Who are fully convinced of their own guilt (Acts ii. 37). It is true, that many who are converted at the present day seem to have but a faint sense of personal guilt before the change; but they have, we think, some sense of it: and they have no doubt whatever of their deep sinfulness. In former times, a deeper conviction of sin seems to have generally preceded a change of heart.

4. Who are truly anxious to be saved (Acts ii. 37; xvi. 30). "To be saved," we mean, from eternal death, from the penalty of sin, and perhaps from sin itself, as involving that penalty. Beyond this, the carnal heart does not go. It has no desire for God and holiness in themselves, and no hatred of sin as such. The conscience, indeed, condemns sin; but the heart loves it. Self cherishes self, and refuses to God his place. Men sometimes think they hate sin, as sin, before conversion; but we think they are mistaken. Certain forms of sin shock their sensibilities; but mere sin, as against God and right, they do not hate.

5. Who feel their need of help, in order to be saved. One who believes that he can do all that must be done to deliver himself from sin, and render himself acceptable to God, is not likely, while cherishing that belief, to be renewed by the Spirit of God. Men are commonly made to feel their need of divine help, before it is granted. Often they are led to the brink of despair, in their efforts to make themselves right, before the grace of God enters their hearts.

By calling these "antecedents," instead of conditions, we mean to guard against the following errors: (a) That, when realized, they place God under obligation to regenerate the soul; (b) that, when realized, they constitute the reason why he performs this work. Nothing which an impenitent man does establishes any claim to the mercy of God. He can plead no promise of renewing grace. His thinking, his anxiety, his fear, his sense of need, his prayer, all spring from a carnal heart, which has no real trust in Christ, or love to God (cf. Turretin, i. 318 sq.).

Nay, so far as we are informed by the language of Scripture, there is nothing which men do before regeneration which is uniformly followed by regeneration. Thus a man may become eligible to the presidency of the United States, by reaching the age of thirty years; but not every man who is thirty years old is made president of the United States. Again, the taking of a certain oath might be necessary to render one eligible to that office; but taking it would not therefore secure him the office. So the particulars named above may be antecedents of regeneration, and yet constitute no claim to it, nor even a sufficient or proper motive for it.

We are brought, therefore, face to face with the doctrine of election. There are doubtless good and sufficient reasons which move God to regenerate and save some men rather than others; but they are not revealed, and should not be sought with too eager a curiosity.

“But that soul in the heaven which is most pure,
That Seraph which his eye on God most fixes,
Could this demand of thine not satisfy;
Because so deeply sinks in the abyss
Of the eternal statute what thou askest,
From all created sight it is cut off.
And to the mortal world, when thou returnest,
This carry back, that it may not presume Longer tow’rd such a goal to move its feet.”

— Dante Paradiso, xxi. 90.

The Scriptures forbid us to find the reasons in question in the moral action of men before the new birth, and refer us merely to the sovereign will and mercy of God; in other words, they teach the doctrine of personal election on the part of God. — (See Jas. i. 18; 1 Peter i. 1–3; Gal. i. 15, 16; Eph. i. 4, 5, 9, 11; 2 Tim. i. 9; Rom. viii. 28, 30; ix. 11, 24; Acts xiii. 48; Rom. xi. 29; 1 Cor. i. 24, 26; Eph. i. 18; iv. 1; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Thess. i. 11; Matt. xxii. 1–14; xx. 14–16; xi. 20–22; Luke xiv. 15–24; John xv. 16.)¹

¹ Mozley (J. B.) “The Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination”; Woods (I.) “Works,” Vol. IV. pp. 39–63, and 231–267; Taylor (N. W.) “Revealed Theology,” pp. 378–9; Bunyan (J.) “The Jerusalem Sinner Saved,” “Complete Works in one Vol.” p. 322; Calvin (J.) “Institutio Christianæ Religionis,” III. cc. 21–24; Wardlaw (R.) “Systematic Theology,” Vol. II. pp. 485–549; Weiss (B.) “Die Prädestinationslehre des Apostel Paulus,” Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, II. s. 54 ff.; Winer (G. B.) “The Confessions of Christendom,” p. 162 sq.; Nemeyer (H. A.) “Collectio Confessionum,” &c., p. 218 sq.; “Consensus Genevensis: De Aeterna Dei Prædestinatione.”

In view of what the Saviour and his apostles clearly teach, it may be considered certain (a) That God has a sovereign right to bestow more grace upon one subject than upon another,—grace being unmerited favor (Matt. xx. 11–16; Rom. ix. 20, 21). (b) That God has been pleased to exercise this right in dealing with men (Ps. cxlvii. 20; xix. 9, 10, compared with 1–6; Rom. iii. 1, 2 (cf. i. 20); John xv. 16). (c) That God has some other reason than that of saving as many as possible for the way in which he distributes his grace (Matt. xi. 20–22; Rom. ix. 22–25).

It may also be remarked:—

1. That the action of God in electing, calling, justifying, and glorifying men is intelligent,—not blind. In this case, as in every other, he does what he knows it is best to do. He knows the personal qualities and circumstances of every man; and it may possibly be that the uses to which he can put certain persons, as vessels of grace, determines his selection of them. But this is merely a conjecture. All we know is, that he has good and sufficient reason for the choice he makes.—“Heus tu, caute de istis agas”—(Zwingle.)

2. That he elects from mankind certain persons to be renewed and saved by his grace. Why he takes these, rather than others, we are not informed; but it is an act of pure grace on his part. It is not because they are more worthy or less unworthy of his favor than others; nor because they have done any thing morally pleasing to him; nor because they will to be saved, and others do not: he only tells us that such is his good pleasure (Rom. viii. 28; Eph. i. 9–11; Rom. ix. 11, 15, 16).

3. That his purpose to save the elect includes the atonement of Christ, and their union with him. Apart from his person and work, God purposes to save no one; but union with Christ is made actual by faith: and faith presupposes the effectual calling or regenerating work of God by his Spirit (Eph. i. 4; ii. 5; 2 Tim. i. 9).¹

¹Says Augustine, “Non quia credimus, sed ut credamus, elegit nos: ne priores eum eligere dicamur” (De Prædest. Sanctor. ch. 8); “Apostolus gra-

4. That God's treatment of the non-elect is just. His right (Rom. ix. 20) to save some men, while he leaves others to reap the fruits of their own sin, is as perfect as that of the potter to mould his clay as he pleases, — either to a noble or a vile use. The lesson is not that "might makes right," but that God is morally entitled to glorify his righteousness or his mercy in disposing of a guilty race. By virtue of his relation to men, he has a right to bestow more good upon some than upon others, though the former are as undeserving as the latter.

Says Dörner, "The working of God on Pharaoh finds him already wicked, and only brings out what is latent. If wickedness takes place, the fault is in the wicked tools which God does not allow to stand idle. God indeed preserves the wicked; but he does not create within them a new element of wickedness."

If we understand the apostle in his letter to the Romans, he regards the hearts of all men as fully set in them to do evil, — as at enmity with God, and disobedient to his righteous will: hence all men are living under just condemnation to death for their sins. He also regards mankind as so bent upon evil, that all, with one consent, reject, or would reject, the offer of pardon, though presented with every gracious influence but that which regenerates the heart; and, in view of these facts, he pronounces it to be perfectly right for God to save none, or to save all; or to save some, and leave the rest to perish.

But, it is said, this doctrine of personal election is unequal, and therefore unfair; all those who are equally guilty ought to be dealt with alike; and God is no respecter of persons. To this we reply, We have no reason whatever to believe that God treats all moral beings or all men alike, — doing as much tiam præponit operibus, non ut opera extinguat, sed ut ostendat non esse opera præcedentia gratiam, sed consequentia. . . . Non enim ut ferbeat, calefacit ignis, sed quia fervet. Nec ideo bene currit rota, ut rotunda sit, sed quia rotunda est; sic nemo propterea bene operatur, ut accipiat gratiam, sed quia accipit." — (Ad. Sinepl. lib. 1.)

¹ "History of Protestant Theology," I. s. 210.

for one as for another. "What, then, is the advantage of the Jew? . . . Much every way." He had reason to bless God for distinguishing goodness; and so have all who know the gospel.¹

Besides, the truly good rejoice that other beings are wiser and better than they, even though this superiority is due to the hand of God. What benevolent heart would not be glad to know that other races of moral beings have been more highly endowed, and placed in more favorable conditions for persevering in virtue than our own? But, of all beings, culprits condemned to death have the least right to insist that they all must be treated alike; that no favor be granted to one that is not given to all. A government may consult its honor and safety in the treatment of rebels.

Yet it may be said, as a matter of fact, (a) That God offers his favor to all men on the same terms: the conditions of justification by law or by grace are the same for all. (b) That, when he deals with men as a Judge, it is according to their true character; the great and the wise fare no better than the feeble and the foolish. (c) That he takes account of their different circumstances in estimating the guilt of men.—(See Deut. x. 17; 1 Sam. xvi. 7; Job xxxiv. 19; 2 Chron. xix. 7; Acts x. 34, 35; Rom. ii. 11; Gal. ii. 6; Eph. vi. 9; Col. iii. 25; 1 Peter i. 17 (cf. Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 14; Luke xx. 21; Jas. ii. 1; Jude, 16).

v. First Fruits of Regeneration in Experience.

Of these, the most important are the following:—

1. Spiritual Discernment. This appears to precede in the order of nature every pious affection or volition. "In strictness of philosophical language, spiritual knowledge is distinct from faith, and precedes it. By knowledge, the object is furnished which is received by faith as true."² Yet it has sometimes been doubted whether the power of discerning religious truth is increased by direct agency, or only by indirect, — by the relish for truth implanted in the soul.

¹See Froude (J. A.) "Address on Calvinism," p. 5; Dante Paradiso, XXXII. 61 sq.

²Alexander (J. W.) See Wardlaw (R.) "Sys. Theol." II. 749. Dr. Payne defines faith, "The belief of the gospel; its meaning, evidence, and glory being unveiled to the mind by the Holy Spirit." Dr. Wardlaw's discussion is able. He makes spiritual discernment a condition of faith.

2. Christian faith. By this is meant a genuine trust in Christ as Saviour, — a trust which presupposes a belief in the testimony of the Scriptures respecting him. Faith is a receptive act, and is supposed by many to precede regeneration. But this surely is an error; for, as Schmid says, "All the apostles agree in this, that faith is mediated by a new birth from God."¹ Says Dr. Williams, "Faith in Christ is the very first outgush of the new-found spiritual life." The relation of faith to regeneration is one of great importance, and cannot be too carefully settled.

3. Christian love. By this we mean a supreme delight in God, as revealed by Jesus Christ; and, in general, a truly benevolent disposition. "The glory of God," says Charnock, "is the end of the new creature; self, the end of the old man" (Vol. II. p. 51).² Love is communicative, and is a higher grace than faith; for it is more blessed to give than to receive. The words ἀγαπάω and ἀγάπη are generally used by the writers of the New Testament to express Christian love. They signify good-will towards an object, united, for the most part, with delight in its qualities. Love to enemies is expressed by the word ἀγαπάω, but not by the word φιλέω.³

4. Christian hope. This relates to one's own salvation through Christ, and is logically subsequent to faith and love. It may be described in a word as anticipation, and it evidently held a prominent place in the experience of the apostles.¹

¹ See 1 John v. 1; Eph. ii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 3; Rom. xii. 3; v. 24; vi. 47 (cf. 1 John iii. 9, 14). Fuller (A.) "Works," II. pp. 118, 376, 377, 379 sq.; Anderson (W.) "Treatise on Regeneration," p. 116 sq.; Köstlin (J.) "Der Glaube: sein Wesen, Grund und Gegenstand, seine Bedeutung für Erkennen, Leben und Kirche;" Erskine (J.) "The Nature of Christian Faith," in "Theol. Tracts," Vol. II. p. 201 sq.

² See Barrows (I.) "Works," Vol. I. p. 238 sq.

³ French (R. C.) "The New Testament Synonymes," p. 38 sq. Yet I am in doubt whether this author has rightly explained John xxi. 15-17. See also Cremer (H.) "Biblisch-Theologisches Wörterbuch der New Testament Græcität," s. v. Ἀγάπη.

*Repentance*² is a comprehensive term, often used to signify the first spiritual emotions of the soul, in contrast with its former views or feelings; more strictly, mentem muto (in melius), and sometimes to denote especially, though not exclusively, contrition for sin, Acts xx. 21; xxvi. 20; viii. 22; 2 Cor. xii. 21 (cf. 7, 9, 10). It is never employed in the New Testament to express mere regret or remorse, without any change of moral bias.

* II. JUSTIFICATION.

The religious literature of the present day furnishes evidence of no little contempt, on the part of some zealous teachers, for the doctrine of justification through the work of Christ, imputed to those who believe in him. Yet this doctrine must stand; for it is founded on the clear testimony of Scripture, and is necessary to peace of conscience, in view of personal sin and of a holy law. In studying it, therefore, we are studying a central and most important truth, which cannot be too well understood by a follower of Christ.

There may be an objection to considering it in this place, on the ground that regeneration is the beginning of sanctification; and therefore the latter ought to be studied in immediate connection with the former. But to this it may be replied, that justification is connected and contemporaneous with faith, while an assurance of it promotes sanctification. Hence it is safe to follow the usual arrangement, and consider justification, before taking up the subject of sanctification.

The following topics belong to the doctrine in question: The nature of the act, the author of the act, the ground of the act, the condition on which it depends, and the reasonableness of it.³

¹ Kelber (L.) "Christliche Hoffnung," in "Jahrbücher," &c., Vol. X.; Zöckler "de vi ac notione vocis ἐλπίς in Novo Tnto."

² Μετάνοια. See Trench, ut supra, p. 241 sq. In composition meta denotes, 1, cum; 2, trans. (um.); 3, post. Wilkei Clavis, ed. by Grimm.

³ Owen (J.) "On Justification"; Buchanan (Ja.) "On Justification"; Preuss (E.) "Die Rechtfertigung des Sünders vor Gott, aus der heiligen Schrift dar-

I. THE NATURE OF JUSTIFICATION.

No one of the sacred writers makes use of this expression so frequently as the apostle Paul. Hence our knowledge of its meaning must come in a great measure from the study of his writings. The verb which is translated, to justify, occurs thirty-eight times in the New Testament, and mostly in books written by Paul, or by his companion, Luke. Thus (Matt. xi. 19; xii. 37; Luke ix. 29, 35; x. 29; xvi. 15; xviii. 14; Acts xiii. 39, twice; Rom. ii. 13; ix. 4, 20, 24, 26, 28, 30; iv. 2, 5; v. 1, 9; vi. 7; viii. 30, 33; 1 Cor. iv. 4; vi. 11; Gal. ii. 16, 17, four times; iii. 8, 11, 24; v. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Titus iii. 7; James ii. 21, 24, 25).

An impartial study of these passages, with others in the Old Testament where the corresponding Hebrew word occurs, will convince any one that it is properly a legal term, and signifies to pronounce one right or righteous before the law (Ex. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxv. 1; 2 Sam. xv. 4; 1 Kings viii. 32; Isa. v. 23; xliii. 9). It never signifies to make a person righteous, but always, for one reason or another, to declare him righteous.

Note, first, that it is used of the decisions of an earthly tribunal (Isa. v. 23; Deut. xxv. 1); and also of the decisions of the Supreme Ruler at the last day (Matt. xii. 37; Rom. ii. 13, 16). Secondly, that it is used as the opposite of condemnation (1 Kings viii. 32; Prov. xvii. 15; Matt. xii. 37; Rom. viii. 33, 34). And, thirdly, that it is used as virtually equivalent to the act of forgiving sins, or of not imputing iniquity (Acts xiii. 38, 39; Rom. iv. 6-8).

It is doubtless true that pardon and justification are separable in thought. Pardon assumes that there is guilt; justification says that there is none. But, in the case of sinners believing in Christ, the two are but different sides of the same act. For God pardons no one whom he does not at the same instant justify; and he justifies no one whom he does not at the same instant pardon. Hence the sacred writers use the terms as if they were equivalent; or, since one involves the other, they do not deem it necessary to mention them both in the same connection.—(See Mark i. 4; Luke i. 77; iii. 3; xxiv. 47; Acts ii. 38; v. 31; x. 43; xxvi. 18; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; and Luke xviii. 14; Rom. iii. 24; v. 9; viii. 30; Titus iii. 7).

gestellt"; Fuller (A.) "Works," I. 276; Bunyan (J.) "Justification by an Imputed Righteousness"; "Works," ed. by Geo. Offer, I. 300 sq.; Bushnell (H.) "The Vicarious Sacrifice," Part III. c. 7; Chalmers (T.) "Institutes of Theology," Vol. II.; Wardlaw (R.) "Sys. Theol." Vol. II. p. 678 sq.; Gerhard (J.) "Loci Theologici," T. III. L. XVI. p. 300 sq. ed. Preuss; Winer (G. B.) "Creeds of Christendom," p. 178 sq.

In the order of nature, pardon precedes justification; for a sinner cannot be pronounced righteous before the law until his sins have been forgiven; yet in time and effect they are inseparable and equal, though not the same.

It may be added, —

(a) That justification does not set one free from the law of God as a rule of duty (Rom. vi. 1, 14, 20; vii. 5, 7, 9; Gal. iii. 19), though it does set him free from it, as a rule by which he is to be finally acquitted or condemned. Antinomianism is a dangerous perversion of the doctrine of grace.

(b) That justification does not secure for one the same treatment in all respects which he would receive if he were free from personal sin. Bishop Devenant remarks, "God absolves the justified from all punishment that is retributive; but not from all that is chastening and medicinal."¹

(c) That pardon and justification are complete from the first moment of their existence. God does not forgive a part of the believer's sins, or pronounce him partially just before the law. He forgives all, and declares the pardoned sinner righteous, or free from condemnation.

Yet this statement is by no means inconsistent with the theory of continuous pardon and justification. The relation of the believer to Christ is ever dependent on a vital union between the two (1 Peter i. 5); and the blessing of justification may well be conceived of as being perpetually renewed. Hence David could pray for the pardon of his great sin (Ps. l.). Hence, likewise, all Christians ought daily to pray for the forgiveness of their sins (Matt. vi. 12); Preuss (E.) "Die Rechtfertigung des Sünders vor Gott,"—"Sechster Abschnitt: Beständige Vergebung," s. 119.

¹ Compare Heb. xii. 4 sq.

Hence the doctrine of the Papal Church on this subject must be rejected. For that Church teaches that "justification is not solely the remission of sins, but also the sanctification and renovation of the inner man, by a voluntary reception of grace and gifts"; and also that the "sacrament of baptism" is the "sacrament of faith,—without which (faith) no one is ever justified."¹ That is, justification is conditioned on faith; and faith is conditioned on baptism.

In other words, righteousness is infused into the heart by justification; so that men are pardoned and sanctified by the same act,—the forgiveness of sins advancing from one degree to another with the process of sanctification. This doctrine is manifestly unscriptural.

II. THE AUTHOR OF JUSTIFICATION.

According to the apostle who speaks most frequently of justification, it is to be looked upon as an act of God the Father.—"It is God that justifieth." It was God who "set forth Jesus Christ in his blood as a propitiation, for the exhibition of his righteousness, that he might be righteous and pronounce righteous him that believeth" (Rom. i. 17; iii. 21, 30; iv. 5; viii. 30, 33; x. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iii. 8).

And according to the same apostle, it is the grace of God which leads him to justify any. Even faith in Christ has no virtue in itself. As an affection or act of the soul, it is inferior to love; and neither of them is half as steady or fervid as it ought to be. As strongly as possible, therefore, does Paul assert that justification is an act of free grace to the sinner on the part of God. In himself, the believer has no claim to it. Rom. iii. 24; iv. 4, 16; v. 15; xi. 5, 6; Eph. i. 6, 7; (cf. John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 9, 10, 19; Acts xx. 24; 1 Cor. i. 4; Eph. ii. 7, 8; 2 Thess. ii. 16; Titus ii. 11).

¹"Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini," Sessio VI. Canones III., VI. VII.

And this view of the case is yet more obvious, when the act of God is simply denominated forgiveness of sins. For no one would think of himself as having a right to forgiveness; much less would any one who had a just conception of the dreadful guilt of sin dream that any thing in his own action could entitle him to pardon. Forgiveness, in order to be forgiveness, must be unmerited.

But, from another point of view, it is an act of righteousness (1 John i. 9): "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." For, in this passage, the faithfulness referred to is fidelity on the part of God to his promise; and righteousness is that attribute of God which insures such fidelity. In a certain sense, therefore, the penitent believer has a title or claim to the mercy of God, but not "in and of himself"; his title is in Christ, to whom he is joined by faith: and this brings us to another section.

III. THE GROUND OF JUSTIFICATION.

By this we mean the moral basis or sufficient reason for this act, — that in consideration of which the believer is justified. And this can only be the vicarious work of Christ, culminating in his death. This may be proved, —

1. By the direct testimony of God's Word (for example in Rom. iii. 24, 25; v. 9, 18, 19; Eph. i. 7; Gal. iii. 13).

The first of these passages describes men as justified "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus"; and this redemption is said to be in him, because the righteousness of God had been illustrated by his propitiatory death. In the second, men are represented as having been "justified in the blood of Jesus," who had died for them while they were sinners. In the third, it is said that "as through one trespass it came upon all men unto condemnation, so also through one righteous act it came upon all men unto justification of life." In Eph. i. 7, the apostle speaks of Christ as the one "in whom we have the redemption through his blood, — the remission of our trespasses"; and in Gal. iii. 13, he declares that "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us." It would be difficult to express the fact of justification through the vicarious death of Christ in plainer language than this.

2. By the indirect testimony of God's Word. Matt. xxvi. 28; 1 Cor. i. 30; xv. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. i. 4; Col. i. 14; Heb. ix. 22; 1 Peter ii. 24 (cf. Luke xxiv. 47; Acts ii. 38.)

The whole of our argument for the Godward efficacy of the atonement may be referred to in support of the statement which we have now made in respect to the ground of justification; and on this account it seems unnecessary to protract our investigation at this point. A review of that topic will afford ample evidence of the proposition above expressed.

IV. CONDITION OF JUSTIFICATION.

It has been shown that the proper ground or sufficient reason for justification is the vicarious death of Christ. But unbelief in Christ, as the Saviour of sinners, or a refusal to accept of pardon on account of his atonement, would be an insuperable obstacle to a sinner's justification; and, therefore, faith or trust in him is very properly said to be a condition of justification. Some have preferred to call it a prerequisite rather than a condition; but we see no difference between the two words in this connection. Without faith in Christ crucified, no one can receive forgiveness of sins and an inheritance with the saints in light. This is the plain meaning of the inspired writers. (Mark xvi. 16; John iii. 36; vi. 40; Acts xvi. 31; Gal. ii. 16; iii. 21; 1 John v. 10, 12; Rom. iii. 22, 28; iv. 5, 13, 14; v. 1; Gal. iii. 6 sq. 26; Eph. ii. 8; iii. 17; Phil. iii. 9; Heb. xi. 6).

From the testimony of the Word of God, therefore, it appears that trust in Christ, rather than sorrow for sin, or love to God, is the proper condition of justification; not as working, but as trusting, are men justified or forgiven. Hence faith does not justify as being in itself righteousness, obedience, a germ of righteousness, or an equivalent for obedience; but as a total renunciation of all claim to personal righteousness, and a sole reliance upon Christ for acceptance with God.—“The glory of faith is, that its utter emptiness opens to receive consummate good.”¹

A disposition of heart, therefore, whose moral qualities were essentially the same as those of intelligent faith in Christ, must have been possessed by every adult of the human race that has been saved. Christian faith is the act of a sinner who sees himself to be a sinner, and utterly renounces all trust in his own works, whether internal or external,—all confidence in his own love, or trust, or humility, and casts himself without reserve on the mercy of God in Christ. It is, therefore, quite as truly distrust of self, as it is trust in Christ. It cannot live without doing good; but it can do no good in which it has any confidence as satisfying the law of a holy God.

V. REASONABLENESS OF THIS DOCTRINE.

On this difficult subject, only a few suggestions can be made; and they will be no more than inferences from the language of the New Testament in respect to the intimate connection between Christ and his people. They are said to be “in Christ”; and Christ is said to be “in them”: they are said to be one body; and he is said to be the head of that body. It may therefore be affirmed that in a profound, spiritual sense, (a) The soul of the believer is united with Christ.—(See John i. 12; vi. 35; xv. 1–11; Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 12–27; Gal. ii. 20; iii. 16; Eph. v. 29–33; and (b) This union with Christ secures to the believer the benefits of his work. What the believer in himself does not deserve,—that is, life,—Christ does deserve; and what the believer in himself does deserve,—that is, death,—Christ has suffered for him (cf. 2 Tim. i. 10).

¹ Alexander (J. W.) “On Faith”; Jackson (T.) “Works,” Vol. III., “Justifying Faith”; Winer (G. B.) “The Confessions of Christendom,” p. 183 sq.; Kahnis (K. F. A.) “Die Lutherische Dogmatik historisch-genetisch dargestellt,” II. s. 265 ff.; Preuss (E.) “Die Rechtfertigung des Sünders vor Gott,” s. 27, 83; Hase (K.) “Hutterus Redivivus,” s. 306 ff.; Luthardt (C. E.) “Kompendium der Dogmatik,” s. 219 ff.; Reuss (E.) “History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age,” II. ch. 13.

In these two facts we may discover, perhaps, the philosophy of justification. Believers are vitally and legally one with Christ. Hence (1) Their sins are now forgiven in view of what he with whom they are made one has suffered in their behalf. (2) They are treated as implicitly righteous; and this treatment comports as well with the divine righteousness as it would if they were personally righteous. The law has no penal claim on them for sin. (3) They are treated as sons of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; and thus, through adoption, they expect a glory which they could not have expected as a reward for their own obedience, even if they had never sinned.

The spiritual union of the believer with Christ is such, that he has true fellowship with the work of Christ. He indorses and accepts it, so far as possible, as his own. He acknowledges the law of God to be holy, and its penalty just. In dying to sin, he dies with Christ; entering into the meaning and necessity of the Saviour's death, and feeling that, if it were possible, he would gladly suffer in the same way, and for the same great end,—the honor of God, and the good of men. Hence we say that the imputation of Christ's work is mediate,—not immediate,—to the believer as such, and not to the elect as such. A moral union is prerequisite to the legal one.

The logical order of the process of redemption seems to be this: (1) Election by God, the Father; (2) Regeneration by the Holy Spirit; (3) Union with Christ by faith; (4) Imputation of Christ's work; (5) Justification on account of that work.¹

As the philosophy of justification is a matter of great interest, we subjoin a few extracts which bear upon it:—²

¹ Kahnis (K. F. A.) "Die Lutherische Dogmatik," II. s. 273 ff.—It is worthy of notice, that Lutheran theology makes union with Christ a consequence of justification by faith. "The doctrine of justification is treated by Paul; the doctrine of the mystical union, by John; and the doctrine of sanctification as preparatory to eternal life, by Peter."—(Kahnis.)

² Gordon (A. J.) "In Christ," VI. p. 115 sq., "Standing in Christ."

"I attribute the highest importance to the connection between the head and members, — to the mystical union by which we enjoy him, so that, being made ours, he makes us partakers of the blessings with which he is furnished. Because he has designed to unite us to himself, therefore we glory in a participation of his righteousness."—Calvin (J.) "Institutio Christianæ Religionis," L. III. c. xi. 10.

"Faith must be purely taught; namely, that thou art so entirely and nearly joined to Christ, that he and thou art made, as it were, one person: so that thou mayest boldly say, I am now one with Christ; that is to say, Christ's righteousness, victory, and life are mine. And again, Christ may say, I am that sinner; that is, his sins and his death are mine, because he is united and joined unto me, and I unto him."—Luther (M.) "Com. on Gal.," Eng. Transl. p. 171.

Zwingle taught that Christ "is made unto us righteousness, for no one may come to God who is not righteous; and neither can any man be righteous in himself. But Christ is righteous, and he is our head; we are his members, and thus, as members, draw near to God through the righteousness of the head."

"Justifying righteousness is the doing and suffering of Christ when he was in the world. . . . When Jesus Christ fulfilled the righteousness of the law, it is said it was fulfilled in us, because indeed fulfilled in our nature. . . . For there being a union between head and members, though things may be done by the head and that for the members, the things are counted to the members as if not done by the head. . . . Wherefore, in this sense, we are said to do what only was done by him; even as the client doth by his lawyer, when his lawyer personates him." But, "mark, the righteousness is still in Christ, not in us, even then when we are made partakers of the benefit of it; even as the wing and feathers still abide in the hen when the chickens are covered, kept, and warmed thereby."—Bunyan (J.) "The Works of," Vol. I. pp. 302, 304, edited by George Offer.

The justification of the believer is no other than his being admitted to communion in the justification of the head and surety of all believers.—Edwards (J.) "Works of," Vol. IV. p. 66, and Vol. I. p. 596 sq.

"I have no doubt that the imputation of Christ's righteousness presupposes a union with him; since there is no perceivable fitness in bestowing benefits on one for another's sake, where there is no union or relation between. It is not such a union, however, as that the actions of either become those of the other. Obedience itself may be and is imputed, while its effects only are imparted."—Fuller (A.) "Works of," Vol. II. p. 685.

"As Christ the Holy can alone be, in an absolute sense, the object of divine love and complacency, so no man can be its object, except in connection with Christ. . . . As one with him, the redeemed are presented to the eye of God."—Neander (A.) "Commentary on the 1st Ep. of John," ad. loc. ii. 1, 2.

"Union with Christ is the distinctive blessing of the gospel dispensation, in which every other is comprised,—justification, sanctification, adoption, and the future glorifying of our bodies; all these are but different aspects of the one great truth,—that the Christian is one with Christ."—Litton (E. A.) "The Church of Christ," p. 162.

"Believers are in Christ, so as to be partakers in all that he does, and has, and is. They died with him, and rose with him, and live with him, and in him are seated in heavenly places. When the eye of God looks on them they are found in Christ; and there is no condemnation in them that are in him; and they are righteous in his righteousness, and loved with the love which rests on him, and are sons of God in his sonship, and heirs with him in his inheritance, and are soon to be glorified with him in his glory. And this standing which they have in Christ, and the present and future portion which it secures, are contemplated in eternal counsels, and predestined before the foundation of the world."—Bernard, Progress of Doc. in the N. T., p. 181.

III. SANCTIFICATION.¹

It has been already remarked that regeneration is the beginning of sanctification; and it may be added that the language of the sacred writers respecting the new birth is sometimes very sweeping,—as if regeneration completed the work which it begins; as if the production of a holy disposition were at the same time the destruction of all evil, or tendency to evil, in the heart (2 Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15; 1 Cor. vi. 11; i. 2).

But this cannot be a true interpretation of their words; for it is a doctrine wholly inconsistent with their ordinary teaching, and with their own experience. They recognized the existence of evil affections in the sincere disciples of Christ; they deplored and reproved the sins of those whom they called saints; they spoke of many as babes in Christ, and carnal, because they walked as men; they called upon believers to mortify the deeds of the body; and they exhorted their brethren to grow in the grace and knowledge of the Lord Jesus.²

Whatever view, then, may be taken of the strong language mentioned above,—whether it be supposed to set forth the prescribed standard and perfect ideal of discipleship, or the nature of the new principle of life, without looking, for the moment, at the old which is destined to vanish away, or the end and fruitage of the seed implanted by grace as seen in its germ by the eye of faith, or the complete justification of the believer in Christ, by which his conscience is purified from dead works,—whatever, we say, may be the true interpretation of that language, there is a scriptural doctrine of sanctification regarded as a progressive work in the soul; and in studying it we are to ascertain, if possible, the nature of the work, the author of it, the means of it, the period of it, and the certainty of it.

¹Owen (J.) "On Sanctification"; Romaine (W.) "The Triumph of Faith"; Doddridge (P.) "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul"; Williams (W. R.) "Religious Progress"; Bunyan (J.) "The Pilgrim's Progress," "Holy War"; Sibbes (R.) "The Soul's Conflict with itself, and Victory over itself by Faith"; Hare (J. C.) "The Mission of the Comforter"; Bonar (H.) "Way of Holiness"; Princeton Theol. Essays, First Series, "Sanctification," p. 403 sq.; Bunyan (J.)

²Braune (C.) "Die Sünden der Wiedergeborenen," in St. u. Kr. 1847 s. 371 ff.

I. THE NATURE OF SANCTIFICATION.

1. The verb which is translated "sanctify" often denotes the action that renders a person holy, either (a) in a judicial sense, as the atonement of Christ (Heb. ii. 11; x. 10, 14, 29; xiii. 12; or (b) in a moral and religious sense, as the work of the Spirit in connection with the gospel (John xvii. 17, 19; 1 Thess. v. 23; 1 Cor. i. 2).

2. The corresponding noun generally denotes the effect of the action expressed by the verb; that is, a state of partial or complete godliness (1 Thess. iv. 3, 4, 7; 1 Tim. ii. 15; Rom. vi. 19, 22; Heb. xii. 14; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Peter i. 2). In the last two passages, the noun may denote the action itself, rather than its effect.

To avoid confusion, we will endeavor to use the term in the second sense; and, thus understood, sanctification consists in a gradual increase of faith, love, hope, &c., and a gradual decrease of pride, avarice, lust, or, in a word, selfishness. Perhaps the latter is best attained by means of the former. "Infinite toil," says Arthur Helps, "would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but, by ascending a little, you may often look over it altogether." As love to God and man increases, selfishness diminishes.

II. THE AUTHOR OF SANCTIFICATION.

In a general sense, God is the author of sanctification; for the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are equally concerned in having the polluted soul made pure. But in the special sense, here contemplated, the Holy Spirit accomplishes the sanctification of the believer. This is affirmed,—

1. Because spiritual discernment or knowledge is traced to the Holy Spirit as its source (1 Cor. ii. 13, 14, 15; 1 John ii. 20, 27; Eph. i. 17; Col. i. 9). In the first of these passages, Paul represents the unrenewed man as unable to receive the things of God, because they are spiritually understood : while the renewed man rightly estimates all things ; he appreciates the truth. In the second of them, John speaks of the Holy Spirit as an unction, or anointing, from Christ the Holy One. νάμα is restricted by the context to the essential nature or principles of the gospel, — to that which must be known by the Christian, in order to detect whatever is anti-Christian.

2. Because the Christian virtues are traced to the Holy Spirit as their source (Gal. v. 22 ; Rom. xii. 3 ; 1 Cor. xii. 3, 9 ; 2 Cor. iv. 13 (cf. Phil. ii. 13). In the first of these passages (Gal. v. 22), "love, joy, peace, forbearance, kindness, goodness, faith, meekness, self-control" are said to be the first fruit of the Spirit ; and in verse 5, of the same chapter, the Christian's expectant waiting for future acceptance and glory is ascribed to the Spirit's agency in his heart. In the second passage (Rom. xii. 3), Paul teaches that God gives to every believer the measure of faith which he possesses ; and, if we interpret this in harmony with 1 Cor. xii. 3, 9, it will be seen that he gives this faith by the operation of the Holy Spirit in the soul.

3. Because Christian conduct and worship are referred to the Holy Spirit as their source (Rom. viii. 14 ; Gal. iv. 6 ; Eph. v. 18, 19). In the first of these texts (Rom. viii. 14), the sons of God are said to be led or moved by the Spirit ; in the second, Christian prayer is ascribed to the influence of the Spirit (cf. Rom. viii. 26, on which Augustine remarks, "Non Spiritus Sanctus in semetipso, sed in nobis gemit, quia nos gemere facit") ; and in the third (Eph. v. 18, 19), the proper singing of spiritual songs is made consequent on being filled with the Spirit (cf. also 1 Cor. xiv. 15 ; and Phil. i. 6).

4. Because the Christian's conflict with his evil propensities, and his victory over them, are traced to the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii. 13 ; Gal. v. 17). In the former of these passages (Rom. viii. 13), we are taught, that, by the assistance of the Spirit, believers slay, or put an end to the deeds of the flesh, — those acts which are prompted by a carnal mind ; and, in the latter (Gal. v. 17), the Spirit is said to strive eagerly against the flesh, ἐκδιναμι (cf. v. 19, 20).

5. Because the spiritual life of believers depends upon their union with Christ, who dwells in them by his Spirit. (John xv. 1-6; and perhaps xiv. 16-21; Eph. iii. 16, 17; Rom. viii. 8-10 (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19; Eph. ii. 22).

R. (a) The doctrine of the Trinity underlies and explains the various representations here given.

R. (b) The indwelling or gracious working of the Spirit is, therefore, really the indwelling of the Father and the Son as well.

6. Because the work of sanctification is directly ascribed to the Holy Spirit (2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Peter i. 2; 2 Cor. iii. 18). In the first of these texts, belief of the truth is placed in logical order after the Spirit's working; that depends on this. In the second, election is said to be realized in sanctification wrought by the Spirit. Both these texts refer specially to the first act of the sanctifying work, but without excluding the remainder. In the third, we have the progressive transformation of the believer into the image of Christ attributed virtually to the Spirit. "But we all, with unveiled face, beholding in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Lord, the Spirit." That is to say, the transformation is such a one as might be expected from the working of the Spirit of Christ.

R. (a) Regeneration, inspiration, &c., are ascribed to the Holy Spirit; and, as the work of sanctification belongs to the same sphere of action with these, analogy would lead us to refer it to the same agent.

R. (b) In the economy of our salvation, the office-work of the Holy Spirit seems to embrace whatever is done within the human soul by special divine agency.

III. THE MEANS OF SANCTIFICATION.

The following are thought to be the most important:—

A. Providential Discipline. B. Religious Truth. C. Christian Action. D. Church Life. E. The Lord's Day.

A. PROVIDENTIAL DISCIPLINE. We do not here refer to such discipline as giving one who is in doubt as to his duty a knowledge of God's will, but rather as preparing him in spirit to profit by knowledge from any source; and we place this means of sanctification first, because, in the order of nature, it goes before the others named, and because it is used by God alone. That Divine Providence does thus promote the sanctification of believers, we infer, —

1. From the language of God's word. (1) In respect to prosperity (Ps. cxlv. 7; Rom. ii. 4). (2) In respect to adversity (Rom. v. 3 sq.; 1 Cor. xi. 32; Heb. xii. 6; 2 Cor. iv. 17). (3) In respect to all events (Rom. viii. 28; 2 Cor. iv. 15; Eph. v. 20; 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22). Query: Does the πάρα of Rom. viii. 28, include the sinning of those who love God? We do not find it easy to reply. Steudel (in the Chr. Rev. XXVI. p. 241) remarks that, "Sin — in case we do not give ourselves up to its power — often impels the conscience to hold the truth before us more distinctly and sharply than it would otherwise have done. A close observer of himself will scarcely be able to say that he has not been greatly benefited by a deeper knowledge of his own heart, and by a more thorough use of the Christian truth at his command, even when these were occasioned by a sin which revealed to him the depravity of his moral nature." Chastisement stands related to sin; punishment to guilt: the former is corrective in its aim; the latter retributive. — See Müller (J.) "The Doctrine of Sin," I. p. 245.

2. From experience and observation. Such is the union of soul and body in man, that the latter often solicits the former to sin; but its power to do this may be greatly weakened, for example, by disease. Hence the Christian may be made to experience want or weakness, for the purpose of fitting him to welcome the truth as a little child, with humility and trust in Christ. So, too, prosperity may increase his thankfulness and power to benefit others. When it will do this, God is able and willing to bestow it. Query: Does God so direct events as to make them promote, in the highest degree, the sanctification of each believer? Or may that of one be delayed for the sake of greater good to others? For example, if a man could know that a certain course of labor would do less to make him holy than another, would it then be certain that he ought to choose the latter instead of the former?

B. RELIGIOUS TRUTH. It has been observed that every Christian emotion, desire, purpose, and action is called into being by a perception of truth. Holy living is completely dependent on true knowledge. Right moral feelings and actions must be called forth, if at all, by the presence of suitable thoughts in the mind.

As to the relation of truth, as a means of sanctification to the Holy Spirit, its living Author, it will be enough to say, that, while the heart is made susceptible by the action of the Spirit, every truth presented serves to elicit and strengthen those affections, desires, or volitions which respond to its nature.

Without undervaluing the religious truth which is made known to us by the works of God in creation and providence, we must limit our study to that which is taught by Holy Writ; for, however important the voices of Nature may be to those who have not the Bible, they add very little to the contents of this book.

To show that religious truth is used in sanctifying believers, we refer, —

1. To the direct testimony of God's word (John vi. 63; xvii. 17; viii. 32; Heb. v. 12–14; 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17; 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2; 1 Peter ii. 2; 2 Peter i. 3, 4; Ps. cxix. 9, 50, 80, 93, 104, 130, 165). Divine truth is spoken of in John xvii. 17, as the element or atmosphere in which the sanctification is to be wrought by God. The word “sanctify” may here include two ideas: namely, that of consecration to a holy service, — preaching; and that of moral preparation for the service. With this passage may be compared 2 Peter iii. 18.

2. To the implied testimony of God's word (Eph. i. 8, 9, 17, 18 (cf. John xiv. 17; xv. 26; xvi. 13); Eph. iv. 11, 12; 1 Cor. xiv. 3–5, and many other places.)

3. To the nature of the human soul. For the word of God contains just those moral and religious truths which tend to beget faith, love, hope, and every other holy exercise.

C. CHRISTIAN ACTION. Under this head, we shall speak of only certain forms of Christian action, since other forms may be conveniently treated elsewhere.

I. OF SECRET WORSHIP. By worship in general, we mean the homage of the soul paid to God in view of his attributes and prerogatives. This homage may be directly expressed in praise, and then it involves a corresponding admission of the worshipper's dependence, and perhaps guilt; or it may be implied only, while the worshipper testifies his sense of dependence and guilt. In further considering the topic before us, we shall confine our attention to the nature, the duty, and the efficacy of prayer.

I. The nature of prayer. Prayer is said to have four elements: namely (1) adoration, or homage to God in view of his nature, or the sum of his perfections, sometimes expressed by the single word, "holiness"; (2) thanksgiving, or homage to God in view of his beneficence; (3) confession of sin, or homage to God in view of his righteousness; (4) petition for favors, or homage to God in view of his grace and faithfulness.

It may be remarked:—

(a) That prayer should always be offered by us, either to Christ himself, or to God in the name of Christ. This is evident (1) from the words of Christ to the eleven (John xiv. 13; xv. 16; xvi. 23, 24). (2) From the words and example of his apostles (Acts i. 24; ii. 21; vii. 59; ix. 14, 21; xxii. 16; 1 Cor. i. 2). (3) From his relation to believers. He is their Head; and only in consideration of his work do they receive divine grace. Hence the Lord's prayer was not given as a permanent form, nor even as a complete model of Christian prayer. Yet the paraphrase of this prayer, attributed to Bernard, illustrates the wonderful fulness of its meaning, and is worthy of transcription. "Our Father—by right of creation, by bountiful provision, by gracious adoption; Who art in heaven—the throne of thy glory, the portion of thy children, the temple of thine angels; Hallowed be thy name—by the thoughts of our hearts, by the words of our lips, by the work of our hands; Thy kingdom come—of Providence to defend us, of grace to refine us, of glory to crown us; Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven—toward us without resistance, by us without compulsion, universally without exception; Give us this day our daily bread—of necessity for our bodies, of eternal life for our souls; And forgive us our trespasses—against the commands of thy law, against the grace of thy gospel; As we forgive those that trespass against us—by defaming our characters, by embezzling our property, by abusing our persons; And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil—of overwhelming affliction, of worldly enticement, of error's seduction, of sinful affections; For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever—thy kingdom governs all, thy power subdues all, thy glory is above all; Amen—as it is in thy purposes, so is it in thy promises, so be it in our prayers, so shall it be to thy praise."

(b) That prayer should always be submissive, instead of dictatorial. Strong faith will make it such; for faith leans upon Christ, trusts his wisdom, goodness, and promise. No prayer is acceptable to God unless it be offered in faith; and no dictatorial prayer is offered in faith.

"And so I sometimes think our prayers
 Might well be merged in one;
 And nest and perch and hearth and church
 Repeat, 'Thy will be done.'"

Whittier.

But this feeling is not inconsistent with the most affectionate and importunate pleading for what is believed to be in harmony with the will of God.

(c) That prayer should be very often vocal. There are, indeed, feelings which cannot be uttered, and there are times when silent desires are enough; but, when it can be, secret prayer ought, we think, to be vocal; for the utterance of our desires by the voice strengthens them, and expels foreign thoughts.

II. The duty of prayer. Nearly all who believe in a personal God concede that praise, thanks, and confession should be offered to him; but many professed theists call in question the propriety of our asking God to grant any special blessing. Such a petition they deem useless, if not disrespectful, to the All-Wise. Says one of this class, "I cannot express my repugnance at the notion that supreme intelligence and wisdom can be influenced by the suggestion of any human mind, however great."—("The Prayer-Gauge Debate," p. 122.) But we hold that prayer as petition is a Christian duty:—

1. Because it is commanded (Jer. xxix. 7; Matt. v. 44; vi. 6; ix. 38; xxvi. 40; Luke xviii. 1 sq.; 1 Thess. v. 17; Jas. i. 5; v. 16; 1 Peter iv. 7).

2. Because it is encouraged. (Jer. xxix. 12, 13; Ezek. xxxvi. 37; Matt. vii. 7, 11; xviii. 19; xxi. 22; Luke xi. 13 (cf. 1 Sam. xii. 23).

3. Because it is suitable. A child may fitly ask favors of a parent, and the Christian is a child of God.

4. Because it is spontaneous. The Christian prays, as a matter of course, just as he believes and loves.

III. THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

It may be truly said that prayer is one of the best exercises of Christian trust, love, humility, and holy desire; and that, according to a general law of our being, every power or principle, every affection or desire, is strengthened by fit exercise. Hence, if it can be offered honestly and intelligently, it must tend to the sanctification of Christians.

It may also be truly said, that every Christian who prays at all will be certain to pray for his own sanctification; and, therefore, if God bestows blessings, at the request of his children, which he would not otherwise bestow, prayer will secure sanctifying grace.

In proof that prayer is thus answered, reference may be made with confidence,—

(1) To the direct testimony of Scripture (Matt. vii. 7 sq.;

xviii. 19; xxi. 22; Luke xi. 13; Jas. i. 5 sq.; iv. 2, 3; v. 16 sq.; 1 John v. 14 sq.; Ex. xxxii. 7 sq). (2) To the indirect testimony of Scripture.—See the passages alleged to prove the duty of prayer; for God does not command and encourage a vain service. (3) To the moral nature which God has given us,—a nature which, in its renovated state, expects such answers.

“More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friends?
For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.”¹

Alas! those who doubt the efficacy of prayer have little knowledge of a personal God; for no philosophical objection can be made to the doctrine that God answers prayer, which cannot be made to the doctrine of Divine Providence in general.

Yet scientific men have pressed the uniformity of nature into service against the doctrine that God ever answers prayer by “physical equivalents.” A formal review of their arguments would occupy too much space; but a few remarks may be offered in reply to them.²

(a) It is irrational to deny that God can use the forces of nature for the accomplishment of special ends; for man is able to do this on a large scale. Says Wallace, “We can anticipate the time when the earth will produce only cultivated plants and animals; when man’s selection shall have supplanted ‘natural selection’; and when the ocean will be the only domain in which that power can be exerted, which, for countless cycles of ages, ruled supreme over the earth."¹

¹Tennyson (A.) “Morte d’Arthur.”

²Hessey (J. A.) “Recent Difficulties on Prayer”; “The Prayer Gauge Debate,” ed. by J. O. Means; Romanes (G. J.) “Christian Prayer and General Laws”; Lord (E.) “Prayer and Meditation,” Am. Presby., and Theol. Rev. 1863, p. 407 sq.; Graves (S.) “The Efficacy of Prayer,” Chr. Rev. Vol. XXIII, p. 620 sq.

But human intelligence and power are finite. Not so those of God! As author of natural forces, and intimately present with them, he can surely, in ways imperceptible to man, direct them to the accomplishment of such ends as he pleases. If prayer is acceptable to him, and if he chooses to answer it, by making use of physical forces, there is nothing in the known character of these forces, or in his known relation to them, to forbid his doing it.

(b) It is irrational to deny that God may add to the permanent forces of nature for the accomplishment of special ends in answer to prayer. Says Romanes, "No man of science will hesitate to admit that most, if not all petitions, would require for their answer but the creation of force alone. We can see plainly enough that there is no prayer which may not receive a physical equivalent, provided that the Being to whom it is offered is able and willing to originate the adequate physical conditions."² There is, moreover, "no argument in support of the belief that the creative energy is spent or suspended."³ Still further, "An alteration in the total sum of energy, requisite to produce any physical result in answer to prayer, might, in comparison with that sum, be inadequately represented by the difference between the mass of a chyle molecule, which is indefinable by the highest powers of the microscope, and the mass of the solar system."⁴ In other words, the added force thus introduced might be wholly inappreciable to sense, wholly unknown to man, unless God should be pleased to reveal the fact of such continuous and gracious exercise of his power.

(c) It is irrational to deny that God may have preadjusted the forces of nature in such a way as to answer by them some of the prayers which are offered by his children. His knowledge is perfect, embracing from the foundation of the world every act of every one of his creatures. Why, then, may he not have provided for the answer of acceptable prayer, in some instances, through the working of natural laws? It seems to us that no one who admits the omniscience and wisdom of God can question the possibility, or indeed, the probability of such answers to prayer.

¹ "Natural Selection," p. 326.

² "Christian Prayer and General Laws," p. 143. ³ Id. p. 159 ⁴ Id. p. 150.

(d) It is impossible to deny the use of physical forces in answering prayer, without denying that it is answered at all; for all modifications of mental action are accompanied by corresponding modifications of the substance of the brain, and so of the body. Thus spiritual forces change the action of physical forces; and indirectly, if not directly, God makes use of the latter, as well as of the former, in answering prayer. But is it credible that God cannot do that directly, which he can do mediately? Or is it reasonable to suppose that man can do what God cannot, in using the powers of nature to accomplish rational ends?

The following queries may also be suggested, before leaving this subject:—

(a) If the influence of the Holy Spirit is presupposed in acceptable prayer, what need is there of praying for his influence?

(b) Is some additional influence of the Spirit always given in answer to earnest prayer for the same?

(c) Does the Holy Spirit ordinarily direct the minds and desires of Christians towards special objects,—say persons,—or does he enkindle holy affections, and leave them to the guidance of the word and providence of God in selecting objects for prayer? Is his influence on the mind, or on the heart? Is it prophetic or quickening?

(d) In what sense, and to what extent, may one believe that his own prayers are answered? or that a particular blessing was conditioned on his own praying?

II. OF LABOR FOR THE GOOD OF OTHERS.

It is not easy to over-rate the benefit of Christian effort for the salvation of men; for such effort brings into exercise almost every Christian affection, while it prevents the growth of evil propensities. It cultivates the manly virtues of piety,—boldness, frankness, self-forgetfulness, sympathy,—and tends to cheerfulness and hope.

Hence, as a rule, monastic life is unfavorable to growth in grace. If long continued, it is almost certain to develop a one-sided piety,—self-scrutiny becoming too minute, and the free and natural action of love being prevented. If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen? Love to God is most genuine and healthful when it is accompanied by love to man; and love to man is best cultivated by persistent and direct effort to secure his eternal welfare.

Yet it may be admitted that seclusion for a brief period, with a view to deeper self-knowledge and more protracted communion with God, especially when looking forward to some great service, has proved, in many instances, useful. It has given one a knowledge of man, if not of men; of his own soul, if not of society; and has opened the mind to the much-needed influence of the invisible world, to a degree not easily reached without seclusion.

That labor for the good of others is conducive to personal sanctification may be shown by an appeal (a) To the word of God (John vii. 17; Ps. cxix. 100). In commenting on the second passage, Dr. South quaintly remarks, "David got the start of them in point of obedience, and thereby outstripped them, at length, in point of knowledge." (b) To the nature of true religion, the highest principle of which is love; for love leads to action for the good of others. (c) To the constitution of the human soul; for not only is man commanded to love his neighbor as himself, but his soul is so constituted that its health requires him to do this. Yet this love will be morbid and puny when it leads to no action for the highest welfare of men. (d) To the history of the Christian religion. Working disciples, like Paul and John, Athanasius and Augustine, Luther and Calvin, Bunyan and Wesley, Edwards and Judson, have made the greatest progress in the divine life.

D. CHURCH LIFE. "A Christian Church is an association of believers in Christ for the observance, the maintenance, and the extension of the Christian religion."¹ The power of Church life to promote the sanctification of believers may be discovered (1) in the spirit of obedience to Christ which it cultivates; (2) in the practice of social worship which it maintains; (3) in the increase of Christian knowledge which it secures; (4) in the labor for others which it organizes and stimulates; and (5) in the watchfulness and consistency which it promotes. We must give attention to each of these points.

I. It cultivates a spirit of obedience to Christ. For it requires, at the outset, a solemn act of obedience,—a public profession of faith in Christ, and allegiance to him. No act in a Christian's life is adapted to fill his mind with greater awe and thankfulness than that of being buried with Christ in baptism. It is an act never to be repeated, deliberate, irreversible; and, by its very solitariness, it lays hold of his imagination, and repeats its lesson again and again to the close of life. Besides, there is self-denial in it: the offence of the cross has not ceased; and, if it clings to one act of obedience more than to others, that act is baptism. Perhaps this was intended by the Saviour as one check to a rash profession of faith.

In a less marked degree, church-life is, from first to last, a school of obedience. It must be continued when the affections languish, when doubt creeps into the heart, when courage wanes, because it is commanded. It must be persisted in against the opposition and contempt of the world, because it is commanded. And, by this obedience, it cultivates an open, manly spirit,—the heroic virtues; for, in church-life, the Christian has his place apart from the world, under the banner of his Lord: and, after a time, obedience becomes easy.

II. It maintains the practice of social worship. And, by social worship, we mean all worship in connection with others. It will be in place to speak briefly of the duty and benefits of social worship.

¹ Ripley (H. J.) "Church Polity."

1. The duty of social worship is evident (1) From its being enjoined in the word of God (Heb. x. 25 ; Col. iii. 16). (2) From its being encouraged in the same word (Matt. xviii. 19, 20). (3) From its being practised by apostolic men (Acts i. 13 sq. ; ii. 1 sq.). (4) From its being implied in the organization of church and family.

2. The benefits of social worship. This form of worship promotes growth in grace, —

(1) By enkindling higher devotion to God in the heart. We are beings of sympathy, easily affected by the feelings of those around us. Hence religious emotion is increased by contact with religious emotion. Besides, the truths of the Bible are set in new lights by the experience and meditation of different minds. The old is made new, and gains new power over the heart.

(2) By bringing into livelier exercise brotherly love. "The sight of the eye affects the heart." We do not often feel a very deep love for those who are strangers to us. As a rule, we love our fellow-Christians, as such, in proportion to our knowledge of their Christian life and experience.

(3) By securing a special blessing from God. "If two of you shall agree on earth concerning any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them by my Father who is in heaven ; for, where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." United prayer and worship do, therefore, entitle us to expect signal favors from God through Christ.

It is not, indeed, easy to overstate the spiritual benefits of social and public worship to believers ; yet for this they are indebted to the Christian church. It preserves multitudes from apostasy ; it stimulates multitudes to higher activity ; it unites the moral life and force of many persons ; it augments their faith, love, hope, zeal, and thereby the efficiency of their prayer.

III. It secures an increase of Christian knowledge. This it does (1) by the regular preaching of the gospel, which it supports; (2) by the study of God's word, which this preaching induces; (3) by the vivid representation of Christian truth,—central, vital truth, in the ordinances.

IV. It organizes and stimulates labor for the good of others. This is one great end of church-life. Thus associated, Christians can act with more success in diffusing the gospel and saving men; and, the more effectually they are able to labor, the more earnestly will they do so. Success stimulates effort; numbers do the same. There is, or should be, in every church, a kind of esprit de corps which excites a degree of enthusiasm in the several members, animating them to greater boldness and activity. But seeking a high and holy object, as the honor of Christ and the salvation of men, is always beneficial to the moral nature of him who seeks it. Hence church-life tends to sanctify the believer's heart; to render him more unselfish, hopeful, magnanimous.

Perhaps we ought to add, —

V. It promotes, by its discipline, watchfulness and consistency. Many a Christian has been saved from apostasy by the consciousness of being under the eye of the church, and liable to its discipline; and many a one has doubtless, like the incestuous man at Corinth, been led to repentance by solemn exclusion from the church.

E. THE LORD'S DAY. This topic may be subdivided into three: namely, The Duty of Keeping the Lord's Day, The Manner of Keeping it, and the Relation of it to Sanctification.¹

¹Baxter (R.) "The Divine Appointment of the Lord's Day," Works, Vol. XIII. p. 369 sq.; Hessey (J. A.) "Sunday: its Origin, History, and Present Obligation"; Wilson (D.) "The Divine Authority and Perpetual Obligation of the Lord's Day"; Gurney (J. J.) "Brief Remarks on the History, Authority, and Use of the Sabbath"; Gilfillan (J.) "The Sabbath viewed in the Light of Reason, Revelation, and History"; Stone (J. S.) "Lectures on the Institution of the Sabbath"; Arnold (A. N.) "The Christian Sabbath," in Bap. Quar. for 1868; Dwight (T.) "Theology," &c., Vol. III. pp. 222-273; Bacon (G. B.) "The Sabbath Question"; Brown (T. B.) "Thoughts suggested by the Perusal of Gilfillan, and other authors, on the Sabbath"; Turretin (F.) "Institutio Theologiæ," &c., Loc. XI. Quæst. 13 and 14; Hengstenberg (E. W.) "Ueber den Tag des Herrn."

1. The Duty of Keeping the Lord's Day.

Of the several theories maintained by Christians as to the Lord's day, the following deserve particular notice: (a) That men are under no obligation to keep it by abstaining from secular business; either (1) because reason and Paul unite in declaring that all days are alike, — a view which we need not pause to refute, or (2) because the fourth commandment of the decalogue and the original appointment of the Sabbath require all men to keep the seventh day of the week holy. But this view is inconsistent with the language of Paul in Col. ii. 16; Gal. iv. 9, 10; and Rom. xiv. 5; with the testimony of Christian writers, like Justin Martyr, as to the practice of the early churches; and with the principle laid down by Christ, that the Sabbath was made for man, — that is, for his highest good.

(b) That by the authority of Christ, the first day of the week has been substituted for the seventh, — the day being changed, but the command to observe it by abstaining from all secular labor remaining in full force. The defenders of this theory insist that the decalogue is binding on Christians, from the first command to the last, though God has seen fit to ordain that the Lord's day shall take the place of the Jewish Sabbath. This theory has prevailed extensively in England, Scotland, and the United States; and a great deal may be justly said in its favor.

Yet it does not seem to be entirely consistent with the language of Paul in the passages cited above, with the views of fair-minded Christian writers in the early Church, or with the general character of the new dispensation. It appears to emphasize unduly the legal side of the question, attaching more importance to the fourth commandment of the decalogue, as directly applicable to the Lord's day, than is altogether safe. The adherents of this view are careful to call the Lord's day the Christian Sabbath, — a designation which is never given to it in the New Testament, or by any Christian writer of the first three centuries.

(c) That the duty of keeping the Lord's day rests entirely on the practice and authority of the church. Many who accept this theory believe that the practice began in the days of the apostles; but they do not admit that this circumstance is of decisive importance. They may be divided into two classes; namely, those who concede to the church authority in such matters, and those who are willing to comply, in some measure, with a good and useful custom.

This theory overlooks the real grounds of Christian obligation in this matter, and tends to great laxity in observing the Lord's day. Where it prevails, recreation, if not business, will be sure to encroach upon the proper use of the day, as a period for religious worship and instruction, and thus defeat the chief end of its appointment.

(d) That the duty of consecrating the Lord's day to religious uses rests upon THE AUTHORITATIVE EXAMPLE OF THE APOSTLES (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10; Heb. x. 25); confirmed (1) by the practice of the early churches (see the works quoted supra); (2) by the Sabbath-keeping enjoined on the children of Israel (Ex. xx. 8 sq.); (3) by the original sanctification of the seventh day (Gen. ii. 2, 3); and (4) by the words of Christ, affirming that the Sabbath was made for man (Mark ii. 27).

The practice of the early churches tends to establish very firmly the distinction between the Lord's day and the Jewish Sabbath. The fourth command of the decalogue proves that the Israelites needed to have one day in seven set apart from secular toil to religious service; the primeval institution of the Sabbath shows that it was meant for all mankind; and the reason of its existence, declared by Christ, fully accounts for the change from the last day of the week to the first, made by the apostles. For, since the resurrection of Christ, the first day of the week takes precedence of every other in religious interest, and it is practically impossible for Christians to feel as deep an interest in the finishing of the work of creation as they do in the finishing of the work of atonement.

It should be borne in mind, that when God rested from creating, — a kind of secular work, — he entered at once on the moral and religious training of man; so that Jesus could say, "My Father worketh until now, and I work" (John v. 17); that is, even on the Sabbath, and, perhaps, especially on the Sabbath. But this primeval training was carried forward, chiefly, by means of the light which shines from creation, — a light which has proved insufficient for fallen man. Not the knowledge of creation, but the knowledge of redemption, provided by God, is what sinful man most needs. Hence the day which commemorates a completed atonement, ready to be applied by the gospel and grace of Christ, is the day of divinest significance and greatest spiritual influence for sinful men.

This theory is in perfect accord with the doctrine of Paul, and with the character of the new dispensation. It recognizes the very important bearing of the primeval and Jewish Sabbath on the question of keeping the Lord's day; and it assigns a proper place to the inspired guidance of the churches by the apostles.

2. The Manner of Keeping the Lord's Day.

It has been shown above, that it is the duty of Christians to consecrate the day to religious uses. But how strictly? Must they be governed by the same rules as were the Jews in abstaining from every kind of secular toil? Or have they greater freedom in this respect?

It must doubtless be conceded that much is left to their own judgment and conscience, to their love of Christ, and desire to win men to his service. But with the general duty made plain, and with the law of love written upon their hearts, it is to be presumed that they will keep the day very much as Christ kept the Jewish Sabbath, finding no occasion for secular business or idle self-indulgence. Hence it may be remarked that their employments on the Lord's day should be: —

(a) Those which are either embraced in religious service, or are immediately prerequisite to it. By religious service is meant not only worship in the sanctuary, or elsewhere, but all labor for the salvation of men.

(b) Those which are evidently necessary for the preservation of life and health. A tender Christian conscience will guide one to the right application of this general rule; especially, with the aid of Christ's example.

(c) Those which are required to prevent or to relieve severe suffering in man or beast. Particular applications of this rule must also be left to the enlightened conscience. If it is honestly accepted, and interpreted in the light of the Saviour's conduct, few mistakes will be made.

The idea of rest was more predominant in the Jewish law than it should be in Christian practice; for spiritual joy and activity are characteristic of the followers of Christ. Their religion is not conservative chiefly, but aggressive; it should go forth with joyful step, conquering and to conquer.

In saying that it is the duty of Christians to keep the Lord's day in the manner specified, it is meant that all who have a knowledge of the Christian religion ought to do this; but it is not meant that some may compel others to do it. As to the Lord's day as a civil institution, something will be said in "Christian Ethics"; but, in this place, reference is made solely to the personal obligation of every man to do the will of God in this respect.

3. The Relation of the Lord's Day to Sanctification.

This may be indicated in a very few words. A proper use of the Lord's day affords opportunity, —

(a) For protracted religious study and worship, as well in public as in private; (b) For special Christian effort in behalf of others, and especially of those who are impenitent; and (c) For breaking the current of worldly thought and desire, and thus gradually eradicating sinful affections, as well as strengthening those that are holy.

III. THE PERIOD OF SANCTIFICATION.

By this is meant the period during which sanctification is yet partial, but progressive, — the subject of it being not yet free from sin, but becoming so through the power of divine grace. And this period, it is supposed, closes with the life of the believer on earth. Beginning with regeneration, it is terminated by death and entrance into paradise.

In support of this view, reference is made (1) To the language of John in his first Epistle (i. 8–10),—“If we say that we have not sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, He is faithful and righteous to forgive us the sins, and to cleanse us from every unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His word is not in us.” It is to be observed, that, in the eighth verse, John puts himself in the same class with his Christian readers, and that he employs a verb in the present tense, thus referring to the present state of believers; also, that, in the ninth verse, he associates himself with those who should seek forgiveness; and that, in the tenth verse, he uses the perfect tense to describe that which has come over from the past into the present. This view of his language agrees with that of Calvin, Turretin, Lücke, De Wette, and Neander.

Yet it has been thought by some to be irreconcilable with other statements of the same Epistle (for example, iii. 9; v. 18). “Every one who has been begotten from God doeth not sin, because his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he has been begotten from God.”—“We know that every one who has been begotten from God sinneth not; but he that was begotten from God keepeth himself, and the wicked one toucheth him not.”

This language is no doubt remarkable; but, if it proves that any Christian lives without committing sin, it proves that every Christian does the same. And, if it affirms that all Christians live without sinning, it contradicts the testimony of John himself, as well as the whole tenor of Scripture.—(See for example, 1 John ii. 1; v. 16; and Gal. ii. 11.) This, therefore, cannot be its true meaning, however difficult it may be to ascertain that meaning.

But it has been supposed to signify one of three things, namely (a) That, in so far as the new principle of life is concerned, the regenerate man does not commit sin. In this case, that which is highest and best in the believer is spoken of as the person himself, even as Paul in the seventh of Romans says, "But if what I desire not, that I do, it is no more I that perform it, but the sin that dwelleth in me." Thus "the new man" and "the old man" both exist in the Christian (Rom. vi. 6; Eph. iv. 22, 24; Col. iii. 9 sq.). (b) That one who has been begotten of God cannot sin deliberately, habitually, or persistently, since, by the grace of God, the new disposition is stronger than the old. (c) That one who has been made a child of God will not be suffered to apostatize and perish. The first of these interpretations is preferable to the second, and the second to the third; though the third may express a truth which is elsewhere taught.

It does not appear, therefore, that John has written any thing in this Epistle inconsistent with the interpretation given to his language in the first chapter. More than this, his language in that chapter agrees with the teaching of James, of Peter, of Paul, and of Christ himself (James iii. 2; ii. 11; Rom. viii. 10, 13; Gal. v. 17; Phil. iii. 12; Mark x. 18; Matt. vi. 12; see also 1 Kings viii. 46; Prov. xx. 19; Eccl. vii. 20).

It may also be remarked, in this connection, that there seems to be no sufficient evidence of the existence of two, and only two, great classes of Christians, namely, a small one, embracing persons who exercise sanctifying faith and enjoy what has been called "the higher Christian life"; and a large one, embracing persons who have justifying faith, but know not the blessedness of perfect trust. It seems more in harmony with the representations of Christian life in the Bible, and with the experience of believers in every age, to say that the varieties of true life and progress are manifold, no two disciples standing on exactly the same plane.¹

¹ See "The Doctrine of the Higher Christian Life compared with the Teaching of the Holy Scriptures," by the author of this manual; Owen (J.) "On the Remainder of Indwelling Sin," and "On the Mortification of Sin in Believers";

But are Christians set free from the power of sin at death? Or do they enter the other world with the viper still in their bosom? Is the period between death and resurrection a kind of purgatory to many of the saints? Or is paradise the home and rest of all who have trusted in Christ? The Bible knows nothing of a purgatory for the saints after death. It teaches, rather, that the state of both the righteous and the wicked will be fixed from the hour when they leave this world (Luke xvi. 22 sq.; xxiii. 43; Phil. i. 23; 2 Cor. v. 8).¹

Sanctification will therefore be completed at death, but not before. The conflict with sin will be more or less arduous till the call to pass beyond the river comes.

“The way is long, my child! But it shall be
Not one step longer than is best for thee;
And thou shalt know, at last, when thou shalt stand
Safe at the goal, how I did take thy hand,
And quick and straight
Lead to heaven’s gate
My child!”

IV. THE CERTAINTY OF SANCTIFICATION.

The question may now be asked, Is it certain that persons who have been truly regenerated by the Holy Spirit will be preserved and carried forward in the new life unto the end? That they will be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation? Or is it probable that the work of sanctifying them will be arrested and brought to nought, in many instances, so that men who have been made partakers of the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, will finally perish?

That some, at least, will “fall from grace” is confidently asserted by a large class of devout Christians; and the arguments which they bring forward in support of their belief are worthy of careful examination. The most important are these : —

Hodge (C.) “Systematic Theology,” III. p. 245 sq.; Oosterzee (J. J. van) “Christian Dogmatics,” II. p. 657 sq.; Herzog (R. E.) s. v. “Heiligung”; Harless (Dr.) “Christian Ethics,” s. 33 sq.

¹ Hovey (A.) “State of Men after Death.”

² Hodge (A. A.) “Outlines of Theology,” p. 425 sq.

(a) That analogy favors their doctrine ; for not only Adam and Eve, but also holy angels, fell from a state of moral purity. By parity of reason, it may be presumed that men imperfectly sanctified will also, in some instances, fall.

In reply to this argument, it is to be said, that the relation of Christians to the Saviour is peculiar. In all probability, the grace of God is given to them in larger measure, and on a different principle, than it was given to our first parents, or to angels in heaven. It is not therefore legitimate to infer the lapse of believers in Christ from that of beings superior to them in goodness, but standing in other relations to divine grace.

(b) That Christians are exhorted to persevere ; and exhortation to perseverance implies a danger of the opposite. — (See Rev. ii. 10, 25 ; Heb. iv. 1 – 3, 11). But, in answer to this, it may be affirmed that exhortations to perseverance hardly prove that those exhorted will not persevere. At most, they imply that without the exhortations, they might not persevere. Moral means must be used in accomplishing moral ends.

(c) That Christians are warned against apostatizing, and must therefore be in danger of this sin (Heb. vi. 4–6 ; x. 26–32 ; 2 Peter ii. 20–22 ; iii. 7). The same reply may be made to this argument as to the preceding. Warnings against apostasy do not prove that any of those addressed will apostatize ; they only prove that the use of means is necessary to prevent them from committing so dreadful a sin. The principle involved is aptly illustrated by the narrative of Luke in Acts (cf. xxvii. 22–25, with verse 31). Contingency and certainty are compatible in the government of God.

(d) That cases of apostasy are introduced hypothetically by the sacred writers ; and from these the same inference may be drawn, as from exhortations and warnings (Rom. xvi. 15 ; 1 Cor. viii. 11 ; John xv. 1–6 ; Matt. xxv. 1–13 ; Luke viii. 11 sq.). In this case also, the same answer may be made as in the two preceding cases. The passages appealed to are virtually warnings against apostasy. They recognize the moral freedom of Christians, and the natural possibility of their turning utterly away from Christ; but they are written to prevent such a fall: and none of them show that any who are truly united to Christ will finally be lost.¹

(e) That instances of final apostasy are related in the Bible,—as those of Saul, Judas, Hymenæus, Alexander, and others.

In studying the history of Saul, we find no evidence that he was ever a child of God. — (See 1 Sam. x. 9–13; xiii. 13, 14; xv. 10 sq.; xvi. 13, 14). The gift of the Spirit which he had for a time was apparently official, and somewhat of the nature of inspiration; but he seems never to have possessed a docile and obedient heart.

Still less do we discover any evidence of true piety in the life of Judas, or in the language which either Christ or the evangelists use respecting him. — (See John vi. 64, 70; xii. 6; xiii. 18, 19; xvii. 12; xviii. 9). It is not, indeed, easy to account for his being one of the twelve by the free choice of Christ, if he was evil from the first; but this hypothesis agrees better than any other with the narrative of John.

Nor is there any decisive proof that Hymenæus and Alexander were, on the one hand, ever true Christians; or, on the other, finally lost. Both of them were delivered to Satan in order that they might be taught, by chastisement, not to blaspheme (1 Tim. i. 20). This language suggests Paul's hope of their recovery. Whether the Alexander mentioned in 2 Tim. v. 14, was the same as the one named in 1 Tim. i. 20, is quite uncertain, since the name was a common one among the Greeks; and, if not, there is no evidence of his being a Christian, even by profession.

But the weight of scriptural evidence for the preservation and sanctification of all true believers depends very much upon the view which is taken of God's relation to the work. If it be true that some are chosen to eternal life, and that they are the same as those who are regenerated by the Spirit of God, it follows that they will be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation; but the clause, "through faith," should never be overlooked. The Scriptures furnish no evidence for the opinion that men will be either sanctified or saved, without faith in Christ. If they are kept, they are kept by keeping alive their faith.

¹See Edwards (J.) "Works," I. p. 125.

It is doubtless conceivable that God has elected some of our race to a temporary faith,—to a state of grace from which they are to fall away and perish; but the Scriptures do not, on the whole, present this view of election. Thus, in 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14, the apostle writes as follows: "But we are bound to give thanks to God always for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God from the beginning chose you to salvation, in sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth; whereunto he called you by our gospel to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." And this is not the doctrine of Paul only; Peter expresses the same belief (1 Pet. i. 3–5),—"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy begot us again unto a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; unto an inheritance imperishable and undefiled and unfading, reserved in heaven for you, who, by the power of God are kept through faith, unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time."

In both these passages the end is salvation; and the means a vital union with Christ, established and maintained by the purpose and grace of God. In both, it is most natural to suppose that the writers considered all true believers as certain of being led by the grace of God, freely given and heartily received, to persevere unto the end. Says Turretin, "Faith is not true because it perseveres; but it perseveres because it is true." It would be still better to say, that it perseveres because the Saviour, by his Spirit and his truth, keeps it alive in the heart which he has renewed; but there is no salvation for men who do not abide in Christ. The purpose of God comprehends the means as well as the end. If the means fail, the end will fail (cf. John xv. 6; Matt. xxiv. 13; Heb. vi. 9, 11, 12; Rom. viii. 29 sq.).

But if the means fail, if faith and love are utterly wanting, if the soul that supposed itself united with Christ finds that it has no allegiance to him, or trust in him, what is the inference to be drawn from its state? John appears to have furnished a satisfactory answer to this question in his first Epistle, — "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for, if they had been of us, they would have continued with us" (ii. 19). Very many passages of the New Testament are addressed to bodies of Christians as if they were, all of them, what they profess to be, and, therefore, as if any defection among them would be a defection of true believers; but, in this instance, John appears to have given the key to such passages.

It may be added, that Christ, as mediator, has received power to keep his own, and sanctify them (see John vi. 39, 40; x. 27-29; xvii. 2), and that it agrees with our idea of the divine mind, that he should complete the work of their redemption which was begun by the new birth. Paul seems to have had this thought when he wrote to the Philippians, "Being confident of this very thing, that He which began a good work in you will perfect it up to the day of Jesus Christ."

The doctrine of the perseverance, or the preservation of the saints, is, like the doctrine of election, very easily perverted; but, rightly understood, it may be a source of great comfort and power, — an incentive to gratitude, a motive to self-sacrifice, and a pillar of fire in the hour of danger.

PART SIXTH.

CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND ORDINANCES.

IN considering the "means of sanctification," reference was made to "church-life"; but no account was given of the constitution, the government, the work, the officers, and the ordinances implied in the use of the word Church, as interpreted by the New Testament.¹

To these, attention must now be given; for it is manifest that the functions of a Christian Church are not exhausted in seeking to further the sanctification of its own members; it is an aggressive as well as a conservative organization; it is to be employed in preserving the truth and edifying the saints, but also in diffusing the truth and subduing the world to Christ. In view of its two-fold office, we assign it a separate place in this treatise.

I. CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

In regard to the constitution, government, and work of a Christian Church, the following statements may be made:—

1. That the apostles, either by word or action, have determined what ought to be the polity of Christian churches to the end of time. (a) 1 Cor. xiv. 33, 40; xii. 12 sq. (cf. vii. 15). (b) 1 Cor. iv. 17; vii. 17; xi. 16, 34. (c) Acts xiv. 23; Titus, i. 5 (cf. Acts xx. 17; Phil. i. 1, &c.). (d) Heb. xiii. 7, 17; Acts xx. 28; 1 Peter v. 1-4; Titus ii. 15. (e) 1 Cor. ix. 14 (cf. vv. 7-11); Gal. vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. (f) 1 Cor. v. 1-13; 2 Thess. iii. 6 (cf. Matt. xviii. 15 sq.; 1 Tim. iii. 15). (g) 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2; xiv. 34-36 (cf. 1 Tim. ii. 12). (h) Acts xiv. 26, 28; xv. 2, 3.

¹Dagg (J. L.) "Church Order"; Ripley (H. J.) "Church Polity"; Reynolds (J. L.) "Church Polity"; Dexter (H. M.) "Congregationalism: What is it? Whence is it? How does it work?" Punchard (G.) "History of Congregationalism"; Litton (E. A.) "The Church of Christ"; Jacob (G. A.) "The Eccl. Polity of the New Testament"; Whately (R.) "The Kingdom of Christ"; King (P.) "An Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Churches"; Davidson (S.) "The Eccl. Polity of the New Testament Unfolded"; "Ecclesia," "First Series," "Second Series"; Cunningham (W.) "Discussions on Church Principles"; Smith (T.) "Presbyterianism, not Prelacy, the Scriptural and Primitive Polity"; Lindsay (A. L.) "Œcumenicity in Relation to the Church of England"; Steveus (A.) "An Essay on Church Polity"; Hooker (R.) "Laws of Eccl. Polity"; Rothe (R.) "Die Anfänge der Christlichen Kirche"; Ritschl (A.) "Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche."

These passages show (a) that, in the apostle's view, order should reign in the churches of Christ, every member filling his own place and doing his own work; (b) that essentially the same principles and practices were taught by Paul in all the churches under his care, the practices resting upon the principles; (c) that he was wont to organize churches, and appoint elders or pastors over them, wherever there was a group of converts; (d) that these elders had everywhere substantially the same rank and work in the churches, and were to be treated accordingly; (e) that they were, as a rule, entitled to a reasonable support from those for whom they labored, if they gave their whole time to the work; and (f) that the churches, as such, were charged with the duty of maintaining Christian doctrine and discipline. These various items fully justify our statement, unless it can be proved that the church arrangements of the apostolic age were temporary; and, if that can be shown, it will, of course, be impossible to prove that Christians are under obligation to form themselves into societies at all. But evidently the presumption is altogether in favor of our statement; and it belongs to those who deny the permanency of church-life and order to show cause for their denial.

2. That the word "polity" is used by us in the sense of constitution and government; while the word "church" is used to denote a society of baptized believers, maintaining together the worship and ordinances of Christ, according to his revealed will. For this use of the word church, see Matt. xviii. 17; Acts v. 11; viii. 1; xi. 22, 26; xii. 1, 5; xiii. 1; xiv. 23, 27; xv. 3, 4, 22, 41; xvi. 5; xviii. 22; xx. 17, 28; Rom. xvi. 1, 4, 16, 23; 1 Cor. i. 2; iv. 17; vi. 4; vii. 17; x. 32; xi. 16, 18, 22; xiv. 4, 5, 12, 19, 23, 28, 33, 34, 35; xvi. 1, 19, and other passages, about ninety times in the New Testament.

The word ecclesia is also used in the New Testament to denote (a) all the churches in a part or the whole of the world, as being in some sense one. — See Acts ix. 31, though the singular is not absolutely certain in this place; and 1 Tim. iii. 5, and 1 Cor. xii. 28, though the word may possibly refer in these places to a particular church, — indeed, we think it does in the former; (b) all Christians in heaven and on earth. — See Eph. i. 22; iii. 10; v. 24, 25, 27, 29, 32; and (c) a public assembly, whether orderly or not, but, properly, one capable of civil action. — See Acts xix. 32, 39, 41. But these uses of the word are infrequent; and the New Testament gives us no reason to connect the word “polity” with the word “church” when employed in the senses marked (a) and (b); while (c) is the original and secular meaning of the word, of no importance to us, except as accounting for its ordinary Christian use. Twice it is used with reference to the Jewish assembly or congregation (namely, Acts vii. 38; Hebrew ii. 12).

3. The primary relation of the members of a Christian church to one another is that of equality and fraternity. They are all brethren; all entitled to the same privileges, all kings and priests unto God. Matt. xxiii. 8; Acts vi. 3; 1 Cor. viii. 12; Gal. iii. 26 sq.; iv. 7 (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 12 sq.; Gal. vi. 10; Eph. ii. 18 sq.; Heb. iii. 6; 1 Tim. vi. 2; 1 Peter ii. 9; Rev. i. 6; 1 Peter v. 3.)

Hence, social and civil distinctions do not affect one's position in the church. A son may be the spiritual teacher and overseer of his father, or a servant of his master. Hence, too, in the church, men do not claim office as a right, but are put in office by the act of their brethren. Fitness for official service is the only good reason for appointment to it.

4. In the last instance, it belongs to every church as a whole, and not to its officers, to exclude and receive members; the right to exclude presupposing the right to receive (Rom. xiv. 1; Matt. xviii. 17; 1 Cor. v. 13; 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14 (cf. Titus iii. 10, 11); and see also Acts i. 23; vi. 3, 4, 5; xv. 2.)

The members of a church cannot transfer their authority to others, for it is intrusted to them; and the use of it is a duty no less than a right. They may perhaps do a particular act, agreed upon, through representatives; but there is no Scriptural ground for more than this. The so-called council at Jerusalem may be thought to furnish an example of submitting a particular point to others for final decision; but neither that nor the nature of the case warrants a general transfer of rights and duties to any other body. For, in the first place, there is no valid reason to suppose that the church polity sanctioned by the apostles is not adapted to all times and peoples, since true religion fits men for responsibility: and, in the second place, such a transfer, once made, cannot easily be revoked; and, therefore, by making it, the members of a church interfere, more or less, with the rights and duties of their successors.

Whether all who belong to a church, or only the brethren, should act in receiving and excluding members is somewhat doubtful; see 1 Tim. ii. 12; but, in a majority of Baptist churches, all are expected to act, if they see fit to do so. The voice of a majority is binding on the whole body.— (See 2 Cor. ii. 6.)

5. The members of a Christian church ought to receive into the same those, and those only, who are baptized on a credible profession of their faith, and who have reasonably correct views of Christian doctrine. Matt x. 32, 37, 38; xxviii. 19 (cf. xvi. 16); John iii. 5; iv. 1; Acts ii. 41; viii. 12, 13; 1 Tim. i. 19, 20 (cf. 1 Cor. v. 5, 13; Titus iii. 10).

As the essential prerequisites for admission to a Christian church are given in the New Testament, no church can rightfully welcome to its fellowship persons who are not believed to have those prerequisites; nor is any church at liberty to insist on qualifications other than those virtually prescribed by the New Testament.

We say "virtually prescribed"; and we think the last qualification named above, to wit, "reasonably correct views of Christian doctrine," to be in this way prescribed; for it is implied in the law of discipline for heretics and errorists. A man who will probably sow error in the church that receives him ought not to be received; for the law of self-preservation and efficiency forbids it. But regard must be had to the age and circumstances of a candidate, in deciding whether he has "reasonably correct views of doctrine."

It may properly be added, that persons should be received to baptism and church-membership as soon as they give to the members of the church satisfactory evidence of their faith and desire to obey the Saviour's commands.

6. The members of a Christian church are responsible for the proper discipline of offenders belonging to the body. This appears from (a) Matt. xviii. 15-17; Matt. v. 23, 24. (b) 1 Cor. v. 1-13. (c) 1 Tim. i. 19, 20 (cf. 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). (d) Titus iii. 10. (e) 2 Thess. iii. 6 (cf. 1 Tim. v. 8); also 1 Tim. v. 19.

It is evident, therefore, that there are at least five kinds of offences, for any one of which a person ought to be excluded from the church; namely, (a) wrong-doing to a brother in the church, for which satisfaction is refused; (b) gross immorality of any kind; (c) inculcating religious error; (d) creating division in the church; (e) idleness, meddlesomeness, or disregard of manifest family obligations.

In case of flagrant immorality or crime, the offender ought to be promptly excluded, without waiting to see whether he repents or not; but, if he then gives convincing proof of repentance, he may in due time be restored.

No charge against an elder or pastor of a church should be received, unless it is sustained by two or three witnesses,—a rule which seems to presuppose eminent integrity and self-control in such an officer, making it particularly improbable that he will commit an offence worthy of discipline.

In case of special doubt or difficulty, it is sometimes wise for a church to seek the advice of judicious brethren from without, or of a council of delegates from other churches, before giving its final judgment.

All the important business of a church ought to be transacted at meetings properly notified as business meetings, so that all members who desire to do so may be present, and share in its action.

7. It belongs to a Christian church to select for official service such of its members as it deems qualified for the same. Acts i. 21 sq.; vi. 3 (cf. xiii. 2. 3; xiv. 26, 27; xv. 2).

The action of the church under the direction of the apostles, before the day of Pentecost, cannot be relied upon as certainly expressing the mind of Christ; yet the presumption that it did so in the instance cited is very strong; for we find the apostles, after the Pentecost, directing the church to repeat its action in the choice of another grade of officers. These two cases evidently establish a precedent, and reveal a principle; and we find nothing inconsistent with this precedent and principle in the later teaching of the apostles. We have, I think, a right to presume that the churches were always called to choose their pastors and deacons, though the formal act of consecration was performed by apostles or elders.¹

8. As a rule, churches ought to respect the action of one another; for, though organically separate, they are under the same law, animated by the same spirit, seeking the same end, and intrusted with equal authority.

Hence the ordination of a minister by one church may be properly accepted by others as valid; yet this act is of such a nature as to render the advice of a council of delegates from several churches very desirable, if not imperative. Should the council deem the candidate presented unworthy of ordination, and thus disagree with the church calling it, the latter may have power to go on and ordain the man: but it is rarely or never wise to do so; and the man thus ordained would have no claim to be recognized by other churches as a competent and trustworthy minister.

Hence, too, the discipline of one church should be treated as valid and just by other churches. Exceptions to this rule must be of very rare occurrence; for the relation of churches to one another is fraternal; and a spirit of mutual confidence ought to be cherished.

¹ Compare Clemens Romanus; 1 Ep. ad Corinthios, c. 44, συνεῦδοκῆσάς τῆς ἐκκλησίας πάσης.

This is what churches ought to be and to do, according to the apostolic teaching; but, if any so-called churches differ essentially in doctrine or in polity from the New Testament standard, their action need not, and oftentimes should not, be considered as valid.

9. Without risk to self-control or separate responsibility to Christ, churches may combine their resources and influence for the furtherance of religious or benevolent enterprises (Acts xi. 29, 30; Gal. ii. 10; 2 Cor. viii. and ix).

It is evident from these passages that, under the direction of Paul, a systematic and united effort was made by the churches of Macedonia and Achaia to assist, by a large contribution of money, their poor brethren in Judea. It also appears that a well-known and trusted brother was associated by the churches with Paul for transmitting this contribution. But it does not appear that any ecclesiastical body, superior to the churches, was called into existence, or was engaged in this work. By what method the churches appointed the brother referred to, we are not informed. One church may have chosen him, and the other churches may have been asked to concur in the choice; or the several churches may have made the election by delegates empowered to act for them. It is plain, however, as before stated, that delegates can only act for churches in the particular matter intrusted to them. If they do more than this, their action can be only advisory, binding themselves, perhaps, but not the churches.

But the members of a Christian church, fully organized for growth and service, may be divided into three classes, laical, diaconal, and clerical; and a few words must be said as to the particular functions of each.

10. The lay members of a church are required to pay suitable deference to their officers, and, along with the deacons, to see that their pastors have reasonable compensation for their official work. (Heb. xiii. 7, 17; Gal. vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 17, 18; 1 Cor. ix. 14 (cf. vv. 7-11).

Of course they are to share in all the work of the church, previously described, every one endeavoring to serve the body according to his special ability (1 Cor. xii. 12 sq.; Rom. xii. 4 sq.). The decision as to what is reasonable pay for the official work done by a pastor must be left to the judgment of the whole church. But if any layman of means differ from the church, thinking the pastors ought to be paid more than is judged to be a reasonable compensation by the body, he is not to be blamed for making up what he considers the deficiency. It is doubtful whether a church has a right to fix the sum which each one of its members shall pay in support of public worship, and, in case of refusal, to deal with the delinquent by way of discipline. Nor is it certain that every member of a church ought to pay for the support of preaching in proportion to his income. Yet the salary of a pastor, though raised by voluntary contributions, is not a gift to him, nor alms from the church.

11. The deacons of a church ought to assist the pastor in the subordinate duties of his office, especially in caring for the sick and the poor (Acts vi. 1 sq.; Rom. xii. 7; xvi. 1, 2; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 8-12).

It is sometimes thought that deacons, by virtue of their office, have charge of all the finances of the church; but there is no adequate proof of this. A church may select for its treasurer one who is not a deacon, or may appoint a financial committee to look after pecuniary matters. The duties of a deacon are of a semi-spiritual character, and are determined by the amount of help which the pastor needs. In small churches, having pastors, there may be no occasion, for a time, for the service of deacons; yet it may be wise, even in such cases, to have at least one, who can take the lead, should the office of pastor become vacant.

From the statement of Justin Martyr, in his "First Apology," it is almost certain that deacons distributed the bread and wine at the Lord's Supper; but the New Testament does not allude to this as one of their functions.

Deacons should be selected for office by the church of which they are members, and which they are to serve; and should be set apart to their work by prayer and laying on of hands, the pastor or bishop naturally leading in the consecration.

12. The pastors of Christian churches are to watch over the churches which they serve, instruct them in the gospel, rebuke false teachers, and refute their errors, insist upon suitable discipline; and, in a word, be leaders, teachers, and examples to the flock in all spiritual things (Acts xx. 17, 28; Eph. iv. 11, 12; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1-7; v. 1, 17; Titus i. 5-9; Heb. xiii. 7, 17; 1 Peter v. 1-4; 1 Tim. iv. 11-14; 2 Tim. ii. 2).¹

For the use of the word pastors, see Eph. iv. 11 (and cf. John xxi. 16; Acts xx. 28; 1 Peter v. 2; Matt. xxvi. 31; John x. 11 sq.; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Peter ii. 25). For the use of the word teachers, see Eph. iv. 11 (cf. Acts xiii. 1; 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29; 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; iv. 3; Heb. v. 12; James iii. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 2). For the word bishops, see Acts xx. 28; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 7 (cf. 1 Peter ii. 25; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Heb. xii. 15; 1 Peter v. 2). For elders, see Acts xi. 30; xiv. 23; xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; xvi. 4; xx. 17; xxi. 18; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 17, 19; Titus i. 5; James v. 14; 1 Peter v. 1; 2 John i.; 3 John i). For presidents or leaders, see 1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Tim. iii. 11 (cf. Rom. xii. 8); Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24 (cf. ii. 6; Luke xxii. 26; Acts xv. 22).

¹Müller (J.) "Von der göttlichen Einsetzung des geistlichen Amtes," Abhandlungen, pp. 468-657; Nitzsch (C. I.) "Praktische Theologie"; Hoppin (J. M.) "The Office and Work of the Christian Ministry"; Vinet (A.) "Pastoral Theology"; Ripley (H. J.) "Sacred Rhetoric"; Wayland (F.) "The Ministry of the Gospel"; Cannon (J. S.) "Lectures on Pastoral Theology"; Beecher (H. W.) "Yale Lectures on Preaching"; Hall (J.) "God's Word through Preaching"; Storrs (H. R.) "Preaching without Notes"; Taylor (W. M.) "The Ministry of the Word"; Blaikie (W. G.) "The Work of the Ministry"; Porter (N.) "Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching"; Broadus (J. A.) "Preparation and Delivery of Sermons," and "History of Preaching"; Vinet (A.) "Histoire de la Prédication"; Ehrenfeuchter (F.) "Die Praktische Theologie," &c.; Zincke (F. B.) "The Duty and Discipline of Extemporary Preaching"; McIlvaine (J. H.) "Elocution: the Sources and Elements of its Power"; Day (H. N.) "The Art of Discourse."

That the words, "elder" and "overseer," or "bishop," refer to the same officer in a church is evident (a) from their being used interchangeably; (b) from the identity of qualifications required of them; (c) from the way in which overseers and deacons are named together,—as if they were the only officers of a church.¹

Against this it is urged (1) that Titus had Episcopal authority in Crete (Titus i. 5); but there is no sufficient evidence of this. The brief direction of Paul is fairly accounted for, by assuming that Titus was an evangelist, commissioned to effect a further organization of the churches by the action, or with the co-operation of the same. It is safe to presume that he performed a definite service in the usual way, but with Paul's authority.

(2.) That the "angels of the seven churches," addressed by John, were bishops or overseers, holding an office superior to that of "elders." There is, however, much doubt in the minds of good interpreters as to the significance of the word, "angels," in the passages referred to; and there is little or no evidence for the assertion, that they were diocesan bishops.

Again, it appears that many churches had more elders than one; and this may have been the case with all. — (See Acts xi. 30; Phil. i. 1; Acts xiv. 23; Titus i. 5). Yet the use of the singular number in 1 Tim. iii. 2, and Titus i. 7, compared with 1 Tim. iii. 8, 11, 12, has suggested the idea, that there was but one pastor in some of the churches. In most of the larger cities, there were doubtless several small congregations, as well as several pastors.

It will also be observed (1) that bishops were overseers in the Church, and not lords over it; (2) that, in distinction from deacons, they must be "apt to teach"; and (3) that they were to look after the spiritual interests of the Church by preaching, as their principal work.

¹ Winer, Neander, De Wette, Meyer, Huther, Wiesinger, Bickell, Rothe, Jacobson, Alford, Ellicott, Conybeare; see especially Mellor (E.) "Priesthood in the Light of the New Testament,"—a very spirited and able work. Hackett and others agree on this point.

There is scarcely sufficient ground for the opinion that elders were of two classes,—teaching and ruling; but this may have been the case. The only passage which obviously suggests this view is 1 Tim. v. 17,—“Let the elders that preside well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in word and teaching.” But the word translated “labor” means literally, “to work hard,”—“to weary or beat out one’s self by labor”; and the apostle may intend to say that such as give themselves wholly and exhaustively to the ministry of the word deserve more respect and compensation than others. This is the view of Mosheim; and it appears to be very reasonable. But Dr. Ripley thinks the word, “elders,” here includes deacons; and his judgment always deserves consideration.

The authority of pastors is moral,—depending on their character, their call from God, their Christian knowledge, and their position as religious teachers. They will be likely, in ordinary circumstances, to have all the respect and confidence which they deserve. They will mould their people,—“Like priest, like people.” Probably ministers do not have as much control over their people as the New Testament authorizes them to have; but it is because they are not sufficiently wise and godly to win it.

Pastors should be selected by the whole church which they are to serve; but, in the first instance, they should be set apart to their work by the aid and approval of a council of elders and laymen from other churches. The service of ordination should include prayer, and the laying on of hands by the eldership (1 Tim. iv. 14). But, as we understand the matter, the vote of a properly organized council, recognizing one as called of God to the ministry, and deciding to set him apart to that work, is the essential act in ordination. All that follows is but a fitting announcement of this act, (1) by the imposition of hands, publicly; and (2) by solemn prayer to God for his blessing on the person ordained. It is this vote of a council (or of a church) which, under God, authorizes a given person to administer the ordinances, and to perform all the duties assigned to the ministry in well-ordered churches. Churches and councils should beware of acting hastily or under pressure in ordaining persons to the ministry (1 Tim. v. 22). All the preliminary steps should be taken prayerfully and deliberately by the church.

It may also be remarked, that, while ordination does not impart any official gift or grace to him who receives it, it does promote order and efficiency in the churches; first, by keeping out of the ministry not a few persons who are unqualified for it; and secondly, by giving moral countenance and support to suitable men in and after entering it. Thus the churches are able to protect themselves, in a measure, against fluent and plausible men who do not hold the truth, and to secure a better class of "pastors and teachers" than they would otherwise have.

But should ministers of other evangelical denominations be ordained, if they would become Baptist ministers? In many instances this appears to be scarcely necessary; for they are already well-known and approved, needing no recommendation to Baptist churches, save this: that they fully accept our views of the doctrines and ordinances of Christ. A council for examination and recognition would, therefore, be as suitable as one for ordination; yet there would be no sacrilege in the latter. For ordination confers no indelible character or permanent grace; and, if circumstances require this, may be repeated a dozen times without harm,—as often, indeed, as the pastor is placed over a new church. But ordinarily there seems to be no sufficient reason for such a course, or for re-ordaining a Pedobaptist minister who becomes a Baptist; for, setting aside the figment of sacramental grace, ordination and recognition are virtually the same, with this difference only: that the latter treats the candidate as one who has been acting as a minister before, though not in fellowship with those now receiving him. The essential point in such a case is that the council, after suitable examination, recognize by vote the person in question as qualified to do all the work of a regular Baptist minister, and as worthy of the confidence of Baptist churches in doing the duties of the ministry.

It is often the duty of pastors and churches to take the initiative in directing the minds of suitable men to the work of the ministry. Females are not eligible to the office of pastor or evangelist; but they may be made deaconesses, though not as substitutes for men. Rom. xvi. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 11 (cf. v. 3, 9).

13. Evangelists are simply preachers of the gospel, or ministers who have no pastoral charge (Acts xxi. 8 (cf. viii. 40); Eph. iv. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 5). Many missionaries are strictly evangelists. As to the wisdom of setting apart a class of ministers for irregular, itinerant preaching, in a region where pastors and churches abound, there will be honest differences of opinion; but, in those parts of a country where there are but few churches supplied with pastors, evangelists are necessary.

14. The apostles and prophets of the first age have had no successors thus far; and there is no promise of them for the future. Their work could be done once for all. But they still speak to us by the Scriptures; and their position, commission, and illumination were such that all Christians should obey their word.

II. CHRISTIAN ORDINANCES.

There are but two ordinances or sacred rites enjoined upon Christians by the New Testament; namely, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Both are emblematic of central facts in the Christian religion; and together they teach in a very impressive manner the vital doctrines of the gospel. It is therefore important to understand their meaning and use, to guard against their misinterpretation, and to keep them as they were delivered by Christ to his apostles, and by the apostles to the primitive Christians.

I. CHRISTIAN BAPTISM.

We propose to consider the external rite, the significance of the rite, the subjects of the rite, and the relation of the rite to John's baptism.

1. The External Rite.

Aside from the words employed, the external rite of baptism consists in an immersion of the candidate in water, unto or into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

That the rite includes an immersion of the subject in water is learned, —

(a) From the meaning and use of the word βαπτίζω, which was employed by Christ himself and the inspired apostles to denote the rite. Strenuous and learned efforts have been made to show that the word in question does not point to immersion as the primitive rite; but these efforts are unavailing. The proper meaning of the word — a meaning which it has always retained in the Greek language, and a meaning which it always has, unless the circumstances of the case point to a tropical use — is immerse. The figurative applications of the word may all be traced back to this, as the literal and radical sense expressed by the verb. To this view the best lexicographers assent.¹

(b) From the use of λούω, and, perhaps, λουτρόν with reference to baptism. Acts xxii. 16 (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 11; Titus iii. 5; Eph. v. 26; John xiii. 10; Acts ix. 37; xvi. 33; Heb. x. 22; 2 Peter ii. 22). On the first of these passages, Dr. Hackett remarks: "The sort of outward washing expressed by this verb has been noticed on xvi. 33. Hence, there can be no question as to the mode of baptism in this instance; for if it be maintained that βάπτισμα is uncertain in its meaning, a definition is added in ἀπόλουσαι, which removes the doubt." His note on the simple word in xvi. 33, is this: "This verb," says Dr.

¹ Sophocles (E. A.) "Greek Lexicon of the Later and Byzantine Periods," s. v.; he remarks: "There is no evidence that Luke and Paul and the other writers of the New Testament put upon this verb meanings not recognized by the Greeks"; Liddell and Scott, "Greek-English Lexicon, based on the German work of F. Passow," s. v.; Pape (W.) "Handwörterbuch der Griechischen Sprache," s. v.; Robinson (E.) "Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament," s. v.; Grimm (C. L. W.) "Lexicon Græco-Latinum in Libros Novi Testamenti," s. v.; "Stephani Thesaurus Græcæ Linguae," tertia editio, and other works.

Robinson (Lex. N. T. s. v.), "signifies to wash the entire body, not merely a part of it, like νίπτω." Trench says: "νίπτω and νίψασθαι almost always express the washing of a part of the body . . . ; while λούω, which is not so much 'to wash' as 'to bathe,' and λούσθαι, or in common Greek, λούεσθαι, 'to bathe one's self,' imply always, not the bathing of a part of the body, but of the whole." The other passages cited merit careful attention, as confirming this account of the word. Baptism is a bathing.

(c) From the circumstances mentioned by New Testament writers in connection with baptism (Mark i. 9; John iii. 23; Acts viii. 38, 39). It is sometimes said that the reason for resorting to places where there was much water was this, that the people and their animals might be supplied with a very necessary means of refreshment and cleanliness. But this reason is nowhere suggested by the sacred writers; and it has never been shown that there was any such lack of water in Palestine, at that time, that a multitude, even an army, could not subsist comfortably in any of the larger towns. Besides the natural sequence of thought in John iii. 23, makes it almost certain that the abundant waters of Enon¹ were convenient for administering the rite of baptism, and that the place was chosen on that account. "But John also was baptizing"—not holding great meetings, and preaching, but—"baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, because there was much water there: and they came, and were baptized."—(Alford's Trans.)

(d) From references to the ritual act, in stating its import (Rom. vi. 3-5; Col. ii. 12). Says Lightfoot on Col. ii. 12: "Baptism is the grave of the old man, and the birth of the new. As he sinks beneath the baptismal waters, the believer buries there all his corrupt affections and past sins; as he emerges thence, he rises regenerate, quickened to new hopes and a new life. . . . Thus baptism is an image of his participation, both in the death and in the resurrection of Christ.—(See

¹ See G. W. Samson, "The Sufficiency of Water for Baptizing at Jerusalem, and elsewhere in Palestine," in "The Design of Baptism," &c., esp. p. 136 sq.

Apost. Const. III. 17). — The immersion is the dying with him; the emersion is the rising with him. For this twofold image, as it presents itself to St. Paul, see especially Rom. vi. 3 sq." And this is but a sample of the concessions made by those who do not insist on immersion. A very large number of scholars, belonging to churches that do not practise immersion might be quoted in support of the view, that the passages cited above presuppose immersion as the customary rite in the apostolic age.

But, if it was the customary rite, what evidence is there that it was not the uniform rite? This evidence ought to be very clear, to be of any avail against the presumption in favor of a ritual act that was always the same, and sure to speak the same language. But, instead of being clear and stringent, it is inferential and weak.

(e) From the practice of "the early churches," — meaning by this expression, the churches of the second century and the beginning of the third. This practice was evidently immersion; and it furnishes a presumption of more or less force in favor of immersion as the apostolic rite. No one ought to rely upon it with entire confidence; for it may have been one of the earliest errors that crept into the churches, as Coleman suggests; but it is not antecedently very probable that error would first enter at this door, since the Greek language was largely used in the West as well as in the East.

Pouring was indeed allowed in case of sickness; and Cyprian defends it on the plea of necessity. God will accept compendia, when the full service is impossible. But on whose authority does he say this? In such case, compendia are dispendia.

(f) From the practice of the Greek Church down to the present time. In proof of this statement, appeal may be made to many high authorities (for example, to Alexander de Stourdza, Russian State Councillor, and member of the Greek Church; to Dean Stanley, the historian of the Greek Church; and to Dr. Arnold, for many years a missionary in Greece). There may have been instances in which a priest has forborne to immerse an infant; but these instances must have been extremely rare. The almost if not quite uniform practice of the Greek Church is immersion; and I do not think any native Greek would admit that βαπτίζω means either to sprinkle or to pour.

(g) From the concessions of those who practice affusion or sprinkling. Among these may be named A. P. Stanley, G. F. Howson, F. W. Robertson, J. B. Mozley, Thomas Chalmers, E. Pressensé, Edw. Reuss, Daniel Schenkel, H. A. W. Meyer, W. M. L. De Wette, A. Tholuck, L. J. Rückert, A. Neander, H. Olshausen, F. Bleek, H. Alford, C. J. Ellicott, J. P. Lange, J. B. Lightfoot, J. H. A. Ebrard, K. F. A. Kahnis in his "Die Lutherische Dogmatik historisch-genetisch dargestellt," II. s. 319, ff. besonders s. 337.¹

It has been customary to mention also the use of the prepositions εἰς, ἐν, and ἐκ, in connection with going into the water, being baptized in the water, and coming out of the water, as confirmatory of the view that the sacred rite included an immersion of the candidate; and this, at least, may be said with confidence, that the use of these prepositions is precisely what might have been expected, if the rite was performed by immersion. Nor is the circumstance that the element, water, is put several times in the dative without a preposition, thus denoting the means,—if, indeed, this is the true explanation of the dative in every such case,—any reason for denying that the rite was performed by immersion; for baptism is with water, whether it is immersion, or pouring, or sprinkling. Yet we do not see that much reliance can be placed on the argument drawn from the use of the prepositions named above; though whatever bearing they have on the question is in favor, rather than against, the Baptist view.

¹ Of Special examinations, the following may be mentioned: Stuart (M.) "Is the Manner of Christian Baptism prescribed in the New Testament?" Biblical Repository, Vol. III. p. 288 sq.; Höfling (W. F.) "Das Sacrament der Taufe"; Matthies (C. L.) "Baptismatis Expositio, Biblica, Historica, Dogmatica"; Dale (J. W.) "Classic Baptism," "Judaic Baptism," "Christic and Patristic Baptism"; Hutchings (S.) "The Mode of Baptism"; Ripley (H. J.) "Reply to Stuart on Baptism"; Wiberg (A.) "On Baptism"; Chase (I.) "The Design of Baptism," &c.; Carson (A.) "On Baptism"; Conant (T. J.) "On the Meaning and Use of βαπτίζω in Greek Authors"; Crystal (J.) "A History of the Modes of Christian Baptism"; Dressler (E.) "Die Lehre von der Heiligen Taufe"; Ingham (R.) "Handbook of Baptism," Vol. I; Gotch (F. W.) "A Critical Examination of the Rendering of the word βαπτίζω, in the Ancient, and many of the Modern Versions of the N. T."

But the following objections have been urged by Dr. Robinson against supposing that the word, βαπτίζω always retains its classical sense in the New Testament :—

1. It is used in Luke xi. 38, to signify ablution, or affusion, as may be seen from Mark vii. 2, 4, 8 (cf. 2 Kings iii. 11). But, in this view, he differs from the ablest critics of Germany. Indeed, the references of Dr. Robinson prove nothing; because the circumstances are not described as similar. Couches, as well as smaller articles, were naturally plunged in water to cleanse them. If they included a frame, it was doubtless separable into parts, which could easily be immersed; but Tischendorf omits “couches” in his last edition.

2. He supposes that Acts ii. 41, and iv. 4, prove eight thousand persons to have been baptized in Jerusalem within a short period; and that there was not water enough in the city to immerse so many. We respond (a) That there were pools in and around the city, large enough to immerse almost any number of persons at a time; for Dr. Hackett, who was not given to exaggeration, and who had visited the city, remarks, “that the pools so numerous and large, which encircled Jerusalem . . . afforded ample means for the administration of the rite”; and adds, that “The habits of the East, as every traveller knows, would present no obstacle to such a use of the public reservoirs”; (b) that a pool large enough for the immersion of one might serve for the immersion of five thousand in succession; (c) that five thousand, instead of eight thousand, was probably the number of believers in Jerusalem at the time referred to in Acts iv. 4; (d) that it is by no means certain that three thousand were baptized on the day of Pentecost; yet the apostles and their assistants could easily have baptized this number in a few hours. Indeed, immersion may be administered in a reverent manner, as rapidly as sprinkling or pouring.¹

3. He urges that βαπτίζω was transferred, and not translated, in the early Latin version; hence it did not mean the same as immergo.

Reply. This transference of the word can be readily explained without supposing any difference of meaning between βαπτίζω and immergo; for the Greek language was generally understood, and largely used during the first three centuries of the Christian era. Hence the word βαπτίζω first used to describe the act of Christian baptism, would naturally become well known; and, like the word εὐχαριστία, be retained, when other less important words were translated. But it must also be said that the earliest Latin version of the New Testament, of which we have any traces, was the one used by Tertullian in North Africa; and that in this version the Greek verb is translated by tingo or tinguo.² Tertullian also used the nouns, tinctio and intinctio, to denote baptism. These words point to immersion as the ritual act, especially when compared with mergo, immergo, lavo, and lavacrum, which he employs likewise; but they suggest, at the same time, the idea of some sacred and mystical energy, imparted to the baptismal waters by the presence of the Holy Spirit, — the incipient doctrine of baptismal regeneration.³

4. He says that certain baptismal fonts of an early date were too small for the immersion of adults, and must therefore have been used for sprinkling or pouring. But it may be remarked, in reply, that the fonts examined by him were subsequently examined by Dr. Hackett, and pronounced large enough for the immersion of adults. Surely, then, they were absurdly large for any other mode of administering the rite in question. Besides, it is difficult to fix the date of these fonts. More recently one has been brought to light in ancient Tyre, having steps leading down into it at one end, and being manifestly intended for the baptism of adults; it is a monolith, large enough within for the immersion of adults. The church in which it was found was built, we believe, in the fifth century.

¹ "The Design of Baptism, with other Baptismal Tracts for the Times," p. 112 sq.; Barclay (J. T.) "The City of the Great King"; Robinson (E.) "Biblical Researches in Palestine," &c., I. p. 323 sq.; Williams (Geo.) "The Holy City."

² See Rönisch (H.) "Das Neue Testament Tertullians."

³ It may be proper to remark, that the writer is not indebted to Dr. Dale for this view, it being one that he has held and taught for many years.

Others add to these objections, the plea that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was conceived of and represented as an effusion; and therefore baptism with water must have been performed by affusion. This argument has been put in the forefront of the controversy by some Pedobaptist writers. But it seems to us destitute of any force; for it cannot be denied, that the same operation of an invisible and spiritual agent may be represented by different figures of speech. And it is perfectly natural to represent a very abundant communication of the Spirit as being poured out from above,—from God, or from Christ; while, on the other hand, it might be, and it surely was, by the word, βαπτίζω, represented as encompassing the apostles, and as being the very element or atmosphere of this new life. The two representations are distinct, but not inconsistent; for they present different sides of the same marvellous act. — See Acts ii. 17, 18, 33; also Isa. xlv. 3 (cf. Acts i. 4, 5; Joel iii. 1–5). But is it not true that, with those who reject immersion, sprinkling is more frequent than pouring? And does ἐξέω signify to “sprinkle”? Was the Holy Spirit “sprinkled” on the apostles? Were not their souls encompassed and pervaded by his presence? Was not the Pentecostal miracle a gift of new powers, rather than a purification, even if sprinkling were the proper symbol of any other purification than that by atoning blood?

As to the plea that Christianity is a spiritual faith, and therefore any thing like a scrupulous exactness in preserving the form of a rite is indefensible, we reply (1) that in symbolical language the form is essential, for it expresses the meaning: the form of the rite is the rite, for the rite itself is a form ; and (2) that "it is of the essence of disobedience and rebellion to assume to make commutations and substitutions of duty, — to transfer obligation to where it would be less inconvenient that it should be enforced, and to affect to render, in the form of preferred and easier services, an equivalent for the obedience which the righteous and supreme authority has distinctly required to be rendered in that harder service which is evaded." — (John Foster, "The Glory of the Age," 70.)

As to the formula which should be used by the administrator of baptism, we think it is virtually given in Matt. xxviii. 19. Not that the words there recorded are necessary to the validity of the act, nor that the Saviour designed to have his words repeated as a prescribed form ; but that they express briefly and clearly what ought to be said by the administrator. The preposition εἰς before τὸ ὄνομα signifies into or unto ; and the telic clause signifies that the candidate enters publicly into a very close relation to the Holy Trinity, avowing himself a servant of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

An abbreviated formula, mentioning only the name of Christ, may have been sometimes used by the apostles. — (See Acts ii. 38 ; viii. 16 ; xix. 5). But there is no certain evidence of this. From the time of Justin Martyr, A.D. 130, the formula given by Christ was carefully observed ; and, we presume, it was by the apostles themselves.

II. The Significance of the Rite.

In determining the significance of baptism, our appeal must be to the language of the New Testament on this point, and to the natural import of the rite itself ; for ritual acts are, to a certain extent, self-interpreting, and there can be no reasonable doubt that, in most instances, their true meaning lies on the face of them, — that they were chosen as being a sort of universal language, readily understood by men of every age and nation. Hence, where the natural language of the ritual act accords with the explanation of it by the sacred writers, there remains no ground for doubt ; assurance becomes doubly sure. And this is true in the present case.

For, looking at the ritual act, and at the language of Scripture, we remark (1) That it symbolizes the regeneration of the subject, as being, on the one hand, a dying to sin, and, on the other, a rising to holiness.—(See Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12; together with the passages cited under “Penalty of Sin,” (I.) (1) 2 (4), and under “Nature of Regeneration”). (2) The language of Prof. Lightfoot, quoted under (d) above, clearly expresses the meaning of Paul, but need not be repeated.

(2) That it commemorates the accomplished death and resurrection of Christ (Rom. vi. 3; Col. ii. 12; Mark x. 38, 39; Luke xii. 50). Says Dr. Döllinger, “St. Paul made this immersion a symbol of burial with Christ, and the emerging a sign of resurrection with him to a new life.” And Messner remarks, with equal clearness, “Peculiar to Paul is the manner in which he connects the two acts of the rite of baptism, as then administered; namely, the submersion and the emersion, with the idea of fellowship with Christ in his death and resurrection,—a view which, in this definite form, belongs to him alone. While the submersion symbolizes the putting-off of the old man, the emersion from the water is an emblem of the reception of a new divine life; and, because the former is considered by him as an effect of the death of Christ, the latter is brought into connection with the resurrection of Christ. Thus Paul connects the act of submersion with the death of Christ, and that of emersion with the resurrection of Christ,—a symbolism of the baptismal rite which has lost its significance with the disappearance of the rite as then observed.”¹

The same explanation of the apostle’s language may be found in the works of numerous Pedobaptist scholars; and there is no good reason whatever for doubting its correctness.

(3) That it represents this regeneration as a purifying change. Acts xxii. 16; Titus iii. 5; Eph. v. 26 (cf. 1 Peter iii. 21). To this part of the symbolism of baptism, those persons who reject immersion attach almost exclusive importance; and they maintain that this part of the meaning symbolized is set forth as clearly by sprinkling as by immersion. But there is abundant reason to doubt whether biblical writers ever express the idea of purification by the sprinkling or pouring of mere water upon a person or object.¹

¹ Messner (H.) “Die Lehre der Apostel,” s. 279–80.

The only passage where this seems at first sight to be the case is Ezek. xxxvi. 25, — "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you," &c. But the words "clean water" should rather be "pure water," meaning the "water of purification," in which the ashes of the heifer of purification had been steeped. Num. xix. 11-22 (cf. viii. 5-22). Says Hengstenberg, "The sprinkling with water has likewise the shedding of blood for its foundation. It was done with such water only as had in it the ashes of the sin-offering of the red heifer." — (See Heb. ix. 13, 14.) — "It is very evident that there is an allusion in this passage to the Mosaic rites of purification; especially to the holy water, in which the ashes of the red heifer were mixed, and which served as an antidote, first to the greatest of all defilements, — contact with a corpse, — and then to defilements in general."²

But washing or bathing in water is a natural symbol of purification; and, if Baptists have not insisted on this as often as on other ideas symbolized by immersion in water, it is perhaps due in part to a reaction of feeling against the exclusive reference made to it by Pedobaptists; yet they have by no means failed to recognize this part of the meaning conveyed by the rite. Says Dr. Chase, "In baptism, there is retained, in all its significancy, the idea of cleansing or purification; for the water in which we are buried is a purifying element. Thus there is a figurative washing away of sins, — a putting off of the body of sinful propensities, and, as it were, a depositing of it in the grave, — from which, in this emblem, we come forth as alive from the dead, to walk in newness of life, and at length to enter on the life everlasting."¹ And this is but a sample of the language often used by Baptists.

¹ For this view, the writer is indebted to an admirable and conclusive tract on the subject, by the Rev. J. C. Wightman.

² "Christology of the Old Testament," transl. by T. Meyer, Vol. II. p. 271 and Vol. III. p. 47.

It may be added in this place, that baptism is emblematical of the candidate's experience, — an act of confession by which his own conscience is obeyed and filled with peace (1 Peter iii. 21). It is fitly administered by regularly ordained ministers of the gospel; and, though its validity does not really depend on the spiritual or ecclesiastical standing of the administrator, it is highly important, for the sake of order, decorum, and a reverent performance of the rite, that the standing of the administrator should be in all respects unexceptionable.

If necessary, in order that the baptism of suitable candidates be not omitted, a church may even select one of its lay members to administer the ordinance: but this is very rarely, if ever, necessary. Only in extreme cases would it be wise to deviate thus from the usual order. We may also remark, that a baptism administered by a clergyman who has never been baptized himself may be valid for the candidate. The ordinance expresses the candidate's entrance upon a new life, — his union with Christ, not with the administrator; and, if it be reverently performed, need not be repeated.

III. The Subjects of the Rite.

On this point, Baptists differ more widely from other denominations than on the rite itself; or, rather, the difference between them and others on the former point is more important than the difference on the latter; for they hold that only believers in Christ are entitled to baptism, and that only those who give credible evidence of faith in him should be baptized.

In proof of this, they appeal, —

1. To the great commission (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 16). For it is believed that the verb translated "teach," in the former passage, means to "make disciples by teaching," even as Paul declares that "God was pleased by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe" (1 Cor. i. 21); and that the consecration by baptism is mentioned afterwards, because it was to be subsequent in fact, — first, discipleship in heart, then a public profession of it in baptism.

¹ "The Design of Baptism," &c., p. 21.

But this interpretation has been called in question; and it has been said that the participial clauses describe the way in which the duty expressed by the verb "teach" is to be performed: thus, "Go make all the nations disciples, by baptizing and teaching them all things which I have commanded you." That this is not required by the use of language in the New Testament may be seen by consulting the following passages (Matt. viii. 27; ix. 33, 35; xix. 25; xxi. 10, 20; xxvi. 8; also Matt. xvii. 14; xix. 3; xxii. 16; Luke vi. 35; Matt. xix. 28; also Col. iii. 16; Eph. v. 18–21; vi. 17, 18; 1 Tim. vi. 20; Acts xx. 29, 30, 31, 37, 38; xxii. 16; Joel i. 18 sq.; 1 Cor. xv. 58; 1 Tim. i. 12; Rom. xv. 25; James ii. 9; Luke ii. 45; Acts xv. 27; Heb. xiii. 13; 2 Peter ii. 5; Matt. xix. 22; also Wiberg and Ingham on Baptism). And that it is not the meaning which lies on the face of the passage may be proved by the impression which the passage makes on ninety-nine out of a hundred who read it, as well as by the course which the apostles took in spreading the gospel. — (See Hofmann (J. C. K. v.) "Der Schriftbeweis," II. s. 164). Yet if the word translated "teach" be understood to signify "make disciples," and the following participial clauses be understood to set forth in general the way of doing this, it is to be observed (a) That no one becomes a "disciple" of another, unless it be by his own preference and choice. (b) That such preference and choice presuppose a knowledge of the Master selected, and a willingness to be taught and trained by him. (c) That baptism would then be the act by which discipleship was formally avowed and openly begun. (d) That it would be an expression of faith in Christ, including a purpose to be guided by him in all things. And (e) That discipleship would only be consummated when the followers of Christ had been taught all things which he commanded.

But this last point suggests the remark, that a disciple is a learner, — not one who has learnt all which the Master has to teach; that a person is a disciple as soon as he accepts one as his teacher and guide. And this circumstance is almost, or quite, decisive against the interpretation proposed.

2. To the practice of the apostles and their contemporaries (Acts ii. 38, 41; viii. 12, 13; ix. 18; x. 44, 47; xvi. 14, 15, 31, 33; xviii. 8). There should, it would seem from these portions of the New Testament, be no doubt as to the practice of the apostles and those acting under their direction. Faith in Christ, with a radical change of heart towards God, preceded baptism. But, if it should be thought by any that the Great Commission, as given by Matthew, embraces both baptism and teaching in the work of making men disciples of Christ, — a view which we reject, — it would still be evident, from the course pursued by the apostles, that faith in Christ was required in order to baptism. Whatever knowledge must precede a hearty acceptance of Christ as Saviour and Lord must precede baptism and avowed discipleship.

3. To apostolic language concerning it (Rom vi. 3, 4; Gal. iii. 27; 1 Peter iii. 21). The language of Peter is a veritable crux interpretum. He says clearly enough what baptism is not; namely, “a putting away of filth of flesh,” the emphasis being on the word “flesh,” but more darkly what it is, — ἀλλὰ συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς ἐπερωτήματα εἰς θεόν — translated by Noyes, “The earnest seeking for a good conscience toward God”; by Alford, “The inquiry of a good conscience after God”; by the Bible Union Committee, “The requirement of a good conscience toward God”; and in the common version, “The answer of a good conscience toward God.” Tertullian appears to have had this passage in mind, when he wrote (de resur. carnis): anima non lavatione, sed responsione sancitur.

If, with Noyes, Wiesinger, and others, the genitive συνειδήσεως is regarded as objective, the expression, “good conscience,” must signify a state of mind resulting from obedience to the will of God, — a sense of peace and fellowship with him and an earnest seeking for this in the prescribed way must certainly presuppose faith in the seeker. If, with Alford, Huther, and many others, the genitive συνειδήσεως is held to be subjective, the expression, "good conscience," naturally signifies the candidate's purity of religious intention, resulting from a belief of the gospel and desire to obey the Lord. But against the view of Alford may be urged the remark of Huther, "That baptism, on the part of man, is not so much a seeking after God as rather a confession of having found him." Yet looking at Baptism from the sacramental point of view, and remembering that the entire life of a believer is a drawing near to God (see Thomas Aquinas, "de motu ad Deum"), a seeking after him, it must be easy to regard this as "the aim and end of the baptismal life." But any view of the passage is unfavorable to infant baptism; for infants neither seek nor obey a good conscience in baptism.

4. To the usage of the church for upwards of two centuries.—See "Christian Review," Vol. XVI. Dr. Ripley; and Vol. XIX. Dr. Chase; also "Baptist Quarterly," Vol. III. p. 168 sq.

But there are many persons who add to "believers in Christ," their children, as proper subjects of baptism.¹ And they rely upon such statements as follow to justify their view; namely,—

1. Baptism under the new covenant takes the place of circumcision under the old.

Reply. If this be true, it does not follow that the natural offspring of believers should be baptized: for the initiatory rite may belong to natural offspring in one case, and to spiritual in the other; to babes, and to "new-born babes."

¹See Wall (Wm.) "The History of Infant Baptism," &c.; Gale (J.) "Reflections on Mr. Wall's History of Infant Baptism," &c.; Hibbard (F. G.) "Christian Baptism," "Part First, Infant Baptism"; Ingham (R.) "The Theology of the Commission on the Subjects of Baptism," and "Christian Baptism: its Subjects"; Hodges (W.) "Baptism tested by Scripture and by History"; Booth (A.) "Pedobaptism Examined," &c., Vol. II. of his work on baptism; Chase (I.) "Infant Baptism an Invention of Men."

Being born of the flesh, and being born of the Spirit, may be prerequisite to circumcision and baptism respectively.

That this is true, we conclude (a) From the fact that God established the old covenant with Abraham and his natural seed (Gen. xvii. 10–14); but the new covenant with Christ and a spiritual seed (John iii. 3–7; Rom. ix. 6–8; ii. 28, 29; Gal. iii. 28, 29; 1 Peter i. 23; 1 Cor. iv. 15; James i. 18 (cf. Heb. v. 12, 14; 1 Peter ii. 1, 2; Matt. xi. 25; and see also Luke xiv. 26, 33; Mark iii. 34, 35; Heb. ii. 13; 1 Peter ii. 5; Heb. viii. 10, 11). (b) From the fact that the subjects of each rite are carefully described, and are not the same. — (See Gen. xvii. 10 sq.; and Mark xvi. 16; Acts viii. 12.) The male children of Jews, and the male servants of Jews, with their male children, were to be circumcised; while believers in Christ, both male and female, Jew and Gentile, were to be baptized.

But, still further, it is evident that baptism did not take the place of circumcision in the apostolic church:—

(1) From the fact that the rite of circumcision was practised by the Jewish Christians, along with baptism, for a considerable period (Acts xvi. 3; xi. 3 sq.; Gal. ii. 12 sq.; Acts xxi. 20 sq.). In proof of a distinction between the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's day, Hengstenberg (Ueber den Tag des Herrn, s. 104) says, "Mosheim appeals to the fact that the Sabbath was observed along with Sunday. Such a co-observance of the Sabbath has indeed no meaning, if Sunday had entered simply into its place."—"Oh, most wise Judge!" Even so a co-observance of circumcision has no meaning if baptism had entered simply into its place.

(2) From the fact that Paul, when opposing the circumcision of Gentile converts, never hints that baptism takes its place. Says Neander, "The dispute carried on with the Judaizing party on the necessity of circumcision would easily have given an opportunity of introducing this substitute, into the controversy, if it had really existed."¹

¹ See Smith (J. T.) "On the Covenant of Circumcision"; also "The Technobaptist."

2. Entire households were baptized by the apostles; and we must suppose there were infants in some of them. Acts xvi. 15, 33, 34; xviii. 8; 1 Cor. i. 16 (cf. xvi. 15, 17).

Reply. There is no evidence, nor is it probable, that any members of these households were infants or unbelievers. The best modern interpreters have dropped this argument.

3. Christ blessed little children, and said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven"; and, if infants are saved by Christ, of course they are to be baptized (Mark x. 13–16; Luke xviii. 15–17; Matt. xix. 13–15).

Reply. (1) The words, "Suffer little children to come unto me," do not point to babes, but to those a few years old, at least. (2) The language of Christ cannot be restricted to the children of believers; it means children as such. (3) The clause, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," as interpreted by Pedobaptists, affirms the salvation of all these and similar children, if it does of any. (4) Christ's disciples had not been accustomed to baptize little children, as such; for they did not see the propriety of their coming to Christ. (5) Christ did not baptize these children; for he baptized none. (6) There is no intimation that he now, for the first time, directed them to be baptized by his disciples. (7) The words, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," mean that persons of a child-like spirit belong to the kingdom; they compose it.

Says Archb. Thomson, "The account of the bringing of young children to Jesus unites again the three evangelists. Here, as often, St. Mark gives the most minute account of what occurred. After the announcement that the disposition of little children was the most meet for the kingdom of God, "He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." The childlike spirit, which in nothing depends upon its own knowledge, but seeks to be taught, is in contrast with the haughty pharisaism with its boast of learning and wisdom; and Jesus tells them that the former is the passport to his kingdom."¹ It has been justly said, that "to infer infant baptism from Christ's blessing little children proves nothing so much as that there is want of better argument. For the conclusion would, with greater probability, be derived thus : Christ blessed little children, and so dismissed them, but baptized them not ; therefore infants are not to be baptized."

¹ Smith (W.) "Dictionary of the Bible," Am. Ed. Vol. II. p. 1370.

4. Children are said to be holy by virtue of their parents' faith ; hence they must have been baptized (1 Cor. vii. 14).

Reply. Paul's argument seems to us to prove that the children of believers were not, as such, baptized ; for he argues that it is not contaminating for a Christian to live in wedlock with an unbeliever, because it is not contaminating for him to live with his children. But there could surely be no force in this to one whose children had all been brought into a covenant relation with God. The heathen companion and the baptized children would not have stood on the same level, would not have been in the same fold ; and hence the propriety of associating with the latter could not prove the propriety of doing the same with the former. — (See Neander, Rückert, Meyer, De Wette, Müller, Hackett, and others.)

5. The Jews would have made great complaint, if Christianity had not admitted children to baptism. But we read of no such complaint ; hence their infant seed were treated as well under the new covenant as under the old.

Reply. The Jews who believed in Christ during the apostolic period continued for the most part to practise circumcision ; and regarded Christianity, we doubt not, as a separate, additional blessing for those who believed in Christ. The new did not displace the old ; the rites of the new did not supersede the rites of the old : hence there could be no reason why Jews, more than others, should insist upon infant baptism. They were too much accustomed to associate particular rites with particular conditions, to be surprised that repentance and faith were made the conditions of baptism. Says Neander, "Among the Jewish Christians, circumcision was held as a seal of the covenant ; and hence they had so much the less occasion to make use of another dedication of their children."

6. The early church admitted the children of believers to baptism; hence it must have been an apostolic practice likewise.

Reply. If reference be had to the first two centuries after Christ, the statement is incorrect; if to a later period, it has no force.

It may be added in this place (1) That the practice of infant baptism appears to have had its origin in the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. So far as history casts any light on this point, the latter preceded the former, and sacramentalism led to Technobaptism. (2) That the practice of infant baptism sustains and extends the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. If the theory led to the practice, the practice evermore leads back to the theory, and is empty without it; and (3) That the practice of infant baptism has made the union of church and state possible. Without this practice, such a union would have been extremely improbable, if not impossible.¹

IV. The Relation of the Rite to John's Baptism.

Many writers have taken the position, that Christian baptism is entirely distinct from John's baptism; while others have considered them virtually the same. There is something to be said for the former view, and something also for the latter.

For the former, it is urged, —

(a) That John the Baptist belonged to the old dispensation, and therefore his baptism could not belong to the new. There is certainly evidence enough that he belonged to the old economy (See Matt. xi. 11 sq.); but it may be that he belonged to the new also. Certainly both John and Christ passed most of life under the mosaic law. But John lived to point men to Christ, the Lamb of God; and his work had respect to the introduction of the new era rather than to the filling out of the old. It is therefore by no means certain that his relation to Judaism forbade him to introduce, by divine authority, an ordinance which belonged to Christianity.

¹ Hovey (A.) "Evils of Infant Baptism," p. 41 sq.

(b) That he could not have administered baptism into the name of the Trinity. Possibly not; indeed, it seems scarcely probable that he used the formula which has been generally used by Christians; for this formula presupposes a fuller knowledge of the gospel than can be reasonably attributed to him. But if his words in baptizing were an epitome of his preaching, they must have implied allegiance to the Christ and the Spirit, as well as to the Father; for Luke testifies expressly, that he "evangelized" the people (ch. iii. 18); and John bears witness to nearly the same thing (i. 29 sq. 36; iii. 25 sq.), as well as Paul (Acts xix. 4).

(c) That baptism was sometimes repeated when the followers of John embraced Christianity, as preached by the apostles after the day of Pentecost (Acts xix. 1 sq.). In the only instance of the kind recorded, "the disciples" had never heard "whether there is a Holy Spirit;" and it is therefore difficult to believe that they had been baptized by John himself; for John had taught his disciples to believe in him that should come after him, and had described Jesus as one who should baptize them in the Holy Spirit. This appears to have been an important feature of his preaching; and therefore it is fair to presume that the disciples in question had not been taught and baptized by him. They had probably been baptized without suitable instruction, by some unenlightened follower of John; and hence their baptism had no reference to Christ or to the Holy Spirit.

But, on the other hand, it may be said (a) That the ritual act was in both cases the same, representing the same inward change. Matt. iii. 6 sq.; Mark i. 4 sq.; Luke iii. sq.; vii. 10; xx. 3 sq. (cf. the senior Edwards, I. p. 163).

(b) That repentance towards God, and faith in the Messiah, as the Giver of the Holy Spirit, were required in both cases (Matt. iii. 11 sq.; Mark i. 7 sq.; Luke iii. 15 sq.; John i. 27 sq.; Acts xix. 4). It will be evident to those who study closely all the passages bearing on this point, that John invited none but renewed persons to his baptism. For (1) Repentance — μετάνοια — is a change of mind and heart, implying faith and love. By it one enters upon a new spiritual life. But was not the baptism which he administered unto or into repentance,—that is, a rite by which an impenitent man pledged himself to repent? Such a rite would have been absurd; for no impenitent man can give a satisfactory pledge of repentance in the future. It is a present duty; and a refusal to do it now vitiates every promise to do it by and by. (2) Both Mark and Luke say that John came preaching “a baptism of repentance unto the remission of sins” (Mark i. 4; Luke ii. 3); and the sins of unregenerate men cannot be forgiven. His baptism symbolized the beginning of a new spiritual life, to which those who received it devoted themselves. (3) Both Matthew and Mark testify that “confession of their sins” was made by those who were baptized by John (Matt. iii. 6; Mark i. 5); doubtless then it was required by him as one of the clearest evidences of a new heart. Men do not readily make public confession of “their sins,” while still foes to God. (4) “Fruits meet for repentance,” or rather, “worthy of repentance,” were required of some,—(See Matt. iii. 6–12; Luke iii. 7–14); and both from the expression itself and from the use made of it by Paul (Acts xxvi. 20), we know that it refers to fruits which reveal a penitent or changed mind, rather than those which will lead to it. The passages quoted above give ample proof that John accompanied the requirement of repentance with that of a readiness to welcome the Messiah, who should baptize in the Holy Spirit.

(c) That baptism was not repeated when the followers of John became disciples of Christ. Some suppose that many of the three thousand who were added to the church on the day of Pentecost had been disciples of John; but, if so, there is no evidence of their re-baptism; if so, there is no evidence of their being regarded as for the first time believers. They were probably said to be added, because now they were fully convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus, and were at last ready to avow themselves his followers. There is no proof to be found in the New Testament, that those baptized by John were commonly re-baptized when they connected themselves with Christians. In Acts xviii. 24-28, the story of Apollos is told. He knew only the baptism of John; but there is no hint of his receiving Christian baptism. Aquila and Priscilla taught him the way of the Lord more perfectly, and that is all. "In every instance, unless this be an exception, where the case of an individual is mentioned in the Acts, as in a state requiring baptism, this rite is administered, and prominent notice taken of it in the narrative." Apollos was not baptized, because John's baptism was virtually Christian baptism.

(d) That the apostles themselves were, it is probable, only baptized with John's baptism. This seems to be a natural inference from the narrative in the first chapter of John, verses 35-49; at least so far as those were concerned who had been baptized by the harbinger of Christ. If any of the twelve had not been immersed by John, they were doubtless introduced into the fellowship of the earlier apostles by the rite of baptism.—(See John iv. 1, 2). It is likewise to be noted, that Jesus himself submitted to John's baptism (cf. Turretin, Loc. iii. Qu. xvi. p. 340 sq.).

(e) That the new dispensation is represented as beginning with the work of John (Luke xvi. 16; Acts x. 36, 37; John i. 22 sq.). The first of these texts reads thus: "The law and the prophets (were), until John—μέχρι Ἰωάννου; since then the kingdom of God is preached, and every one presseth forcefully into it." Meyer says, "Since then (already by John himself) the good news of the Messiah's kingdom has entered, and with what result! Every one presses with force into it." And this is the only obvious meaning of the words.

The reasons for believing that Christian baptism began with that of John, and only became more significant as the truths which it represented were more fully revealed, seem to us stronger than those which are supposed to show an essential difference between the two.

II. THE LORD'S SUPPER.

In this case it is proper to consider the external rite, the import of the rite, and the proper communicants.

1. The external rite. The institution of this rite by our Saviour has been described by four of the sacred writers (namely, Matthew xxvi. 26–29; Mark xiv. 22–25; Luke xxii. 19, 20; and Paul 1 Cor. xi. 23–25). From these several accounts, we learn the following facts in respect to the elements employed in this rite, and the way in which they were used:—

1. The elements were bread and wine. The bread was doubtless unleavened; yet this peculiarity is nowhere referred to by the sacred writers, or by Christ himself; and hence is not to be looked upon as significant. The wine is spoken of by Christ as “this fruit of the vine” (Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25); and it seems very desirable for us to make use of the same at the present day.

2. The ritual use of these elements embraced (1) the eucharistic prayers; (2) the breaking of the bread, and giving of the wine by the presiding officer; and (3) the eating and drinking of the respective elements by all the communicants.

Remark a. We do not suppose that the singing or chanting of Christ and his disciples, just before they went out into the Mount of Olives, was intended to be a part of the new ordinance; for it is mentioned by neither Luke nor Paul in describing the institution of the Lord’s Supper, and we do not find it anywhere enjoined as a part of this ordinance. The words sung by Christ and his disciples were probably the second part of the great Hallel,—namely, Psalms cxv., cxviii.—which the Jews were in the habit of singing after they had eaten the paschal lamb. It is, however, eminently proper to praise the Lord in song after partaking of the emblems of his death.

R. b. It has been conjectured, that, in the age of the apostles, the eucharistic prayers were offered by the whole body of the church in concert; but there is no good reason for this conjecture. The language of Paul (1 Cor. x. 16) would be perfectly natural, if all the members of the church were supposed to join in the prayers offered by the pastor,— a fact which they were accustomed to signify by saying "Amen" at the close.

II. The import of the Lord's Supper. Since the elements represent the body and blood of the dying Saviour, the reception of them, —

1. Symbolizes the reception by faith of Christ crucified as the source and support of spiritual and eternal life (1 Cor. x. 16; cf. John vi. 51, 53, 54). This implies, of course, a belief in the doctrine of the atonement. To believe in Christ crucified as the perpetual source of life is to believe in the atonement as that source. It implies also union with the spiritual body of Christ; by virtue of receiving him. This is a subordinate but important fact represented by the joint partaking of the Supper. It is the act of a family (1 Cor. x. 15–21).

2. Commemorates the atoning death of Christ, or Christ as the Lamb of God offering himself in sacrifice for sin (1 Cor. xi. 24, 26; v. 7). This office of the Lord's Supper, it will be noticed, was very emphatically declared by the Saviour. Indeed, the commemorative import of this rite makes its symbolical meaning doubly impressive. That the emblems are also memorials, bringing the scenes of Calvary distinctly before the mind, adds greatly to their power in sustaining faith and love.

3. Typifies the marriage supper of the Lamb, or, in other words, the future blessedness of believers in the presence of Christ. Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25; 1 Cor. xi. 26 (cf. Matt. xxii. 2 sq.; xxv. 10; Rev. xix. 7–9). Some theologians have doubted whether the Lord's Supper is really typical of heavenly fellowship and joy; but the passages referred to are sufficient evidence that it is.

Remark a. It appears from several passages that the paschal lamb was, in some sense, a type, not of the Lord's Supper, but of Christ himself. 1 Cor. v. 7; John xix. 36 (cf. Ex. xii. 46; and Num. ix. 12.) But, if the paschal lamb bore some resemblance to Christ, the paschal supper must naturally have borne some resemblance to the Lord's Supper. The former, in fact, commemorated the deliverance of the natural Israel from temporal ruin ; while the latter commemorates the deliverance of the spiritual Israel from eternal ruin. As the Jewish people typified the true Israel, so likewise did many Jewish rites foreshadow Christian realities, but not Christian rites.

R. b. Breaking the bread and pouring out the wine are important parts of the ordinance ; for they increase its commemorative power by bringing the death of Christ more vividly to mind. This is lost by the Catholic form.

R. c. The papal custom of withholding the cup from laymen is not authorized by the word of God ; though several expressions in the New Testament are appealed to as furnishing, at least by implication, this authority. For example, Acts ii. 42 ; xx. 7, 11 ; 1 Cor. xi. 27-29 ; (but cf. x. 16, 17, 21).

R. d. The papal doctrines of transubstantiation, and sacrifice of the mass are unscriptural. — (See Heb. vii. 27 ; ix. 26, 28 ; x. 10 (cf. Mal. i. 11), for conclusive proof of this remark.)

For the papal doctrine, see "Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini," p. 66, i. : "Si quis negaverit, in sanctissimæ eucharistiæ sacramento contineri vere, realiter et substantialiter corpus et sanguinem una cum ANIMA et DIVINITATE Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ac proinde totum Christum ; sed dixerit tantummodo esse in eo, ut in signo vel figura aut virtute : anathema sit." Yet Christ says expressly of one of the elements which he had consecrated, "I will not drink again of this fruit of the vine," &c.

R. e. The Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation is exceedingly unnatural, and no more scriptural than the papal doctrine. Could the disciples have supposed the real body and blood of Christ present in the elements, bread and wine, which they received from him ? It does not seem possible. Yet the Augsburg Confession says, "De Cœna Domini docent, quod corpus et sanguis Christi vere adsint et distribuantur vescentibus in cœna Domini, et improbant secus docentes," (A.D. 1530;) and the Formula of Concord says, "Credimus, quod in cœna Domini corpus et sanguis Christi vere et substantialiter sint præsentia, et quod una cum pane et vino vere distribuuntur atque sumantur," (A.D. 1579.)

R. f. The view which regards the elements as merely emblems of the body and blood of Christ rests upon a simple and obvious interpretation of Christ's language. — (See John xiv. 6; xv. 5; Luke xii. 1; Heb. x. 20; Philem. 12, and Ex. xii. 11.)

R. g. The New Testament nowhere prescribes when or how often this ordinance is to be observed. It was, however, in all probability, observed more frequently in the apostolic church than it is by Christians at the present day. Whether a more frequent observance of this rite is now desirable can only be determined by careful observation.

III. The proper communicants. For the sake of treating this topic in a practical way, we offer the following questions and replies, namely: —¹

1. Should any except credible believers in Christ be invited to the Lord's Supper?

Replying in the negative, we appeal, —

1. To the import of the ordinance itself. It is partly commemorative, — "This do in remembrance of me." It is a memorial of the dying Redeemer. But those who have no true faith in Christ, who are at heart self-righteous, who reject his proffered aid, cannot properly commemorate his death. Again, it is partly symbolical: "Take, eat; this is my body which was broken for you." The act of eating and drinking the consecrated elements is made prominent; and by it the communicants signify their reception of Christ as the support of their spiritual life. How, then, can any person who rejects the Saviour wish or dare to approach his table? Or how can one who gives no satisfactory evidence of faith in Christ, or fellowship with him, be invited to his table?

¹ See Edwards (J. the elder) "On the Qualifications for Full Communion"; Arnold (A. N.) "Qualifications for the Lord's Supper"; Curtis (T. F.) "The Distinction between Christian and Church Fellowship, and between Communion and its Symbols"; Howell (R. B. C.) "The Terms of Communion at the Lord's Table"; Denison (F.) "The Supper Institution"; Pepper (G. D. B.) "Open Communion," "Bap. Quarterly," Vol. I; Sarles (J. W.) "Qualifications for the Communion," in the "Madison Avenue Lectures"; Hovey (A.) "Close Communion"; Bunyan (J.) "Reason for my Practice in Worship," II. 602; Hall (R.) "Terms of Communion."

2. To the example of the apostolic churches. So far as this point is concerned, their practice seems to have been uniform. The sacred emblems were never offered to unbelievers. But is the example of churches under apostolic guidance of any weight in the present case? We believe it is; for when Paul declares, with reference to a practice far less closely connected with the gospel than this, "We have no such custom, neither the churches of God," he appears to regard this fact as a final argument against it. Moreover, the practice now in question must have been established by the apostles; for they received the ordinance from Christ, and caused it to be observed in the primitive church.

3. To the caution which Paul gave to the Corinthians.—"Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup,"—words which imply the need of special preparation for the ordinance. Whoever does not appreciate the sacrifice of Christ, and does not feel his need of it as an atonement for sin, is unprepared for the Lord's Supper. If he partake, it will be "unworthily, not discerning the Lord's body."—"He will eat and drink judgment to himself."

II. Should any except baptized believers be invited to the Lord's Supper? We reply in the negative, and justify our answer by an appeal,—

1. To the relation of the two ordinances to each other as symbols. Baptism symbolizes the beginning of the new life; and the Lord's Supper, its nourishment. The former represents a change from one spiritual condition into another,—putting off the old, and putting on the new,—death and resurrection; while the latter represents growth,—progress in a present condition. The one sets forth a single event; the other, an ever-recurring duty and refreshment. As the life of faith must be originated before it can be nourished, so an ordinance which represents the inception of this life must naturally precede one which represents its existence and support. In baptism, the sinner publicly declares his allegiance to Christ; at the Lord's table, he takes his place among the acknowledged friends of Jesus, and receives from him tokens of love and favor. By baptism, he is formally qualified for the duties and privileges of citizenship; by the Lord's Supper, he is formally recognized and honored as a citizen.

2. To the practice of Christian churches in the apostolic age. We find no hint in the sacred record of the presence of unbaptized persons at the Lord's table; but we do find that baptism was treated as the first great duty to be done after exercising faith, and that the eucharist, when noticed at all, is assigned to those who were already baptized. In no case is the Lord's Supper put before baptism; in no case are believers brought into the church, and afterwards baptized.

But to this it has been objected, that some of the eleven, who were present at the institution of the Supper, had never been baptized at all; and that none of them had received Christian baptism. In reply, we remark (1) That John's baptism was substantially the same as Christian; (2) That several of the eleven had been baptized by John prior to their connection with Jesus; (3) That all of them had probably been thus baptized. For John was sent expressly to prepare the way of the Lord; and, in default of evidence to the contrary, it may be presumed that men whose hearts had been prepared by his preaching were selected by our Saviour to be his personal attendants. Besides, the promptness with which they left all, and followed Christ, is favorable to this view. (4) That Jesus, by the hands of his disciples, baptized others who believed in him; and, if it was his custom to have his followers baptized, it may be taken for granted that he did not make the case of the twelve an exception. He was, moreover, himself baptized,—a fact which strengthens our conviction that his chosen were also baptized.

III. Should any but those whose church-walk is orderly be invited to the Lord's Supper? No persons, we reply, but those who are members of some Christian church, whose deportment agrees with the gospel of Christ, and who strive together for the faith of the gospel, should be invited to the communion. In support of this position, we remark,—

1. That becoming connected with a Christian church naturally precedes partaking of the eucharist. By baptism, one avows himself a servant and soldier of Christ. But the army of Christ is made up of different companies,—one here, another there; and he can have no regular connection with it, unless he joins one of these companies, or, in other words, a particular church. Uniting with a local church is therefore the natural sequence or counterpart of the baptismal vow. Hence baptism is often, called the door into the church; and membership is supposed to follow it as a matter of course. Ordinarily it should do so, and thus precede admission to the Lord's Supper. The latter is to be repeated till the close of life; while the former,—uniting with a Christian church,—is, like baptism, an act to be performed but once, unless a repetition is made necessary by local changes.

2. That the Lord's Supper is, properly speaking, a church rite, and should therefore be restricted to church members in good standing. It was meant, we believe, to be observed, not by individual Christians at will, nor by irresponsible companies of believers, but by the churches of Christ as such.

(1) This view is justified by the language of Paul to the Corinthians (1 Cor. x. 16, 17; xi. 18–34). Several points are fixed by these words of the apostle; for example:—

(a) The Corinthian Christians were evidently accustomed to meet together to observe the Lord's Supper. No less than four times, within the space of a few verses, does Paul connect their coming together in one place with the celebration of the eucharist. To do this seems to have been the avowed and principle object of their assembling.

(b) They could not properly observe it without coming together. This is evidently implied. Many things could be done by Christians separately and at home. "Have ye not houses to eat and to drink in?"—"If any man is hungry, let him eat at home;" but it does not seem to have entered the apostle's mind that the Lord's Supper could be eaten at home.

(c) They came together "in church," to observe the Lord's Supper. When Paul wrote his first letter to the Corinthians, the word ἐκκλησία had already become the appropriate designation of an organized body of Christians; and, in the passage before us, it must be used in this sense,—a sense which it generally has in this Epistle. Hence the words ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ signify “in church form or capacity,” and show that the Corinthian believers celebrated the eucharist as a church.

In no other instance has an inspired writer spoken at length of the manner of celebrating the Lord’s Supper in the apostolic churches. If the New Testament anywhere shows with sufficient clearness the practice of those churches which were planted and trained by the apostles, it is in this letter; and, in this letter, the ordinance is represented as observed by the church as such.

(2) Looking back from this, the fullest account of the eucharist in the New Testament, we find a brief reference to it in Acts xx. 7: “And in the first day of the week, when we were assembled to break bread,” &c. That there were disciples in Troas is not denied; and that they were a regular church is almost certain.—See Acts xvi. 8; 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13 (cf. Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5).

(3) Going back still further, we find another record in Acts ii. 41, 42. The Christians here spoken of were already baptized; they were under the guidance and teaching of the apostles; they met together almost daily for social worship; they provided for their poor with great liberality; and they were living in the same city. Hence they were, to all intents and purposes, a Christian church. If not, when did they become such a body? They are called expressly by this name a few verses farther on; and, after this record of their breaking bread, they are habitually spoken of as “the church at Jerusalem.”

But it may be said, they did not meet together and observe the Lord’s Supper as a church; for they are described as “breaking bread from house to house.” In reply, it may be remarked, that the circumstances of the church at Jerusalem were peculiar. The disciples of Jesus could use neither temple nor synagogue for any service distinctively Christian. Meyer, De Wette, Alford, Bengel, and others, think that κατ' οἶκον means a private house, or a house of their own, as distinguished from the temple; but even if they had no house large enough to receive them all, and therefore met in several places to break bread,—one or two of the apostles presiding over each assembly,—this provisional arrangement would not have caused the Holy Supper to be esteemed a family or social rite; for only those who had been baptized, and were walking together in the faith, partook of it. The emblems were not carried out of the church as an associated body of believers, nor were they used at pleasure by families, or groups of brethren.

(4) Finally, we come to the institution of the Supper by our Saviour himself. There were doubtless many Christians in Jerusalem at the passover when the Supper was instituted; but they were in no proper sense a church,—a distinct, responsible body,—called out from the rest of the nation, and acting together as the servants of Christ. “For the Greek word ἐκκλησία, which expresses the idea of evoking, calling out, expresses also the idea of convoking, calling together, and is therefore most applicable to a Christian church as a select, organized body, called out by direct choice from the mass of men, and called together by divine authority as a spiritual corporation.” — (Alexander.)¹ On the other hand, the little band of disciples to whom the Supper was first administered were essentially such a body. They had been summoned to his side by the Saviour, were his recognized and constant followers, were under his instruction, were the champions of his cause, had a common purse and treasurer, were united in belief and action, and, in a word, were a responsible community, separated from the world, and associated together in the service of Christ.

(5) It is also to be observed, that when we read of the baptism of single individuals, or even of households,—as of Paul, of the Ethiopian eunuch, of Lydia, of the Philippian jailer, and of Crispus at Corinth,—there is never any allusion to the Lord's Supper as following the baptism; but, when great numbers were baptized on the day of Pentecost, there is a reference to the Supper as presently observed.

¹ See also Litton (E. A.) “The Church of Christ,” ch. IV. p. 203 sq.

3. That this ordinance appears to have been restricted by the early Christians to church members. Says Justin Martyr, "First Apology," ch. 66 (A.D. 138–9), "This food is called among us εὐχαριστία, of which no one is allowed to partake who does not believe that what we teach is true, and has not been bathed the bath for the remission of sins and unto regeneration, and does not live as Christ has enjoined." Three prerequisites are here laid down,—faith, baptism, and an orderly walk; and there is abundant evidence that these were insisted upon by Christians of every name for a long time.

As the eucharist is a church ordinance, Baptists generally hold that none but members of the church, observing it, are strictly entitled to partake; and that none can properly be invited to join with them who could not be welcomed, without change of views, to full membership. They also hold that those who are giving, and are pledged to give, the weight of their influence against what is believed to be essential to Christian obedience, cannot properly be received into its fellowship. If admitted, they would sow dissension, and thus prove themselves "heretics" in the primitive sense of the term.

But members of Pedobaptist churches do steadily affirm and teach by their ecclesiastical position, that infant sprinkling is, in effect, Christian baptism; or else that baptism is not prerequisite to full membership and an orderly walk in a Christian church. In either case, they throw the whole weight of their example against the practice of Christian baptism,—a practice which, in the judgment of Baptists, is essential to Christian obedience. How, then, can their church-walk be indorsed as orderly? If the members of a Baptist church were, in some other way, to act as decisively against this doctrine and practice, they would justly be esteemed by their brethren subverters of the truth, and originators of division. — (See Rom. xvi. 17; and cf. Titus iii. 10; Gal. v. 12; 1 Cor. i. 10).

But, if a Baptist church ought to withdraw the hand of fellowship from those who set themselves firmly against the duty of obeying a plain command of Christ, it surely has no right to offer this hand to the same persons when united to another church, or to any persons who persistently assail the duty in question. If communion at the Lord's table were the sign of Christian fellowship merely, the case would be different; but such a sign it can never be while, besides faith, baptism and an orderly church-walk are the scriptural terms of admission to the Lord's Supper.

It may now be remarked, that Baptists heartily acknowledge both the duty and the privilege of Christian fellowship with all who love the Lord, and approve of denominational co-operation, if and so far as it requires no one to disregard his convictions as to the paramount claims of Christ. To "love the truth and peace" is their watchword (Zech. viii. 19).

PART SEVENTH.

DOCTRINE OF THE LAST THINGS.

THE topics to be considered in this part of theology are Natural Death, the Intermediate State, the Second Advent of Christ, the Resurrection of the Dead, the Last Judgment, the Final State of Unbelievers, and the Final State of Believers. Some of them may be treated briefly, but others will require careful study.¹

I. NATURAL DEATH.

In discussing the Penalty of Sin, it was necessary to speak of natural death; and, on that account, it will be sufficient to reiterate our conclusions in this place. In that discussion, it was shown that natural death does not put an end to the conscious existence of the soul,—that the separation of the body from the spirit leaves the latter in possession of all its essential powers. Further evidence of this will be embraced in the testimonies which will be brought from the word of God, to show the condition of man after death.

II. THE INTERMEDIATE STATE.²

By this is meant the state of men between their bodily death and resurrection. That there is such a state must be assumed for the present; but we shall soon have occasion to exhibit the proof of it, by showing that there will be a simultaneous resurrection of the dead. Almost all Christians feel a particular solicitude about the condition of human souls immediately after death. The proximity of that state to this invests it with double interest. Friends accompany their friends to the very borders of it, and know that, when the latter close their eyes here, they open them at once there,—know that in a moment their loved ones are in the state that lies between time and eternity,—between existence in a natural body and existence in a spiritual body. Besides, that is a profoundly mysterious life which connects the one before death with the one beyond the judgment,—a life of waiting for the Lord, with how much of blessed service on the part of the righteous, no one knows; for the teaching of Scripture concerning the middle state is neither full nor explicit, but it assures us of these facts:—

¹ "Studien und Kritiken," IX. s. 271 ff.; Weisse (C. H.) "Ueber die philosophische Bedeutung der Christlichen Lehre von den letzten Dingen," s. 271 ff.

² Brown (J.) "The Dead in Christ: their State Present and Future"; Kitto's "Journal of Sacred Literature," for Jan. 1850, "On the Separate State"; "Christian Review," 1855, D. W. Phillips, "The Intermediate State"; Bib. Sac., G. H. Griffin, "Place and Condition of the Departed"; Calvin (J.) "Psychopannychia," &c.; "Meth. Quarterly," 1850, J. Porter, "The Condition of the Dead"; Estes (H. C.) "The Christian Doctrine of the Soul"; Hovey (A.) "State of Men after Death"; "Church Review," 1852, "The Place of Departed Spirits"; Weitzel (Dr.) "Die Urchristliche Unsterblichkeitslehre," Stu. u. Kr. IX. s. 579 ff. und 895 ff.; Fitch (E. T.) "Theol., Hades, the Invisible State"; "New Englander," 1864, p. 125 sq.; König (J. L.) "Die Lehre von Christi Höllenfahrt."

1. That the spirits of the departed are bodiless in that state. This may be inferred (1) From the joy which Paul expresses in view of the resurrection at the coming of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 54). (2) From the way in which the Scriptures connect our present and our future bodies (John v. 28; 1 Cor. xv. 44, 51, 52; Phil. iii. 21). Were we to have other bodies in the middle state, the language of these passages would be unnatural. (3) From those texts of Scripture which refer by way of distinction to the spirit of man at death, or after it (Eccl. xii. 7; Acts vii. 59; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Peter iii. 19).

Against this view, the following passages have been urged as decisive; namely, Luke xvi. 23 sq.; Matt. xxii. 23–33 (cf. Luke xx. 27, 40; 2 Cor. v. 1–8). But we cannot admit them to be so. They may all be explained, without violence, in harmony with the statement made above, that the spirits of the departed are bodiless.

2. That the spirits of the departed are conscious in the middle state. This may be asserted on the authority,—

(1) Of the Old Testament.—(See Eccl. xii. 7; Prov. xv. 24; xxiii. 14; xiv. 32; Ps. xvii. 15; lxxiii. 23, 24; xlix. 15). But still more confidently on that,—

(2) Of the New Testament (Luke xvi. 23 sq.; 1 Peter iii. 19; 2 Peter ii. 4 sq.; Luke xxiii. 42, 43 (cf. 2 Cor. xii. 4; Rev. ii. 7; xxii. 2); Acts vii. 59; Matt. viii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 1-8 (cf. Rev. vi. 9); 1 Sam. xxviii. 11-20; Phil. i. 21-24).

Objection 1. The dead are usually spoken of as asleep. Hence they must be unconscious.—(See 2 Sam. 7-12; Dan. xii. 2; 1 Thess. iv. 13-15; v. 10). To this we reply, that death is called sleep by a natural figure of speech, though it does not involve unconsciousness. It is the bodily senses which are inactive in sleep; the spirit is often, if not always, active, and in a certain way conscious. Besides, the term sleep is used instead of the term death, when speaking of believers in Christ, because it is at once a milder term, and one suggestive of a resurrection. It is very rarely applied to the death of unbelievers,—at least, in the New Testament.

Objection 2. A general judgment which is based, as the Scriptures affirm, on the conduct of men in this life, is scarcely compatible with moral existence in the middle state; for character must be greatly modified by the course pursued in that state; and it is absurd to suppose that moral conduct there will not be taken into account in the final decision.

To this we reply (a) That the objection undertakes to set aside positive testimony by an appeal to difficulties, even though it must be admitted that human reason cannot fully understand the merits of the case. Such an attempt is certainly rash, and likely to lead one astray. (b) That it probably rests on a false view of the ends to be reached by a general judgment; for these ends may be more numerous and important than any man supposes, even though the judgment should consist chiefly in a manifestation of the perfection of God's government to all intelligent beings. (c) That it undervalues the moral influence which the certain prospect of a general judgment has upon the minds of men in this life.

3. That unbelievers are in a state of misery. This might be inferred from the circumstance that they are unreconciled to God; but whether their condition will be one of greatly increased misery, as compared with a sinful life here, can only be learned from the word of God. The language of that word, though figurative, is sufficiently clear; and one who believes it to be true cannot doubt the great misery of those who die in their sins (Luke xvi. 23 sq. (cf. Matt. xi. 23; xvi. 18); Luke x. 15; 2 Peter ii. 9; Rev. i. 18; vi. 8; xx. 13, 14). The state or place in which they are is called hades.

4. That believers are in a state of happiness (Luke xvi. 22; xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. v. 1-8; Phil. i. 23). The terms applied to their state or abode suggest that it is one of greatly advanced satisfaction. They are to be in Abraham's bosom, which would be esteemed by any pious Jew the highest privilege. They are to be in paradise; and this word signified almost every thing delightful. They are to be with the Lord, than which nothing could be more desired by the Christian. They are to be numbered and united with the spirits of just men made perfect; and every true believer longs to be free from sin.

5. That neither believers nor unbelievers are on probation in that state (Luke xvi. 21 sq.; Matt. xxv. 31 sq.; 2 Cor. v. 10; Matt. xi. 22-24; Rom. ii. 7-9, 12). It will be noticed that an impassable gulf is said to separate the evil from the good after death; and that, in all the accounts of the judgment, the deeds done in the body are represented as determining the destiny of men. This seems to show that the eternal condition of men depends on their conduct in the present life. All that is done afterwards will be in the direction of what they do here.

Against this view many protest, appealing to 1 Peter iii. 19, 20; iv. 6. But it seems to us, on the whole, improbable that Peter refers to a personal visit of Christ to hades, between his crucifixion and resurrection, for the purpose of preaching to the ungodly who were there confined. It is more probable that he refers to the ministry of Noah, who, by the power of the Spirit of Christ imparted to him, preached to his unbelieving contemporaries for a hundred and twenty years, while the ark was building.¹

III. THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST.

In this section, we are to inquire whether the return of Christ, spoken of in Acts i. 11, will precede or will follow the period of a thousand years described in Rev. xx. 1 sq. . . . For if it is to precede that period, the resurrection of the wicked will be effected at least a thousand years later than that of the righteous, and the judgment of the former will be separated by as great an interval from that of the latter. Moreover, if this be true, the proper reign of Christ has not yet begun.

The question is one of much interest; and it is now attracting attention in every part of Christendom. Many of the ablest German and English expositors believe in the pre-millennial advent of Christ, as an event predicted by the Scriptures, and not very distant from the present time.

But those who entertain this belief are divided into two classes. One of these classes believes, that, at the coming of Christ to introduce the millennium, the righteous dead will be raised, the living believers changed, and the wicked who are alive on the earth destroyed, so that Christ will reign on the earth with his saints in their glorified bodies a thousand years: then all the wicked dead will be raised and judged.

The other class holds that the righteous dead will be raised, living believers changed, and yet the race be continued by natural generation; all, or nearly all, who are born, being converted very early in life. In the millennium, therefore, Christ will reign with his saints in their glorified bodies over the race of mankind in their natural bodies.

Both classes hold that the earth will be changed or renewed at the coming of Christ; but the former class supposes that the renewal will be very complete, while the latter does not.

¹ See "Baptist Quarterly," Vol. IV. p. 486 sq.; Bib. Sac. Vol. XXXII. p. 401 sq.; "New Englander," 1872, p. 601 sq.; (Expositions by the author of this manual, by H. Cowles, and by S. C. Bartlett); and for the opposite view a majority of German Expositors.

In support of their opinion, they appeal to such passages as follow: Matt. xix. 28 sq.; Luke xix. 11 sq.; Acts i. 6-8, iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 23 sq.; 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 2 Thess. i. 7-10; Rev. xx. 1-7. Of these New Testament passages, it may be remarked,—¹

1. That the first four are too indefinite to have any value as proof-texts. This must be obvious to the careful student.

2. That the argument from 1 Cor. xv. 23 sq. has little, if any, force. It is said that, as a long period separates the resurrection of Christ from that of his people at his coming, so a long period may be expected to separate the resurrection of his people from that of the ungodly, — an argument of little weight.

3. That the remaining passages, though difficult of explanation, are no sufficient basis for the doctrine in question. The word "resurrection" may be used figuratively in Rev. xx. 5. The fidelity of Christians will be like that of the martyrs; and they will be so numerous as to bear rule in the earth. Hence it will be as if all the martyrs had been raised at once, to people the earth for a thousand years; that is, an indefinite but vast period of time. As Elijah reappeared in John the Baptist, so will all the martyrs in the faithful men of that future day. But, when this period has elapsed, there will be great wickedness again, as if all the enemies and persecutors of Christ had reappeared on earth. This is the second resurrection, described in the following verses; namely, Rev. xx. 8, 9.¹

¹ Seiss (S.) "On the Pre-Millennial Advent of Christ"; Auberlen (C. A.) "The Prophecies of Daniel, and the Revelations of St. John"; Christiani (A.) "Darstellung des Inhalts der Apocalypse"; Weitbrecht (Dr.) "Christliche Glaubenslehre," Bd. III.; Karsten (Dr.) "Die letzten Dinge"; Luthardt (E.) "Vom Lehre der letzten Dingen"; Hofmann (J. C. K. von) "Schriftbeweis," Bd. II. s. 624 sq.; Brown (D.) "On the Second Advent"; Fairbairn (P.) "Prophecy viewed in respect to its dist. Nature, its special Function, and proper Interpretation," p. 434 sq.; Brown (J. A.) "The Second Advent, and the Creeds of Christendom," Bib. Sac. 1867, p. 629 sq.; Keil (C. F.) "Zur Frage über den Chiliasmus," Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie u. Kirche, 1870, s. 639 ff.; Harris (S.) "The Scriptural Doctrine of the Triumph of Christ's Kingdom distinguished from Millenarianism," Bib. Sac. 1873, p. 77 sq.; Cowles (H.) "On the Man of Sin," 2 Thess. ii. 3, Bib. Sac. 1872, p. 623 sq.; also "On the Teachings of Christ in Regard to his then future Comings, and the Phraseology of the Apostles on this Subject," Bib. Sac. 1871, p. 485 sq.; Thomasius (G.) "Christi Person und Werk," III. 2 s. 459 sq.; Köhler (Dr.) "Die Schriftwidrigkeit des Chiliasmus"; Hodge (C.) "Sys. Theol." III. 792 sq.

Against the second theory of the pre-millennial advent of Christ may be urged the following considerations:—

(1) It is inconsistent with the fact that the kingdom of Christ has already been set up. — (Acts ii. 29–36; iii. 13, 15; iv. 26, 28; v. 29, 31; Heb. x. 12, 13; Rev. iii. 7–12.)

(2) It is inconsistent with the language of Peter (2 Ep. iii. 10–13). For this language predicts such a dissolving of the earth by fire as will make it a new earth, if the new earth be not rather wholly distinct from it.

(3) It is inconsistent with the passages which connect the second advent of Christ with the resurrection and general judgment (Dan. xii. 2; John v. 28, 29; Matt. xxv. 31–46; Rev. xx. 11 sq.).

(4) It is inconsistent with those passages which represent the Jewish sacrifices and priesthood as superseded by the work of Christ (Heb. vii. 12, 22, 24; x. 14). For the principle of literal interpretation on which this view of the second advent chiefly rests requires its advocates to concede the resumption of Jewish sacrifices in Jerusalem. — (See Ezek. xliii. 18 sq.).

IV. THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

By this is meant the restoration of man to his normal condition, as a complex being, or a reunion of body and spirit. Our knowledge of this subject is derived entirely from the Scriptures, and may be comprehended in a few brief, but extremely important statements.

1. There will be a resurrection of all the dead. (a) Of the righteous (Luke xiv. 14; xx. 34 sq.; John vi. 54; xi. 23 sq.; 1 Cor. vi. 14; xv. 1–58; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Phil. iii. 11; 1 Thess. iv. 14, 15). And (b) of the wicked. John v. 28, 29; Acts xxiv. 15 (cf. Dan. xii. 2; Rev. xx. 13).

¹ See Fuller (A.) "Works," Vol. III. p. 29.

In respect to the righteous, the testimony is certainly ample and unambiguous. If it were necessary, it could be increased; but every one will regard it as sufficient.

In respect to the wicked, it is limited to a few passages; but these are clear. The words of Christ are entirely decisive; for it seems impossible to assign them any other meaning. Equally clear is the language of Paul before Felix.

How this statement of the apostle is to be reconciled with the testimony of Josephus concerning the doctrine of the Pharisees¹ may not be obvious, but it is conclusive as to Paul's belief.

Perhaps the Pharisees laid principal stress on the resurrection of the just, and were all united on that point; while many, or even most of them held, though with less confidence, to the resurrection of the unjust also. In this case, Paul could utter his own belief, as agreeing substantially with theirs, and could hope for their sympathy, as against the Sadducees.

2. The dead will be raised at the end of the present world. And by the "present world" is meant the present order of things which will be changed at the second coming of Christ (John v. 29; Matt. xxv. 46; John xi. 24; Acts xvii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 23, 24, 52; 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 2 Thess. i. 7-9; 2 Peter iii. 7; and perhaps Rev. xx. 11 sq.).

Of course the believers in a premillennial advent of Christ teach that the resurrection of the just antedates that of the unjust, by the period of a thousand years; but they affirm that the present world, or dispensation, ends with the premillennial advent of Christ, and only postpone the resurrection of the wicked a thousand years.

We have expressed our dissent from their view, and believe that, according to the Scriptures, all the dead will be raised at the same time. By the expression, "the same time," however, we do not mean to assert any thing in respect to the amount of time employed in raising the dead, or in respect to the exact order of this miraculous work; but only that the Scriptures, on the whole, assign the resurrection of all to the same period. It may be an instantaneous, it may be a gradual process.

¹ Antiq. XVIII. 1, 3; Wars II. 8, 14.

3. The bodies raised will be real and material organisms, additional to the spirit (1 Cor. xv. 36, 38). Not only does the language of these verses point to such organisms, but the term "body" itself can be reasonably understood to mean nothing else. There are many Christians who do not understand this; but they are probably misled by the word "spiritual" in 1 Cor. xv. 44.¹

4. Their raised bodies will be very different from their earthly ones (1 Cor. xv. 42-54; Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. vi. 13). It is not easy to overstate the difference between the present and the future bodies of the saints. The language of the Scriptures seems to us very strong. The present are earthy, corruptible, weak; the future will be celestial, incorruptible, glorious, rendering men like angels.

5. Their raised bodies will be adapted to spirit-life, as their present bodies are to animal life (1 Cor. xv. 44). A physical body is an organ for the psyche, or animal life; a spiritual body is an organ for the pneuma, or rational spirit. This is the distinction laid down by the apostle; and it is the most important and comprehensive one named by him. Indeed, it includes all the rest, and deserves the closest study.

6. Their raised bodies will have some connection with the present ones, serving at least to identify the two. Such is the impression made upon our minds by the language of Scripture; but whether this connection will be due to identity in any of the particles of matter, we do not certainly know. In some instances, as in Christ's glorified body, we may affirm that identity; but it may be going too far to affirm

Compare Augustine "De Civitate Dei," XIII. 20, 22. "For as spirit that serves flesh is called carnal, so flesh that serves spirit is called spiritual; not because it is converted into spirit, but because it is subject to spirit with a supreme and marvellous facility of obeying, having no sense of weariness, no liability to decay, and no tardiness of motion."—"Surely Christian faith doubts not in respect to the Saviour himself, that even after his resurrection, he still, in spiritual but true flesh, took both food and drink with his disciples."

it in all, or to find in it the identity which was in the mind of the Spirit, when moving and guiding the sacred writers in their work.¹

R. We have no special instruction as to the sort of bodies which unbelievers will possess hereafter; yet, though they will be immortal, it can hardly be supposed that they will be glorious.

V. THE LAST JUDGMENT.

I. There will be such a judgment under Christ (Matt. xxv. 31 sq.; John v. 22, 27, 29; Acts xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 9, 10). These portions of Scripture refer in plain words to a future judgment, and also declare that Christ will be the judge. Some of them appear to emphasize his human nature as in some way making it specially suitable for him to fill that office,—whether because honor should be put upon his suffering humanity, or because his human sympathy would make him a merciful judge, is supposed to be doubtful; but the former reason is suggested by the passage in John. In one place he is called ἀνὴρ, but elsewhere ἀνθρώπος.

According to certain expressions of Scripture, it is thought that Christians will first be judged, and then take part with Christ in judging the wicked (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3 (cf. Matt. xxv. 21, 23; Luke xix. 17–19; Rom. v. 17; Rev. xxii. 5). It is not easy to determine the exact sense of these statements; for example, whether they refer to the judgment itself, or to something which may precede or follow that crisis; or whether some of them refer to one thing, and others to another.

¹ Gouldburn (E. M.) "The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Same Body," &c.; Brown (J.) "The Resurrection of Life," 1 Cor. xv.; "A Masterpiece and Model of Exegesis," Jour. of Sac. Lit.; Hanna (W.) "The Doctrine of the Resurrection," Discourses on 1 Cor. xv.; Edwards and Parks, "Selections from German Literature"; "The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead," by L. I. Rückert; Bib. Sac. 1852, "The Resurrection of the Body," by D. R. Goodwin; Bap. Quarterly, I. pp. 385–399, "The Resurrection of the Dead," by A. Hovey; Bush (Geo.) "Anastasis: or the Doc. of a Res. of the Body rationally and scripturally considered"; Schöberlein (L.) "Über das Wesen der geistlichen Natur und Leiblichkeit," in the Jahrbücher für Theologie," VI. (1861); Hamberger (J.) "Die Rationalität des Begriffes der himmlischen Leiblichkeit," in "Jahrbücher," VIII. and "Die Wichtigkeit des Begriffes der himmlischen Leiblichkeit für die Theologie," in "Jahrbücher," XII.

2. It will be a general judgment. All men of all ages of the world will be judged (Matt. xii. 36, 37; (Eccl. xii. 14); Matt. xxv. 32; Acts xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10; 2 Thess. i. 6-10; Rev. xx. 11-15).

The opinion of some that πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, in Matt. xxv. 32, refers to unbelievers exclusively—that is, to “all the nations” as distinguished from the elect,—is not well founded; for the principal arguments in favor of it are inconclusive, while those bearing against it are apparently conclusive.

Three considerations are pressed:—

(a) That the judgment of believers is described in the two preceding parables, from which this account differs essentially, and in such a way that it is complementary to them. No doubt this passage differs from the two parables that go before it. It is more nearly literal in form than they. It brings forward the Supreme Judge at the supreme moment in language befitting his greatness; but it does not read like a third parable on the same plane as those that go before it, and merely intended to fill out an account begun in them.

(b) That those on the right hand are represented as unconscious of having done any thing for Christ, while believers must be perfectly aware of having done many things for him. To this we reply, by saying that the language which Christ puts into the lips of his friends seems to us true to the feeling which must be in their hearts at that time. The language of the judge will be a surprise. All his previous grace to them will not prevent grateful wonder at the marvellous manner in which he will identify himself with the “least of his brethren,” and accept a service rendered to them as rendered truly to him.

(c) That believers are not to be judged with the rest of mankind, but are to take part with Christ in judging them. This is indeed true; at least, according to the most obvious sense of several passages; but the language of Christ in Matt. xxv. 31 sq. represents believers as judged before others; and it is difficult to see why their own acceptance should interfere in the least with their participating in the subsequent act of judging unbelievers.

Against this interpretation, three facts may be urged; (1) That, according to verse 34, those on the right hand must be the elect; for they are invited by the judge to "inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world;" and it is evident that the kingdom referred to was prepared for God's chosen people (cf. John xiv. 2).

(2) That according to vv. 35-40, those on the right hand must have befriended Christians as the followers of Jesus. Any other view of the Saviour's words will be found unsatisfactory. They are plainly parallel to his saying in Matt. x. 40-42, "He that receiveth you receiveth me; and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward" (cf. Mark ix. 41, 42).

(3) That, according to vv. 43-45, those on the left were not heathen men, but persons who lived where there were Christians whom they knew to be followers of Jesus, and in need of their assistance.

Meyer goes to the opposite extreme, and holds that only those who profess to be followers of Christ are meant by "all the nations." (a) Because the decision respecting each class depends on the disposition manifested towards Jesus Christ, or, in other words, on love instead of faith. But there is no force in this circumstance; for faith and love are inseparable. Faith works by love; and, if faith is revealed in the conduct of life, it will be revealed, for the most part, by the exercise of love.

(b) Because those who are judged are represented collectively as the flock of Christ; for an oriental flock usually comprises both sheep and goats. To this it may be answered, first, that Christ as mediator is in a certain sense the head and shepherd of all mankind; and, secondly, that the description of the judgment here given introduces Christ as king, and brings forward the figure of a shepherd and his flock to illustrate but a single point,—the separation of one class from the other.

(c) Because the subjects to be judged are designated “all the nations”; and Christianity will be universal at the time of the Parousia. In response to this, it may be remarked, that there is no sufficient evidence of the universal prevalence of Christianity at the time of Christ’s second coming; indeed, many expressions of the sacred writers are apparently inconsistent with the view, that all nations will then be nominally Christian. But if they are all nominally Christian, can we suppose that they alone will be judged? Must we conclude that the generations of the dead are overlooked, because the word “nations” is used? Are they no part of “all the nations,” when one speaks of the coming of Christ?—(cf. 1 Thess. iv. 13–17; 2 Thess. i. 6–10; 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52; John v. 28, 29.)

3. It will be a righteous judgment. (Acts xvii. 31; Rom. ii. 6; 2 Cor. v. 10; Gal. vi. 7–10; Eph. vi. 8; Rev. ii. 23; xx. 12; xxii. 12 sq.) This fact should be frequently and earnestly asserted, when the last judgment is referred to. It should be urged with all possible emphasis, as a first truth of Christianity, that no man will be wronged in the least by the final sentence,—that every one will be sent to his own place. The final day will bring a revelation of the righteous judgment of God, and will thus render it forever impossible for the good to doubt his righteousness, or be troubled at the dark features of his providence. Such a judgment, vindicating the ways of God to men, and setting plainly before them the wonders of his holiness and grace, can only be effected at the end of the world.

Michel Angelo’s fresco of the Last Judgment in the Sistine Chapel is a failure at just this point; for it represents the judge as a being of dreadful decision and force, but gives no impression of what John Bunyan calls the “equitableness,” and “excellent righteousness,” which will make even the lost "conclude that there is all the reason in the world" why "they should be shut out of heaven." It gives no impression of either holiness or tenderness in "the Son of Man." Many have looked upon this as a grave defect in that powerful work.

Yet the language of Dr. Lillie on Peter is in accord with the Sistine fresco. "The man that meets his descending judge, unreconciled and alienated from the life and love of God, shall be hurried forth by whirlwinds to a waste, howling wilderness, — a dry, parched land where no water is — where no light of the sun nor of the stars appears; where no sleep refreshes, and hope never comes: but, as the blighted soul wanders on through eternity, the only memorial of the existence of Him who is Almighty will be the ever-thickening reverberations, bursting all around its path, of that voice of doom, 'Depart from me!'" ("Lectures on the Epistles of Peter," p. 236.)

4. It will follow after the resurrection of the dead. This must be the case, if there is to be a general judgment at all; and it seems to be a natural inference from the several passages of the New Testament which refer to the resurrection and the judgment. — (See Rev. xx. 12 sq.)

VI. THE FINAL STATE OF UNBELIEVERS.

On this subject, the Bible teaches, —

1. That the state in question begins directly after the last judgment (Matt. xxv. 41, 46; Rev. xx. 10–15; Rom. ii. 5–16). It does not seem possible to find in these passages any other sense than the one adopted in our statement. The very idea of such a judgment carries with it retribution as its consequence, and without any further offer of pardon.

2. That it continues the same in kind forever. Matt. xxv. 46; Mark ix. 43–48; Rev. xx. 10, 15; xxii. 11, 15 (cf. Matt. xii. 32; xxvi. 24; Luke xvi. 26; John viii. 21; 1 John v. 16). According to the passage in Luke, a gulf of some kind separates the unbelieving from believers in the middle state; and that gulf is for some reason impassable: much more, then, will the good and the bad be separated by an impassable gulf after the last day.¹

3. That in it the wicked will be conscious of great misery. Dan. xii. 2; Matt. xxv. 46; Mark ix. 43-48; Rev. xx. 10, 15; xxi. 8; xxii. 15 (cf. Matt. xxii. 13; xxv. 30).

What Bishop Butler remarked in the last century is no less true in this; namely, "There is, in the present age, a certain fearlessness with regard to what may be hereafter under the government of God, which nothing but a universally acknowledged demonstration on the side of atheism can justify; and which makes it quite necessary that men be reminded, and, if possible, made to feel, that there is no sort of ground for being thus presumptuous, even upon the most sceptical principles." — ("Analogy," Part I. ch. II). Hence the necessity of bringing forward distinctly God's word on this point.

And, though the language employed by the sacred writers is figurative, and cannot therefore be used to prove the kind of suffering which the wicked will endure hereafter, it must be presumed to give us some just idea of its greatness and dreadfulness; it must be fitted to awaken in our souls such a dread as the reality ought to awaken, and would awaken, if we had a proper conception of it.

4. That some of the wicked will suffer greater punishment than others (Luke xii. 47, 48; Matt. xi. 21-24; Heb. x. 29). In this statement, we assume (a) That some unbelievers in Christ are more guilty than others, since they have rejected him in the face of clearer light, and therefore with greater opposition to the revealed character of God. (b) That retribution in the final state will be strictly just, — no one suffering a particle of anguish more than he ought to suffer.

¹ Whiton (J. M.) "Is Eternal Punishment Endless?" Stuart (M.) "Essays on Future Punishment"; Erbkam (H.) "Ueber die Lehre von der ewigen Verdammniss ein dogmatische Versuch," St. u. Kr. 1838, s. 384 ff.; Thompson (J. P.) "Love and Penalty"; Long (C.) "Objections from Reason against the Endless Punishment of the Wicked"; Hovey (A.) "State of the Impenitent Dead"; Dexter (H. M.) "The Verdict of Reason," &c.; Bartlett (S. C.) "Life and Death Eternal"; Parker (J.) "Ecce Deus," ch. XIV.; Hoppin (J. M.) "The Future State," Bib. Sac. XV. p. 381 sq.; Barrows (E. P.) "The Scriptural Doctrine of a Future State," Bib. Sac. XV. p. 625 sq.; Alger (W. R.) "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," passim; Jackson (Wm.) "The Doctrine of Retribution"; Schaff (P.) "Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist."

But it is to be borne in mind, that sin, as well as suffering for sin, may be eternal;¹ and it is not impossible that some who have hated God less than others in this life may overtake in wickedness their more guilty companions hereafter. If so, their misery will surely equal that of their companions; for no one's accountability will come to an end at the last day. Moral beings must be forever under obligation to do perfectly the will of God; for that will is holy: and, if they refuse to do it, they must forever experience the reproach of conscience for their refusal.²

This view of the case seems to imply, that the misery of the lost will increase from æon to æon; and it must be conceded that all we know of the human soul and of divine righteousness points to such an increase. But just what will be the result of sin and of woe in the final state, no one of the sacred writers has informed us. Whether the wicked will always seek for more knowledge, or rather as far as possible shun the light, can only be conjectured. Preferring to remain the enemies of God, they may nevertheless despair of improving their condition, and so make no effort to enter new fields of thought. A sense of shame and of guilt may brood over them, and turn their attention to the past rather than to the future. Opportunities to do evil, except in thought, may be cut off, and their minds be chiefly occupied with what they "might have been," — with what they have lost, and with the conviction that they have no excuse for their sin and folly.

Objections are often urged against the doctrine of endless

¹ Mark iii. 29, Alford translates, "but is guilty of eternal sin"; which may signify sin that will never end, — sin that sets the soul forever against God, and which grace will never reach.

² Cheever (G. B.) "The Powers of the World to Come," Bibl. Repository and Class. Rev. 3d. Series, Vol. V. pp. 651-668; Vol. VI. pp. 75-99; 457-474; and Bib. Sac. Vol. VIII. pp. 471-491.

punishment, as being inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God. These objections are so stated as to seem very conclusive; but, in reply to them, it may be said,—

(a) That, while the moral judgment of man is able to approve right action, and condemn wrong action, it does not pretend to know the amount of punishment which the latter deserves.

(b) That conscience is of such a nature that it must forever condemn any act of sin; and, therefore, unless that act of sin be repented of, and forgiven, or the moral constitution of man be destroyed, the sinner must forever experience remorse of conscience. He may say, "Evil, be thou my good;" but he will never cease to know that he sins in doing this.

"So I sit alone with my conscience
In the place where the years increase;
And I try to remember the future
In the land where time will cease.

"And I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful soe'er it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience,
Will be judgment enough for me."

—Charles W. Stubbs.

But, to be more specific, we remark,—

(c) That impenitence for sin is sin, and must be condemned by conscience as long as this impenitence continues. The same is likewise true of want of love to God, which inevitably passes over into hatred of God; while hatred of God is hatred of holiness, and must be forever recognized by the moral nature of man as wrong and without excuse. If impenitence continue, punishment will continue; for it is involved in the constitution of the soul: so of hatred to God, and punishment for the same.

(d) That there is no ground for a belief, that, after the last judgment, any one will repent. This is said (1) Because the will of man tends to act in the same moral direction which it has become accustomed to follow. Thus, in a certain sense, man becomes more and more the servant of sin the longer he continues in sin. (2) Because punishment appears to have very little, if any tendency, to work reformation in offenders. It often deters from crime, but it rarely brings one to genuine repentance. (3) That during the middle state, if at any time after this life, a return to God might be expected; yet the language of Scripture does not permit us to expect it then (Luke xvi. 26).

VII. THE FINAL STATE OF BELIEVERS.

A glimpse of what that state will be is afforded us by such texts as the following (Matt. xxv. 46; John v. 29; 1 Cor. xv. 51 sq.; 1 Thess. iv. 16-18; 2 Thess. i. 6-10; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Rev. xxi. 1 sq.). From these portions of Holy Writ, however figurative they may be, we may safely conclude:—¹

1. That this state begins directly after the last judgment. On this point we suppose there is no disagreement among Christians, certainly none among Protestant Christians. The Papal church ought to place the last judgment long after the end of the world, that the souls of the pious dead may escape from purgatory before it; or else to remand some of the pious to purgatory for a time after the judgment.

2. That it continues the same in kind forever. "Ibi esse nostrum non habebit mortem, ibi nosse nostrum non habebit errorem, ibi amare nostrum non habebit offensionem."—(Augustine De Cir. Dei, xi. 28.) Let such a state be endless, and it is heaven. The immutability of the saints in holiness and blessedness is perfectly consistent with the very highest degree of moral freedom and activity. To do the will of God will be their supreme delight, and their growing knowledge of his ways will be a source of unfailing joy.

3. That in it believers will enjoy perfect blessedness. To use the language of Roger Williams, in that final state believers will enjoy forever "the holy and sweet presence of the Father of lights." Just how this presence will be manifested, we cannot tell. The "beatific vision" of God is now inconceivable.

¹ See also Mant (R.) "The Happiness of the Blessed"; Baxter (R.) "The Saints' Everlasting Rest"; Bonar (H.) "The Eternal Day"; Harbaugh (H.) "Heaven," &c., 3 vols.; Dick (T.) "The Philosophy of a Future State"; Taylor (I.) "Physical Theory of a Future Life."

Yet something is meant by "seeing as we are seen, and knowing as we are known" (1 Cor. xiii. 12). And it is quite credible that the nature of God may be as clearly revealed to our spiritual eye hereafter as the nature of any material object is revealed to the eye of sense here. Says Bishop Pearson, "Invisibilitas essentialis divinæ non tollit clarem visionem intellectualem in statu supernaturali," quoted by Ellicott, on 1 Tim. vi. 16. This, at least, may be confidently affirmed, that the blessed and glorified Redeemer will be an object of direct vision and of perfect beauty.

"Now just as the gates were opened to let in the men, I looked in after them, and, behold, the city shone like the sun. The streets also were paved with gold; and in them walked many men, with crowns on their heads, palms in their hands, and golden harps to sing praises withal.

"There were also of them that had wings; and they answered one another without intermission, saying, 'Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord' (Rev. iv. 8). And after that, they shut up the gates; which, when I had seen, I wished myself among them." — "And there shalt thou, oh my mansoul! have such communion with me, with my Father, and with your Lord Secretary, as is not possible here to be enjoyed." — (Bunyan.)

4. That this blessedness will be proportioned to their fidelity on earth (Dan. xii. 3; Rom. ii. 6, 7; Phil. iv. 1; 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20). It might be enough to say, that the quality and degree of their blessedness will depend in some measure on their fidelity in this life; for this may not be the only thing that will affect that blessedness: original capacity may have something to do with it. A knowledge of human sinfulness and divine grace, due to the providence of God rather than to personal service, may have much to do with it; but holy living amid the trials of earth will surely augment the bliss of those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

5. That this blessedness will be forever increasing. For the soul will be restored to its normal condition, ever adding to its knowledge, and thereby to its happiness.

"She recommenced: We from the greatest body
Have issued to the heaven that is pure light, —
Light intellectual replete with love,
Love of true good replete with ecstasy,
Ecstasy that transcendeth every sweetness."

— Dante, Paradiso, xxx. 38 sq.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

INTRODUCTION.

CHRISTIAN ethics is the science of Christian conduct, the latter expression being used in its broadest sense. The term "ethics" is thus synonymous with "morals," "morality," or "moral philosophy."

This science is founded on the moral teachings of the Bible, illustrated by the life of Jesus Christ.

The New Testament is naturally the best guide to Christian conduct for men of all nations and times; but the Old Testament reveals, in its own way, the essential principles of morality, though modified in their application by the character of the Jewish theocracy.

In the order of logical study, Christian ethics must follow Christian theology. For theology treats of God and his grace, while Christian ethics treats of man under the influence of that grace; the former deals with the Giver and the giving of true moral life; the latter with the growth and expression of that life.

The various theories of moral science differ from one another primarily in respect to the original ground or principle of right; that is, the reason—back of which we cannot go—why any act or feeling is to be considered right or wrong. Hence a brief discussion of this point is necessary.

For assuming that the manner of life enjoined by the Scriptures, and illustrated by Christ is right, we may still ask, Why is it right? Is such a life right in view of its end; that is, because it tends to something good other than right character or conduct, and will issue in that good? Or is it right in view of itself; that is, because it is good and desirable per se? And, if it be pronounced good in itself, can we say that it is good independently of the actual nature of God, and the actual constitution of the universe?

For different answers to these questions, see the works mentioned below:¹—

Without stopping to criticise other views, it is enough for our purpose to say that the Scriptures seem to make the moral nature of God the original ground of right. For,—

1. They propose the holiness of God as an all-sufficient reason why men should be holy. And it is quite noteworthy, that, when his holiness is appealed to as an argument for holiness in man, no other reason is added (Lev. xi. 44, 45; xix. 2; xx. 7, 26; Matt. v. 48; 1 Peter i. 14–16; also Gen. i. 26, 27; Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10; 2 Peter i. 4).

2. They enjoin upon men the duty of supreme love to God. Here again it is noteworthy, that the duty of honoring abstract right, eternal order, or natural law is never urged by them as tantamount to honoring God (Deut. x. 12; xi. 1, 13, 22; xix. 9; xxx. 6; Matt. xxii. 37; Luke x. 27; 1 John v. 3; iv. 19; Rom. i. 18, 20).

3. They represent Christ as absorbed in doing joyfully the will of God. His language and bearing carry our minds up to God the Father as a person; and not to God, and the immutable right, as something beside him (John iv. 34; viii. 29; xv. 10; Matt. xi. 25; Luke x. 21; Heb. x. 7).

These three classes of passages favor the view that the moral nature of God, which finds expression in his will, is ultimate, — the proper and original ground of right; and this view is certainly in accord with the general tone and spirit of the sacred writers.

¹ Wardlaw (R.) "Christian Ethics," &c.; Mackintosh (Sir James) "A General View of the Progress of Ethical Philosophy," &c.; Whewell (Wm.) "Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy in England," &c.; Jouffroy (Theo.) "Introduction to Ethics," &c.; Lecky (W. E. H.) "History of European Morals," &c., ch. I.; Hopkins (M.) "Lectures on Moral Science"; also "The Law of Love, and Love as Law"; Butler (Bp. Jos.) "Sermons upon Human Nature"; Wayland (F.) "Moral Science"; Hickok (L. P.) "Moral Science"; Alexander (A.) "Outlines of Moral Science"; Haven (J.) "Moral Philosophy"; Harless (C. A.) "System of Christian Ethics"; Cobbe (Miss F. P.) "Studies New and Old," &c.; Martineau (Jas.) "Studies of Christianity," p. 299 seq.; Calderwood (H.) "Handbook of Moral Philosophy"; Blackie (J. S.) "Four Phases of Morals"; Rothe (R.) "Theologische Ethik."

But it is sometimes objected that men have a natural intuition of the right, and recognize it as something independent of God (Rom. ii. 14, 15; Luke xii. 57).

Our reply is (1) that the power of moral intuition is from God, and is one of the means by which he reveals to us what is approved by himself; (2) that as men often know phenomena or effects without knowing their cause, so they may perceive the existence of a law without recognizing the law-giver. But as the question is one of some difficulty, as well as importance, we can afford to look at it a little longer.

In doing this, we begin with the words of Secretan; namely, "The distinction of good and evil has been established by the divine will. To suppose moral order pre-existent and supreme would be to make moral order God. To suppose them eternally simultaneous would be to divide the sovereignty of the universe between abstract law and the Being consenting to it." The last two of these sentences appear to us correct statements. — (See also the "Office of Law," by the Rev. L. B. Tefft, in "The Baptist Quarterly," II. p. 476 seq.)

We regard the nature of God as the one fons naturarum, the absolutely original and sole reality, beyond which we should never seek to go in thought. But, since God has made men in his own image, they see that which he approves to be right, and cannot, without destroying their own nature, see otherwise. Yet this remark applies only to principles, and not to their various applications.

We do not, however, suppose that moral right, and moral law, its expression, are related to the consciousness of God just as they are to our consciousness. The moral law is a free expression of his will to others, and therefore in the fullest and strictest sense it is from him, under him, dependent on him, and immutable only as he is immutable; while the same law comes down upon us from his mind and will, imposing itself on our consciences, and therefore is over us, and independent of us.

But it is important to bear in mind always, that we are so constituted that what the law enjoins we look upon as in its own nature good and right, and therefore fit to be enjoined. Hence we do not believe that the law has made right to be right, but has only expressed it as such; nor could it be different, and yet be right, any more than God could be different and still be God.

Yet we do not know whether it is, or is not, logically conceivable, that the nature of God might have been different from what it is, approving what it now disapproves, and disapproving what it approves. But, if it had been so, it is plain that we, having been made in his image, must have regarded that as good and right which we now look upon as evil and wrong. That is to say, a morally different Creator would have insured a morally different creation. This is self-evident.

Whether it would have been as good as the actual one, we cannot tell; for our faculties are utterly incompetent to judge or even conceive of it in any definite way. We must see with the moral eye which God has given us; must see facts and laws and principles as they are, the moral universe as it is. And, being ourselves a part of the moral universe as it is, we cannot but regard God and his moral law as perfect and immutable.

It may be added briefly, that we hold, —

(1) With Hickok, that whatever is right is worthy of man's spiritual nature; but against him we say, it is worthy of that nature because it is right, and not right because it is worthy of that nature.

(2) With Smith, that whatever is right excites a peculiar feeling in us, namely, that of approbation; but against him we say, that this feeling is due to a judgment or cognition of the rightness of the act, instead of the judgment being due to the feeling.

(3) With Dwight, that whatever is right is conducive to the greatest good; but against him, that under God, and by his providence, it is conducive to the greatest good because it is right, and not right simply because it is conducive to the greatest good.

(4) With Price, that whatever is right comports with the nature and fitness of things ; but against him, that the very nature and fitness of things are due to the action of God, and express his will, instead of his nature and will being due to the fitness of things.

(5) With Paley, that whatever is right is required by the will of God ; but against him, that God's will expresses an unchangeable and rational nature, — the source of our own.

(6) With Paley, that whatever is right is useful to us ; but against him, that it is not right simply because it is useful to us, but under God it is useful to us because it is right.

Having ascertained from the Scriptures the original ground of right and wrong, our next step is to find the supreme rule of right. And this, if we are correct as to the ground, must be the revealed will of God, — a will revealed partly by nature, and more fully by the sacred record. In support of this statement, we may appeal, —

(1) To the common judgment of Christians. For there are very few points on which they are better agreed than on this, — that the will of God is the rule of right.

(2) To the general consent of ethical writers. For most of these writers distinctly admit the truth of our statement.

(3) To the testimony of God's word.^f This appears to be very plain and consistent from first to last. — (See, for example, Mark iii. 35 ; Luke xxii. 42 ; Acts xxi. 14 ; Ps. i. 2 ; cxliii. 11 ; Rom. vii. 10–12 ; ix. 20 seq. ; 1 John iii. 4, 20 ; 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4 ; Acts xxvi. 9–11 ; also 1 Cor. xv. 9 ; Eph. iii. 8 ; John xii. 28).

The will of God as to Christian duty is revealed in nature, —

(1) By the original testimony of conscience to the existence of a moral quality in human conduct, and of man's duty to be and to do right. This testimony assures every man, also, that he ought to seek light in regard to his duty from every source open to him ; and the Saviour has taught us why it is unheeded (John iii. 19, 20). Without it, however, the ignorant might remain ignorant, in many instances at least, and yet be blameless.

Says Pres. Chadbourne ("Instinct in Animals and Men," p. 264), "While obligation must have light from the comprehending power, it does not wait for that light to come, or not, as some lower impulse may determine; but with royal voice it demands more light every instant of time; it demands all the light the comprehending power can give; it will be satisfied with nothing less; and it increases its demands as the capacity of the comprehending power increases, when used in the best manner possible. Can any thing be more beautiful than this double action of obligation in the system of means? It does not make man a perfect being, as to knowledge; but it is beautiful as the means of constant progress toward perfection. There is resting upon man, evermore, the obligation to do right, and to secure knowledge that he may know what is right." — (See also Rom. ii. 14, 15, the classic passage on this point; and Hofmann, "Die Lehre von der Gewissen.")

Yet it must be admitted that conscience affords by itself but little ethical knowledge; namely, that there is a moral quality in conduct, that man ought to do right and be right, and that he is bound to seek the knowledge which will assist him to do right.

(2) By the working of natural sympathies and impulses, For these sympathies, when normal, indicate the will of God, and can therefore be used as sources of light to moral judgment. The conjugal, parental, and filial instincts may be named as the most important in this respect. Yet these affections and sympathies teach but little perfectly; for sin has marred their character, and thereby diminished the clearness and fulness of their testimony.

(3) By the relations which God has established between living beings. These relations may be studied as they exist in families and nations; indeed, wherever living beings of any race have any thing to do with one another. But the knowledge thus attainable is obscured by the complexity of the relations to be studied, and the disturbance which they have suffered from sin.

The will of God is also revealed in the Scriptures, —

(1) By a clear statement of moral principles. These principles are so comprehensive, that, when properly applied, they always guide the inquirer in the way of duty.

(2) By special rules, showing the application of said principles in particular instances.

(3) By the life of Christ, the one example of perfect conduct among men. This is perhaps the most important source of ethical truth in the Scriptures.

Thus, in a very simple manner, the sacred record rectifies, completes, and confirms the knowledge derivable from other sources, and proves itself to be an inexhaustible fountain of ethical light or truth.

The sources of ethical knowledge seem, therefore, to be ample; yet in no man on earth is this knowledge perfect, —

(1) Because no man seeks it with a zeal proportioned to its importance. Sin has weakened our desire to know the will of God.

(2) Because no man has moral powers unimpaired by sin. Evil propensities have warped the moral judgment, and led to imperfect views of truth and duty.

(3) Because many of our race have not the Holy Scriptures, but only the light of nature.

This imperfection of ethical knowledge has doubtless to some extent an unfavorable bearing on the conduct of Christians (1 John iii. 2; and comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Phil. i. 10). Hence they should seek to acquaint themselves with the principles of Christian morality.

The imperfection of their ethical knowledge affects the form, rather than the substance, of the conduct of unbelievers (Rom. i. 18–32; vii. 8; Gal. iii. 19).

Imperfection of ethical knowledge can modify one's responsibility for his conduct only in so far as the former is due to causes beyond his control (John iii. 19, 20; Rom. i. 28). For instance, a man who in a fit of drunkenness kills a neighbor may be guilty of murder, though a part of his guilt belongs to the act of drinking.

But, as due to causes beyond his control, no man's ignorance of duty is so complete as to destroy his responsibility for evil conduct.—(See Luke xii. 48; John ix. 41; Rom. i. 19 seq.; ii. 15 seq.; Acts xxvi. 9; comp. 1 Cor. xv. 9.) Yet in so far as it is due to such causes, it diminishes his guilt in the sight of God (Matt. xx. 20–24; Luke xii. 47, 48; John iii. 19; xv. 22, 24; Rom. ii. 12; iv. 15; v. 13; 2 Tim. iii. 13; James iv. 17.)

Finally, the grand distinction of Christian conduct is this: it is rooted in faith, and sustained by divine grace. Faith works by love. The former receives; the latter gives. The former sustains; the latter acts. Moreover, gratitude for love quickens returning love (2 Cor. v. 14; 1 John iv. 19). Hence the possibility of a gradual transition from sin to holiness.

"Gradual," we say, because if we reason from the conscious experience of believers, this change seems to be thus effected in a majority of instances, because it is represented in the New Testament as a growth in the grace and knowledge of Christ, as a progress from childhood to maturity, as a renewal of the inner man from day to day, as a transformation from glory to glory into the image of Christ, as a race and a conflict, and because we are assured that all things work together for good to them that love God; a statement which appears to be true of every Christian, though it is certain that the conscious progress of some is so slow as to be imperceptible, except at long intervals.

In the further study of Christian ethics, the works named below may be consulted:¹—

¹Harless (G. C. A.) "Christian Ethics"; Schmid (C. F.) "Christliche Sittenlehre"; Martensen, "Christian Ethics"; Wuttke (Adolf) "Christian Ethics"; Rothe (R.) "Theologische Ethik"; Wardlaw (R.) "Christian Ethics"; Sartorius (E.) "Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe"; Row (C. A.) "Moral Teaching of the New Testament"; Wilkins (A. S.) "The Light of the World"; Luthardt (C. E.) "The Moral Truths of Christianity"; Dale (R. W.) "The Ten Commandments"; Gregory (D. S.) "Christian Ethics."

CHAPTER I.

CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO GOD.

THE leading passages of Scripture bearing upon this topic may be gathered into three groups, namely:—

- (1) Deut. x. 12, 13; Matt. xxii. 37; Luke x. 27.
- (2) 1 Cor. x. 31; 1 John v. 2, 3; John xiv. 23; xv. 10, 14.
- (3) Eph. vi. 18; Phil. iv. 6; Col. iv. 2; 1 Thess. v. 16; 1 Tim. ii. 8.

The first of these groups evidently requires of Christians a love to God commensurate with the utmost natural power of man to love. This love comprises in itself (1) a clear view of God's moral perfection; (2) a profound admiration of his character; (3) a peculiar delight in his presence; and (4) a high regard for his honor. The Saviour makes all our duties to God depend upon love, because love will lead us to perform them all; or, better perhaps, because it is the condition of their performance. Without it, conscience dictates in vain; with it, conscience always rules the will.

The second group requires of Christians not only a reverent obedience to the commands of God, but a purpose to honor him by all their conduct. Is the latter practicable? We reply, that the honor of God may be the ruling motive of every action, though the mind does not always have that end consciously in view.

For (1) a series of actions is often embraced in a single purpose; and the right doing of those acts may at times absorb the mind, so that the end sought by them all is lost sight of. Yet the one ruling purpose may pervade the whole series, and give character to it all. Nay, it is possible that the mind may have consciously in view a great end, and be moved by a deep love, without being distinctly conscious of its own state; and in certain circumstances this may be the very highest kind of Christian action.

And (2) many duties are so unquestionable, and constantly recurring, that they may be performed as a matter of course, without a thought of the supreme end. Of this character are numberless social and domestic duties. Perhaps, however, it would be right and easy to connect them more frequently in thought with God, who has established our social and domestic relations.

The whole spirit and bearing of Oliver Cromwell are said to have risen with his advancement to higher stations of power and trust. Charles Sumner is supposed by some to have never lost for a moment the feeling that he was a senator of the United States. A poor German wood-sawyer arrested the attention of a young Jewish scholar by the noble and happy expression of his countenance while engaged in his work; and when asked to explain it, replied, "I am a King's son." He was a Christian who rejoiced in the privilege of adoption.

While, then, the requirement that we should always act with reference to the honor of God is not unreasonable, it is exceedingly comprehensive; and no Christian in this life does more than advance towards a fulfilment of it.

The last group enjoins upon the followers of Christ unceasing worship or prayer. Is this possible? Certainly not as an outward service, and probably not as a form of conscious mental action. Yet, in a certain intelligible sense, the whole life may be, in the words of Origen, "one connected prayer"; but only if the word "prayer" is understood to include praise, and giving of thanks, as well as petition and states of heart, half-conscious, as well as separate acts. As every Christian knows, there is a tone of thought and feeling which may be characterized as devout and prayerful,—a perpetual uplooking and uprising of the soul to God,—which do not interfere with any duty to man. All this may be called prayer, and associated with what has been said in the outlines of secret prayer.

But Christian conduct embraces the duty of public or social, as well as of secret worship. And public worship should be simple, direct, earnest, and reverent. In the strictly devotional parts of such worship,—that is, in prayer and singing,—God himself should be the chief object of thought. The spirit should be turned fervently to him; and, if it is, the worship will be such as we have described, for no other will satisfy the worshipper. “The most eloquent prayer,” &c., would be unnatural. — (See Matt. vi. 5, 6.)

One who leads in social prayer should never address others through God, or choose his language to God with a view to convince or impress men; for this would be irreverent. Prayer to God is always primarily and chiefly for his ear. Hence the special danger in one feature of the woman’s crusade against intemperance. It must be very difficult, though perhaps not impossible, to pray in presence of the rum-seller, without thinking much of the effect of the prayer itself upon his conscience, instead of looking simply to God for help. Prayer with a stubborn child is for the same reason difficult.

Again, it is quite true that genuine worship by prayer and song quickens the spiritual life of those who engage in it; but this is a result,—not the end consciously sought. The proximate end of praise is the honor of God; and the proximate end of petition is the blessing of God,—his interposition in some way for the suppliant, or for others. Hence, if prayer is to be sincere, and the best exercise of holy affections, it must not be offered for the sake of the benefit which there is in this exercise; it must not terminate in itself, but in God: the improvement of holy affection by prayer must be a result, and not an end.

Yet public worship implies a consciousness that others are taking part with the leader, and so a desire in him to assist their approach to God. Hence ecstatic devotion, excluding the sense of fellowship with men by the sense of Jehovah’s glory, is scarcely natural in public worship. Whoever conducts such worship should ordinarily be so far mindful of those who are expected to join in it as to fix his attention upon objects of common interest, and use language fit to be uttered by the common voice; in order that those who hear may appropriate his words in silence, if not by an audible Amen at the close.

Remark. In this connection, it would be well to examine carefully the prayers, some private and some public, recorded in the Scriptures; and, in particular, the Book of Psalms.

CHAPTER II.

CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO ONE'S SELF.

FROM the circumstance that Christ makes love to one's self the standard of love to a fellow-man, two inferences may be drawn; namely, first, that he looked upon a certain degree of self-love as right; and, second, that he knew men were not deficient in that love.

Self-love is, indeed, far too strong in the heart of man unrenewed, — so strong as to be a passion, blind and tyrannical. But in the Christian it is not supreme, though it still exceeds the lawful measure, — that of love to one's neighbor. In what way, then, should the Christian have respect to his own character, improvement, and welfare in the conduct of life? This is the question which we are now to answer according to the intimations of God's word.

And it may be answered thus: in so far as Christians can properly have regard to themselves in their conduct, they should seek their own highest good, especially by aiming to render their whole nature, in body and spirit, perfect. But this general reply is too vague for our purpose. We must look at the subject in detail, beginning with the spiritual side of our being, and passing thence to the animal. We shall thus be led to consider the moral and religious, the intellectual and æsthetic, and finally the bodily powers, which are to be guarded and improved by right conduct.

The Scriptures always treat men as moral beings, able to distinguish between good and evil, right and wrong, and to feel their obligation to do the one, and avoid the other. Moreover, they sometimes speak of that in their nature, by which they are able to do or feel this, as conscience. Acts xxiv. 16; Rom. ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12; 1 Tim. i. 5, 19; iii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 3; Heb. xiii. 18; 1 Peter iii. 16 (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 4; Heb. ix. 9, 14; x. 22; 1 Peter ii. 19; iii. 21).

The term, συνείδησις, means literally "a knowing with one's self,"—that is, "consciousness," then "conscience." Whewell says, "Conscience is the reason employed about questions of right and wrong, and accompanied with the sentiments of approbation and condemnation; which, by the nature of man, cling inextricably to his apprehension of right and wrong."—(Sys. Mor. Lect. VI. See Fleming's Vocab. of Phil. sub. v., and Hofmann's (R.) "Lehre von der Gewissen.")

Conscience may be regarded as discriminative, mandatory, and sensitive in its functions; but it will be enough for our present purpose to speak of it as discriminative and sensitive. These two functions must, however, be carefully distinguished; for it is one thing to see that a given course of conduct is right, and quite another to love it on that account. Hence the judicial power of conscience is sometimes good, when its tenderness is lost; and its tenderness is sometimes great, when its power of discrimination is feeble.

From some of the passages noted above, it appears that Christians should excel other men in soundness and purity of conscience, and that strict regard should be paid by them to the culture of their moral nature.

Hence it may be said, in the first place, that every Christian should bring his conscience, as a judicial power, to bear upon his whole life, secular and religious; and should assist this faculty to decide aright by every means within his reach. He should not only give the first place to the question, Is this or that contemplated action right? but he should aid his moral judgment by the use of all available knowledge, to answer this question correctly. Moreover, it will be his duty to pass judgment upon actions already performed by himself or by others, and, indeed, to study, if practicable, the whole science of Christian ethics. In this way only can the judicial power of conscience be fitly cultivated.

And it may be said, in the second place, that every Christian should strictly obey the decisions of his own conscience. To this remark there can be no exception. It is impossible for any one to be without blame in doing that which he believes to be wrong. To deny the authority of conscience in a single instance is to pronounce the moral nature a wreck, and remove the actor beyond the sphere of responsibility. Yet we do not mean to say that the decisions of conscience are always right; this is far from true: yet, right or wrong, they are imperative. By careful obedience to conscience, its practical force and its continued sensitiveness are increased.

It may also be said, in the third place, that every Christian should abstain from such forms of mental action as tend in any way to injure the clearness or sensitiveness of his conscience. Any kind of study which rarely presents moral questions or phenomena may deny to this faculty the exercise necessary to its health and improvement. Moreover, conscience is a practical faculty: it was meant to produce or control action; and therefore it must have to do with real life far more than with ideal. Much reading of fiction is, therefore, unfavorable to its growth in power. For the same reason, no Christian can dwell in imagination upon scenes of cruelty, deception, or vice, without peril to conscience; much less can he witness such scenes very often without injury. Gladiatorial combats, bull-fights, horse-races even, are likely to harm the moral nature; and the same may be said of the stage.

But two points need to be recalled and supported by the language of Scripture, namely:—

(1) That the decisions of conscience are not always correct. Acts xxvi. 9 (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 9; 1 Tim. i. 13, 16.)

(2) That it is wrong for Christians to disregard the decisions of a weak conscience (1 Cor. viii. 7, 10, 12; x. 28, 29; Rom. ii. 15). If they are bound to respect such a conscience in others, it is plain that they should obey it when it is their own. To these we add, —

(3) That Christianity is the only religion which can fully purify and educate the conscience of man. — See 1 Tim. i. 5, 19; 2 Tim. i. 3; Heb. ix. 9, 14; x. 22; xiii. 18 (cf. 1 Tim. iv. 2; Tit. i. 15); for it insists on a perfect moral standard, while it brings the believer, though still imperfect, into favor with God through Christ, and gives him hope of ultimate holiness.

But, though morality and religion are so united that neither can prosper without the other, they are not, as many believe, identical. We are able to distinguish between trust in Christ, and a sense of duty to him; between love to God, and a conviction that he ought to be loved; between the effect of divine grace as a state of the heart, and the act of seeking that grace, or of manifesting that state.

Though devout affections are due to the grace of God, they are strengthened by exercise; and therefore it is clearly a part of our duty to provide for that exercise. Hence it is plain that meditation on the power, the wisdom, the holiness, and the love of God—a reverent but trustful uplooking of the soul to him, and a diligent study of his word and works for the purpose of obtaining new views of his glory—are embraced in Christian conduct.

The New Testament inculcates penitence for sin, lowliness of heart, submissiveness of will, and perfect docility towards God. These are humble virtues; they attract little notice; they are foreign to the unrenewed mind. But they are of great price in the sight of God, and they are indispensable to Christian life.

Again, it has been often remarked, that the sacred writers insist upon the duty of meekness, patience, forbearance, long-suffering, forgiveness of injuries, and a lowly estimate of one's self as compared with others; in a word, upon the passive virtues rather than the active, the enduring rather than the heroic, the obscure rather than the conspicuous. A desire to shine by his own light, and to be admired for his own excellence, is a heathen, not a Christian feeling. But this topic has been considered in the Manual of Theology, and may therefore be dismissed with only a brief notice.

Again, Christian conduct should have some respect to the health and growth of one's mental powers. And this growth depends (1) upon their being sufficiently used. In professional men, there is, perhaps, as much danger of their being overworked, as of their being left idle. Christian ethics requires one to avoid both extremes, and thus secure a normal development of the mind. (2) Upon their being rightly used. No mental power should be neglected; no one should be cultivated in such a way as to injure another. Reason, memory, taste, will, should all be disciplined for the best service. The Christian must therefore have regard to what he reads, and how he reads; he must learn to hear well, observe well, speak well. He must be interested in the phenomena of matter, as well as of mind; in nature inorganic, organic, animate, rational; and in the progress of events, whether social, civil, or religious. He must also provide for mental recreation; and to do this will sometimes test his wisdom and virtue. Conversation and reading, games which require close thought, and those which tax the body, foreign travel, and camping out will offer their attractions.

The Christian religion honors human feeling and sensibility, as well as intellect. It rejects the stoic view of life. It calls upon every Christian to shape his conduct with some regard to the training of his natural senses, susceptibilities, and affections. He should be able to appreciate the grandeur and beauty of nature. He should admire the forms and colors which adorn the universe. He should know something, if practicable, of music and painting, so that the blessings of life may be multiplied to him.

And lastly, as the nature of man includes a body, the organ and instrument of the spirit, this body should also be suitably regarded in the conduct of life. It may be used for the glory of God (1 Cor. vi. 20). But, in order to this, it must be ruled by the spirit (1 Cor. ix. 27). Both suitable food and suitable exercise are necessary to the health and perfection of the body. Perhaps there is little reason to speak of the former; yet Christians are certainly liable to be too careless, as well as too fastidious, about their food. A plain, nutritious diet has much to do with mental, and even moral vigor; and for none is such a diet more necessary than for persons who labor with the mind, rather than with the body. In almost all cases, alcoholic and narcotic stimulants are sooner or later injurious to those who employ them. Men of sedentary life have special reason to avoid them.

Many employments furnish ample exercise to the body. But this is not true of all; and, when it is not, exercise should be sought as a condition of health and strength. And, other things being equal, those forms of bodily exercise should be chosen for this purpose which are least likely to be abused by evil men. It is, however, extremely difficult to lay down any rules on the subject. But it is, perhaps, generally true that the most fascinating amusements are the most likely to be perverted. Walking, especially with a congenial friend or two, is a good exercise. Croquet, bowling, ball-playing, may prove equally healthful, and more attractive. Dancing is not an altogether safe recreation. Riding on horseback is excellent, if one can afford it. Rowing is likely to be too severe.

CHAPTER III.

¹ CHRISTIAN CONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO OTHER MEN.—

INTRODUCTORY.

It may be inferred from several statements of the New Testament, and especially from Acts xvii. 26, and Luke x. 27 seq., that every man should treat every other man as kindly as he would treat a neighbor or a brother; but the Christian standard for motive and conduct is defined even more exactly by Matt. xxii. 39, and vii. 12.

The last of these passages, often called the Golden Rule, seems to presuppose three things: (1) that no man stands on a higher level in essential worth than his fellow-man; (2) that no man is entitled to better treatment from others than he is willing to accord to them ; (3) that God takes the will for the deed, making one's settled desire the criterion and standard of his character.

But, assuming the truth of these positions, can it even then be seen that one's own desires are in all cases a safe guide to what would be best for others, and right for him to do to others? It is difficult to answer these questions in the affirmative; for the desires of a selfish being crave much that is not for the highest good of that being, and cannot, therefore, be a proper measure of what would be useful to another person of the same nature, even though they are a sure index of what might be justly required of their possessor. We are, therefore, inclined to something like the following view of the Golden Rule, namely: —

It requires that, in so far as conduct depends upon feeling, or may properly be swayed by it, every man should do to others as he can see that he would have them do to him, were he in their circumstances, and they in his. But, as love to one's neighbor is not so strictly the fulfilling of the law as rather a pledge of its fulfilment, so the Golden Rule is not of itself an all-sufficient guide to duty, but rather a clear statement of the feeling that will insure right conduct towards others. It is a perfect expression of what a man, so far as he himself is concerned, ought to be willing to do. It points out the degree of self-sacrifice which he should be ready to make; and, if he is ready to make it, he will rarely or never do wrong to his neighbor.

And, if we look at the second great command of the law, it will be necessary to bear in mind, —

(1) That neither self-love, nor love to one's neighbor, includes of necessity any moral approbation of the character of the person loved. It is, rather, a genuine interest in the welfare of that person, though his character may be viewed with abhorrence.

(2) That external duties are often affected in this life by local, social, domestic, or ecclesiastical relations, and not determined altogether by the degree of love which ought to be felt for the persons concerned.

(3) That natural affection and moral sympathy knit together many hearts with ties additional to the tie required by the second command. Hence it is possible for one human being to love another better than himself; that is, with a self-sacrificing love.

But we must consider Christian conduct with reference to others in the several relations of life, and, —

SECTION I. — IN CHURCH RELATIONS.

The bond of union which connects members of the same church is twofold, — love to their common Lord, and love to one another; the latter growing out of the former. — (See 1 John iv. 20, 21; Matt. x. 42; xxv. 40.)

The primary relation of the members of a Christian church to one another is that of brethren, all being entitled to the same privileges. Matt. xxiii. 8; Acts vi. 3; 1 Cor. viii. 12; Gal. iii. 26 seq. (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 12 seq.; Gal. vi. 10; Eph. ii. 18 seq.; Heb. iii. 6; 1 Tim. vi. 2; 1 Peter ii. 9; v. 3; Rev. i. 6; and "Bap. Quarterly," iv. p. 225 seq., "Church Polity;" also Litton (E. A.) "The Church of Christ"; Jacob (G. A.) "The Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament"; Ripley (H. J.) "Church Polity"; Whately (R.) "The Kingdom of Christ.")

Hence social and civil distinctions do not affect one's position in the church. A son may be made the spiritual overseer and teacher of his father, or a servant of his master. But natural distinctions, as of sex, ability, and experience, are not to be overlooked in the organization and work of a church.

It may be noted in particular, —

(1) That every member of a Christian church should seek the spiritual welfare of the other members with all fidelity, love, patience, and hope (Gal. vi. 2; Phil. ii. 3 seq.; Rom. i. 11, 12).

(2) Should co-operate with the others, according to his own gift, in every good work; that the church being complete, wanting nothing, may accomplish its labor of love (Rom. xii. 4 seq.; 1 Cor. xii. 12 seq.). These are most instructive paragraphs.

(3) Should treat the poor, the lowly, the ignorant, with as much honor and affection as those who have wealth or station or learning (Jas. ii. 1 seq.). This passage does not refer to members of the church; though it must apply to them, as well as to others.

(4) Should fully recognize the rights and functions of church officers, and heartily honor those officers (Heb. xiii. 7, 17). The kind of authority belonging to pastors should be carefully learned from the New Testament; and, when learned, it should be exercised on the one hand, and respected on the other.

Hence we remark still further, —

(a) That fraternal equality in the church does not of itself render one eligible to office in the same; much less does it entitle one to claim office. Fitness for special service is the only sufficient reason for appointment to it; and the brethren as a body must judge of this fitness.

(b) That, in judging of any member's fitness for the ministry, the brethren must bear in mind the qualifications enumerated by the apostle (1 Tim. iii. 1-7; Tit. i. 6-9), quite as much as the member's sense of duty. A similar remark may be made in respect to deacons. — (See 1 Tim. iii. 8-10.)

(c) That women are not eligible to the ministry; nor is it their duty to address public assemblies comprising men as well as women (1 Tim. ii. 12-15; 1 Cor. xiv. 33-35).

In the former passage, Paul affirms (1) that the sphere of woman's appropriate and blessed activity is domestic (v. 15); (2) that in public assemblies she is to be a learner, quiet and subordinate to man, — not a teacher, or one exercising authority over man (12, 13); and (3) that this position is assigned her in view of her distinctive nature as revealed in the history of the first sin (14).

In the latter passage, Paul enjoins upon Christian women the duty of silence in the church assemblies, and supports this injunction by an appeal (1) to the practice of all the other churches (33); (2) to the divinely ordained subordination of woman to man (34); (3) to the instinctive feeling of right-minded persons, especially women (35). If this interpretation of the last clause be rejected, we must suppose that the apostle regarded public speaking as incompatible with the true nature of woman. — (See also 1 Tim. iii. 11; v. 9, 10.)

But, against this apparently obvious and indisputable sense of the two passages quoted above, many things are urged on the ground of Scripture and of reason. And, in particular,—

The following passages of Holy Writ (1 Cor. xi. 5–16; Acts xxi. 9; xviii. 26; ii. 17, 18; i. 14; Luke ii. 38; Exod. xv. 20, 21; Judges iv. 4–6, 14; v. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 12; Gal. iii. 28). It is manifestly proper for us to look with care at these statements of Scripture; for our simple duty is to ascertain, if possible, the will of God on the point in question.

In the first passage, women are admonished not to pray or prophesy with uncovered head; and this admonition is enforced by sundry reasons, especially by one from the subordination of woman to man, and by one from the custom of all the churches. It is therefore inferred that the apostle had in mind praying or prophesying in the public assemblies of the church; and that he sanctioned the practice by simply correcting an abuse in it.

But we see no evidence that Paul refers to public assemblies of the church. For, beyond a doubt, there were many small meetings of Christians in private houses, where men and women prayed and talked together familiarly; and in these the apostle may have encouraged women to pray and prophesy, though with due modesty, and recognition of man as the natural leader in even such meetings. This is the view to which Meyer came in the last revision of his commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

In the second passage, Luke mentions that Philip, the Evangelist, had four unmarried daughters who possessed the gift of prophecy, or inspiration; and it is inferred that they were accustomed to deliver their prophecies in public assemblies. But we know of nothing decisive in favor of this inference. The word “prophesy” means undoubtedly to speak for God, to utter truth received by inspiration from him; but this truth may be communicated by writing as well as by word of mouth, and to one or two as well as to many (1 Sam. xxii. 5; 2 Sam. vii. 5, 17; xii. 1 seq.; 1 Kings xi. 29 seq.; xiii. 1 seq., &c.).

In the third passage, Priscilla is spoken of with her husband as having set the way of the Lord more exactly before the mind of Apollos; and hence it is supposed that Christian women may teach in the public assemblies. But we are unable to see the connection between the premise and the conclusion.

In the fourth passage, the effect of the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost is said to include a fulfilment of Joel's prophecy, that "sons and daughters," "servants and handmaids," should prophesy; and hence it is supposed that Christians of both sexes took part in the public speaking of that wonderful day. But we find no satisfactory evidence of this in the narrative, and of course none in the single word "prophesy."

In the fifth passage, Luke says that the women continued in prayer with the other disciples; but this they might certainly have done without leading the company in their worship.

In the sixth passage, Luke mentions that Anna, an aged prophetess, who lived in the temple, came up at the very time when Jesus was presented by his mother in the temple, "gave thanks to the Lord, and spoke of him to all that were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem." But that this giving of thanks, or speaking, was in the presence of any thing like an assembly, we do not know. Is it not more probable that she joined the family group, and expressed her thanks to God in a simple, informal way, while both on that day and afterwards she spoke of the holy child to such devout persons as she met in the courts of the temple? Says Bleek, "It would be proper to place a period before καὶ ἐλάλει, especially as the speaking mentioned here was not restricted to what she said while the child was present in the temple" (Drei ersten Evang. i. S. 90). Godet also observes that "it is not necessary to refer the imperfect, ἐλάλει, to the actual moment; she was doing thus continually" (Com. ad. loc.). And Olshausen remarks that "the aged woman with busy haste imparted the joy of her heart to like-minded friends of the Messiah in Jerusalem." We may ask still further, why, if her address was a public one to a considerable assembly, it is said that she "was speaking of him to all those who were waiting for the redemption of Jerusalem"? A public address could hardly have been restricted to that class.

The seventh passage may be explained by the Speaker's Commentary. — "The men are represented as singing the hymn in chorus, under the guidance of Moses; at each interval, Miriam and the women sang the refrain, marking the time with the timbrel, and with the measured, rhythmical movements always associated with religious festivities (Comp. Judges xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; and 2 Sam. vi. 5)." This narrative does not therefore have any bearing on the subject before us, except only as Miriam is called a prophetess; and this circumstance decides nothing.

In the eighth passage, Deborah, the prophetess who judged Israel for a time, is said to have summoned Barak to lead the warriors of Israel against their enemies now in the land; and, in compliance with his demand, to have gone with him to the war. After the victory, these two are said to have sung a triumphal song; but whether they two chanted it together in public, or in private, we cannot be certain. Perhaps it was only composed by them, as the song of their hearts to the Lord, and vocalized by them and by the people, as other sacred songs (cf. 2 Kings xxii. 14 seq.).

In the ninth passage it is said, "The Lord gives the word; the women that publish the glad tidings are a mighty host." To what does this language refer? Dr. Conant answers, by quoting Exod. xv. 20, "All the women went out with timbrels" (Miriam, &c.), seq.; and 1 Sam. xviii. 6, "The women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing," &c.; and he adds that "verses 12-14 in the Psalm may be understood as the message which they proclaim." Hupfeld says, "It is the chorus of singing and dancing women whom we see in the Old Testament, as in all antiquity, celebrating victories. — (See Exod. xv. 20; Judges v. 11, 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6 seq.; 2 Sam. i. 20, and verse 26 below.)" So also Vaihinger, Ewald, Olshausen (Justin), Tholuck, De Wette, Alexander, Noyes. Delitzsch says that "there is no reference here to the preaching of the gospel"; and in this we think he is certainly correct.

In the last passage, we have the doctrine, that, so far as salvation in and through Christ is concerned, there is no difference between Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female; but how this bears on the question before us, we fail to see.

We conclude, therefore, that there is no passage in the Bible, which, fairly interpreted, conflicts with the prima-facie sense of Paul's language in 1 Cor. xiv. 33-35; and 1 Tim. ii. 12-15.

But is this language of the apostle applicable to Christian women of the present day? "Tempora mutantur; mores mutantur." This question seems to us more difficult to answer than the one which we have been considering; for the form of some of the precepts or counsels given by the apostles was determined, no doubt, by temporal or local circumstances, though the underlying principle must have been, in all cases, of perpetual validity.

This statement is founded on certain expressions in the following texts (Acts xv. 29; 1 Cor. vii. 1, 7, 26; xi. 6 seq.; 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10). But it should be observed (1) that other passages of the New Testament show that the regulation recorded in Acts xv. 29, was temporary, not permanent, except as embraced in other teaching of the Scriptures;

(2) that the language of Paul commending celibacy as better in certain cases than marriage is still applicable to some in the church, for marriage is not best for all Christians; yet a special reason for his words is intimated by 1 Cor. vii. 26; and (3) that a principle of eternal validity underlies the language respecting female dress and ornament, though it may, perhaps, be right to vary the application of it with changes of time and place.

Are we, then, authorized to class the apostle's injunction of silence on the part of women in public assemblies with the expressions just noticed? Are the grounds on which the injunction is made to rest temporary or permanent, fluctuating or stable? These grounds may be reduced to two; namely, the divinely established subordination of woman to man, and the custom of the apostolic churches; and the second of these may be presumed to rest upon the first.

Two questions now present themselves: (1) Is the act of addressing public assemblies, composed of men and women, now and naturally inconsistent with the subordinate position assigned to woman by her Creator? and (2) Is this subordination penal, abnormal, and destined to be gradually removed by the Christian religion?

To the former question, an affirmative reply must, we think, be made; for it would be difficult to name any kind of leadership more real than that of public speakers. Indeed, the authority or influence of Christian pastors is nearly all embraced in their privilege of standing forth as the teachers and guides of the people by means of public discourse. To the latter question, we are constrained to reply in the negative; for woman was originally given to man as a fit helper (Gen. ii. 18); and her relative position is recognized as still the same after conversion (Eph. v. 22 seq.; 1 Cor. xi. 3, 7-9; 1 Peter iii. 1-7). The language of Gen. iii. 16, may imply that man's authority over woman would be felt as a burden henceforth; but in itself it was no more a part of the penalty of sin than childbearing was a part of that penalty.

From this examination we return to our first statement, that women are neither eligible to the Christian ministry, nor is it their duty to address public assemblies of both sexes. If asked to define the expression, "public assemblies," we can only respond in a general way, by saying, They are assemblies of people too large to be easily addressed in a conversational tone without rising from one's seat. In small social meetings, especially such as are often held in private houses, Christian women may speak or pray without transgressing the rule given by the apostle. They may also recount their personal experience to the church from time to time in covenant meetings; and the information which they thus give enables others to sympathize with them.

SECTION II.—IN DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

As marriage is the basis of these relations, it claims attention at the outset. We shall therefore speak of the design and the law of marriage.

The marriage union was evidently designed,—

(1) To bring into healthful action the moral nature of both parties: since, beyond all other relations, it calls for the exercise of mutual integrity, confidence, affection, and tenderness.

(2) To improve the mental powers of both. The natural difference between man and woman renders their influence in this respect more stimulating and wholesome, while it prevents envy and ill-will.

(3) To cultivate the social affections. Celibates are liable to become, in process of time, selfish and censorious. Even natural affection may die for want of suitable exercise.

(4) To tranquillize the violent, and regulate the sensual passions of man. On this point we are not accustomed to speak with as much freedom as they do in Germany; but it is one which ought not to be wholly overlooked by the intelligent Christian.

(5) To continue the human race without further deterioration. For while it is certain that the organs and instincts of our nature unite with the Scriptures in proving that God intended to have mankind increase, and fill the earth, it is no less certain that children born and nurtured in wedlock have great advantages over those who are not. To say the least, they have the love and care of two parents, instead of one. But this is only a small part of their advantage, — an advantage which is really too great and manifold to be set forth in words.

Remark. From what has been said, we conclude, —

(1) That marriage, when their circumstances permit of it, should be regarded by Christians in general as more than lawful, — as desirable and wise. Many persons are plainly counselled by the word of God to seek or to welcome matrimony (1 Thess. iv. 3-7; 1 Tim. v. 14; 1 Cor. vii. 1, 2, 9, 26-28).

(2) That there are persons, perhaps few in number, who, in certain states of society, do right in forbearing to marry (Matt. xix. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 7, 8, 26, 32-34). But the papal church is not authorized by the Scriptures to ascribe special sanctity to a single life (Heb. xiii. 4); nor to forbid the clergy to marry (1 Tim. iv. 1-3).

If we now pass to the law of marriage, it will be found to embrace several particulars; for example, —

(1) It limits the union to one of each sex. Monogamy is Christian; polygamy, unchristian (Matt. xix. 4-6). The union of our two first parents in Eden was evidently adduced by the Saviour as furnishing the type and norm of all true marriage; and the view which he inculcated is confirmed by the fact that the number of men is about equal in every land to the number of women.

Remark. It has been inferred from 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 6; which teach that a bishop must be “husband of one wife,” — μῆς γυναῖκος ἄνδρα, — μῆς γυναῖκος ἀνῆρ, — that polygamy was tolerated among the laity of the apostolic churches, though under protest, as disqualifying one for the highest spiritual service; just as divorce for other causes than one was tolerated among the Jews, because of the hardness of their hearts. But there are two serious objections to this view; namely

(1) that polyandria was unknown at that time, yet the apostle uses the same phrase of an enrolled widow (1 Tim. v. 9), that she must be "wife of one husband"; and (2) that there is no trace whatever of polygamy in the early churches. For the true interpretation, see "Scriptural Law of Divorce," sect. 4.

(2) It limits this union, in case of Christians who are yet free, to persons whose conjugal influence will not be likely to lead the Christian away from Christ, or interfere with his "growth in the grace and knowledge of Christ," or diminish his service of the Lord (1 Cor. vii. 39; 2 Cor. vi. 14).

Many interpreters believe that these passages forbid a Christian to contract marriage with an unbeliever (Tert., Cyp., Ambr., Jerom., Grot., Est., Beng., Olsh., Mey., De W., Alf., Con., and How., Stanley, and perhaps Hodge). And at first sight this seems to be the natural interpretation; but Chrys., Theoph., Calvin., Beza, and perhaps Rückert, take a different view, namely, the one first expressed; and this view is favored by the use of "in the Lord," ἐν κυρίῳ, in Eph. vi. 1. Even thus understood, however, the passage would discountenance the marriage of believers with unbelievers, unless, perhaps, in exceptional cases.

Two important objections are urged against the interpretation favored by a majority of expositors, namely, —

(a) That the persons of one sex are always nearly equal in number to those of the other; while the Christians of one sex are often far more numerous than those of the other. But to this it may be replied, that it is always safe to obey the law of God, and leave the result with him.

(b) That parental, filial, and conjugal relations resemble one another in closeness and sacredness; while, from the nature of the case, the two former are independent of religious character. — (See 1 Cor. vii. 10.) But it may be replied, that the cases are not alike, except where one of the parties is converted after marriage. Entering into marriage with an unbeliever is not to be put on a level with continuing in that union when formed; for we readily admit that incompatibility of temper may be a sufficient reason for not seeking marriage with a particular person, while we promptly deny that it is a sufficient reason for dissolving marriage. — (German Baptists.)

(3) It requires husband and wife to love and assist each other. They should be one, having, as far as it is practicable, all interests and anxieties in common (Matt. xix. 3-9; Eph. v. 22 seq.). It may well be doubted whether the present tendency of legislation to distinguish between the property of husband and wife is free from danger to the marriage union.

(4) It makes the husband head of the domestic circle, including the wife (1 Peter iii. 1-7; Eph. v. 22 seq.; Col. iii. 18). Yet, while this position is assigned to the husband, it will be observed that he is specially charged with the duty of loving his wife. A Christian husband should never forget this duty, any more than a Christian wife should forget the duty of giving the place of authority to her husband.

(5) It makes the union indissoluble, except by death or unfaithfulness. — (See Matt. xix. 8, 9; and the "Scriptural Law of Divorce," with the article "Divorce," in "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible"; and Harless (G. C. A. von) "Die Ehescheidungsfrage.") The legislation of many States is not in full agreement with the Christian law on this subject; but this fact is no excuse for disregard of the latter by the followers or the churches of Christ. The morality of Christians should be higher than that of the State.

Our study of Christian conduct in domestic relations brings us, in the second place, to parental duties. For, according to the divine idea of the family circle, it is incomplete without children. But with the blessing of children come new and important duties, which may be brought under the following heads:—

(1) Parents are under obligation to support their children during minority, or until the latter are able to support themselves (1 Tim. v. 8). The words of the apostle do not, indeed, refer primarily to parents; but they seem to be a general statement, intended to justify the specific one made in verses 4 and 7. Children and grandchildren should, if able, provide for a widowed mother or grandmother; for it is in general the duty of those who are near kinsmen, and especially of those who belong to the same family, to provide for one another in case of need. And this, Paul suggests, is so plain a duty, that persons who have not believed in Christ perform it; so that a Christian who should refuse to do it would be worse than an unbeliever.

From this passage, by an argument a minori ad majus, we conclude that parents should support their children until the latter are able to support themselves, and especially while the latter are in the family, and subject to the control of the former. The only case of doubt would be when other kindred, as brothers or sisters, were much better able to do this than the parents.

By "support" may be understood the providing of suitable food, clothing, and shelter. But the quality of these may vary with circumstances, as severity or mildness of climate; health, sex, or probable employment of the children; station, resources, and other duties of the parents; and habits of dress or living in a particular age or place. Yet, if parental love is strong, there will be little danger of neglect in this matter.

(2) Parents should govern their children, though with a wise regard to age, health, temper, &c. (Eph. vi. 1; Col. iii. 20). Government is more than advice, admonition, entreaty, or bribery; it is authority, to which obedience is rendered from a sense of duty or a fear of penalty. Parental government by moral suasion alone is not recommended by Solomon (Prov. iii. 11, 12; xiii. 24; xix. 18; xxiii. 13, 14; xxix. 15). Mr. Oncken once said that there "was enough family government in America, but it was in the hands of the children." Parental control should be mild and affectionate, but firm and steady.

(3) They should educate their children for the duties of life (Eph. vi. 4; Deut. vi. 6, 7). This education must include a proper training of their faculties, — mental, moral, physical, — with some regard, in most instances, to their probable work in life. But the former is of chief importance. Their great duty is to train their children by all proper means, in the way of piety, integrity, and sound knowledge, to Christian manhood and womanhood.

Remark. The duties of parents to their children are modified by the age, capacity, and character of the latter; and the time generally comes, as the latter grow up, when parental authority should give place to counsel; but the transition from one of these to the other will, in most instances, be natural and almost imperceptible.

Our next topic is Filial Duties. And an enumeration of these must certainly include the following:—

(1) Prompt and cheerful obedience. Eph. vi. 1–3 (cf. Jer. xxxv. 18, 19; Prov. xxx. 17). Submission to no earthly authority is so universally necessary and reasonable as that of children in early life to their parents. “Filial impiety,” says Dr. Conant, “is a violation of one of the purest and strongest instincts of nature.” A refusal to obey one’s parents can only be justified by the conviction that obedience to them would be disobedience to God.

(2) Docility in receiving their instruction (Prov. i. 8, 9; xxiii. 22). If parents are by the law of nature, for several years at least the teachers of their children, it may be safely presumed that children should receive with interest and respect the instruction of their parents. Their respective duties must agree.

(3) Peculiar deference to them through life (Ex. xx. 12; Prov. xxiii. 22). When children leave their father’s house, and have families of their own, they cease to be subject to their parents; but they can still honor them in many ways, and should certainly be careful to do this. — (Dr. Lord’s theory.)

(4) Cheerfully support them, if necessary (1 Tim. v. 8). The doctrine of Paul appears to be evident and reasonable. For while we may admit that the duty of parents to their offspring is in this respect more self-evident than the duty of offspring to their parents, even as the love of parents to their children is more instinctive and universal than that of children to their parents, yet both are natural, and are, therefore, trustworthy indications of the will of God.

It is the tendency of communism to ignore family instincts, affections, and duties, putting every thing into the hands of the State. But this tendency is against nature, — against all that is sweetest, purest, highest, holiest, most self-denying in life. Others, without being communists, believe that the State should do a large part of the work which the Bible assigns to parents, to children, or to friends. Their mistake is a grave one, though we are far from asserting that their motive is bad. The poor, the blind, the deaf, and dumb, the insane, and the idiotic may be objects of charity; but it does not certainly follow that the State should assume their support. Perhaps kindred or friends should do this.

The relation of brothers and sisters in the same family is one of natural equality as to privilege, duty, and discipline; and their affection is often singularly pure, unselfish, and beautiful. Hence Christ said to his disciples, "All ye are brethren," and by his Spirit moved the apostle to speak of him as "the first-born among many brethren." The fraternal relation is extremely useful in the early discipline of life. It is very difficult to educate a single child. Brothers and sisters owe to one another, —

(1) Fraternal Affection (Rom. xii. 10; Heb. xiii. 1; 1 Peter iii. 8; 2 Peter i. 7). This affection should be tender, unselfish, lifelong. To insure this, great forbearance, sincerity, and frankness are necessary.

(2) Fraternal Concord. This is a natural fruit of affection; and, when the latter is strong and pure, the former will be likely to exist. But let the bond of true affection be once severed by passion, selfishness, or insincerity, and the alienation is apt to be very bitter and irreconcilable (Prov. vi. 19; xviii. 19; Matt. x. 21).

(3) Fraternal Help. This help should be rendered in every way possible during childhood and youth; and, in riper years, by sympathy, counsel, and, if need be, property. — (See Gen. iv. 9.)

Remark. The patriarchal and Jewish constitution of families gave to the oldest son certain prerogatives which appear to spring from no natural source, and are therefore properly disregarded under the Christian dispensation.

But in many families there are servants, as well as children; hence the reciprocal duties of masters and servants should be treated under the head of "domestic relations." And, in speaking of these duties, we should bear in mind, —

(1) That all men are of the same race and nature (Acts xvii. 26); (2) that all men have equal rights by nature, — a corollary from the preceding; (3) that all men are neighbors in the sense given to this term for the moral law by Christ (Luke x. 29 seq.); (4) that we should seek another's welfare as earnestly as we should our own (Matt. xxii. 39). No form of servitude which disregards these principles can be justified by Christian ethics.

A. Duties of Masters to their Servants, or of Employers to those employed.

These duties may be learned from the precept of Christ in Matt. vii. 12. A master should be willing, and should aim to treat his servant in all respects as he would be willing to have that servant treat him, if their positions were reversed. To put the same rule in the form of a prohibition: Christian morality forbids him to exact from another for his own benefit that which, willingly rendered, would express a higher moral excellence than he himself possesses; for in the sight of God no man has a just claim to be dealt with in a manner better than he is willing to deal with others; nor has any one a right to complain of being treated as he aims to treat others. The rule, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," expresses a just principle, though it gives no sanction to private revenge.

The general precept of Christ, already considered, is confirmed by the more specific language of Paul (Eph. vi. 9;

Col. iv. 1; Philem. 8-21 (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. iii. 28; iv. 1). These passages teach, —

(1) That masters should ascertain their duties to their servants from the divine rather than the civil law; for the fact that God has spoken on the point is enough.

(2) That they should treat their servants as having equal rights, whether as men, as husbands, or as parents with themselves.

(3) That they should do this cheerfully and kindly. For the way in which an act is performed has oftentimes more to do with its moral quality than the act itself. Whatever is right should be done with the whole heart.

B. Duties of Servants to their Masters, or of Employees to their Employers.

These may also be learned from the precept of Christ in Matt. vii. 12, — a precept which is confirmed and explained for servants by the more specific language of two apostles. Eph. vi. 5-8; Col. iii. 22-25; 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2; Tit. ii. 9, 10; 1 Peter ii. 18-20; 1 Cor. vii. 20, 21 (cf. Philem. passim.)

In the light of these passages, it will be seen, —

(1) That Christian servants should render cheerfully all the service which is due to their masters or employers.

(2) Should obey the will of their masters, if not required by them to disobey God.

(3) Should treat their masters with the respect due to their position.

(4) Should do all this in spite of injustice and severity on the part of their masters. Christianity honors the passive virtues, as well as the active.

(5) Should regard a state of freedom as preferable in itself to one of servitude, and act accordingly. The interpretation of 1 Cor. vii. 21 is doubtful; but a majority of recent interpreters suppose it exhorts to remaining in slavery. We cannot, however, accept this view as the most probable.

Remark. Though the passages cited above have respect to the duty of slaves, instead of hired servants, the duties of the latter are, for the time being, identical with those of the former.

With the instructions of the New Testament may properly be compared the statutes of the Mosaic law on the same subject. That law did not introduce domestic servitude; it rather ameliorated its character, —

(1) By the rule that every Hebrew servant should be released at the end of six years, — longer servitude being strictly voluntary (Deut. xv. 16, 17).

(2) By the rule that a Hebrew servant should not be retained in even voluntary servitude more than forty-eight years (Lev. xxv. 8–13, 39–45).

(3) By the rule that masters must bestow liberal gifts on Hebrew servants at their discharge (Deut. xv. 12–18).

(4) By protecting all servants from violence at the hand of their masters (Ex. xxi. 20, 21, 26, 27).

(5) By providing for their instruction in the law of the Lord. Deut. xxxi. 10–13; Josh. viii. 33–35; Deut. xxix. 10–12 (cf. Gen. xvi. 12, 13; Ex. xx. 10):

(6) By giving them ample rest from labor (Ex. xx. 10; Lev. xxv. 3–6; Deut. xii. 17, 18; xvi. 10, 11). Add to eight years of rest in every fifty, six years of Sabbaths in the remaining forty-two, and the time of the national festivals, Easter, Pentecost, &c., and less than two-thirds of the time was left for labor.

Remark (1) It may be that all servants became free at the year of jubilee. Lev. xxv. 10 (but cf. verses 39–55.)

Remark (2). As a rule, Gentile servants might, after three generations, enjoy all Jewish rights and privileges. Deut. xxiii. 2–8 (cf. xxix. 10–12).

Remark (3). Involuntary servitude was treated as abnormal (a) by prohibiting the act of sending back fugitive slaves to their masters (Deut. xxii. 15, 16); (b) by forbidding man-stealing (Ex. xxi. 16). Hence none but captives could be reduced to slavery against their will.

Remark (4). The Bible did not, therefore, sanction slavery, but only tolerated it for the time because of the hardness of their hearts; and obedience to the Golden Rule is incompatible with it.

SECTION III. IN SOCIAL RELATIONS.

We apply the term "Social Relations" in its popular sense, reserving the business and civil relations of life for separate treatment.

Men, and especially women, do very much in social intercourse to mould the character of one another. Hence the nature of their social influence is of the utmost importance; and Christian morality leads them, —

(1) To be truthful in these relations; that is, to be in the habit of so speaking and acting as to convey to others their actual knowledge, belief, opinion, feeling, wish, or purpose, as the case may be. In support of this statement, reference may be made to several passages (a) (Ex. xviii. 21; Ps. xv. 2; li. 8; Prov. iii. 2; viii. 7; xii. 19; xxx. 23; Zech. viii. 16, 19; (b) Lev. v. 20; xix. 11; Prov. xix. 22; xiv. 15; xii. 19; Rev. ii. 2; xxi. 8; (c) Ex. xxxiv. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 29; Ps. xxv. 10; John i. 14; viii. 40; xiv. 17).

(a) Truthfulness is not necessarily violated by the use of tropical, ironical, or hyperbolical language (Deut. xxxii. 4; Job xii. 2; Dan. ii. 38; Acts ii. 5). But it may easily be violated by such forms of speech: there should be something in the connection, or in the tone of voice, to show the meaning of what is said.

(b) It is not necessarily violated by withholding truth (cf. John vii. 6 seq.; Luke xxiv. 13 seq.; Mark vi. 48).

(c) It is often violated by the use of forms of speech adopted for the sake of politeness. However difficult it may be in this case to draw the line between true and false language, a Christian is bound to do it; for example, he cannot justify himself in telling a servant to report him as "not at home," when he is only too busy to be seen. If the caller is not deceived, a bad use of language is made before servants and children.

(d) It is often violated in repeating and adjusting anecdotes, in pleading for clients at law, in pronouncing eulogies, and writing biographies ("De mortuis nil nisi bonum?"), in making use of other persons' wit or wisdom without acknowledgment, in revealing secrets, or insinuating evil of others, —

("Fama malum, quo non aliud velocius ullum;
Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo," seq.
— Virg. A. IV. 174, 175; cf. Ovid M. xii. 43, seq.)

in withholding just praise, &c. The biographical notices found in the Bible are models of candor.

(e) It is sometimes violated in the treatment of the sick, and especially the insane. Physicians of large experience have testified that there is almost never any good reason for speaking what is not literally true to the insane; and we think it probable, that, in nine cases out of ten where doctors try to deceive their patients, it is wholly unnecessary for them to do so.

(f) It is sometimes violated for the purpose of self-defence. Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25 (cf. Josh. vi. 23). The faith, not the falsehood of Rahab, is commended by the sacred writers. It is possible for an untaught person to mistake the path of duty, and yet be at the time loyal to God. Military feints, though intended to mislead, are not to be put on the same level with ordinary falsehood. They are understood to be puzzles for the enemy to solve, if he can. One foe has no right to know the plans of the other. The same is true in a game of chess.

Christian morality leads men, —

(2) To be magnanimous in their social relations (1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5; 2 Cor. iv. 2, 5, 15; Phil. ii. 4; iii. 7, 8; i. 24; iv. 8, 9; Num. xi. 29; Phil. i. 18; Rom. ix. 3). — (See Bunyan's Great heart, in the second part of the "Pilgrim's Progress," &c. The occasions which call for true nobility of character, for patience, courtesy, self-forgetfulness, are very numerous in social life.

(3) To be sympathizing in these relations. Rom. xii. 15 (cf. Gal. vi. 2; 1 Peter iii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 15). According to its primary sense, sympathy is compassion, —that is, suffering with another ; but, as now used, it embraces rejoicing with another also ; in a word, sharing another's feelings, whether of sorrow or of joy. It is sometimes harder for a bad man to rejoice with another in his prosperity than to weep with him in his adversity. Ambition, envy, rivalry, are put to rest in the latter case, but are roused in the former.

(4) To be beneficent in these relations. For a majority of mankind, social intercourse is the principal means of doing good beyond the family circle. And the art of conversing well, — that is, naturally, sincerely, cheerfully, intelligently, without cant, without slang, without assumption, — is a great accomplishment, and a means of usefulness second to no other. It should therefore be cultivated by all ; and even students should feel that this art, which comes only by practice, is a reason for their going into society. If Christians generally possessed the power of conversing well upon religious subjects, their usefulness would be more than doubled. But this power presupposes not only intelligence and practice, but also a right spirit, a genuine interest in men, a desire to do good in little things, as well as in great. It may be added, that social life belongs in an eminent degree to woman ; indeed, almost as much so as domestic life.

SECTION IV. IN BUSINESS RELATIONS.

If a Christian regulates his conduct in these relations by the rule of duty prescribed by the Bible, he will, —

(1) Be honest. And honesty in business precludes every species of fraud, deception, misrepresentation, and requires fidelity to all engagements. — (See Prov. xxiv. 14, 22 ; xvi. 11 ; Hos. xii. 1 ; Amos viii. 4 seq.). This statement applies to corporations, as well as individuals, and to all kinds of false pretences, and repudiation of just debts. It condemns every attempt to mislead the judgment of purchasers. It requires things to be called by their right names. If the Golden Rule were fairly applied to all the processes of manufacture and trade, the change in society would be considered a revolution. The watering of milk, and of stocks, would cease. But this will never come to pass while the maxim that "business is business" — a maxim whose import is deep and vast and mysterious as the ocean — is accepted as a sufficient reason for any course of conduct. The one principle which seems to be clearly indorsed by this maxim, namely, "Every one for himself," is false. War, instead of peace, is assumed to be the normal state of business.

(2) Be equitable. We transfer this word to business relations for want of a better one; and by equity in trade we mean the rendering of a full equivalent for what is obtained from another. Exchange of values should be for the equal benefit of both parties. This is the only general statement that agrees with the Golden Rule. Hence it is wrong for one man to take advantage of another's necessity or ignorance, to wring from him an exorbitant price for any commodity. The practice of "cornering stocks," or of getting control of the market for the purpose of compelling people to pay for an article more than it should be worth, is wrong. All this is, morally speaking, no better than theft or robbery. It is living on others' labor. Again, the practice of investing the proceeds of business in the name of a wife, that it may be saved from creditors in case of bankruptcy, seems to be unjust, especially if it be done while there are outstanding debts.

(3) Be beneficent. To benefit others, as well as himself, should be an aim of every Christian man in business, as well as in social life. He should in all cases choose a useful employment. The product of his labor should be of real service to the people. Let wicked men raise the tobacco, manufacture and vend the intoxicating drinks, even if we believe it right to say that these articles are simply useless, but not injurious to mankind. A good man should be careful to render a real equivalent to society for all that he receives from it. Moreover, he should seek to encourage others, — the young, the poor, the unfortunate, — in a business way (Deut. xxiv. 6, 10). What the latter need, in many cases, is not charity, but credit,—favor in the way of business, and possibly, in some cases, indorsement to lift them over a hard place. They wish to be put in a condition to earn for themselves what they need. But one should not indorse the paper of another beyond what he is able and willing to pay, if this should become necessary.

In speaking of domestic relations, we referred to the duties of employers and those employed, when the latter belong in a general way to the families of the former. But, in modern society, great numbers are hired to perform a definite work. To this class may be assigned factory operatives, mechanics, masons, miners, railroad employees; indeed, a large part of the men who live by manual labor, with the exception of farmers. And the relations between this class and their employers are by no means satisfactory. The latter plan, organize, and direct the business, furnishing also the capital, and naturally expect large returns; while the former do the work, and often think themselves entitled of right to most of the profit. Neither class is deeply concerned for the welfare of the other. Neither class manifests as strong a desire to do all its duty to the other, as to have the other do all its duty to it. Hence “strikes” on the part of workmen are becoming frequent, and associations for the regulation of wages, &c., are multiplied. How, then, is this selfish and chronic warfare to be brought to an end? Two ways may be suggested:—

(1) That both parties adopt the Golden Rule as their standard of duty in business, seeking to understand the relations of capital to labor, and of labor to capital, and neither of them wishing to overreach the other. The employer should feel that he is a robber, if he takes more than he gives; and the employé should judge himself by the same rule.

(2) That workmen be allowed a reasonable share of the profits, instead of uniform wages, thus enlisting their interest in the business itself. In some kinds of business, the whole association may be composed of those who labor with their hands. In others, this may be found impracticable for want of sufficient capital; yet in such cases the workmen might, perhaps, be allowed to share in the management, the profits, and the losses of the business.

APPENDIX. USE OF MONEY.

Before leaving the present topic, we propose to speak briefly of the use of property for the good of mankind. For business and charity are closely connected. Indeed, it would be difficult to justify a Christian in laboring to accumulate wealth without regard to the use which he intends to make of it; and we venture to say that the best way of using property will often merit as careful thought and study as the best way of acquiring it.

We have already remarked that those who are near of kin should assist one another when in need. For by the law of Christ, as well as by the law of nature, charity to the poor should begin with one's own house, and then seek for objects beyond. But besides providing reasonably for his own support, and for the necessities of immediate kindred, a Christian is almost always able to do something for the higher interests of mankind. And the latter service should not be postponed until the former has been finished for life; but the two are to be associated from first to last, else there is reason to fear that the latter will be wholly neglected.

We submit the following remarks on the charitable use of property :—

(1) To give is to impart what is one's own to another for his benefit. The last clause of this definition is essential to it; for love to others is the source of all true charity. If something is imparted to another, not for his good, but for one's own honor, advancement, or pleasure, the act, in its deepest character, is one of exchange, not one of giving.

(2) "To give is more blessed than to receive" (Acts xx. 35). From the language of Christ, as quoted by Paul, we conclude that man has received from his Maker a spiritual constitution, which requires him to be beneficent. In his normal state he is like God, — a benevolent, rather than a selfish being. And this agrees with the law of God, which demands of him love, rather than prudence; enthusiasm for the welfare of others, rather than intense regard for his own welfare.

(3) To give liberally is therefore a Christian's privilege and duty. Matt. x. 8, δωρεάν ἐλάβετε, δωρεάν δότε, xix. 21; Mark xii. 41-44; Acts ii. 44, 45; 2 Cor. viii. 1-4; ix. 7 (cf. Prov. xi. 25; Isa. xxxii. 8). We do not infer from the test which Christ applied to the young man, or from the praise which he bestowed on the poor widow, or from the course taken by the first Christians in Jerusalem, that it is always or commonly wrong for Christians to hold and increase their property, at least for a time; but we must infer that they should be ready to part with it, if either the Lord's honor or the best good of man requires this at their hands. Wealth in their possession should be a means of usefulness, rather than of self-indulgence; it should be held in trust for the Master's service, and employed according to his will. We must also infer that the Lord is sometimes pleased to have his servants trust him in the dark for their daily bread, when the calls for charity are extremely urgent.

(4) To give in proportion to one's ability is also a Christian's privilege and duty (2 Cor. ix. 12-15; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Luke xii. 48). The truth of this statement needs no proof; but a Christian should be very cautious, when applying it, not to measure his own duty by the conduct of others (cf. 2 Cor. x. 12). Circumstances may make it unwise for a rich man to give as much in proportion to his ability for a particular object as the poor may give; while, for other objects, he may give largely, and they give nothing. Great charity is needed in judging others.

(5) To give regularly, and at frequent intervals through life, is a Christian's duty (2 Cor. xvi. 2). It is, perhaps, inconvenient for some to set aside, every Lord's Day, a portion of their income for charitable use; but it is certainly practicable for them to review the claims of Christ on that day, and keep themselves in readiness to give regularly of their substance to the Lord's cause. This practice should begin with Christian life, and cease only with death.

(6) To give unostentatiously is a Christian's duty and privilege (Matt. vii. 2-4). Christ condemns those who give alms to secure the praise of men; and, according to our first remark, this is not, in a moral sense, giving at all; it is rather buying a good name with money. Nay, more; it is in reality an act of either conscious or unconscious hypocrisy; for the giver expects to be credited with a benevolent regard to others. But we do not suppose that Jesus intended to prohibit open or public almsgiving. He was dealing with the heart, the motive, rather than the outward act. And therefore it may sometimes be a Christian's duty to give openly (1) that his words may be supported by his conduct; and (2) that others may be moved by his example to give also. Men are sometimes charged with baser motives than really influence them.

(7) To give discreetly, according to the greatness of the object, and the urgency of the need. Among the great enterprises which ought to be sustained by the contributions of those who love the Saviour may be named (1) preaching the gospel to all mankind. This was laid upon his followers by the Lord, when he was about to leave them; and it is the only work which was thus solemnly committed to them. It should therefore hold the first place among Christian enterprises; and all those who give to the support of foreign missions are entitled to feel that they are aiding the most important work of the church. (2) Maintaining and applying the gospel where it is known. To this end, preachers, teachers, buildings, and books are needed. The means of grace cannot be brought to bear upon all classes in a land nominally Christian, without a liberal use of money and of time for this purpose. (3) Providing institutions of higher learning for the people, and especially for the ministry. For unless the State is to support religion, and furnish all the means of education, including those needed by only a few of the people, Christians must do this; and we have no doubt of its being their duty and privilege to do it. (4) Caring for the poor and unfortunate, the aged and infirm. Christ did not hesitate to relieve the bodily ills of those who appealed to his compassion. Paul did not think it inconsistent with his spiritual calling to raise money for the poor saints in Judea. And the early Christians were not more distinguished by their worship of Christ than by their liberality to those in distress. But idleness and mendicancy must be discouraged. He that will not work has no right to eat; and indiscriminate giving is almost as evil as not giving at all.

But, if Christians are to make giving an important part of their life-work, it is plain that they must have something to give. And to this end, they must be diligent and frugal, — must earn much, and consume little. It would be easy to enlarge upon the former duty, that of diligence; but we will limit our remarks to the latter, — that of economy.

Economy should be practised by Christians, —

(1) In food and drink. Wholesome food is necessary to health of body and vigor of mind; but the most highly seasoned and costly dishes are not the most wholesome. By proper care in the selection and preparation of food, a considerable sum might be saved from the yearly expenses of many families. For children, if not for older persons, water is the only suitable drink, unless milk be used as a substitute.

(2) In dress and equipage. We cannot doubt that very many Christians, and especially women, spend far more in this way, than is pleasing to the Saviour. While complaining of the tyranny of fashion, they deem it necessary to submit to that tyranny. And it is alleged that Protestant women dress more fashionably for church than do Catholic women (1 Peter iii. 3, 4; 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10). But it is also true that many a Christian man has his carriage and span, not because he needs them, but because others of no greater wealth have them, and because they distinguish in a certain way, the moneyed aristocracy of the day. Thus he wastes several hundred a year in equipage.

(2) In houses and furniture. There is almost equal danger of extravagance in this direction. Health and comfort should be sought in the construction of a house, not display within or without. A fine house has been the ruin of more than one fortune. Taxes, insurance; repairs, servants, company, must all be provided for yearly; and oftentimes the admired house renders liberal giving impossible.

(4) In books and travel. It is easy to cultivate a passion for costly books, while deriving little benefit from what there is in them. Books should be bought as they are needed for use; and, with the exception of a few reference-books, it is a good rule to read or study one before buying another. In many places there are public libraries where all books for mere reading can be wisely obtained. As to travel for health and recreation, we need only remark, that it is an expensive luxury, and should be used sparingly. Ministers of Christ ought certainly to ask themselves how much it costs, and whether it is the best use to which they can put their limited means.

(5) In church buildings and choirs. There are few, we presume, who would hesitate to admit that many churches build costlier houses of worship than they ought to build. By so doing they burden themselves with a heavy debt, and feel constrained to choose their minister with almost sole reference to his popular qualities. Sound or unsound in doctrine, consistent or inconsistent in life, he must be a man that will draw, and help pay the debt. We would speak with caution of choirs, and other helps to the congregation in worship, but have no doubt that churches often err in relying too much upon them.

SECTION V. IN CIVIL RELATIONS.

That civil government is an ordinance of God may be proved by an appeal to the Scriptures (Matt. xxii. 21; Rom. xiii. 1-7; Tim. ii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 13-17); by an appeal to history, which shows that no people has long existed without some kind of government; and by an appeal to the present nature of man, which as social, and at the same time sinful, renders civil government necessary.

But government is ordained by God in the same way, and to the same extent, as labor is ordained by him. The form of neither is prescribed. That form is therefore best which best secures the end to be sought; and the end to be sought by the State is the protection of men in the exercise of their natural rights. Many, indeed, suppose that it should go far beyond this, and use its power for the support of every thing good, and the repression of every thing evil; but we are unable to accept this view.

The form of any civil government depends upon the will of the people protected by it. That will is expressed either by action or by sufferance. Every person, therefore, is responsible in some degree for the character of the government by which he is protected; and his particular responsibility is measured by the influence which he is able, on Christian principles, to wield in determining its character. The responsibility of some persons is, therefore, far greater in this respect, than that of others.

Christians may be called to act either as subjects, as supporters, as rulers, or as reformers, of the State; hence the present section falls naturally into four parts.

I. As subjects of the State, it is the duty of Christians to render cheerful obedience to the civil authority over them, whenever that authority does not require them to disobey God. Such obedience is clearly enjoined (1) by the Word of God in the passages cited above, (2) by the example of Christ and his apostles, and (3) by the dictates of sound reason; for it is plain that, without obedience, the good ends of civil government will never be reached. But our statement limits the duty of obedience to human magistrates by the higher duty of obedience to the will of God made known in the Scriptures. Is there not a contradiction in this? If we are told in one place to worship Jehovah, and in another to obey magistrates, what shall we do if the magistrates forbid us to worship Jehovah? Which of these commands supersedes the other? The answer to these questions is at hand: derived authority must yield to underived, secondary to primary. The direct command of a sovereign cannot be annulled by his servant. On this principle the apostles acted in preaching the gospel (Acts iv. 19; v. 29). On this principle, Daniel and the three worthies acted (Dan. vi. 10, 11; iii. 16-18). And on this principle Christians should always act when civil rulers require them to disobey either the moral law, or any plain command of Christ. But when it is doubtful whether God has forbidden what the powers that be require, or has required what they forbid, it is proper that they should have the benefit of the doubt.

II. As supporters of civil government, it is the duty of Christians (1) To pay cheerfully the taxes necessary to insure its honor and efficiency. . The people should never suffer the government to repudiate an honest debt, or in any way to evade the payment of it. (2) To uphold it against enemies, even at the risk of life. Defensive war appears to be justifiable in many cases; for the State is organized for the express purpose of protecting the people against domestic and foreign violence. (3) To honor its laws and officers with the respect which their place in the government authorizes. Disobedience to a bad law should be a serious and thoughtful and even respectful act, never defiant or contemptuous. Bad rulers should be treated in such a way as to put honor on the office, if not on the man. (4) To seek the blessing of God upon it. This is expressly stated by the apostle in one of the passages referred to above; and a sincere performance of this duty will prepare Christians to fulfil every other named by us. Let this be neglected, and the party spirit fostered by a frequent change of rulers is likely to weaken respect for government itself, as ordained of God.

III. As officers of civil government, it is the duty of Christians to seek, within the proper limits of State control, the best good of the people; and this may be done by enacting good and useful laws, by interpreting them truly and impartially, and by executing them without fear or favor. But, in the best constitutional governments, these distinct functions are assigned to separate officers. Hence we are called to speak of the duty of Christians, —

I. As legislators. We have already assumed that the proper function of civil government is to protect the people in the exercise of their natural rights. And by natural rights we mean, the right to life, unless it has been forfeited by crime; the right to liberty of action, save when it wrongs others; and the right to property regarded as the fruit of one's labor, except what is due to the State for its protection. It may, then, be remarked, —

(1) That legislators should make the laws as few and plain as possible, without leaving the rights of the people unprotected. This rule appears to us of great importance. Laws for the people should be founded on the plainest principles of equity, should be couched in simple, unambiguous language, and should be carefully made known to all whom they concern. Hence they should be few. The tendency in many States to multiply laws, and the details of law, is to be deprecated.

(2) That they should require the people to contribute, according to their several ability, for the support of the government. In the word "ability" we include personal power, and therefore approve of assessing a poll-tax on those who have no property. But the principle which we have stated is believed to be of little or no value by many legislators, and is set aside (a) by indirect taxation. This is defended, first, because it conceals from the people generally the amount which they pay for the support of government; and, secondly, because it lays the burden of civil affairs on those who indulge in luxuries. But it is well for both rulers and people to feel the cost of government is our reply to the former argument; and it is wrong for the State to discriminate against the rich or the self-indulgent is our reply to the latter. (b) By exemption from taxes. This is defended on the ground that certain kinds of property are used for ends coincident with those of the State. So also, we reply, is a vast amount of property which is not thus favored; and a principle which can only be applied very partially is unsafe.

(c) By adjusting the taxes to the cost of protection. Looked at from a simply business point of view, this might seem to be just; but there would be no end to special legislation, if this principle were applied, and no end to the study which would be necessary in order to apply it fairly.

(3) That they may, and perhaps should, require the people to be educated physically, mentally, and morally in early life, in so far as their health will permit and the ends of good government demand. But it seems to us that the State has no moral right to tax the people for the support of colleges and professional schools, with the exception perhaps of military and naval academies. For the higher schools of learning are sure to be supported by the liberality of good men; and, from the nature of the case, only a small part of the people will enjoy their advantages.

(4) That they should make no laws for the support of religion, or the forms of religion. Men can neither be bribed nor compelled to worship God. Christ and the apostles made no appeals to the State for support. The language and conduct of both are a sufficient warrant for the statement, that the Christian religion should do its work by moral and spiritual means alone.

(5) That they should prohibit no form of worship which respects the rights of men. This is but a corollary from the preceding.

(6) That they may forbid ordinary labor on the Lord's Day for such reasons as these; namely, (a) that all may have the amount of rest which is favorable to health and long life; and (b) that those who desire it may be able to worship God undisturbed.

II. As judges and jurymen. It is the duty of judges to decide all questions and cases, properly brought before them, according to the constitution and laws of the land; and they should not permit any considerations whatever to turn them from this course. Should it become their settled conviction that the laws which they are called to expound and maintain are morally wrong, they ought doubtless to resign their office.

Nearly the same may be said of jurymen. They are bound to weigh properly the evidence which is brought before them, and then to render their verdict according to law and evidence. Both judge and jury are to remember that they are not law-makers, but simply interpreters of law, or of law and evidence.

Intelligent and upright men are needed for judicial action; and Christians should not refuse to serve the State, even though they must do so at a considerable pecuniary loss. Yet we have long believed that judicial service deserves a larger compensation than it receives in our land. Especially difficult is it to secure the right kind of men for jurors, at the rate of compensation fixed by law; and this is a serious obstacle to the administration of justice. There is much reason to fear that trial by jury is forfeiting in a measure the confidence which it has enjoyed.

III. As executive officers. In their own sphere these are bound to carry into effect the laws of the land, as interpreted by the proper authority. And, in respect to laws which are believed to be incompatible with natural right or the plain requirements of God, the same remark may be made as was made in speaking of judicial officers. When a man cannot conscientiously execute the laws, it is time for him to resign his office.

The pardoning power, lodged in the hands of certain executives, should be used with the greatest caution. Perhaps it would be safe to limit its exercise to cases when new evidence of very great importance comes to light after they are decided, and removed from jurisdiction of the courts. The people should never be taught to presume that the penalty of the law will not be executed. Indeed, the most obvious remedy for injustice upon the discovery of new evidence would be to submit the case to a fresh trial.

IV. As reformers of government. It seems to us very evident that Christian men may attempt to secure a change in government,—

(1) Whenever the government does not accomplish in the best manner practicable its legitimate ends; whether it fails to do this (a) through the unfaithfulness of its officers, in which case they will seek to substitute better ones for them; or (b) for the want of good laws, or the existence of bad ones, in which case they will seek to have the laws rectified; or (c) owing to the nature of the government, as not adapted to the age or nation, in which case they will seek to effect a revolution.

(2) Provided always, (a) there is a reasonable prospect of effecting in the end more good than evil by the effort, and (b) there is no reason to believe that a better opportunity for effecting the change required will be likely to occur. In other words, the change must be right, practicable, and timely.

The extension of the legal rights of suffrage to women seems to us needless, undesirable, and unnatural; needless, because women can influence legislation sufficiently without voting; undesirable, because voters, and candidates for office, would thereby be doubled with no prospect of advantage to the State; and unnatural, because the distinctive tendencies and duties of women disqualify them for civil affairs.

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: July 2005

PreservationTechnologies
A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION

111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16006
(724) 779-2111

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 014 504 909 A

50

J. C. Irwin

SYSTEMATIC
T H E O L O G Y .

BY
CHARLES HODGE, D. D.,

PROFESSOR IN THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY

VOL. I.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER AND COMPANY.

LONDON AND EDINBURGH: T. NELSON AND SONS.

1872.

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1871, by CHARLES SCRIBNER AND COMPANY,
in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

RIVERSIDE, CAMBRIDGE: STEREOTYPED AND PRINTED BY
H. O. HOUGHTON AND COMPANY.

CARD.

The Messrs. Charles Scribner and Co., of New York, have made an arrangement with the Messrs. Thomas Nelson and Sons, of Edinburgh, Scotland, for the publication of this work in Great Britain. This has been done with the cordial approbation of the author, who feels under obligation to the Messrs. Nelson for the liberal terms on which they have undertaken the publication. The author also desires to acknowledge his indebtedness to his accomplished young friend, Mr. Caspar René Gregory, licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, for his assistance in carrying the work through the press.

PRINCETON, June 2, 1871.

CONTENTS OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I

ON METHOD.

	PAGE
§ 1. Theology a Science	1
§ 2. Theological Method	3
§ 3. The Speculative Method	4
§ 4. The Mystical Method	6
§ 5. The Inductive Method	9
Theologian to be governed by same Rules as a Man of Science .	11
§ 6. The Scriptures contain all the Facts of Theology	15

CHAPTER II

THEOLOGY.

§ 1. Its Nature	18
Definitions of Theology	19
Natural Theology	21
§ 2. Facts of Nature reveal God	22
Scriptural Argument for Natural Theology	24
§ 3. Insufficiency of Natural Theology	25
§ 4. Christian Theology	32
Theology Proper, Anthropology, Soteriology, Eschatology, Ecclesi- ology	32

CHAPTER III.

RATIONALISM.

§ 1. Meaning and Usage of the Word	34
§ 2. Deistical Rationalism	35
§ 3. Second Form of Rationalism. — Its Nature, Refutation, History .	39
§ 4. Dogmatism	44
§ 5. Proper Office of Reason in Matters of Religion	49
Reason necessary for the Reception of a Revelation. — Difference between Knowing and Understanding. — Reason must judge of the Credibility of a Revelation. — The Impossible cannot be be- lieved. — Reason must judge of the Evidences of a Revelation .	53
§ 6. Relation of Philosophy and Revelation	55
§ 7. Office of the Senses in Matters of Faith	59

CHAPTER IV.

MYSTICISM.

	PAGE
§ 1. Meaning of the Word	61
Philosophical Use of the Word	61
Mysticism as known in Church History	66
§ 2. Mysticism in the Early Church	69
Montanism.—The so-called Dionysins.—New Platonism	71
§ 3. Mysticism during the Middle Ages	78
General Characteristics of that Period.—Different Classes of Mediaeval Theologians.—Pantheistical Tendencies of Mysticism.—Evangelical Mystics	79
§ 4. Mysticism at and after the Reformation	79
Effect of the Reformation on the Popular Mind.—Mystics among the Reformers.—Schwenkfeld	82
§ 5. Quietism	84
General Character.—Leaders of the Movement.—Madame Gnyon, Archbishop Fénelon	87
§ 6. The Quakers or Friends	88
Their Origin and Early History.—Their Doctrines.—The Doctrines of the Orthodox Friends.—Heterodox Friends.—Barclay's Views	98
§ 7. Objections to the Mystical Theory	97
It has no Foundation in Scripture.—It is contrary to Facts of Experience.—Productive of Evil	103

CHAPTER V.

ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINE CONCERNING THE RULE OF FAITH.

§ 1. Statement of the Doctrine	104
§ 2. Roman Catholic Doctrine concerning the Scriptures	104
Incompleteness of the Scriptures.—Obscurity of the Scriptures.—Latin Vulgate	107
§ 3. Tradition	108
Tridentine Doctrine	109
§ 4. The Office of the Church as a Teacher	111
The Organs of the Church in Teaching.—The Gallican Theory.—The Transmontane	112
§ 5. Examination of the Romish Doctrine	113
§ 6. Examination of the Doctrine of the Church of Rome on Tradition	113
Difference between Tradition and the Analogy of Faith.—Common Consent.—Tradition and Development.—The State of the Question.—Arguments against the Doctrine of Tradition	121
§ 7. Office of the Church as a Teacher	129
Romish Doctrine on the Subject.—Romish Definition of the Church and its Foundation.—Romish Doctrine of Infallibility founded on a Wrong Theory of the Church.—The Doctrine of Infallibility Founded on the False Assumption of the Perpetuity of the Apostleship.—Modern Prelates not Apostles.—Infallibility founded on a False Interpretation of the Promise of Christ.—It is contradicted by Facts.— Recognition of an Infallible Church incompatible with either Religious or Civil Liberty	149

	PAGE

CHAPTER VI.

THE PROTESTANT RULE OF FAITH.

§ 1. The Statement of the Doctrine	151
The Canon	152
§ 2. The Scriptures given by Inspiration of God	153
The Nature of Inspiration.— Inspiration Supernatural.— Distinction between Revelation and Inspiration.— Inspired Men the Organs of God.— Proof of the Doctrine.— Argument from the Signification and Use of the Word Inspiration.— From the Meaning of the Word Prophet. From the Declarations of Scrip- ture.— Inspiration extends equally to all Parts of Scripture.— Extends to the Words as well as to the Thoughts.— Plenary In- spiration.— Objections considered	168
§ 3. Adverse Theories	172
Rationalistic Doctrine.— Schleiermacher's Theory.— Objections to that Theory.— Gracious Inspiration.— Partial Inspiration .	181
§ 4. Completeness of Scripture	182
§ 5. Perspicuity of Scripture.— Right of Private Judgment	183
§ 6. Rules of Interpretation	187

PART I.

THEOLOGY PROPER.

CHAPTER I.

ORIGIN OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

§ 1. Knowledge of God as Innate	191
What is Meant by Innate Knowledge.— Proof that the Knowledge of God is Innate	194
§ 2. The Knowledge of God is not due to a Process of Reasoning . .	199
§ 3. The Knowledge of God is not due exclusively to Tradition . .	201
§ 4. Can the Existence of God be proved ?	202

CHAPTER II.

THEISM.

§ 1. Ontological Argument.— As presented by Anselm.— By Des Cartes.	204
— By Dr. Samuel Clarke.— By Cousin	206
§ 2. Cosmological Argument	207
Principle of Sufficient Cause.— Nature of Causation.— Intuitive Conviction of the Necessity of a Cause for every Effect.— The World is an Effect.— Hume's Objection to the Cosmological Argument	212
§ 3. Teleological Argument	215
Its Nature.— Evidences of Design in the World	217

	PAGE
§ 4. Objections to the Teleological Argument	227
Denial of Final Causes.—Objections of Hume and Kant	228
§ 5. The Moral or Anthropological Argument	233
Nature of the Argument.—Argument from the Existence of the Mind.—From the Nature of the Soul.—From the Moral Nature of Man	237

CHAPTER III.

ANTI-THEISTIC THEORIES.

§ 1. What is Meant by Anti-Theism.—Atheism	241
§ 2. Polytheism	243
§ 3. Hylozoism	245
§ 4. Materialism	246
Doctrine of Epicurus.—Materialism in England during the Eight- eenth Century.—Locke.—Hartley.—Priestley.—Materialism in France during the Eighteenth Century.—Positivism	254
Scientific Materialism.—Leading Principles	262
Correlation of Physical and Vital Forces	264
Correlation of Physical and Mental Forces	271
Arguments against Materialism.—1. Materialism Contradicts the Facts of Consciousness	276
2. Contradicts the Truths of Reason	280
3. Inconsistent with the Facts of Experience	282
4. Materialism Atheistic	284
5. The Materialistic Argument from Analogy invalid	285
Direct Argument against the Theory of the Correlation of Physical, Vital, and Mental Forces	291
§ 5. Pantheism.—Its three Principal Forms	299
General Principles of the System	300
History of Pantheism	309
Brahminical Pantheism	309
Original Religion of the Hindoos Pantheistic.—Relation of the Hindoo Pantheism to Polytheism.—Its Effect upon Religion	313
Its Effect upon Social Life	315
Grecian Pantheism.—Ionic School.—Eleatic School	319
Stoics.—Plato's Doctrine	322
Aristotle	326
Mediæval Pantheism	328
Neo-Platonists.—John Scotus Erigena.—Modern Pantheism	330

CHAPTER IV.

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

§ 1. Can God be known?	335
State of the Question.—God Inconceivable.—God Incomprehen- sible.—Our Knowledge of God partial	337
How do we form the idea of God?—Proof that this Method is trustworthy	339
§ 2. God cannot be fully known	345
Sir William Hamilton's Argument against the Transcendentalists	346

	PAGE
§ 3. Sir William Hamilton's Doctrine	349
God an Object of Faith but not of Knowledge. — Different Kinds of Ignorance. — Proof that Sir William Hamilton denies that we can know God. — Arguments Against his Doctrine. — The Unthinkable or Impossible cannot be an object of Faith	352
Knowledge essential to Faith. — Our Knowledge not regulative	355
General Objections to Hamilton's Theory	359
Founded on a Wrong Definition of the Absolute and Infinite; on a Wrong Definition of knowledge. — Necessity of a Supernatural Revelation	364

CHAPTER V.

THE NATURE AND ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

§ 1. Definitions of God	366
§ 2. Divine Attributes	368
Relation of the Attributes to the Essence of God. — The Divine Attributes do not differ merely in our Conceptions	371
The Divine Attributes cannot be resolved into mere Causality. — They differ virtualiter	373
§ 3. Classification of the Divine Attributes	374
§ 4. Spirituality of God	376
Consequences of admitting God to be a Spirit	379
§ 5. Infinity	380
The Idea of Infinity not merely negative. — The Infinite is not the All. — Infinitude of God in relation to Space	383
§ 6. Eternity	385
Scriptural Doctrine. — Philosophical View. — Modern Philosophical Views	389
§ 7. Immutability	390
Philosophical Statement. — The Absolute Attributes of God not inconsistent with Personality	391
§ 8. Knowledge	393
Its Nature. — Possibility of Knowledge in God precluded by the Pantheistic Theory. — Knowledge and Power are not to be confounded. — The Doctrine of the Scriptures on the Subject. — The Objects of the Divine Knowledge. — The Actual and the Possible. — Scientia Media . — Origin of the Distinction	399
The Objections urged by Augustinians. — Foreknowledge	400
The Wisdom of God	401
§ 9. The Will of God	402
Meaning of the Term. — Freedom of the Divine Will. — Decretive and Preceptive Will. — Antecedent and Consequent Will. — Absolute and Conditional Will. — The Will of God as the Ground of Moral Obligation	405
§ 10. The Power of God	406
Origin of the Idea of Power. — Omnipotence. — Negation of Power. — Absolute Power. — Potentia Absoluta and Potentia Ordinata . — Will and Power not to be confounded	410

	PAGE
§ 11. Holiness of God	418
Grounds on which Moral Attributes are denied to God	414
§ 12. Justice	416
Meaning of the Word.—Justice in its relation to Sin.—Reformation of the Offender not the Primary Object of Punishment.—The Prevention of Crime not the Primary Object of Punishment.—Proof of the Scriptural Doctrine.—Philosophical Views of the Nature of Justice	424
§ 13. The Goodness of God	427
The Scriptural Doctrine.—Benevolence.—Love.—The Existence of Evil.—Theories which involve the Denial of Sin.—Sin regarded as the Necessary Means of the Greatest Good.—The Doctrine that God cannot prevent Sin in a Moral System.—Scriptural Doctrine as to the Origin of Evil	435
§ 14. The Truth of God	436
§ 15. Sovereignty of God	439

CHAPTER VI.

THE TRINITY.

§ 1. Preliminary Remarks	442
§ 2. Biblical Form of the Doctrine	443
What that Form is.—Scriptural Proof of the Doctrine.—Progressive Character of Divine Revelation.—Formula of Baptism.—Apostolic Benediction	448
§ 3. The Transition Period	448
Necessity for a more Definite Statement of the Doctrine.—Conflict with Error.—Gnostics.—Platonizers.—Origen's Doctrine.—Sabellianism.—Arianism	452
§ 4. The Church Doctrine as presented by the Council of Nice	453
Objects for which that Council was convened.—Difference of Opinion among the Members of the Council.—Semi-Arians.—Orthodox.—Council of Constantinople.—The Athanasian Creed	457
§ 5. Points decided by the Councils of Nice and Constantinople	459
1. As against Sabellianism.—2. As against the Arians and the Semi-Arians.—3. The Mutual Relations of the Persons of the Trinity	460
§ 6. Examination of the Nicene Doctrine	462
Subordination.—Eternal Generation.—Eternal Sonship	471
Objections urged against the Doctrine of Eternal Sonship	474
Relation of the Spirit to the other Persons of the Trinity	477
§ 7. Philosophical Forms of the Doctrine of the Trinity	478

CHAPTER VII.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

§ 1. Testimony of the Old Testament	488
Protevangelium.—Jehovah and the Angel Jehovah.—Evidence contained—1. In the Book of Genesis; 2. In the other Historical Books of the Old Testament; 3. The Book of Psalms, — 4. The Prophetical Books	492

	PAGE
§ 2. The General Characteristics of the New Testament Teaching concerning Christ	495
1. The Sense in which Christ is called Lord	495
2. Christ presented as the Object of our Religious Affections	497
3. The Relations which Christ bears to his People and to the World. — His Authority as a Teacher. — His Control over all Creatures	501
4. The Nature of his Promises	502
5. His Control over Nature	503
§ 3. Particular Passages in the New Testament which teach the Divinity of Christ	504
1. The writings of St. John. — John i. 14. — Other Passages in St. John's Gospel. — Our Lord's Last Discourse. — The Epistles of St. John. — The Apocalypso	511
2. The Epistles of St. Paul. — The Epistle to the Romans. — Corinthians. — Galatians. — Ephesians. — Philippians. — Colossians. — Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul. — The Epistle to the Hebrews. — Other Sacred Writers of the New Testament	520

CHAPTER VIII.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

§ 1. His Nature	522
His Personality. — Proof of his Personality. — Divinity of the Holy Spirit	527
§ 2. Office of the Holy Spirit — 1. In Nature; 2. In the Work of Redemption. — The Revealer of all Divine Truth. — Applies to Men the Benefits of the Redemption of Christ	532
§ 3. History of the Doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit	532

CHAPTER IX.

THE DECREES OF GOD.

§ 1. The Nature of the Divine Decrees	535
The Glory of God the Final Cause of his Decrees. — Decrees reducible to One Purpose. — The Decrees of God are Immutable. — They are Free. — They are certainly Efficacious. — They relate to all Events. — Free Acts are foreordained	543
§ 2. Objections to the Doctrine of Divine Decrees	545
1. Foreordination inconsistent with Free Agency. — 2. Foreordination of Sin inconsistent with Holiness. — 3. The Doctrine of Decrees destroys all Motives to Exertion. — 4. It is Fatalism	548

CHAPTER X.

CREATION.

§ 1. Different Theories concerning the Origin of the Universe.	550
1. The Purely Physical Theory. — 2. The Theories which assume Intelligence in Nature itself. — 3. Scriptural Doctrine	553
§ 2. Mediate and Immediate Creation	556

	PAGE
§ 3. Proof of the Doctrine of a Creation ex nihilo	558
§ 4. Objections to the Doctrine of a Creation ex nihilo	562
§ 5. Design of the Creation	565
Scriptural Doctrine as to the Design of the Creation	567
§ 6. The Mosaic Account of the Creation	568
Objections to the Mosaic Account of the Creation—Geology and the Bible	570

CHAPTER XI.

PROVIDENCE.

§ 1. Preservation	575
The Nature of Preservation.—Preservation is not a Continued Creation.—Objections to the Doctrine of a Continuous Crea- tion.—Scriptural Doctrine on the Subject	581
§ 2. Government	581
Statement of the Doctrine.—Proof of the Doctrine.
1. The Evidence of the Operation of Mind everywhere	588
2. From our Religious Nature	584
3. From Predictions and Promises	585
4. From Experience	586
The Scriptural Doctrine	586
The Bible teaches—1. God's Providence over Nature; 2. Over the Animal World; 3. Over Nations; 4. Over Individuals, over the Free Acts of Men; 5. God's Providence in Relation to Sin	589
§ 3. Different Theories of the Divine Government	591
1. The Deistical Theory of God's Relation to the World	591
2. The Theory of Entire Dependence	592
3. The Doctrine that there is no Efficiency except in Mind	595
4. The Theory of Preëstablished Harmony	597
5. The Doctrine of Concursus	598
Remarks on the Doctrine of Concursus	608
§ 4. The Principles involved in the Scriptural Doctrine of Providence	605
The Providence of God over the Material Universe.—1. The External World has a real Objective Existence.—2. Matter is active.—The Laws of Nature.—The Uniformity of the Laws of Nature consistent with the Doctrine of Providence	609
God's Providence in Relation to Vital Processes	610
The Providence of God over Rational Creatures	613
Distinction between the Providential Efficiency of God and the Influences of the Holy Spirit	614

CHAPTER XII.

MIRACLES.

§ 1. Usage of the Word	617
Definition of a Miracle.—Objections to this Definition	618
Answer to the above Objections	620
The Doctrine of a Higher Law	624
Objections to the Doctrine of a Higher Law	622

	PAGE
§ 2. Possibility of Miracles	626
§ 3. Can a Miracle be known as such?	629
Lying Wonders. — Insufficiency of Human Testimony	639
§ 4. The Value of Miracles as a Proof of Divine Revelation	635

CHAPTER XIII.

ANGELS.

§ 1. Their Nature	637
§ 2. Their State	639
§ 3. Their Employments	639
§ 4. Evil Angels	643
Power and Agency of Evil Spirits. — Demoniacal Possessions.	645

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

ON METHOD.

§ 1. Theology a Science.

IN every science there are two factors : facts and ideas ; or, facts and the mind. Science is more than knowledge. Knowledge is the persuasion of what is true on adequate evidence. But the facts of astronomy, chemistry, or history do not constitute the science of those departments of knowledge. Nor does the mere orderly arrangement of facts amount to science. Historical facts arranged in chronological order, are mere annals. The philosophy of history supposes those facts to be understood in their causal relations. In every department the man of science is assumed to understand the laws by which the facts of experience are determined ; so that he not only knows the past, but can predict the future. The astronomer can foretell the relative position of the heavenly bodies for centuries to come. The chemist can tell with certainty what will be the effect of certain chemical combinations. If, therefore, theology be a science, it must include something more than a mere knowledge of facts. It must embrace an exhibition of the internal relation of those facts, one to another, and each to all. It must be able to show that if one be admitted, others cannot be denied.

The Bible is no more a system of theology, than nature is a system of chemistry or of mechanics. We find in nature the facts which the chemist or the mechanical philosopher has to examine, and from them to ascertain the laws by which they are determined. So the Bible contains the truths which the theologian has to collect, authenticate, arrange, and exhibit in their internal relation to each other. This constitutes the difference between biblical and systematic theology. The office of the former is to ascertain and state the facts of Scripture. The office of the latter is to take those facts, determine their relation to each other and to other cognate truths, as well as to vindicate them and show their harmony and consistency. This is not an easy task, or one of slight importance.

Necessity for System in Theology.

It may naturally be asked, why not take the truths as God has seen fit to reveal them, and thus save ourselves the trouble of showing their relation and harmony?

The answer to this question is, in the first place, that it cannot be done. Such is the constitution of the human mind that it cannot help endeavoring to systematize and reconcile the facts which it admits to be true. In no department of knowledge have men been satisfied with the possession of a mass of undigested facts. And the students of the Bible can as little be expected to be thus satisfied. There is a necessity, therefore, for the construction of systems of theology. Of this the history of the Church affords abundant proof. In all ages and among all denominations, such systems have been produced.

Second, A much higher kind of knowledge is thus obtained, than by the mere accumulation of isolated facts. It is one thing, for example, to know that oceans, continents, islands, mountains, and rivers exist on the face of the earth; and a much higher thing to know the causes which have determined the distribution of land and water on the surface of our globe; the configuration of the earth; the effects of that configuration on climate, on the races of plants and animals, on commerce, civilization, and the destiny of nations. It is by determining these causes that geography has been raised from a collection of facts to a highly important and elevated science. In like manner, without the knowledge of the laws of attraction and motion, astronomy would be a confused and unintelligible collection of facts. What is true of other sciences is true of theology. We cannot know what God has revealed in his Word unless we understand, at least in some good measure, the relation in which the separate truths therein contained stand to each other. It cost the Church centuries of study and controversy to solve the problem concerning the person of Christ; that is, to adjust and bring into harmonious arrangement all the facts which the Bible teaches on that subject.

Third, We have no choice in this matter. If we would discharge our duty as teachers and defenders of the truth, we must endeavor to bring all the facts of revelation into systematic order and mutual relation. It is only thus that we can satisfactorily exhibit their truth, vindicate them from objections, or bring them to bear in their full force on the minds of men.

Fourth, Such is evidently the will of God. He does not teach men astronomy or chemistry, but He gives them the facts out of which those sciences are constructed. Neither does He teach us systematic theology, but He gives us in the Bible the truths which, properly understood and arranged, constitute the science of theology. As the facts of nature are all related and determined by physical laws, so the facts of the Bible are all related and determined by the nature of God and of his creatures. And as He wills that men should study his works and discover their wonderful organic relation and harmonious combination, so it is his will that we should study his Word, and learn that, like the stars, its truths are not isolated points, but systems, cycles, and epicycles, in unending harmony and grandeur. Besides all this, although the Scriptures do not contain a system of theology as a whole, we have in the Epistles of the New Testament, portions of that system wrought out to our hands. These are our authority and guide.

§ 2. Theological Method.

Every science has its own method, determined by its peculiar nature. This is a matter of so much importance that it has been erected into a distinct department. Modern literature abounds in works on Methodology, i. e., on the science of method. They are designed to determine the principles which should control scientific investigations. If a man adopts a false method, he is like one who takes a wrong road which will never lead him to his destination. The two great comprehensive methods are the à priori and the à posteriori. The one argues from cause to effect, the other from effect to cause. The former was for ages applied even to the investigation of nature. Men sought to determine what the facts of nature must be from the laws of mind or assumed necessary laws. Even in our own day we have had Rational Cosmogonies, which undertake to construct a theory of the universe from the nature of absolute being and its necessary modes of development. Every one knows how much it cost to establish the method of induction on a firm basis, and to secure a general recognition of its authority. According to this method, we begin with collecting well-established facts, and from them infer the general laws which determine their occurrence. From the fact that bodies fall toward the centre of the earth, has been inferred the general law of gravitation, which we are authorized to apply far beyond the limits of actual experience. This inductive method is founded upon two principles: First, That there are laws of nature (forces) which are the proximate causes of natural phenomena. Secondly, That those laws are uniform; so that we are certain that the same causes, under the same circumstances, will produce the same effects. There may be diversity of opinion as to the nature of these laws. They may be assumed to be forces inherent in matter; or, they may be regarded as uniform modes of divine operation; but in any event there must be some cause for the phenomena which we perceive around us, and that cause must be uniform and permanent. On these principles all the inductive sciences are founded; and by them the investigations of natural philosophers are guided.

The same principle applies to metaphysics as to physics; to psychology as well as to natural science. Mind has its laws as well as matter, and those laws, although of a different kind, are as permanent as those of the external world.

The methods which have been applied to the study of theology are too numerous to be separately considered. They may, perhaps, be reduced to three general classes: First, The Speculative; Second, The Mystical; Third, The Inductive. These terms are, indeed, far from being precise. They are used for the want of better to designate the three general methods of theological investigation which have prevailed in the Church.

§ 3. The Speculative Method.

Speculation assumes, in an à priori manner, certain principles, and from them undertakes to determine what is and what must be. It decides on all truth, or determines on what is true from the laws of the mind, or from axioms involved in the constitution of the thinking principle within us. To this head must be referred all those systems which are founded on any à priori philosophical assumptions. There are three general forms in which this speculative method has been applied to theology.

Deistic and Rationalistic Form.

1. The first is that which rejects any other source of knowledge of divine things than what is found in nature and the constitution of the human mind. It assumes certain metaphysical and moral axioms, and from them evolves all the truths which it is willing to admit. To this class belong the Deistical and strictly Rationalistical writers of the past and present generations.

Dogmatic Form.

2. The second is the method adopted by those who admit a supernatural divine revelation, and concede that such a revelation is contained in the Christian Scriptures, but who reduce all the doctrines thus revealed to the forms of some philosophical system. This was done by many of the fathers who endeavored to exalt πίστις into γνώσις, i. e., the faith of the common people into philosophy for the learned. This was also to a greater or less degree the method of the schoolmen, and finds an illustration even in the "Cur Deus Homo" of Anselm, the father of scholastic theology. In later times Wolf applied the philosophy of Leibnitz to the explanation and demonstration of the doctrines of revelation. He says, "Scripture serves as an aid to natural theology. It furnishes natural theology with propositions which ought to be demonstrated; consequently the philosopher is bound not to invent but to demonstrate."¹ This method is still in vogue. Men lay down certain principles, called axioms, or first truths of reason, and from them deduce the doctrines of religion by a course of argument as rigid and remorseless as that of Euclid. This is sometimes done to the entire overthrow of the doctrines of the Bible, and of the most intimate moral convictions not only of Christians but of the mass of mankind. Conscience is not allowed to mutter in the presence of the lordly understanding. It is in the spirit of the same method that the old scholastic doctrine of realism is made the basis of the Scriptural doctrines of original sin and redemption. To this method the somewhat ambiguous term Dogmatism has been applied, because it attempts to reconcile the doctrines of Scripture with reason, and to rest their authority on rational evidence. The result of this method has always been to transmute, as far as it succeeded, faith into knowledge, and to attain this end the teachings of the Bible have been indefinitely modified. Men are expected to believe, not on the authority of God, but on that of reason.

Transcendentalists.

3. Thirdly, and preëminently, the modern Transcendentalists are addicted to the speculative method. In the wide sense of the word they are Rationalists, as they admit of no higher source of truth than Reason. But as they make reason to be something very different from what it is regarded as being by ordinary Rationalists, the two classes are practically very far apart. The Transcendentalists also differ essentially from the Dogmatists. The latter admit an external, supernatural, and authoritative revelation. They acknowledge that truths not discoverable by human reason are thereby made known. But they maintain that those doctrines when known may be shown to be true on the principles of reason. They undertake to give a demonstration independent of Scripture of the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, Redemption, as well as of the immortality of the soul and a future state of retribution. Transcendentalists admit of no authoritative revelation other than that which is found in man and in the historical development of the race. All truth is to be discovered and established by a process of thought. If it be conceded that the Bible contains truth, it is only so far as it coincides with the teachings of philosophy. The same concession is freely made concerning the writings of the heathen sages. The theology of Daub, for example, is nothing more than the philosophy of Schelling. That is, it teaches just what that philosophy teaches concerning God, man, sin, redemption, and the future state. Marheinecke and Strauss find Hegelianism in the Bible, and they therefore admit that so far the Bible teaches truth. Rosenkranz, a philosopher of the same school, says Christianity is the absolute religion, because its fundamental principle, namely, the oneness of God and man, is the fundamental principle of his philosophy. In his "Encyclopädie" (p. 3) he says: "The only religion which conforms to reason is Christianity, because it regards man as the form in which God has revealed himself. Its theology is therefore anthropology, and its anthropology is theology. The idea of (Gott-menschheit) the godhead of man, is the key of Christianity, in which as Lessing says, lies its rationality."

¹ Theol. Nat. Prolegg. § 22; Frankf and Leipz. 1736, vol. i. p. 22.

These are the principal forms of the speculative method in its application to theology. These topics will present themselves for fuller consideration in a subsequent chapter.

§ 4. The Mystical Method.

Few words have been used with greater latitude of meaning than mysticism. It is here to be taken in a sense antithetical to speculation. Speculation is a process of thought; mysticism is matter of feeling. The one assumes that the thinking faculty is that by which we attain the knowledge of truth. The other, distrusting reason, teaches that the feelings alone are to be relied upon, at least in the sphere of religion. Although this method has been unduly pressed, and systems of theology have been constructed under its guidance, which are either entirely independent of the Scriptures, or in which the doctrines of the Bible have been modified and perverted, it is not to be denied that great authority is due to our moral nature in matters of religion. It has ever been a great evil in the Church that men have allowed the logical understanding, or what they call their reason, to lead them to conclusions which are not only contrary to Scripture, but which do violence to our moral nature. It is conceded that nothing contrary to reason can be true. But it is no less important to remember that nothing contrary to our moral nature can be true. It is also to be admitted that conscience is much less liable to err than reason ; and when they come into conflict, real or apparent, our moral nature is the stronger, and will assert its authority in spite of all we can do. It is rightfully supreme in the soul, although, with the reason and the will, it is in absolute subjection to God, who is infinite reason and infinite moral excellence.

Mysticism as applied to Theology.

Mysticism, in its application to theology, has assumed two principal forms, the supernatural and the natural. According to the former, God, or the Spirit of God, holds direct communion with the soul ; and by the excitement of its religious feelings gives it intuitions of truth, and enables it to attain a kind, a degree, and an extent of knowledge, unattainable in any other way. This has been the common theory of Christian mystics in ancient and modern times. If by this were meant merely that the Spirit of God, by his illuminating influence, gives believers a knowledge of the truths objectively revealed in the Scriptures, which is peculiar, certain, and saving, it would be admitted by all evangelical Christians. And it is because such Christians do hold to this inward teaching of the Spirit, that they are often called Mystics by their opponents. This, however, is not what is here meant. The mystical method, in its supernatural form, assumes that God by his immediate intercourse with the soul, reveals through the feelings and by means, or in the way of intuitions, divine truth independently of the outward teaching of his Word ; and that it is this inward light, and not the Scriptures, which we are to follow.

According to the other, or natural form of the mystical method, it is not God, but the natural religious consciousness of men, as excited and influenced by the circumstances of the individual, which becomes the source of religious knowledge. The deeper and purer the religious feelings, the clearer the insight into truth. This illumination or spiritual intuition is a matter of degree. But as all men have a religious nature, they all have more or less clearly the apprehension of religious truth. The religious consciousness of men in different ages and nations, has been historically developed under diverse influences, and hence we have diverse forms of religion, — the Pagan, the Mohammedan, and the Christian. These do not stand related as true and false, but as more or less pure. The appearance of Christ, his life, his work, his words, his death, had a wonderful effect on the minds of men. Their religious feelings were more deeply stirred, were more purified and elevated than ever before. Hence the men of his generation, who gave themselves up to his influence, had intuitions of religious truth of a far higher order than mankind had before attained. This influence continues to the present time. All Christians are its subjects. All, therefore, in proportion to the purity and elevation of their religious feelings, have intuitions of divine things, such as the Apostles and other Christians enjoyed. Perfect holiness would secure perfect knowledge.

Consequences of the Mystical Method.

It follows from this theory, — (1.) That there are no such things as revelation and inspiration, in the established theological meaning of those terms. Revelation is the supernatural objective presentation or communication of truth to the mind, by the Spirit of God. But according to this theory there is, and can be, no such communication of truth. The religious feelings are providentially excited, and by reason of that excitement the mind perceives truth more or less clearly, or more or less imperfectly. Inspiration, in the Scriptural sense, is the supernatural guidance of the Spirit, which renders its subjects infallible in the communicating truth to others. But according to this theory, no man is infallible as a teacher. Revelation and inspiration are in different degrees common to all men. And there is no reason why they should not be as perfect in some believers now as in the days of the Apostles. (2.) The Bible has no infallible authority in matters of doctrine. The doctrinal propositions therein contained are not revelations by the Spirit. They are only the forms under which men of Jewish culture gave expression to their feelings and intuitions. Men of different culture, and under other circumstances, would have used other forms or adopted other doctrinal statements. (3.) Christianity, therefore, neither consists in a system of doctrines, nor does it contain any such system. It is a life, an influence, a subjective state; or by whatever term it may be expressed or explained, it is a power within each individual Christian determining his feelings and his views of divine things. (4.) Consequently the duty of a theologian is not to interpret Scripture, but to interpret his own Christian consciousness; to ascertain and exhibit what truths concerning God are implied in his feelings toward God; what truths concerning Christ are involved in his feelings toward Christ; what the feelings teach concerning sin, redemption, eternal life, etc., etc.

This method found its most distinguished and influential advocate in Schleiermacher, whose "Glaubenslehre" is constructed on this principle. By Twisten—his successor in the chair of Theology in the University of Berlin—it is held in greater subjection to the normal authority of Scripture. By others, again, of the same school, it has been carried out to its utmost extreme. We are at present, however, concerned only with its principle, and neither with the details of its application, nor with its refutation.

§ 5. The Inductive Method.

It is so called because it agrees in everything essential with the inductive method as applied to the natural sciences.

First, The man of science comes to the study of nature with certain assumptions. (1.) He assumes the trustworthiness of his sense perceptions. Unless he can rely upon the well-authenticated testimony of his senses, he is deprived of all means of prosecuting his investigations. The facts of nature reveal themselves to our faculties of sense, and can be known in no other way. (2.) He must also assume the trustworthiness of his mental operations. He must take for granted that he can perceive, compare, combine, remember, and infer; and that he can safely rely upon these mental faculties in their legitimate exercise. (3.) He must also rely on the certainty of those truths which are not learned from experience, but which are given in the constitution of our nature. That every effect must have a cause; that the same cause under like circumstances, will produce like effects; that a cause is not a mere uniform antecedent, but that which contains within itself the reason why the effect occurs.

Second, The student of nature having this ground on which to stand, and these tools wherewith to work, proceeds to perceive, gather, and combine his facts. These he does not pretend to manufacture, nor presume to modify. He must take them as they are. He is only careful to be sure that they are real, and that he has them all, or, at least all that are necessary to justify any inference which he may draw from them, or any theory which he may build upon them.

Third, From facts thus ascertained and classified, he deduces the laws by which they are determined. That a heavy body falls to the ground is a familiar fact. Observation shows that it is not an isolated fact; but that all matter tends toward all other matter; that this tendency or attraction is in proportion to the quantity of matter; and its intensity decreases in proportion to the square of the distance of the attracting bodies. As all this is found to be universally and constantly the case within the field of observation, the mind is forced to conclude that there is some reason for it; in other words, that it is a law of nature which may be relied upon beyond the limits of actual observation. As this law has always operated in the past, the man of science is sure that it will operate in the future. It is in this way the vast body of modern science has been built up, and the laws which determine the motions of the heavenly bodies; the chemical changes constantly going on around us; the structure, growth, and propagation of plants and animals, have, to a greater or less extent, been ascertained and established. It is to be observed that these laws or general principles are not derived from the mind, and attributed to external objects, but derived or deduced from the objects and impressed upon the mind.

A. The Inductive Method as applied to Theology.

The Bible is to the theologian what nature is to the man of science. It is his store-house of facts; and his method of ascertaining what the Bible teaches, is the same as that which the natural philosopher adopts to ascertain what nature teaches. In the first place, he comes to his task with all the assumptions above mentioned. He must assume the validity of those laws of belief which God has impressed upon our nature. In these laws are included some which have no direct application to the natural sciences. Such, for example, as the essential distinction between right and wrong; that nothing contrary to virtue can be enjoined by God; that it cannot be right to do evil that good may come; that sin deserves punishment, and other similar first truths, which God has implanted in the constitution of all moral beings, and which no objective revelation can possibly contradict. These first principles, however, are not to be arbitrarily assumed. No man has a right to lay down his own opinions, however firmly held, and call them "first truths of reason," and make them the source or test of Christian doctrines. Nothing can rightfully be included under the category of first truths, or laws of belief, which cannot stand the tests of universality and necessity, to which many add self-evidence. But self-evidence is included in universality and necessity, in so far, that nothing which is not self-evident can be universally believed, and what is self-evident forces itself on the mind of every intelligent creature.

Facts to be collected.

In the second place, the duty of the Christian theologian is to ascertain, collect, and combine all the facts which God has revealed concerning himself and our relation to Him. These facts are all in the Bible. This is true, because everything revealed in nature, and in the constitution of man concerning God and our relation to Him, is contained and authenticated in Scripture. It is in this sense that "the Bible, and the Bible alone, is the religion of Protestants." It may be admitted that the truths which the theologian has to reduce to a science, or, to speak more humbly, which he has to arrange and harmonize, are revealed partly in the external works of God, partly in the constitution of our nature, and partly in the religious experience of believers; yet lest we should err in our inferences from the works of God, we have a clearer revelation of all that nature reveals, in his word; and lest we should misinterpret our own consciousness and the laws of our nature, everything that can be legitimately learned from that source will be found recognized and authenticated in the Scriptures; and lest we should attribute to the teaching of the Spirit the operations of our own natural affections, we find in the Bible the norm and standard of all genuine religious experience. The Scriptures teach not only the truth, but what are the effects of the truth on the heart and conscience, when applied with saving power by the Holy Ghost.

The Theologian to be guided by the same rules as the Man of Science.

In the third place, the theologian must be guided by the same rules in the collection of facts, as govern the man of science.

1. This collection must be made with diligence and care. It is not an easy work. There is in every department of investigation great liability to error. Almost all false theories in science and false doctrines in theology are due in a great degree to mistakes as to matters of fact. A distinguished naturalist said he repeated an experiment a thousand times before he felt authorized to announce the result to the scientific world as an established fact.

2. This collection of facts must not only be carefully conducted, but also comprehensive, and if possible, exhaustive. An imperfect induction of facts led men for ages to believe that the sun moved round the earth, and that the earth was an extended plain. In theology a partial induction of particulars has led to like serious errors. It is a fact that the Scriptures attribute omniscience to Christ. From this it was inferred that He could not have had a finite intelligence, but that the Logos was clothed in Him with a human body with its animal life. But it is also a Scriptural fact that ignorance and intellectual progress, as well as omniscience, are ascribed to our Lord. Both facts, therefore, must be included in our doctrine of his person. We must admit that He had a human, as well as a divine intelligence. It is a fact that everything that can be predicated of a sinless man, is in the Bible, predicated of Christ; and it is also a fact that everything that is predicated of God is predicated of our Lord; hence it has been inferred that there were two Christs, — two persons, — the one human, the other divine, and that they dwelt together very much as the Spirit dwells in the believer; or, as evil spirits dwell in demoniacs. But this theory overlooked the numerous facts which prove the individual personality of Christ. It was the same person who said, "I thirst;" who said, "Before Abraham was I am." The Scriptures teach that Christ's death was designed to reveal the love of God, and to secure the reformation of men. Hence Socinus denied that his death was an expiation for sin, or satisfaction of justice. The latter fact, however, is as clearly revealed as the former; and therefore both must be taken into account in our statement of the doctrine concerning the design of Christ's death.

Necessity of a complete Induction.

Illustrations without end might be given of the necessity of a comprehensive induction of facts to justify our doctrinal conclusions. These facts must not be willfully denied or carelessly overlooked, or unfairly appreciated. We must be honest here, as the true student of nature is honest in his induction. Even scientific men are sometimes led to suppress or to pervert facts which militate against their favorite theories; but the temptation to this form of dishonesty is far less in their case, than in that of the theologian. The truths of religion are far more important than those of natural science. They come home to the heart and conscience. They may alarm the fears or threaten the hopes of men, so that they are under strong temptation to overlook or pervert them. If, however, we really desire to know what God has revealed we must be conscientiously diligent and faithful in collecting the facts which He has made known, and in giving them their due weight. If a geologist should find in a deposit of early date implements of human workmanship, he is not allowed to say they are natural productions. He must either revise his conclusion as to the age of the deposit, or carry back to an earlier period the existence of man. There is no help for it. Science cannot make facts; it must take them as they are. In like manner, if the Bible asserts that Christ's death was a satisfaction to justice, the theologian is not allowed to merge justice into benevolence in order to suit his theory of the atonement. If the Scriptures teach that men are born in sin, we cannot change the nature of sin, and make it a tendency to evil and not really sin, in order to get rid of difficulty. If it be a Scriptural fact that the soul exists in a state of conscious activity between death and the resurrection, we must not deny this fact or reduce this conscious activity to zero, because our anthropology teaches that the soul has no individuality and no activity without a body. We must take the facts of the Bible as they are, and construct our system so as to embrace them all in their integrity.

Principles to be deduced from facts.

In the fourth place, in theology as in natural science, principles are derived from facts, and not impressed upon them. The properties of matter, the laws of motion, of magnetism, of light, etc., are not framed by the mind. They are not laws of thought. They are deductions from facts. The investigator sees, or ascertains by observation, what are the laws which determine material phenomena; he does not invent those laws. His speculations on matters of science unless sustained by facts, are worthless. It is no less unscientific for the theologian to assume a theory as to the nature of virtue, of sin, of liberty, of moral obligation, and then explain the facts of Scripture in accordance with his theories. His only proper course is to derive his theory of virtue, of sin, of liberty, of obligation, from the facts of the Bible. He should remember that his business is not to set forth his system of truth (that is of no account), but to ascertain and exhibit what is God's system, which is a matter of the greatest moment. If he cannot believe what the facts of the Bible assume to be true, let him say so. Let the sacred writers have their doctrine, while he has his own. To this ground a large class of modern exegetes and theologians, after a long struggle, have actually come. They give what they regard as the doctrines of the Old Testament; then those of the Evangelists; then those of the Apostles; and then their own. This is fair. So long, however, as the binding authority of Scripture is acknowledged, the temptation is very strong to press the facts of the Bible into accordance with our preconceived theories. If a man be persuaded that certainty in acting is inconsistent with liberty of action; that a free agent can always act contrary to any amount of influence (not destructive of his liberty) brought to bear upon him, he will inevitably deny that the Scriptures teach the contrary, and thus be forced to explain away all facts which prove the absolute control of God over the will and volitions of men. If he hold that sinfulness can be predicated only of intelligent, voluntary action in contravention of law, he must deny that men are born in sin, let the Bible teach what it may. If he believes that ability limits obligation, he must believe independently of the Scriptures, or in opposition to them, it matters not which, that men are able to repent, believe, love God perfectly, to live without sin, at any, and all times, without the least assistance from the Spirit of God. If he deny that the innocent may justly suffer penal evil for the guilty, he must deny that Christ bore our sins. If he deny that the merit of one man can be the judicial ground of the pardon and salvation of other men, he must reject the Scriptural doctrine of justification. It is plain that complete havoc must be made of the whole system of revealed truth, unless we consent to derive our philosophy from the Bible, instead of explaining the Bible by our philosophy. If the Scriptures teach that sin is hereditary, we must adopt a theory of sin suited to that fact. If they teach that men cannot repent, believe, or do anything spiritually good, without the supernatural aid of the Holy Spirit, we must make our theory of moral obligation accord with that fact. If the Bible teaches that we bear the guilt of Adam's first sin, that Christ bore our guilt, and endured the penalty of the law in our stead, these are facts with which we must make our principles agree. It would be easy to show that in every department of theology,—in regard to the nature of God, his relation to the world, the plan of salvation, the person and work of Christ, the nature of sin, the operations of divine grace, men, instead of taking the facts of the Bible, and seeing what principles they imply, what philosophy underlies them, have adopted their philosophy independently of the Bible, to which the facts of the Bible are made to bend. This is utterly unphilosophical. It is the fundamental principle of all sciences, and of theology among the rest, that theory is to be determined by facts, and not facts by theory. As natural science was a chaos until the principle of induction was admitted and faithfully carried out, so theology is a jumble of human speculations, not worth a straw, when men refuse to apply the same principle to the study of the Word of God.

§ 6. The Scriptures contain all the Facts of Theology.

This is perfectly consistent, on the one hand, with the admission of intuitive truths, both intellectual and moral, due to our constitution as rational and moral beings; and, on the other hand, with the controlling power over our beliefs exercised by the inward teachings of the Spirit, or, in other words, by our religious experience. And that for two reasons: First, All truth must be consistent. God cannot contradict himself. He cannot force us by the constitution of the nature which He has given us to believe one thing, and in his Word command us to believe the opposite. And, second, All the truths taught by the constitution of our nature or by religious experience, are recognized and authenticated in the Scriptures. This is a safeguard and a limit. We cannot assume this or that principle to be intuitively true, or this or that conclusion to be demonstrably certain, and make them a standard to which the Bible must conform. What is self-evidently true, must be proved to be so, and is always recognized in the Bible as true. Whole systems of theologies are founded upon intuitions, so called, and if every man is at liberty to exalt his own intuitions, as men are accustomed to call their strong convictions, we should have as many theologies in the world as there are thinkers. The same remark is applicable to religious experience. There is no form of conviction more intimate and irresistible than that which arises from the inward teaching of the Spirit. All saving faith rests on his testimony or demonstrations (1 Cor. ii. 4). Believers have an unction from the Holy One, and they know the truth, and that no lie (or false doctrine) is of the truth. This inward teaching produces a conviction which no sophistries can obscure, and no arguments can shake. It is founded on consciousness, and you might as well argue a man out of a belief of his existence, as out of confidence that what he is thus taught of God is true. Two things, however, are to be borne in mind. First, That this inward teaching or demonstration of the Spirit is confined to truths objectively revealed in the Scriptures. It is given, says the Apostle, in order that we may know things gratuitously given, i. e., revealed to us by God in his Word (1 Cor. ii. 10-16). It is not, therefore, a revelation of new truths, but an illumination of the mind, so that it apprehends the truth, excellence, and glory of things already revealed. And second,

This experience is depicted in the Word of God. The Bible gives us not only the facts concerning God, and Christ, ourselves, and our relations to our Maker and Redeemer, but also records the legitimate effects of those truths on the minds of believers. So that we cannot appeal to our own feelings or inward experience, as a ground or guide, unless we can show that it agrees with the experience of holy men as recorded in the Scriptures.

The Teaching of the Spirit.

Although the inward teaching of the Spirit, or religious experience, is no substitute for an external revelation, and is no part of the rule of faith, it is, nevertheless, an invaluable guide in determining what the rule of faith teaches. The distinguishing feature of Augustinianism as taught by Augustin himself, and by the purer theologians of the Latin Church throughout the Middle Ages, which was set forth by the Reformers, and especially by Calvin and the Geneva divines, is that the inward teaching of the Spirit is allowed its proper place in determining our theology. The question is not first and mainly, What is true to the understanding, but what is true to the renewed heart? The effort is not to make the assertions of the Bible harmonize with the speculative reason, but to subject our feeble reason to the mind of God as revealed in his Word, and by his Spirit in our inner life. It might be easy to lead men to the conclusion that they are responsible only for their voluntary acts, if the appeal is made solely to the understanding. But if the appeal be made to every man's, and especially to every Christian's inward experience, the opposite conclusion is reached. We are convinced of the sinfulness of states of mind as well as of voluntary acts, even when those states are not the effect of our own agency, and are not subject to the power of the will. We are conscious of being sold under sin; of being its slaves; of being possessed by it as a power or law, immanent, innate, and beyond our control. Such is the doctrine of the Bible, and such is the teaching of our religious consciousness when under the influence of the Spirit of God. The true method in theology requires that the facts of religious experience should be accepted as facts, and when duly authenticated by Scripture, be allowed to interpret the doctrinal statements of the Word of God. So legitimate and powerful is this inward teaching of the Spirit, that it is no uncommon thing to find men having two theologies, — one of the intellect, and another of the heart. The one may find expression in creeds and systems of divinity, the other in their prayers and hymns. It would be safe for a man to resolve to admit into his theology nothing which is not sustained by the devotional writings of true Christians of every denomination. It would be easy to construct from such writings, received and sanctioned by Romanists, Lutherans, Reformed, and Remonstrants, a system of Pauline or Augustinian theology, such as would satisfy any intelligent and devout Calvinist in the world.

The true method of theology is, therefore, the inductive, which assumes that the Bible contains all the facts or truths which form the contents of theology, just as the facts of nature are the contents of the natural sciences. It is also assumed that the relation of these Biblical facts to each other, the principles involved in them, the laws which determine them, are in the facts themselves, and are to be deduced from them, just as the laws of nature are deduced from the facts of nature. In neither case are the principles derived from the mind and imposed upon the facts, but equally in both departments, the principles or laws are deduced from the facts and recognized by the mind.

CHAPTER II.

THEOLOGY.

§ 1. Its Nature.

IF the views presented in the preceding chapter be correct, the question, What is Theology? is already answered. If natural science be concerned with the facts and laws of nature, theology is concerned with the facts and the principles of the Bible. If the object of the one be to arrange and systematize the facts of the external world, and to ascertain the laws by which they are determined; the object of the other is to systematize the facts of the Bible, and ascertain the principles or general truths which those facts involve. And as the order in which the facts of nature are arranged cannot be determined arbitrarily, but by the nature of the facts themselves, so it is with the facts of the Bible. The parts of any organic whole have a natural relation which cannot with impunity be ignored or changed. The parts of a watch, or of any other piece of mechanism, must be normally arranged, or it will be in confusion and worthless. All the parts of a plant or animal are disposed to answer a given end, and are mutually dependent. We cannot put the roots of a tree in the place of the branches, or the teeth of an animal in the place of its feet. So the facts of science arrange themselves. They are not arranged by the naturalist. His business is simply to ascertain what the arrangement given in the nature of the facts is. If he mistake, his system is false, and to a greater or less degree valueless. The same is obviously true with regard to the facts or truths of the Bible. They cannot be held in isolation, nor will they admit of any and every arrangement the theologian may choose to assign them. They bear a natural relation to each other, which cannot be overlooked or perverted without the facts themselves being perverted. If the facts of Scripture are what Augustinians believe them to be, then the Augustinian system is the only possible system of theology. If those facts be what Romanists or Remonstrants take them to be, then their system is the only true one. It is important that the theologian should know his place. He is not master of the situation. He can no more construct a system of theology to suit his fancy, than the astronomer can adjust the mechanism of the heavens according to his own good pleasure. As the facts of astronomy arrange themselves in a certain order, and will admit of no other, so it is with the facts of theology. Theology, therefore, is the exhibition of the facts of Scripture in their proper order and relation, with the principles or general truths involved in the facts themselves, and which pervade and harmonize the whole.

It follows, also, from this view of the subject, that as the Bible contains one class of facts or truths which are not elsewhere revealed, and another class which, although more clearly made known in the Scriptures than anywhere else, are, nevertheless, so far revealed in nature as to be deducible therefrom, theology is properly distinguished as natural and revealed. The former is concerned with the facts of nature so far as they reveal God and our relation to him, and the latter with the facts of Scripture. This distinction, which, in one view is important, in another, is of little consequence, inasmuch as all that nature teaches concerning God and our duties, is more fully and more authoritatively revealed in his Word.

Definitions of Theology.

Other definitions of Theology are often given.

1. Sometimes the word is restricted to its etymological meaning, "a discourse concerning God." Orpheus and Homer were called theologians among the Greeks, because their poems treated of the nature of the gods. Aristotle classed the sciences under the heads of physics, mathematics, and theology, i. e., those which concern nature, number and quantity, and that which concerns God. The fathers spoke of the Apostle John as the theologian, because in his gospel and epistles the divinity of Christ is rendered so prominent. The word is still used in this restricted sense when opposed to anthropology, soteriology, ecclesiology, as departments of theology in its wider sense.

2. Theology is sometimes said to be the science of the supernatural. But what is the supernatural? The answer to that question depends on the meaning assigned to the word nature. If by nature is meant the external world as governed by fixed laws, then the souls of men and other spiritual beings are not included under the term. In this use of the word nature, the supernatural is synonymous with the spiritual, and theology, as the science of the supernatural, is synonymous with pneumatology. If this view be adopted, psychology becomes a branch of theology, and the theologian must, as such, teach mental philosophy.

The word nature is, however, often taken in a wider sense, so as to include man. Then we have a natural and a spiritual world. And the supernatural is that which transcends nature in this sense, so that what is supernatural is of necessity also superhuman. But it is not necessarily super-angelic. Again, nature may mean everything out of God; then the supernatural is the divine, and God is the only legitimate subject of theology. In no sense of the word, therefore, is theology the science of the supernatural. Hooker¹ says, "Theology is the science of divine things." If by divine things, or "the things of God," he meant the things which concern God, then theology is restricted to a "discourse concerning God;" if he meant the things revealed by God, according to the analogy of the expression "things of the Spirit," as used by the Apostle in 1 Cor. ii. 14, then the definition amounts to the more definite one given above.

3. A much more common definition of Theology, especially in our day, is that it is the science of religion. The word religion, however, is ambiguous. Its etymology is doubtful. Cicero² refers it to relegere, to go over again, to consider. "Religio" is then consideration, devout observance, especially of what pertains to the worship and service of God. "Religens" is devout, conscientious. "Religiosus," in a good sense, is the same as our word religious; in a bad sense, it means scrupulous, superstitious. "Religentem esse oportet, religiosum nefas."³ Augustin and Lactantius derive the word from religare, to bind back. Augustin⁴ says: "Ipse Deus enim fons nostræ beatitudinis, ipse omnis appetitionis est finis. Hunc eligentes vel potius religentes amiseramus enim negligentes: hunc ergo religentes, unde et religio dicta perhibetur, ad eum dilectione tendimus ut perveniendo quiescamus." And Lactantius, "Vinculo pietatis obstricti, Deo religati sumus, unde ipsa religio nomen accepit, non, ut Cicero interpretatus est, a religendo."⁵ According to this religio is the ground of obligation. It is that which binds us to God. Subjectively, it is the inward necessity of union with God. Commonly the word religion, in its objective sense, means "Modus Deum colendi," as when we speak of the Pagan, the Mohammedan, or the Christian religion. Subjectively, it expresses a state of mind. What that state characteristically is, is very variously stated. Most simply it is said to be the state of mind induced by faith in God, and a due sense of our relation to him. Or as Wegscheider expresses it, "Æqualis et constans animi affectio, qua homo, necessitudinem suam eandemque æternam, quæ ei cum summo omnium rerum auctore ac moderatore sanctissimo intercedit, intimo sensu complexus, cogitationes, voluntates et actiones suas ad eum referre studet." Or, as more concisely expressed by Bretschneider, "Faith in the reality of God, with a state of mind and mode of life in accordance with that faith." Or, more vaguely, "Recognition of the mutual relation between God and the world" (Fischer), or, "The recognition of a superhuman causality in the human soul and life" (Theile). "Faith founded on feeling in the reality of the ideal" (Jacobi). "The feeling of absolute dependence" (Schleiermacher). "The observance of the moral law as a divine institution" (Kant). "Faith in the moral order of the universe" (Fichte). "The union of the finite with the infinite or God's coming to self-consciousness in the world" (Schelling).¹

¹ Eccles. Pol. iii. 8.² Nat. Deor. ii. 23.³ Poet. ap. Gell. iv. 9.⁴ De Civitate Dei, x. 3. Edit. of Benedictines, Paris, 1838.⁵ Instit. Div. iv. 28.

This diversity of views as to what religion is, is enough to prove how utterly vague and unsatisfactory must be the definition of theology as "the science of religion." Besides, this definition makes theology entirely independent of the Bible. For, as moral philosophy is the analysis of our moral nature, and the conclusions to which that analysis leads, so theology becomes the analysis of our religious consciousness, together with the truths which that analysis evolves. And even Christian theology is only the analysis of the religious consciousness of the Christian; and the Christian consciousness is not the natural religious consciousness of men as modified and determined by the truths of the Christian Scriptures, but it is something different. Some say it is to be referred to a new life transmitted from Christ. Others refer everything distinctive in the religious state of Christians to the Church, and really merge theology into ecclesiology.

We have, therefore, to restrict theology to its true sphere, as the science of the facts of divine revelation so far as those facts concern the nature of God and our relation to him, as his creatures, as sinners, and as the subjects of redemption. All these facts, as just remarked, are in the Bible. But as some of them are revealed by the works of God, and by the nature of man, there is so far a distinction between natural theology, and theology considered distinctively as a Christian science.

With regard to natural theology, there are two extreme opinions. The one is that the works of nature make no trustworthy revelation of the being and perfections of God; the other, that such revelation is so clear and comprehensive as to preclude the necessity of any supernatural revelation.

¹ See Hase's Hutterus Redivivus, l. § 2.

§ 2. The Facts of Nature Reveal God.

Those who deny that natural theology teaches anything reliable concerning God, commonly understand by nature the external, material universe. They pronounce the ontological and teleological arguments derived from the existence of the world, and from the evidences of design which it contains, to be unsatisfactory. The fact that the world is, is a proof that it always has been, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary. And the argument from design, it is said, overlooks the difference between dead mechanism and a living organism, between manufacture and growth. That a locomotive cannot make itself, is no proof that a tree cannot grow. The one is formed ab extra by putting its dead parts together; the other is developed by a living principle within. The one necessitates the assumption of a maker external and anterior to itself, the other excludes, as is said, such assumption. Besides, it is urged that religious truths do not admit of proof. They belong to the same category with æsthetic and moral truths. They are the objects of intuition. To be perceived at all, they must be perceived in their own light. You cannot prove a thing to be beautiful or good to the man who does not perceive its beauty or excellence. Hence, it is further urged, that proof of religious truth is unnecessary. The good do not need proof; the evil cannot appreciate it. All that can be done is to affirm the truth, and let it awaken, if possible, the dormant power of perception.

A. Answer to the above Arguments.

All this is sophistical. For the arguments in support of the truths of natural religion are not drawn exclusively from the external works of God. Those which are the most obvious and the most effective are derived from the constitution of our own nature. Man was made in the image of God, and he reveals his parentage as unmistakably as any class of inferior animals reveal the source from which they sprung. If a horse is born of a horse, the immortal spirit of man, instinct with its moral and religious convictions and aspirations, must be the offspring of the Father of Spirits. This is the argument which Paul on Mars' Hill addressed to the cavilling philosophers of Athens. That the sphere of natural theology is not merely the facts of the material universe is plain from the meaning of the word nature, which, as we have seen, has many legitimate senses. It is not only used to designate the external world, but also for the forces active in the material universe, as when we speak of the operations and laws of nature, sometimes for all that falls into the chain of cause and effect as distinguished from the acts of free agents; and, as natura is derived from nascor, nature means whatever is produced, and therefore includes everything out of God, so that God and nature include all that is.

2. The second objection to natural theology is that its arguments are inconclusive. This is a point which no man can decide for other men. Every one must judge for himself. An argument which is conclusive for one mind may be powerless for other minds. That the material universe began to be; that it has not the cause of its existence within itself, and therefore must have had an extramundane cause; and that the infinitely numerous manifestations of design which it exhibits show that that cause must be intelligent, are arguments for the being of God, which have satisfied the minds of the great body of intelligent men in all ages of the world. They should not, therefore, be dismissed as unsatisfactory, because all men do not feel their force. Besides, as just remarked, these arguments are only confirmatory of others more direct and powerful derived from our moral and religious nature.

3. As to the objection that religious truths are the objects of intuition, and that intuitive truths neither need nor admit of proof, it may be answered that in one sense it is true. But self-evident truths may be illustrated; and it may be shown that their denial involves contradictions and absurdities. All geometry is an illustration of the axioms of Euclid; and if any man denies any of those axioms, it may be shown that he must believe impossibilities. In like manner, it may be admitted that the existence of a being on whom we are dependent, and to whom we are responsible, is a matter of intuition; and it may be acknowledged that it is self-evident that we can be responsible only to a person, and yet the existence of a personal God may be shown to be a necessary hypothesis to account for the facts of observation and consciousness, and that the denial of his existence leaves the problem of the universe unsolved and unsolvable. In other words, it may be shown that atheism, polytheism, and pantheism involve absolute impossibilities. This is a valid mode of proving that God is, although it be admitted that his existence after all is a self-evident truth. Theism is not the only self-evident truth that men are wont to deny.

B. Scriptural Argument for Natural Theology.

The Scriptures clearly recognize the fact that the works of God reveal his being and attributes. This they do not only by frequent reference to the works of nature as manifestations of the perfections of God, but by direct assertions. "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handy-work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." (Ps. xix. 1-4.) "The idea of perpetual testimony," says Dr. Addison Alexander,¹ "is conveyed by the figure of one day and night following another as witnesses in unbroken succession. . . . The absence of articulate language, far from weakening the testimony, makes it stronger. Even without speech or words, the heavens testify of God to all men."

The sacred writers in contending with the heathen appeal to the evidence which the works of God bear to his perfections: "Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?" (Ps. xciv. 8-10.) Paul said to the men of Lystra, "Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you, and preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." (Acts xiv. 15-17.) To the men of Athens he said: "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, 'For we are also his offspring.' Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." (Acts xvii. 24-29.)

¹ Comm. on Psalms, in loc.

Not only the fact of this revelation, but its clearness is distinctly asserted by the Apostle: "That which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful." (Rom. i. 19-21.)

It cannot, therefore, be reasonably doubted that not only the being of God, but also his eternal power and Godhead, are so revealed in his works, as to lay a stable foundation for natural theology. To the illustration of this subject many important works have been devoted, a few of which are the following: "Wolf de Theologia Naturali," "The Bridgewater Treatises," Bntler's "Analogy," Paley's "Natural Theology."

§ 3. Insufficiency of Natural Theology.

The second extreme opinion respecting Natural Theology is, that it precludes the necessity of a supernatural revelation. The question whether the knowledge of God derived from his works, be sufficient to lead fallen men to salvation, is answered affirmatively by Rationalists, but negatively by every historical branch of the Christian Church. On this point the Greek, the Latin, the Lutheran, and the Reformed Churches are unanimous. The two former are more exclusive than the two latter. The Greeks and Latins, in making the sacraments the only channels of saving grace, deny the possibility of the salvation of the unbaptized, whether in heathen or Christian lands. This principle is so essential to the Romish system as to be included in the very definition of the Church, as given by the authoritative writers of the Papal Church. That definition is so framed as to exclude from the hope of salvation not only all unbaptized infants and adults, but all, no matter however enlightened in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and however holy in heart and life, who do not acknowledge the supremacy of the bishop of Rome.

The question as to the sufficiency of natural theology, or of the truths of reason, is to be answered on the authority of the Scriptures. No man can tell a priori what is necessary to salvation.

Indeed, it is only by supernatural revelation that we know that any sinner can be saved. It is from the same source alone, we can know what are the conditions of salvation, or who are to be its subjects.

A. *What the Scriptures teach as to the Salvation of Men.
Salvation of Infants.*

What the Scriptures teach on this subject, according to the common doctrine of evangelical Protestants is first: —

1. All who die in infancy are saved. This is inferred from what the Bible teaches of the analogy between Adam and Christ. "As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many (οἱ πολλοί = πάντες) were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many (οἱ πολλοί = πάντες) be made righteous." (Rom. v. 18, 19.) We have no right to put any limit on these general terms, except what the Bible itself places upon them. The Scriptures nowhere exclude any class of infants, baptized or unbaptized, born in Christian or in heathen lands, of believing or unbelieving parents, from the benefits of the redemption of Christ. All the descendants of Adam, except Christ, are under condemnation; all the descendants of Adam, except those of whom it is expressly revealed that they cannot inherit the kingdom of God, are saved. This appears to be the clear meaning of the Apostle, and therefore he does not hesitate to say that where sin abounded, grace has much more abounded, that the benefits of redemption far exceed the evils of the fall; that the number of the saved far exceeds the number of the lost.

This is not inconsistent with the declaration of our Lord, in Matthew vii. 14, that only a few enter the gate which leadeth unto life. This is to be understood of adults. What the Bible says is intended for those in all ages, to whom it is addressed. But it is addressed to those who can either read or hear. It tells them what they are to believe and do. It would be an entire perversion of its meaning to make it apply to those to whom and of whom it does not speak. When it is said, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John iii. 36), no one understands this to preclude the possibility of the salvation of infants.

Not only, however, does the comparison, which the Apostle makes between Adam and Christ, lead to the conclusion that as all are condemned for the sin of the one, so all are saved by the righteousness of the other, those only excepted whom the Scriptures except; but the principle assumed throughout the whole discussion touches the same doctrine. That principle is that it is more congenial with the nature of God to bless than to curse, to save than to destroy. If the race fell in Adam, much more shall it be restored in Christ. If death reigned by one, much more shall grace reign by one. This "much more" is repeated over and over. The Bible everywhere teaches that God delighteth not in the death of the wicked; that judgment is his strange work. It is, therefore, contrary not only to the argument of the Apostle, but to the whole spirit of the passage (Romans v. 12-21), to exclude infants from "the all" who are made alive in Christ.

The conduct and language of our Lord in reference to children are not to be regarded as matters of sentiment, or simply expressive of kindly feeling. He evidently looked upon them as the lambs of the flock for which, as the good Shepherd, He laid down his life, and of whom He said they shall never perish, and no man could pluck them out of his hands. Of such He tells us is the kingdom of heaven, as though heaven was, in great measure, composed of the souls of redeemed infants. It is, therefore, the general belief of Protestants, contrary to the doctrine of Romanists and Romanizers, that all who die in infancy are saved.

B. Rule of Judgment for Adults.

2. Another general fact clearly revealed in Scripture is, that men are to be judged according to their works, and according to the light which they have severally enjoyed. God "will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth but obey unrighteousness, indignation, and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, honour, and peace to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile, for there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law, and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law." (Rom. ii. 6-12.) Our Lord teaches that those who sinned with a knowledge of God's will, shall be beaten with many stripes; and that those who sinned without such knowledge shall be beaten with few stripes; and that it will be more tolerable in the day of judgment for the heathen, even for Sodom and Gomorrah, than for those who perish under the light of the gospel. (Matt. x. 15; xi. 20-24.) The Judge of all the earth will do right. No human being will suffer more than he deserves, or more than his own conscience shall recognize as just.

C. All Men under Condemnation.

3. But the Bible tells us, that judged according to their works and according to the light which they have severally enjoyed, all men will be condemned. There is none righteous; no, not one. The whole world is guilty before God. This verdict is confirmed by every man's conscience. The consciousness of guilt and of moral pollution is absolutely universal.

Here it is that natural theology utterly fails. It cannot answer the question, How can man be just with God? or, How can God be just and yet justify the ungodly? Mankind have anxiously pondered this question for ages, and have gained no satisfaction. The ear has been placed on the bosom of humanity, to catch the still, small voice of conscience, and got no answer. It has been directed heavenward, and received no response. Reason, conscience, tradition, history, unite in saying that sin is death; and, therefore, that so far as human wisdom and resources are concerned, the salvation of sinners is as impossible as raising the dead. Every conceivable method of expiation and purification has been tried without success.

4. The Scriptures, therefore, teach that the heathen are "without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God." (Eph. ii. 12.) They are declared to be without excuse, "Because, that when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God, into an image made like unto corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves: who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen." (Rom. i. 21-25.) The Apostle says of the Gentiles that they "walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them because of the blindness of their heart: who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness." (Eph. iv. 17-19.)

5. All men being sinners, justly chargeable with inexcusable impiety and immorality, they cannot be saved by any effort or resource of their own. For we are told that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God." (1 Cor. vi. 9.) "For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." (Eph. v. 5.) More than this, the Bible teaches us that a man may be outwardly righteous in the sight of men, and yet be a whitened sepulchre, his heart being the seat of pride, envy, or malice. In other words, he may be moral in his conduct, and by reason of inward evil passions, be in the sight of God the chief of sinners, as was the case with Paul himself. And more even than this, although a man were free from outward sins, and, were it possible, from the sins of the heart, this negative goodness would not suffice. Without holiness "no man shall see the Lord." (Heb. xii. 14.) "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." (John iii. 3.) "He that loveth not, knoweth not God." (1 John iv. 8.) "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." (1 John ii. 15.) "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me." (1 John, iv. 8.) Who then can be saved? If the Bible excludes from the kingdom of heaven all the immoral; all whose hearts are corrupted by pride, envy, malice, or covetousness; all who love the world; all who are not holy; all in whom the love of God is not the supreme and controlling principle of action, it is evident that, so far as adults are concerned, salvation must be confined to very narrow limits. It is also evident that mere natural religion, the mere objective power of general religious truth, must be as inefficacious in preparing men for the presence of God, as the waters of Syria to heal the leprosy.

D. The necessary Conditions of Salvation.

6. Seeing then that the world by wisdom knows not God; seeing that men when left to themselves inevitably die in their sins; it has "pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." (1 Cor. i. 21.) God has sent his Son into the world to save sinners. Had any other method of salvation been possible, Christ is dead in vain. (Gal. ii. 21; iii. 21.) There is, therefore, no other name whereby men can be saved. (Acts iv. 12.) The knowledge of Christ and faith in Him are declared to be essential to salvation. This is proved: (1.) Because men are declared to be guilty before God. (2.) Because no man can expiate his own guilt and restore himself to the image of God. (3.) Because it is expressly declared that Christ is the only Saviour of men. (4.) Because Christ gave his Church the commission to preach the gospel to every creature under heaven, as the appointed means of salvation. (5.) Because the Apostles in the execution of this commission went everywhere preaching the Word, testifying to all men, Jews and Gentiles, to the wise and the unwise, that they must believe in Christ as the Son of God in order to be saved. Our Lord himself teaching through his forerunner said, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." (John iii. 36.) (6.) Because faith without knowledge is declared to be impossible. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach, except they be sent?" (Rom. x. 13-15.)

It is, therefore, as before stated, the common faith of the Christian world, that, so far as adults are concerned, there is no salvation without the knowledge of Christ and faith in Him. This has ever been regarded as the ground of the obligation which rests upon the Church to preach the gospel to every creature.

E. Objections.

To the objection that this doctrine is inconsistent with the goodness and justice of God, it may be answered: (1.) That the doctrine only assumes what the objector, if a Theist, must admit, namely, that God will deal with men according to their character and conduct, and that He will judge them according to the light which they have severally enjoyed. It is because the judge of all the earth must do right that all sinners receive the wages of sin, by an inexorable law, unless saved by the miracle of redemption. In teaching, therefore, that there is no salvation for those ignorant of the gospel, the Bible only teaches that a just God will punish sin. (2.) The doctrine of the Church on this subject does not go beyond the facts of the case. It only teaches that God will do what we see He actually does. He leaves mankind, in a large measure, to themselves. He allows them to make themselves sinful and miserable. It is no more difficult to reconcile the doctrine than the undeniable fact with the goodness of our God. (3.) In the gift of his Son, the revelation of his Word, the mission of the Spirit, and the institution of the Church, God has made abundant provision for the salvation of the world. That the Church has been so remiss in making known the gospel is her guilt. We must not charge the ignorance and consequent perdition of the heathen upon God. The guilt rests on us. We have kept to ourselves the bread of life, and allowed the nations to perish.

Some of the older Lutheran divines were disposed to meet the objection in question by saying that the plan of salvation was revealed to all mankind at three distinct epochs. First, immediately after the fall, to Adam; second, in the days of Noah; and third, during the age of the Apostles. If that knowledge has been lost it has been by the culpable ignorance of the heathen themselves. This is carrying the doctrine of imputation to its utmost length. It is making the present generation responsible for the apostasy of their ancestors. It leaves the difficulty just where it was.

The Wesleyan Arminians and the Friends, admitting the insufficiency of the light of nature, hold that God gives sufficient grace, or an inward supernatural light, which, if properly cherished and followed, will lead men to salvation. But this is merely an amiable hypothesis. For such universal and sufficient grace there is no promise in the Scripture, and no evidence in experience. Besides, if admitted it does not help the matter. If this sufficient grace does not actually save, if it does not deliver the heathen from those sins upon which the judgment of God is denounced, it only aggravates their condemnation. All we can do is to adhere closely to the teachings of the Bible, assured that the Judge of all the earth will do right; that although clouds and darkness are round about Him, and his ways past finding out, justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne.

§ 4. Christian Theology.

As science, concerned with the facts of nature, has its several departments, as Mathematics, Chemistry, Astronomy, etc., so Theology having the facts of Scripture for its subject, has its distinct and natural departments. First —

Theology Proper,

Which includes all the Bible teaches of the being and attributes of God; of the threefold personality of the Godhead, or, that the Father, Son, and Spirit are distinct persons, the same in substance and equal in power and glory; the relation of God to the world, or, his decrees and his works of Creation and Providence. Second, —

Anthropology,

Which includes the origin and nature of man; his original state and probation; his fall; the nature of sin; the effect of Adam's first sin upon himself and upon his posterity. Third, —

Soteriology,

Including the purpose or plan of God in reference to the salvation of man; the person and work of the Redeemer; the application of the redemption of Christ to the people of God, in their regeneration, justification, and sanctification; and the means of grace. Fourth, —

Eschatology,

That is, the doctrines which concern the state of the soul after death; the resurrection; the second advent of Christ; the general judgment and end of the world; heaven and hell. And fifth, —

Ecclesiology,

The idea, or nature of the Church; its attributes; its prerogatives; its organization.

It is the suggestive remark of Kliefoth in his "Dogmengeschichte," that to the Greek mind and to the Greek Church, was assigned the task of elaborating the doctrine of the Bible concerning God, i. e., the doctrines of the Trinity and Person of Christ; to the Latin Church the doctrines concerning man; that is, of sin and grace; to the German Church, Soteriology, or the doctrine of justification. Ecclesiology, he says, is reserved for the future, as the doctrine concerning the Church has not been settled by oecumenical authority as have been the doctrines of Theology and Anthropology, and that of justification at least for the Protestant world.

The above classification, although convenient and generally received, is far from being exhaustive. It leaves out of view the law (or at least subordinates it unduly), or rule of moral duty. This is a department in itself, and under the title of Moral Theology, is sometimes, as in the Latin Church, regarded as the most important. Among Protestants it is often regarded as a mere department of Philosophy.

It has been assumed that Theology has to do with the facts or truths of the Bible; in other words, that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the only infallible rule of faith and practice. This, however, is not a conceded point. Some claim for Reason a paramount, or, at least a coördinate authority in matters of religion. Others assume an internal supernatural light to which they attribute paramount, or coördinate authority. Others rely on the authority of an infallible church. With Protestants, the Bible is the only infallible source of knowledge of divine things. It is necessary, therefore, before entering on our work, briefly to examine these several systems, namely, Rationalism, Mysticism, and Romanism.

CHAPTER III.

RATIONALISM.

§ 1. Meaning and Usage of the Word.

By Rationalism is meant the system or theory which assigns undue authority to reason in matters of religion. By reason is not to be understood the Logos as revealed in man, as held by some of the Fathers, and by Cousin and other modern philosophers, nor the intuitional faculty as distinguished from the understanding or the discursive faculty. The word is taken in its ordinary sense for the cognitive faculty, that which perceives, compares, judges, and infers.

Rationalism has appeared under different forms. (1.) The Deistical, which denies either the possibility or the fact of any supernatural revelation, and maintains that reason is both the source and ground of all religious knowledge and conviction. (2.) That which while it admits the possibility and the fact of a supernatural revelation, and that such a revelation is contained in the Christian Scriptures, nevertheless maintains that the truths revealed are the truths of reason; that is, truths which reason can comprehend and demonstrate. (3.) The third form of Rationalism has received the name of Dogmatism, which admits that many of the truths of revelation are undiscoverable by human reason, and that they are to be received upon authority. Nevertheless, it maintains that those truths when revealed admit of being philosophically explained and established, and raised from the sphere of faith into that of knowledge.

Rationalism in all its forms proceeds on the ground of Theism, that is, the belief of an extramundane personal God. When, therefore, Monism, which denies all dualism and affirms the identity of God and the world, took possession of the German mind, Rationalism, in its old form, disappeared. There was no longer any room for the distinction between reason and God, between the natural and the supernatural. No class of men, therefore, are more contemptuous in their opposition to the Rationalists, than the advocates of the modern, or, as it perhaps may be more properly designated, the modern pantheistic philosophy of Germany.

Although in a measure banished from its recent home, it continues to prevail in all its forms, variously modified, both in Europe and America. Mansel, in his "Limits of Religious Thought,"¹ includes under the head of Rationalism every system which makes the final test of truth to be "the direct assent of the human consciousness, whether in the form of logical deduction, or moral judgment, or religious intuition, by whatever previous process these faculties may have been raised to their assumed dignity as arbiters." This, however, would include systems radically different in their nature.

§ 2. Deistical Rationalism.

A. Possibility of a Supernatural Revelation.

The first point to be determined in the controversy with the Deistical Rationalists, concerns the possibility of a supernatural revelation. This they commonly deny, either on philosophical or moral grounds. It is said to be inconsistent with the nature of God, and with his relation to the world, to suppose that He interferes by his direct agency in the course of events. The true theory of the universe, according to their doctrine, is that God having created the world and endowed his creatures with their attributes and properties, He has done all that is consistent with his nature. He does not interfere by his immediate agency in the production of effects. These belong to the efficiency of second causes. Or if the metaphysical possibility of such intervention be admitted, it is nevertheless morally impossible, because it would imply imperfection in God. If his work needs his constant interference it must be imperfect, and if imperfect, it must be that God is deficient either in wisdom or power.

That this is a wrong theory of God's relation to the world is manifest. (1.) Because it contradicts the testimony of our moral nature. The relation in which we stand to God, as that relation reveals itself in our consciousness, implies that we are constantly in the presence of a God who takes cognizance of our acts, orders our circumstances, and interferes constantly for our correction or protection. He is not to us a God afar off, with whom we have no immediate concern; but a God who is not far from any one of us, in whom we live, move, and have our being, who numbers the hairs of our head, and without whose notice a sparrow does not fall to the ground. (2.) Reason itself teaches that the conception of God as a ruler of the world, having his creatures in his hands, able to control them at pleasure, and to hold communion with them, is a far higher conception and more consistent with the idea of infinite perfection, than that on which this system of Rationalism is founded. (3.) The common consciousness of men is opposed to this doctrine, as is plain from the fact that all nations, the most cultivated and the most barbarous, have been forced to conceive of God as a Being able to take cognizance of human affairs, and to reveal himself to his creatures. (4.) The argument from Scripture, although not admitted by Rationalists, is for Christians conclusive. The Bible reveals a God who is constantly and everywhere present with his works, and who acts upon them, not only mediately, but immediately, when, where, and how He sees fit.

¹ Page 47, edit. Boston, 1859.

B. Necessity of a Supernatural Revelation.

Admitting, however, the metaphysical possibility of a supernatural revelation, the next question is whether such a revelation is necessary. This question must be answered in the affirmative. (1.) Because every man feels that he needs it. He knows that there are questions concerning the origin, nature, and destiny of man; concerning sin, and the method in which it can be pardoned and conquered, which he cannot answer. They are questions, however, which must be answered. So long as these problems are unsolved, no man can be either good or happy. (2.) He is equally certain that no man answers these questions for his fellow-men. Every one sees intuitively that they relate to matters beyond the reach of human reason. What can reason decide as to the fate of the soul after death? Can he who has been unable to make himself holy or happy here, secure his own well-being in the eternal future? Every man, without a supernatural revelation, no matter how much of a philosopher, knows that death is the entrance on the unknown. It is the gate into darkness. Men must enter that gate conscious that they have within them an imperishable life combined with all the elements of perdition. Is it not self-evident then that immortal sinners need some one to answer with authority the question, What must I do to be saved? To convince a man that there is no sin, and that sin does not involve misery, is as impossible as to convince a wretch that he is not unhappy. The necessity of a divine revelation, therefore, is a simple matter of fact, of which every man is in his heart convinced. (3.) Admitting that philosophers could solve these great problems to their own satisfaction, What is to become of the mass of mankind? Are they to be left in darkness and despair? (4.) The experience of ages proves that the world by wisdom knows not God. The heathen nations, ancient and modern, civilized and savage, have without exception, failed by the light of nature to solve any of the great problems of humanity. This is the testimony of history as well as of Scripture. (5.) Even where the light of revelation is enjoyed, it is found that those who reject its guidance, are led not only to the most contradictory conclusions, but to the adoption of principles, in most cases, destructive of domestic virtue, social order, and individual worth and happiness. The reason of man has led the great body of those who know no other guide, into what has been well called, "The Hell of Pantheism."

C. The Scriptures contain such a Revelation.

Admitting the possibility and even the necessity of a supernatural revelation, Has such a revelation been actually made? This the Deistical Rationalist denies, and the Christian affirms. He confidently refers to the Bible as containing such a revelation, and maintains that its claims are authenticated by an amount of evidence which renders unbelief unreasonable and criminal.

1. In the first place, its authors claim to be the messengers of God, to speak by his authority and in his name, so that what they teach is to be received not on the authority of the writers themselves, nor on the ground of the inherent evidence in the nature of the truths communicated, but upon the authority of God. It is He who affirms what the sacred writers teach. This claim must be admitted, or the sacred writers must be regarded as fanatics or impostors. It is absolutely certain that they were neither. It would be no more irrational to pronounce Homer and Newton idiots, than to set down Isaiah and Paul as either impostors or fanatics. It is as certain as any self-evident truth, that they were wise, good, sober-minded men. That such men should falsely assume to be the authoritative messengers of God, and to be endowed with supernatural powers in confirmation of their mission, is a contradiction. It is to affirm that wise and good men are foolish and wicked.

2. The Bible contains nothing inconsistent with the claim of its authors to divine authority as teachers. It contains nothing impossible, nothing absurd, nothing immoral, nothing inconsistent with any well-authenticated truth. This itself is well-nigh miraculous, considering the circumstances under which the different portions of the Scriptures were written.

3. More than this, the Bible reveals truths of the highest order, not elsewhere made known. Truths which meet the most urgent necessities of our nature; which solve the problems which reason has never been able to solve. It recognizes and authenticates all the facts of consciousness, all the truths which our moral and religious nature involve, and which we recognize as true as soon as they are presented. It has the same adaptation to the soul that the atmosphere has to the lungs, or the solar influences to the earth on which we live. And what the earth would be without those influences, is, in point of fact, what the soul is without knowledge of the truths which we derive solely from the Bible.

4. The several books of which the Scriptures are composed were written by some fifty different authors living in the course of fifteen hundred years; and yet they are found to be an organic whole, the product of one mind. They are as clearly a development as the oak from the acorn. The gospels and epistles are but the expansion, fulfillment, the culmination of the protevangelium, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," as uttered to our first parents (Gen. iii. 15). All that intervenes is to the New Testament what the roots, stem, branches, and foliage of the tree are to the fruit. No one book of Scripture can be understood by itself, any more than any one part of a tree or member of the body can be understood without reference to the whole of which it is a part. Those who from want of attention do not perceive this organic relation of the different parts of the Bible, cannot appreciate the argument thence derived in favor of its divine origin. They who do perceive it, cannot resist it.

Argument from Prophecy.

5. God bears witness to the divine authority of the Scriptures by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost. The leading events recorded in the New Testament were predicted in the Old. Of this any man may satisfy himself by a comparison of the two. The coincidence between the prophecies and the fulfillment admits of no rational solution, except that the Bible is the work of God; or, that holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. The miracles recorded in the Scriptures are historical events, which are not only entitled to be received on the same testimony which authenticates other facts of history, but they are so implicated with the whole structure of the New Testament, that they cannot be denied without rejecting the whole gospel, which rejection involves the denial of the best authenticated facts in the history of the world.

Argument from the Effects of the Gospel.

Besides this external supernatural testimony, the Bible is everywhere attended by "the demonstration of the Spirit," which gives to its doctrines the clearness of self-evident truths, and the authority of the voice of God; analogous to the authority of the moral law for the natural conscience.

6. The Bible ever has been and still is, a power in the world. It has determined the course of history. It has overthrown false religion wherever it is known. It is the parent of modern civilization. It is the only guarantee of social order, of virtue, and of human rights and liberty. Its effects cannot be rationally accounted for upon any other hypothesis than that it is what it claims to be, "The Word of God."

7. It makes known the person, work, the acts, and words of Christ, who is the clearest revelation of God ever made to man. He is the manifested God. His words were the words of God. His acts were the acts of God. His voice is the voice of God, and He said, "The Scripture cannot be broken" (John x. 35). If any man refuse to recognize him as the Son of God, as the infallible teacher, and only Saviour of men, nothing can be said save what the Apostle says, "If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them. For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." (2 Cor. iv. 3, 4, 6.)

Deistical Rationalism is in Germany sometimes called Naturalism, as distinguished from Supernaturalism; as the former denies, and the latter affirms, an agency or operation above nature in the conduct of events in this world. More commonly, however, by Naturalism is meant the theory which denies the existence of any higher power than nature, and therefore is only another name for atheism. It is, consequently, not a proper designation of a system which assumes the existence of a personal God.

§ 3. The Second Form of Rationalism.A. Its Nature.

The more common form of Rationalism admits that the Scriptures contain a supernatural revelation. It teaches, however, that the object of that revelation is to make more generally known, and to authenticate for the masses, the truths of reason, or doctrines of natural religion. These doctrines are received by cultivated minds not on the ground of authority, but of rational evidence. The fundamental principle of this class of Rationalists is, that nothing can be rationally believed which is not understood. "Nil credi posse, quod a ratione capi et intelligi nequeat." If asked, Why he believes in the immortality of the soul? the Rationalist answers, Because the doctrine is reasonable. To his mind, the arguments in its favor outweigh those against it. If asked, Why he does not believe the doctrine of the Trinity? he answers, Because it is unreasonable. The philosophical arguments against it outweigh the arguments from reason, in its favor. That the sacred writers teach the doctrine is not decisive. The Rationalist does not feel bound to believe all that the sacred writers teach. The Bible, he admits, contains a Divine revelation. But this revelation was made to fallible men, men under no supernatural guidance in communicating the truths revealed. They were men whose mode of thinking, and manner of arguing, and of presenting truth, were modified by their culture, and by the modes of thought prevailing during the age in which they lived. The Scriptures, therefore, abound with misapprehensions, with inconclusive arguments, and accommodations to Jewish errors, superstitions, and popular beliefs. It is the office of reason to sift these incongruous materials, and separate the wheat from the chaff. That is wheat which reason apprehends in its own light to be true; that is to be rejected as chaff which reason cannot understand, and cannot prove to be true. That is, nothing is true to us which we do not see for ourselves to be true.

B. Refutation.

It is sufficient to remark on this form of Rationalism, —

1. That it is founded upon a false principle. It is not necessary to the rational exercise of faith that we should understand the truth believed. The unknown and the impossible cannot be believed; but every man does, and must believe the incomprehensible. Assent to truth is founded on evidence. That evidence may be external or intrinsic. Some things we believe on the testimony of our senses; other things we believe on the testimony of men. Why, then, may we not believe on the testimony of God? A man may believe that paper thrown upon fire will burn, although he does not understand the process of combustion. All men believe that plants grow, and that like begets like; but no man understands the mystery of reproduction. Even the Positivist who would reduce all belief to zero, is obliged to admit the incomprehensible to be true. And those who will believe neither in God nor spirit because they are invisible and intangible, say that all we know is the unknowable, — we know only force, — but of force we know nothing but that it is, and that it persists. If, therefore, the incomprehensible must be believed in every other department of knowledge, no rational ground can be given why it should be banished from religion.

2. Rationalism assumes that the human intelligence is the measure of all truth. This is an insane presumption on the part of such a creature as man. If a child believes with implicit confidence what it cannot understand, on the testimony of a parent, surely man may believe what he cannot understand, on the testimony of God.

3. Rationalism destroys the distinction between faith and knowledge, which all men and all ages admit. Faith is assent to truth founded on testimony, "credo quod non video." Knowledge is assent founded on the direct or indirect, the intuitive or discursive, apprehension of its object. If there can be no rational faith, if we are to receive as true only what we know and understand, the whole world is beggared. It loses all that sustains, beautifies, and ennobles life.

4. The poor cannot be Rationalists. If we must understand what we believe, even on the principles of the Rationalists, only philosophers can be religious. They alone can comprehend the rational grounds on which the great truths of even natural religion are to be received. Widespread, therefore, as has been the influence of a Rationalistic spirit, it has never taken hold of the people; it has never controlled the creed of any church; because all religion is founded on the incomprehensible and the infinite.

5. The protest, therefore, which our religious nature makes against the narrow, cold, and barren system of Rationalism, is a sufficient proof that it cannot be true, because it cannot meet our most urgent necessities. The object of worship must be infinite, and of necessity incomprehensible.

6. Faith implies knowledge. And if we must understand in order to know, faith and knowledge become alike impossible. The principle, therefore, on which Rationalism is founded, leads to Nihilism, or universal negation. Even the latest form of philosophy, taking the lowest possible ground as to religious faith, admits that we are surrounded on every side by the incomprehensible.

Herbert Spencer, in his "First Principles of a New Philosophy," asserts, p. 45, "the omnipresence of something which passes comprehension." He declares that the ultimate truth in which all forms of religion agree, and in which religion and science are in harmony, is, "That the Power which the universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable."¹ The inscrutable, the incomprehensible, what we cannot understand, must therefore of necessity be rationally the object of faith. And consequently reason, rational demonstration, or philosophical proof is not the ground of faith. We may rationally believe what we cannot understand. We may be assured of truths which are encompassed with objections which we cannot satisfactorily answer.

C. History.

The modern form of Deistic Rationalism had its rise in England during the latter part of the seventeenth, and the first half of the eighteenth centuries. Lord Herbert, who died as early as 1648, in his work, "De Veritate, prout distinguitur a Revelatione," etc., taught that all religion consists in the acknowledgment of the following truths: 1. The existence of God. 2. The dependence of man on God, and his obligation to reverence him. 3. Piety consists in the harmony of the human faculties. 4. The essential difference between good and evil. 5. A future state of rewards and punishment. These he held to be intuitive truths, needing no proof, and virtually believed by all men. This may be considered as the confession of Faith of all Deists, and even of those Rationalists who admit a supernatural revelation; for such revelation, they maintain, can only authenticate what reason itself teaches. Other writers quickly followed in the course opened by Lord Herbert; as, Toland in his "Christianity without Mystery," 1696, a work which excited great attention, and drew out numerous refutations. Toland ended by avowing himself a Pantheist. Hobbes was a Materialist. Lord Shaftesbury, who died 1773, in his "Characteristics," "Miscellaneous Treatises," and "Moralist," made ridicule the test of truth. He declared revelation and inspiration to be fanaticism. Collins (died 1729) was a more serious writer. His principal works were, "An Essay on Free-thinking," and "The Grounds and Reasons of Christianity." Lord Bolingbroke, Secretary of State under Queen Anne, "Letters on the Study and Utility of History." Matthew Tindal, "Christianity as Old as the Creation." Tindal, instead of attacking Christianity in detail, attempted to construct a regular system of Deism. He maintained that God could not intend that men should ever be without a religion adequate to all their necessities, and therefore that a revelation can only make known what every man has in his own reason. This internal and universal revelation contains the two truths: 1. The existence of God. 2. That God created man not for his own sake, but for man's. By far the most able and influential of the writers of this class was David Hume. His "Essays" in four volumes contain his theological views. The most important of these are those on the Natural History of Religion, and on Miracles. His "Dialogues on Natural Religion" is regarded as the ablest work ever written in support of the Deistical, or rather, Atheistical system.

¹ First Principles of a New Philosophy, p. 46.

From England the spirit of infidelity extended into France. Voltaire, Rousseau, La Mettrie, Holbach, D'Alembert, Diderot, and others, succeeded for a time in overthrowing all religious faith in the governing classes of society.

Rationalism in Germany.

In Germany the Rationalistic defection began with such men as Baumgarten, Ernesti, and John David Michaelis, who did not deny the divine authority of the Scriptures, but explained away their doctrines. These were followed by such men as Senler, Morus, and Eichhorn, who were thoroughly neological. During the latter part of the last, and first part of the present century, most of the leading church historians, exegetes, and theologians of Germany, were Rationalists. The first serious blow given to their system was by Kant. The Rationalists assumed that they were able to demonstrate the truths of natural religion on the principles of reason. Kant, in his "Critique of Pure Reason," undertook to show that reason is incompetent to prove any religious truth. The only foundation for religion he maintained was our moral consciousness. That consciousness involved or implied the three great doctrines of God, liberty, and immortality. His successors, Fichte and Schelling, carried out the principles which Kant adopted to prove that the outward world is an unknown something, to show that there was no such world; that there was no real distinction between the ego and non-ego, the subjective and objective; that both are modes of the manifestation of the absolute. Thus all things were merged into one. This idealistic Pantheism having displaced Rationalism, has already yielded the philosophic throne to a subtle form of Materialism.

Bretschneider's "Entwicklung aller in der Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe," gives a list of fifty-two works on the rationalistic controversy in Germany. The English books written against the Rationalists or Deists of Great Britain, and on the proper office of reason in matters of religion, are scarcely less numerous. Some of the more important of these works are the following: "Boyle on Things above Reason," Butler's "Analogy of Religion and Nature," Conybeare's "Defence of Religion," "Hulsean Lectures," Jackson's "Examination," "Jew's Letters to Voltaire," Lardner's "Credibility of the Gospel History," Leland's "Advantage and Necessity of Revelation," Leslie's "Short and Easy Method with Deists," Warburton's "View of Bolingbroke's Philosophy," and his "Divine Legation of Moses," John Wilson's "Dissertation on Christianity," etc., etc. See Ständlin's "Geschichte des Rationalismus," and a concise and instructive history of theology during the eighteenth century, by Dr. Tholuck in "Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review" for 1828. Leibnitz's "Discours de la Conformité de la Foi avec la Raison," in the Preface to his "Théodicée," and Mansel's "Limits of Religious Thought," deserve the careful perusal of the theological student. The most recent works on this general subject are Lecky's "History of Rationalism in Europe," and "History of Rationalism, embracing a survey of the present state of Protestant Theology," by Rev. John F. Hurst, A.M. The latter is the most instructive publication in the English language on modern skepticism.

§ 4. Dogmatism, or the Third Form of Rationalism.

A. Meaning of the Term.

It was a common objection made in the early age of the Church against Christianity, by the philosophical Greeks, that its doctrines were received upon authority, and not upon rational evidence. Many of the Fathers, specially those of the Alexandrian school, answered that this was true only of the common people. They could not be expected to understand philosophy. They could receive the high spiritual truths of religion only on the ground of authority. But the educated classes were able and were bound to search after the philosophical or rational evidence of the doctrines taught in the Bible, and to receive those doctrines on the ground of that evidence. They made a distinction, therefore, between πίστις and γινῶσις, faith and knowledge. The former was for the common people, the latter for the cultivated. The objects of faith were the doctrinal statements of the Bible in the form in which they are there presented. The ground of faith is simply the testimony of the Scriptures as the Word of God. The objects of knowledge were the speculative or philosophical ideas which underlie the doctrines of the Bible, and the ground on which those ideas or truths are received and incorporated in our system of knowledge, is their own inherent evidence. They are seen to be true by the light of reason. Faith is thus elevated into knowledge, and Christianity exalted into a philosophy. This method was carried out by the Platonizing fathers, and continued to prevail to a great extent among the schoolmen. During the Middle Ages the authority of the Church was paramount, and the freest thinkers did not venture openly to impugn the doctrines which the Church had sanctioned. For the most part they contented themselves with philosophizing about those doctrines, and endeavoring to show that they admitted of a philosophical explanation and proof.

Wolfianism.

As remarked in the preceding chapter, this method was revived and extensively propagated by Wolf (1679-1754, Professor at Halle and Marburg). His principal works were "Theologia Naturalis," 1736, "Philos. Practicæ Universalis," 1738, "Philos. Moralis s. Ethica," 1750, "Vernünfftige Gedanken von Gott, der Welt und der Seele des Menschen, auch allen Dingen überhaupt," 1720. Wolf unduly exalted the importance of natural religion. Although he admitted that the Scriptures revealed doctrines undiscoverable by the unassisted reason of man, he yet insisted that all doctrines, in order to be rationally received as true, should be capable of demonstration on the principles of reason. "He maintained," says Mr. Rose (in his "State of Protestantism in Germany," p. 39), "that philosophy was indispensable to religion, and that, together with Biblical proofs, a mathematical or strictly demonstrative dogmatical system, according to the principles of reason, was absolutely necessary. His own works carried this theory into practice, and after the first clamors had subsided, his opinions gained more attention, and it was not long before he had a school of vehement admirers, who far outstripped him in the use of his own principles. We find some of them not content with applying demonstration to the truth of the system, but endeavoring to establish each separate dogma, the Trinity, the nature of the Redeemer, the Incarnation, the eternity of punishment, on philosophical, and strange as it may appear, some of these truths on mathematical grounds." The language of Wolf himself on this subject has already been quoted on page 5. He expressly states that the office of revelation is to supplement natural religion, and to present propositions which the philosopher is bound to demonstrate. By demonstration is not meant the adduction of proof that the proposition is sustained by the Scriptures, but that the doctrine must be admitted as true on the principles of reason. It is philosophical demonstration that is intended. "Theological Dogmatism," says Mansel,¹ "is an application of reason to the support and defense of preëxisting statements of Scripture. . . . Its end is to produce a coincidence between what we believe and what we think; to remove the boundary which separates the comprehensible from the incomprehensible."² It attempts, for example, to demonstrate the doctrine of the Trinity from the nature of an infinite being; the doctrine of the Incarnation from the nature of man and his relation to God, etc. Its grand design is to transmute faith into knowledge, to elevate Christianity as a system of revealed truth into a system of Philosophy.

B. Refutation.

The objections to Dogmatism, as thus understood, are, —

1. That it is essentially Rationalistic. The Rationalist demands philosophical proof of the doctrines which he receives. He is not willing to believe on the simple authority of Scripture. He requires his reason to be satisfied by a demonstration of the truth independent of the Bible. This demand the Dogmatist admits to be reasonable, and he undertakes to furnish the required proof. In this essential point, therefore, in making the reception of Christian doctrine to rest on reason and not on authority, the Dogmatist and the Rationalist are on common ground. For although the former admits a supernatural revelation, and acknowledges that for the common people faith must rest on authority, yet he maintains that the mysteries of religion admit of rational or philosophical demonstration, and that such demonstration cultivated minds have a right to demand.

2. In thus shifting faith from the foundation of divine testimony, and making it rest on rational demonstration, it is removed from the Rock of Ages to a quicksand. There is all the difference between a conviction founded on the well-authenticated testimony of God, and that founded on so-called philosophical demonstration, that there is between God and man, the divine and human. Let any man read the pretended philosophical demonstrations of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the resurrection of the body, or any other of the great truths of the Bible, and he will feel at liberty to receive or to reject it at pleasure. It has no authority or certainty. It is the product of a mind like his own, and therefore can have no more power than belongs to the fallible human intellect.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, p. 47.

² Ibid. p. 50.

3. Dogmatism is, therefore, in its practical effect, destructive of faith. In transmuting Christianity into a philosophy, its whole nature is changed and its power is lost. It takes its place as one of the numberless phases of human speculation, which in the history of human thought succeed each other as the waves of the sea, — no one ever abides.

4. It proceeds on an essentially false principle. It assumes the competency of reason to judge of things entirely beyond its sphere. God has so constituted our nature, that we are authorized and necessitated to confide in the well-authenticated testimony of our senses, within their appropriate sphere. And in like manner, we are constrained to confide in the operation of our minds and in the conclusions to which they lead, within the sphere which God has assigned to human reason. But the senses cannot sit in judgment on rational truths. We cannot study logic with the microscope or scalpel. It is no less irrational to depend upon reason, or demand rational or philosophical demonstration for truths which become the objects of knowledge only as they are revealed. From the nature of the case the truths concerning the creation, the probation, and apostasy of man, the purpose and plan of redemption, the person of Christ, the state of the soul in the future world, the relation of God to his creatures, etc., not depending on general principles of reason, but in great measure on the purposes of an intelligent, personal Being, can be known only so far as He chooses to reveal them, and must be received simply on his authority.

The Testimony of the Scriptures against Dogmatism.

5. The testimony of the Scriptures is decisive on this subject. From the beginning to the end of the Bible the sacred writers present themselves in the character of witnesses. They demand faith in their teachings and obedience to their commands not on the ground of their own superiority in wisdom or excellence; not on the ground of rational demonstration of the truth of what they taught, but simply as the organs of God, as men appointed by Him to reveal his will. Their first and last, and sufficient reason for faith is, "Thus saith the Lord." The New Testament writers, especially, repudiate all claim to the character of philosophers. They taught that the Gospel was not a system of truth derived from reason or sustained by its authority, but by the testimony of God. They expressly assert that its doctrines were matters of revelation, to be received on divine testimony. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him?" (1 Cor. ii. 9-11.) Such being the nature of the Gospel, if received at all it must be received on authority. It was to be believed or taken on trust, not demonstrated as a philosophical system. Nay, the Bible goes still further. It teaches that a man must become a fool in order to be wise; he must renounce dependence upon his own reason or wisdom, in order to receive the wisdom of God. Our Lord told his disciples that unless they were converted and became as little children, they could not enter into the kingdom of God. And the Apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, and in those addressed to the Ephesians and Colossians, that is, when writing to those imbued with the Greek and with the oriental philosophy, made it the indispensable condition of their becoming Christians, that they should renounce philosophy as a guide in matters of religion, and receive the Gospel on the testimony of God. Nothing, therefore, can be more opposed to the whole teaching and spirit of the Bible, than this disposition to insist on philosophical proof of the articles of our faith. Our duty, privilege, and security are in believing, not in knowing; in trusting God, and not our own understanding. They are to be pitied who have no more trustworthy teacher than themselves.

6. The instructions of the Bible on this subject are abundantly confirmed by the lessons of experience. From the time of the Gnostics, and of the Platonizing fathers, the attempt has been made in every age to exalt faith into knowledge, to transmute Christianity into philosophy, by demonstrating its doctrines on the principles of reason. These attempts have always failed. They have all proved ephemeral and wortbless, — each successive theorizer viewing with more or less contempt the speculations of his predecessors, yet each imagining that he has the gifts for comprehending the Almighty.

These attempts are not only abortive, they are always evil in their effects upon their authors and upon all who are influenced by them. So far as they succeed to the satisfaction of those who make them, they change the relation of the soul to the truth, and, of course, to God. The reception of the truth is not an act of faith, or of trust in God; but of confidence in our own speculations. Self is substituted for God as the ground of confidence. The man's whole inward state is thereby changed. History, moreover, proves that Dogmatism is the predecessor of Rationalism. The natural tendency and the actual consequences of the indulgence of a disposition to demand philosophical demonstration for articles of faith, is a state of mind which revolts at authority, and refuses to admit as true what it cannot comprehend and prove. And this state of mind, as it is incompatible with faith, is the parent of unbelief and of all its consequences. There is no safety for us, therefore, but to remain within the limits which God has assigned us. Let us rely on our senses, within the sphere of our sense perceptions; on our reason within the sphere of rational truths; and on God, and God alone, in all that relates to the things of God. He only truly knows, who consents with the docility of a child to be taught of God.

§ 5. Proper Office of Reason in Matters of Religion.

A. Reason Necessary for the Reception of a Revelation.

Christians, in repudiating Rationalism in all its forms, do not reject the service of reason in matters of religion. They acknowledge its high prerogatives, and the responsibility involved in their exercise.

In the first place, reason is necessarily presupposed in every revelation. Revelation is the communication of truth to the mind. But the communication of truth supposes the capacity to receive it. Revelations cannot be made to brutes or to idiots. Truths, to be received as objects of faith, must be intellectually apprehended. A proposition, to which we attach no meaning, however important the truth it may contain, cannot be an object of faith. If it be affirmed that the soul is immortal, or God is a spirit, unless we know the meaning of the words nothing is communicated to the mind, and the mind can affirm or deny nothing on the subject. In other words, knowledge is essential to faith. In believing we affirm the truth of the proposition believed. But we can affirm nothing of that of which we know nothing. The first and indispensable office of reason, therefore, in matters of faith, is the cognition, or intelligent apprehension of the truths proposed for our reception. This is what theologians are accustomed to call the usus organicus, seu, instrumentalis, rationis. About this there can be no dispute.

Difference between Knowing and Understanding.

It is important, however, to bear in mind the difference between knowing and understanding, or comprehending. A child knows what the words "God is a spirit" mean. No created being can comprehend the Almighty unto perfection. We must know the plan of salvation; but no one can comprehend its mysteries. This distinction is recognized in every department. Men know unspeakably more than they understand. We know that plants grow; that the will controls our voluntary muscles; that Jesus Christ is God and man in two distinct natures, and one person forever; but here as everywhere we are surrounded by the incomprehensible. We can rationally believe that a thing is, without knowing how or why it is. It is enough for the true dignity of man as a rational creature, that he is not called upon by his Creator to believe without knowledge, to receive as true propositions which convey no meaning to the mind. This would be not only irrational, but impossible.

B. Reason must judge of the Credibility of a Revelation.

In the second place, it is the prerogative of reason to judge of the credibility of a revelation. The word "credibile" is sometimes popularly used to mean, easy of belief, i. e., probable. In its proper sense, it is antithetical to incredible. The incredible is that which cannot be believed. The credible is that which can be believed. Nothing is incredible but the impossible. What may be, may be rationally (i. e., on adequate grounds) believed.

A thing may be strange, unaccountable, unintelligible, and yet perfectly credible. What is strange or unaccountable to one mind, may be perfectly familiar and plain to another. For the most limited intellect or experience to make itself the standard of the possible and true, would be as absurd as a man's making his visible horizon the limit of space. Unless a man is willing to believe the incomprehensible, he can believe nothing, and must dwell forever in utter darkness. The most skeptical form of modern philosophy, which reduces faith and knowledge to a minimum, teaches that the incomprehensible is all we know, namely, that force is, and that it is persistent. It is most unreasonable, therefore, to urge as an objection to Christianity that it demands faith in the incomprehensible.

The Impossible cannot be believed.

While this is true and plain, it is no less true that the impossible is incredible, and therefore cannot be an object of faith. Christians concede to reason the judicium contradictionis, that is, the prerogative of deciding whether a thing is possible or impossible. If it is seen to be impossible, no authority, and no amount or kind of evidence can impose the obligation to receive it as true. Whether, however, a thing be possible or not, is not to be arbitrarily determined. Men are prone to pronounce everything impossible which contradicts their settled convictions, their preconceptions or prejudices, or which is repugnant to their feelings. Men in former times did not hesitate to say that it is impossible that the earth should turn round on its axis and move through space with incredible rapidity, and yet we not perceive it. It was pronounced absolutely impossible that information should be transmitted thousands of miles in the fraction of a second. Of course it would be folly to reject all evidence of such facts as these on the ground of their being impossible. It is no less unreasonable for men to reject the truths of revelation on the assumption that they involve the impossible, when they contradict our previous convictions, or when we cannot see how they can be. Men say that it is impossible that the same person can be both God and man; and yet they admit that man is at once material and immaterial, mortal and immortal, angel and animal. The impossible cannot be true; but reason in pronouncing a thing impossible must act rationally and not capriciously. Its judgments must be guided by principles which commend themselves to the common consciousness of men. Such principles are the following: —

What is Impossible.

(1.) That is impossible which involves a contradiction; as, that a thing is and is not; that right is wrong, and wrong right. (2.) It is impossible that God should do, approve, or command what is morally wrong. (3.) It is impossible that He should require us to believe what contradicts any of the laws of belief which He has impressed upon our nature. (4.) It is impossible that one truth should contradict another. It is impossible, therefore, that God should reveal anything as true which contradicts any well authenticated truth, whether of intuition, experience, or previous revelation.

Men may abuse this prerogative of reason, as they abuse their free agency. But the prerogative itself is not to be denied. We have a right to reject as untrue whatever it is impossible that God should require us to believe. He can no more require us to believe what is absurd than to do what is wrong.

Proof of this Prerogative of Reason.

1. That reason has the prerogative of the judicium contradictionis, is plain, in the first place, from the very nature of the case. Faith includes an affirmation of the mind that a thing is true. But it is a contradiction to say that the mind can affirm that to be true which it sees cannot by possibility be true. This would be to affirm and deny, to believe and disbelieve, at the same time. From the very constitution of our nature, therefore, we are forbidden to believe the impossible. We are, consequently, not only authorized, but required to pronounce anathema an apostle or angel from heaven, who should call upon us to receive as a revelation from God anything absurd, or wicked, or inconsistent with the intellectual or moral nature with which He has endowed us. The subjection of the human intelligence to God is indeed absolute; but it is a subjection to infinite wisdom and goodness. As it is impossible that God should contradict himself, so it is impossible that He should, by an external revelation, declare that to be true which by the laws of our nature He has rendered it impossible we should believe.

2. This prerogative of reason is constantly recognized in Scripture. The prophets called upon the people to reject the doctrines of the heathen, because they could not be true. They could not be true because they involved contradictions and absurdities; because they were in contradiction to our moral nature, and inconsistent with known truths. Moses taught that nothing was to be believed, no matter what amount of external evidence should be adduced in its support, which contradicted a previous, duly authenticated revelation from God. Paul does the same thing when he calls upon us to pronounce even an angel accursed, who should teach another gospel. He recognized the paramount authority of the intuitive judgments of the mind. He says that the damnation of any man is just who calls upon us to believe that right is wrong, or that men should do evil that good may come.

3. The ultimate ground of faith and knowledge is confidence in God. We can neither believe nor know anything unless we confide in those laws of belief which God has implanted in our nature. If we can be required to believe what contradicts those laws, then the foundations are broken up. All distinction between truth and falsehood, between right and wrong, would disappear. All our ideas of God and virtue would be confounded, and we should become the victims of every adroit deceiver, or minister of Satan, who, by lying wonders, should call upon us to believe a lie. We are to try the spirits. But how can we try them without a standard? and what other standard can there be, except the laws of our nature and the authenticated revelations of God.

C. Reason must judge of the Evidences of a Revelation.

In the third place, reason must judge of the evidence by which a revelation is supported.

On this point it may be remarked, —

1. That as faith involves assent, and assent is conviction produced by evidence, it follows that faith without evidence is either irrational or impossible.

2. This evidence must be appropriate to the nature of the truth believed. Historical truth requires historical evidence; empirical truths the testimony of experience; mathematical truth, mathematical evidence; moral truth, moral evidence; and “the things of the Spirit,” the demonstration of the Spirit. In many cases different kinds of evidence concur in the support of the same truth. That Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, for example, is sustained by evidence, historical, moral, and spiritual, so abundant that our Lord says of those who reject it, that the wrath of God abideth on them.

3. Evidence must be not only appropriate, but adequate. That is, such as to command assent in every well-constituted mind to which it is presented.

As we cannot believe without evidence, and as that evidence must be appropriate and adequate, it is clearly a prerogative of reason to judge of these several points. This is plain.

1. From the nature of faith, which is not a blind, irrational assent, but an intelligent reception of the truth on adequate grounds.

2. The Scriptures never demand faith except on the ground of adequate evidence. “If I had not done among them,” says our Lord, “the works which none other man did, they had not had sin” (John xv. 24); clearly recognizing the principle that faith cannot be required without evidence. The Apostle Paul proves that the heathen are justly liable to condemnation for their idolatry and immorality, because such a revelation of the true God and of the moral law had been made to them, as to leave them without excuse.

3. The Bible regards unbelief as a sin, and the great sin for which men will be condemned at the bar of God. This presumes that unbelief cannot arise from the want of appropriate and adequate evidence, but is to be referred to the wicked rejection of the truth notwithstanding the proof by which it is attended. The popular misconception that men are not responsible for their faith, arises from a confusion of ideas. It is true that men are not blameworthy for not believing in speculative truths, when the cause of their unbelief is ignorance of the fact or of its evidence. It is no sin not to believe that the earth moves round the sun, if one be ignorant of the fact or of the evidence of its truth. But wherever unbelief arises from an evil heart, then it involves all the guilt which belongs to the cause whence it springs. If the wicked hate the good and believe them to be as wicked as themselves, this is only a proof of their wickedness. If a man does not believe in the moral law; if he holds that might is right, that the strong may rob, murder, or oppress the weak, as some philosophers teach, or if he disbelieve in the existence of God, then it is evident to men and angels that he has been given up to a reprobate mind. There is an evidence of beauty to which nothing but want of taste can render one insensible; there is evidence of moral excellence to which nothing but an evil heart can render us blind. Why did the Jews reject Christ, notwithstanding all the evidence presented in his character, in his words, and in his works, that he was the Son of God? "He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God." (John iii. 18.) The fact, however, that unbelief is a great sin, and the special ground of the condemnation of men, of necessity supposes that it is inexcusable, that it does not arise from ignorance or want of evidence. "How shall they believe," asks the Apostle, "in him of whom they have not heard." (Rom. x. 14.) And our Lord says, "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." (John iii. 19.)

4. Another evidence that the Scriptures recognize the necessity of evidence in order to faith, and the right of those to whom a revelation is addressed to judge of that evidence, is found in the frequent command to consider, to examine, to try the spirits, i. e., those who claim to be the organs of the Spirit of God. The duty of judging is enjoined, and the standard of judgment is given. And then men are held responsible for their decision.

Christians, therefore, concede to reason all the prerogatives it can rightfully claim. God requires nothing irrational of his rational creatures. He does not require faith without knowledge, nor faith in the impossible, nor faith without evidence. Christianity is equally opposed to superstition and Rationalism. The one is faith without appropriate evidence, the other refuses to believe what it does not understand, in despite of evidence which should command belief. The Christian, conscious of his imbecility as a creature, and his ignorance and blindness as a sinner, places himself before God, in the posture of a child, and receives as true everything which a God of infinite intelligence and goodness declares to be worthy of confidence. And in thus submitting to be taught, he acts on the highest principles of reason.

§ 6. Relation of Philosophy and Revelation.

Cicero¹ defines philosophy as “Rerum divinarum et humanarum, causarumque quibus hæ res continentur, scientia.” Peemans² says, “Philosophia est scientia rerum per causas primas, recto rationis usu comparata.” Or, as Ferrier³ more concisely expresses it, “Philosophy is the attainment of truth by the way of reason.” These and other definitions are to be found in Fleming’s “Vocabulary of Philosophy.”

There is, however, a philosophia prima, or first philosophy, which is concerned not so much with what is to be known, as with the faculty of knowledge, which examines the cognitive faculty, determines its laws and its limits. It is the philosophy of philosophy.

Whether we take the word to mean the knowledge of God and nature attained by reason, or the principles which should guide all efforts for the attainment of knowledge, the word is intended to cover the whole domain of human intelligence. Popularly, we distinguish between philosophy and science; the former having for its sphere the spiritual, the latter, the material. Commonly, philosophy is understood as comprising both departments. Hence we speak of natural philosophy as well as of the philosophy of mind. Such being the compass of the domain which philosophers claim as their own, the proper relation between philosophy and theology becomes a question of vital importance. This is, indeed, the great question at issue in the Rationalistic controversy; and therefore, at the conclusion of this chapter, all that remains to be done is to give a concise statement of familiar principles.

¹ De Officiis, lib. ii, c. 2.

² Introd. ad Philosophiam, sect. 107.

³ Inst. of Metaphys. p. 2.

Philosophy and Theology occupy Common Ground.

1. Philosophy and Theology occupy common ground. Both assume to teach what is true concerning God, man, the world, and the relation in which God stands to his creatures.

2. While their objects are so far identical, both striving to attain a knowledge of the same truths, their methods are essentially different. Philosophy seeks to attain knowledge by speculation and induction, or by the exercise of our own intellectual faculties. Theology relies upon authority, receiving as truth whatever God in his Word has revealed.

3. Both these methods are legitimate. Christians do not deny that our senses and reason are reliable informants; that they enable us to arrive at certainty as to what lies within their sphere.

4. God is the author of our nature and the maker of heaven and earth, therefore nothing which the laws of our nature or the facts of the external world prove to be true, can contradict the teaching of God's Word. Neither can the Scriptures contradict the truths of philosophy or science.

Philosophers and Theologians should Strive after Unity.

5. As these two great sources of knowledge must be consistent in their valid teachings, it is the duty of all parties to endeavor to exhibit that consistency. Philosophers should not ignore the teachings of the Bible, and theologians should not ignore the teachings of science. Much less should either class needlessly come into collision with the other. It is unreasonable and irreligious for philosophers to adopt and promulgate theories inconsistent with the facts of the Bible, when those theories are sustained by only plausible evidence, which does not command the assent even of the body of scientific men themselves. On the other hand, it is unwise for theologians to insist on an interpretation of Scripture which brings it into collision with the facts of science. Both of these mistakes are often made. The Bible, for example, clearly teaches the unity of the existing races of men, both as to origin and species. Many Naturalists, however, insist that they are diverse, some say, both in origin and kind, and others, in origin if not in species. This is done not only on merely plausible evidence, being one of several possible ways of accounting for acknowledged diversities, but in opposition to the most decisive proof to the contrary. This proof, so far as it is historical and philological, does not fall within the sphere of natural science, and therefore the mere Naturalist disre-gards it. Comparative philologists hold up their hands at the obtuseness of men of science, who maintain that races have had different origins, whose languages render it clear to demonstration that they have been derived from a common stock. Considering the overwhelming weight of evidence of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and the unspeakable importance of that authority being maintained over the minds and hearts of men, it evinces fearful recklessness on the part of those who wantonly impugn its teachings. On the other hand, it is unwise in theologians to array themselves needlessly against the teachings of science. Romanists and Protestants vainly resisted the adoption of the Copernican theory of our solar system. They interpreted the Bible in a sense contradictory to that theory. So far as in them lay, they staked the authority of the Bible on the correctness of their interpretation. The theory proved to be true, and the received interpretation had to be given up. The Bible, however, has received no injury, although theologians have been taught an important lesson; that is, to let science take its course, assured that the Scriptures will accommodate themselves to all well-authenticated scientific facts in time to come, as they have in time past.

The Authority of Facts.

6. The relation between Revelation and Philosophy (taking the word in its restricted sense) is different from that between Revelation and Science. Or, to express the same idea in different words, the relation between revelation and facts is one thing; and the relation between revelation and theories another thing. Facts do not admit of denial. They are determined by the wisdom and will of God. To deny facts, is to deny what God affirms to be true. This the Bible cannot do. It cannot contradict God. The theologian, therefore, acknowledges that the Scriptures must be interpreted in accordance with established facts. He has a right, however, to demand that those facts should be verified beyond the possibility of doubt. Scientific men in one age or country affirm the truth of facts, which others deny or disprove. It would be a lamentable spectacle to see the Church changing its doctrines, or its interpretation of Scripture, to suit the constantly changing representations of scientific men as to matters of fact.

While acknowledging their obligation to admit undeniable facts, theologians are at liberty to receive or reject the theories deduced from those facts. Such theories are human speculations, and can have no higher authority than their own inherent probability.

The facts of light, electricity, magnetism, are permanent. The theories concerning them are constantly changing. The facts of geology are to be admitted; the theories of geologists have no coercive authority. The facts of physiology and comparative anatomy may be received; but no man is bound to receive any of the various conflicting theories of development. Obvious as this distinction between facts and theories is, it is nevertheless often disregarded. Scientific men are disposed to demand for their theories, the authority due only to established facts. And theologians, because at liberty to reject theories, are sometimes led to assert their independence of facts.

The Authority of the Bible higher than that of Philosophy.

7. Philosophy, in its widest sense, being the conclusions of the human intelligence as to what is true, and the Bible being the declaration of God, as to what is true, it is plain that where the two contradict each other, philosophy must yield to revelation; man must yield to God. It has been admitted that revelation cannot contradict facts; that the Bible must be interpreted in accordance with what God has clearly made known in the constitution of our nature and in the outward world. But the great body of what passes for philosophy or science, is merely human speculation. What is the philosophy of the Orientals, of Brahmins and Buddhists, of the early Gnostics, of the Platonists, of the Scotists in the Middle Ages; of Leibnitz with his monads and preëstablished harmony; of Des Cartes and his vortices; of Kant and his categories; of Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, with their different theories of idealistic pantheism? The answer to that question is, that these systems of philosophy are so many forms of human speculation; and consequently that so far as these speculations agree with the Bible they are true; and so far as they differ from it, they are false and worthless. This is the ground which every believer, learned or unlearned, is authorized and bound to take. If the Bible teaches that God is a person, the philosophy that teaches that an infinite being cannot be a person, is false. If the Bible teaches that God creates, controls, regenerates, the philosophy that forbids the assumption that He acts in time, is to be rejected. If the Bible teaches that the soul exists after the dissolution of the body, the philosophy which teaches that man is only the ephemeral manifestation of a generic life in connection with a given corporeal organization, is to be dismissed without further examination. In short, the Bible teaches certain doctrines concerning the nature of God and his relation to the world; concerning the origin, nature, and destiny of man; concerning the nature of virtue, the ground of moral obligation, human liberty and responsibility; what is the rule of duty, what is right and what is wrong in all our relations to God and to our fellow creatures. These are subjects on which philosophy undertakes to speculate and dogmatize; if in any case these speculations come into conflict with what is taught or necessarily implied in the Bible, they are thereby refuted, as by a reductio ad absurdum. And the disposition which refuses to give up these speculations in obedience to the teaching of the Bible, is inconsistent with Christianity. It is the indispensable condition of salvation through the gospel, that we receive as true whatever God has revealed in his Word. We must make our choice between the wisdom of men and the wisdom of God. The wisdom of men is foolishness with God; and the wisdom of God is foolishness to the wise of this world.

The relation, therefore, between philosophy and revelation, as determined by the Scriptures themselves, is what every right-minded man must approve. Everything is conceded to philosophy and science, which they can rightfully demand. It is admitted that they have a large and important sphere of investigation. It is admitted that within that sphere they are entitled to the greatest deference. It is cheerfully conceded that they have accomplished much, not only as means of mental discipline, but in the enlargement of the sphere of human knowledge, and in promoting the refinement and well-being of men. It is admitted that theologians are not infallible, in the interpretation of Scripture. It may, therefore, happen in the future, as it has in the past, that interpretations of the Bible, long confidently received, must be modified or abandoned, to bring revelation into harmony with what God teaches in his works. This change of view as to the true meaning of the Bible may be a painful trial to the Church, but it does not in the least impair the authority of the Scriptures. They remain infallible; we are merely convicted of having mistaken their meaning.

§ 7. Office of the Senses in Matters of Faith.

The question, What authority is due to the senses in matters of faith, arose out of the controversy between Romanists and Protestants? The doctrine of transubstantiation, as taught by the Romish Church, contradicts the testimony of our senses of sight, taste, and touch. It was natural for Protestants to appeal to this contradiction as decisive evidence against the doctrine. Romanists reply by denying the competency of the senses to bear testimony in such cases.

Protestants maintain the validity of that testimony on the following grounds: (1.) Confidence in the well-authenticated testimony of our senses, is one of those laws of belief which God has impressed upon our nature; from the authority of those laws it is impossible that we should emancipate ourselves. (2.) Confidence in our senses is, therefore, one form of confidence in God. It supposes him to have placed us under the necessity of error, to assume that we cannot safely trust the guides in which, by a law of our nature, he constrains us to confide. (3.) All ground of certainty in matters either of faith or knowledge, is destroyed, if confidence in the laws of our nature be abandoned. Nothing is then possible but absolute skepticism. We, in that case, cannot know that we ourselves exist, or that the world exists, or that there is a God, or a moral law, or any responsibility for character or conduct. (4.) All external supernatural revelation is addressed to the senses. Those who heard Christ had to trust to their sense of hearing; those who read the Bible have to trust to their sense of sight; those who receive the testimony of the Church, receive it through their senses. It is suicidal, therefore, in the Romanists to say that the senses are not to be trusted in matters of faith.

All the arguments derived from the false judgments of men when misled by the senses, are answered by the simple statement of the proposition, that the senses are to be trusted only within their legitimate sphere. The eye may indeed deceive us when the conditions of correct vision are not present; but this does not prove that it is not to be trusted within its appropriate limits.

CHAPTER IV.

MYSTICISM.

§ 1. Meaning of the Words Enthusiasm and Mysticism.

IN the popular sense of the word, enthusiasm means a high state of mental excitement. In that state all the powers are exalted, the thoughts become more comprehensive and vivid, the feelings more fervid, and the will more determined. It is in these periods of excitement that the greatest works of genius, whether by poets, painters, or warriors, have been accomplished. The ancients referred this exaltation of the inner man to a divine influence. They regarded persons thus excited as possessed, or having a God within them. Hence they were called enthusiasts (ἐνθεος). In theology, therefore, those who ignore or reject the guidance of the Scriptures, and assume to be led by an inward divine influence into the knowledge and obedience of the truth, are properly called Enthusiasts. This term, however, has been in a great measure superseded by the word Mystics.

Few words indeed have been used in such a vague, indefinite sense as Mysticism. Its etymology does not determine its meaning. A μύστης was one initiated into the knowledge of the Greek mysteries, one to whom secret things had been revealed. Hence in the wide sense of the word, a Mystic is one who claims to see or know what is hidden from other men, whether this knowledge be attained by immediate intuition, or by inward revelation. In most cases these methods were assumed to be identical, as intuition was held to be the immediate vision of God and of divine things. Hence, in the wide sense of the word, Mystics are those who claim to be under the immediate guidance of God or of his Spirit.

A. The Philosophical Use of the Word.

Hence Mysticism, in this sense, includes all those systems of philosophy, which teach either the identity of God and the soul, or the immediate intuition of the infinite. The pantheism of the Brahmins and Buddhists, the theosophy of the Sufis, the Egyptian, and many forms of the Greek philosophy, in this acceptance of the term, are all Mystical. As the same system has been reproduced in modern times, the same designation is applied to the philosophy of Spinoza, and its various modifications. According to Cousin, "Mysticism in philosophy is the belief that God may be known face to face, without anything intermediate. It is a yielding to the sentiment awakened by the idea of the infinite, and a running up of all knowledge and all duty to the contemplation and love of Him."¹

For the same reason the whole Alexandrian school of theology in the early Church has been called Mystical. They characteristically depreciated the outward authority of the Scriptures, and exalted that of the inward light. It is true they called that light reason, but they regarded it as divine. According to the new Platonic doctrine, the Λόγος, or impersonal reason of God, is Reason in man; or as Clemens Alexandrinus said, The Logos was a light common to all men. That, therefore, to which supreme authority was ascribed in the pursuit of truth, was "God within us." This is the doctrine of modern Eclecticism as presented by Cousin. That philosopher says, "Reason is impersonal in its nature. It is not we who make it. It is so far from being individual, that its peculiar characteristics are the opposite of individuality, namely, universality and necessity, since it is to Reason we owe the knowledge of universal and necessary truths, of principles which we all obey, and cannot but obey. . . . It descends from God, and approaches man. It makes its appearance in the consciousness as a guest, who brings intelligence of an unknown world, of which it at once presents the idea and awakens the want. If reason were personal, it would have no value, no authority beyond the limits of the individual subject. . . . Reason is a revelation, a necessary and universal revelation which is wanting to no man, and which enlightens every man on his coming into the world. Reason is the necessary mediator between God and man, the Λόγος of Pythagoras and Plato, the Word made Flesh, which serves as the interpreter of God, and teacher of man, divine and human at the same time. It is not indeed the absolute God in his majestic individuality, but his manifestation in spirit and in truth. It is not the Being of beings, but it is the revealed God of the human race."²

Reason, according to this system, is not a faculty of the human soul, but God in man. As electricity and magnetism are (or used to be) regarded as forces diffused through the material world, so the Λόγος, the divine impersonal reason, is diffused through the world of mind, and reveals itself more or less potentially in the souls of all men. This theory, in one aspect, is a form of Rationalism, as it refers all our higher, and especially our religious knowledge, to a subjective source, which it designates Reason. It has, however, more points of analogy with Mysticism, because, (1.) It assumes that the informing principle, the source of knowledge and guide in duty, is divine, something which does not belong to our nature, but appears as a guest in our consciousness. (2.) The office of this inward principle, or light, is the same in both systems. It is to reveal truth and duty, to elevate and purify the soul. (3.) Its authority is the same; that is, it is paramount if not exclusive. (4.) Its very designations are the same. It is called by philosophers, God, the Λόγος, the Word; by Christians, Christ within us, or, the Spirit. Thus systems apparently the most diverse (Cousin and George Fox!) run into each other, and reveal themselves as reproductions of heathen philosophy, or of the heresies of the early Church.

¹ Fleming's Vocabulary.

² Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature, edited by George Ripley, vol. i.; Philosophical Miscellanies from Cousin, et al., pp. 125, 149.

Although the Alexandrian theologians had these points of agreement with the Mystics, yet as they were speculative in their whole tendency, and strove to transmute Christianity into a philosophy, they are not properly to be regarded as Mystics in the generally received theological meaning of the term.

B. The Sense in which Evangelical Christians are called Mystics.

As all Evangelical Christians admit a supernatural influence of the Spirit of God upon the soul, and recognize a higher form of knowledge, holiness, and fellowship with God, as the effects of that influence, they are stigmatized as Mystics, by those who discard everything supernatural from Christianity. The definitions of Mysticism given by Rationalists are designedly so framed as to include what all evangelical Christians hold to be true concerning the illumination, teaching, and guidance of the Holy Spirit. Thus Wegscheider¹ says, "Mysticismus est persuasio de singulari animæ facultate ad immediatum ipsoque sensu percipiendum cum numine aut naturis coelestibus commercium jam in hac vita perveniendi, quo mens immediate cognitione rerum divinarum ac beatitate perficitur." And Bretschneider² defines Mysticism as a "Belief in a continuous operation of God on the soul, secured by special religious exercise, producing illumination, holiness, and beatitude." Evangelical theologians so far acquiesce in this view, that they say, as Lange,¹ and Nitsch,² "that every true believer is a Mystic." The latter writer adds, "That the Christian ideas of illumination, revelation, incarnation, regeneration, the sacraments and the resurrection, are essentially Mystical elements. As often as the religious and church-life recovers itself from formalism and scholastic barrenness, and is truly revived, it always appears as Mystical, and gives rise to the outcry that Mysticism is gaining the ascendancy." Some writers, indeed, make a distinction between Mystik and Mysticismus. "Die innerliche Lebendigkeit der Religion ist allezeit Mystik" (The inward vitality of religion is ever Mystik), says Nitsch, but "Mysticismus ist eine einseitige Herrschaft und eine Ausartung der mystischen Richtung." That is, Mysticism is an undue and perverted development of the mystical element which belongs to true religion. This distinction, between Mystik and Mysticismus, is not generally recognized, and cannot be well expressed in English. Lange, instead of using different words, speaks of a true and false Mysticism. But different things should be designated by different words. There has been a religious theory, which has more or less extensively prevailed in the Church, which is distinguished from the Scriptural doctrine by unmistakable characteristics, and which is known in church history as Mysticism, and the word should be restricted to that theory. It is the theory, variously modified, that the knowledge, purity, and blessedness to be derived from communion with God, are not to be attained from the Scriptures and the use of the ordinary means of grace, but by a supernatural and immediate divine influence, which influence (or communication of God to the soul) is to be secured by passivity, a simple yielding the soul without thought or effort to the divine influx.

¹ Inst. § 5.

² Systematische Entwicklung, fourth edit. p. 19.

C. The System which makes the Feelings the Source of Knowledge.

A still wider use of the word Mysticism has to some extent been adopted. Any system, whether in philosophy or religion, which assigns more importance to the feelings than to the intellect, is called Mystical. Cousin, and after him, Morell, arrange the systems of philosophy under the heads of Sensationalism, Idealism, Skepticism, and Mysticism. The first makes the senses the exclusive or predominant source of our knowledge; the second, the self, in its constitution and laws, as understood and apprehended by the intellect; and Mysticism, the feelings. The Mystic assumes that the senses and reason are alike untrustworthy and inadequate, as sources of knowledge; that nothing can be received with confidence as truth, at least in the higher departments of knowledge, in all that relates to our own nature, to God, and our relation to Him, except what is revealed either naturally or supernaturally in the feelings. There are two forms of Mysticism, therefore: the one which assumes the feelings themselves to be the sources of this knowledge; the other that it is through the feelings that God makes the truth known to the soul.¹ "Reason is no longer viewed as the great organ of truth; its decisions are constamped as uncertain, faulty, and well-nigh valueless, while the inward impulses of our sensibility, developing themselves in the form of faith or of inspiration, are held up as the true and infallible source of human knowledge. The fundamental process, therefore, of all Mysticism, is to reverse the true order of nature, and give the precedence to the emotional instead of the intellectual element of the human mind."² This is declared to be "the common ground of all Mysticism."

¹ In Herzog's Encyclopädie, art. "Mystik."

² System der Christlichen Lehre, fifth edit. p. 35.

Schleiermacher's Theory.

If this be a correct view of the nature of Mysticism; if it consists in giving predominant authority to the feelings in matters of religion; and if their impulses, developing themselves in the form of faith, are the true and infallible source of knowledge, then Schleiermacher's system, adopted and expounded by Morell himself in his "Philosophy of Religion," is the most elaborate system of theology ever presented to the Church. It is the fundamental principle of Schleiermacher's theory, that religion resides not in the intelligence, or the will or active powers, but in the sensibility. It is a form of feeling, a sense of absolute dependence. Instead of being, as we seem to be, individual, separate free agents, originating our own acts, we recognize ourselves as a part of a great whole, determined in all things by the great whole, of which we are a part. We find ourselves as finite creatures over against an infinite Being, in relation to whom we are as nothing. The Infinite is everything; and everything is only a manifestation of the

¹ See Cousin's Cours de l'Histoire de la Philosophie, and Morell's History of Modern Philosophy, p. 556 ff.

² Morell, p. 560.

Infinite. "Although man," says even Morell, "while in the midst of finite objects, always feels himself to a certain extent free and independent; yet in the presence of that which is self-existent, infinite, and eternal, he may feel the sense of freedom utterly pass away, and become absorbed in the sense of absolute dependence."¹ This is said to be the essential principle of religion in all its forms from Fetichism up to Christianity. It depends mainly on the degree of culture of the individual or community, in what way this sense of dependence shall reveal itself. Because the more enlightened and pure the individual is, the more he will be able to apprehend aright what is involved in this sense of dependence upon God. Revelation is not the communication of new truth to the understanding, but the providential influences by which the religious life is awakened in the soul. Inspiration is not the divine influence which controls the mental operations and utterances of its subject, so as to render him infallible in the communication of the truth revealed, but simply the intuition of eternal verities due to the excited state of the religious feelings. Christianity, subjectively considered, is the intuitions of good men, as occasioned and determined by the appearance of Christ. Objectively considered, or, in other words, Christian theology, it is the logical analysis, and scientific arrangement and elucidation of the truths involved in those intuitions. The Scriptures, as a rule of faith, have no authority. They are of value only as means of awakening in us the religious life experienced by the Apostles, and thus enabling us to attain like intuitions of divine things. The source of our religious life, according to this system, is the feelings, and if this be the characteristic feature of Mysticism, the Schleiermacher doctrine is purely Mystical.

D. Mysticism as known in Church History.

This, however, is not what is meant by Mysticism, as it has appeared in the Christian Church. The Mystics, as already stated, are those who claim an immediate communication of divine knowledge and of divine life from God to the soul, independently of the Scriptures and the use of the ordinary means of grace. "It despairs," says Fleming, "of the regular process of science; it believes that we may attain directly, without the aid of the senses or reason, and by an immediate intuition, the real and absolute principle of all truth, — God."²

Mystics are of two classes; the Theosophists, whose object is

¹ Philosophy of Religion, p. 75.

² Word "Mysticism."

knowledge, and with whom the organ of communication with God, is the reason ; and the Mystics proper, whose object is, life, purity, and beatitude ; and with whom the organ of communication, or receptivity, is the feelings. They agree, first, in relying on the immediate revelation or communication of God to the soul ; and secondly, that these communications are to be attained, in the neglect of outward means, by quiet or passive contemplation. "The Theosophist is one who gives a theory of God, or of the works of God, which has not reason, but an inspiration of his own for its basis."¹ "The Theosophists, neither contented with the natural light of reason, nor with the simple doctrines of Scripture understood in their literal sense, have recourse to an internal supernatural light superior to all other illuminations, from which they profess to derive a mysterious and divine philosophy manifested only to the chosen favorites of heaven."²

Mysticism not identical with the Doctrine of Spiritual Illumination.

Mysticism, then, is not to be confounded with the doctrine of spiritual illumination as held by all evangelical Christians. The Scriptures clearly teach that the mere outward presentation of the truth in the Word, does not suffice to the conversion or sanctification of men ; that the natural, or unrenewed man, does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them ; that in order to any saving knowledge of the truth, i. e., of such knowledge as produces holy affections and secures a holy life, there is need of an inward supernatural teaching of the Spirit, producing what the Scriptures call "spiritual discernment." This supernatural teaching our Lord promised to his disciples when He said that He would send them the Spirit of truth to dwell in them, and to guide them into the knowledge of the truth. For this teaching the sacred writers pray that it may be granted not to themselves only, but to all who heard their words or read their writings. On this they depended exclusively for their success in preaching or teaching. Hence believers were designated as πνευματικοί, a Spiritu Dei illuminati, qui reguntur a Spiritu. And men of the world, unrenewed men, are described as those who have not the Spirit. God, therefore, does hold immediate intercourse with the souls of men. He reveals himself unto his people, as He does not unto the world. He gives them the Spirit of revelation in the knowledge of himself. (Eph. i. 17.) He unfolds to them his glory, and fills them with a joy which passes understanding. All this is admitted; but this is very different from Mysticism. The two things, namely, spiritual illumination and Mysticism, differ, firstly, as to their object. The object of the inward teaching of the Spirit is to enable us to discern the truth and excellence of what is already objectively revealed in the Bible. The illumination claimed by the Mystic communicates truth independently of its objective revelation. It is not intended to enable us to appreciate what we already know, but to communicate new knowledge. It would be one thing to enable a man to discern and appreciate the beauty of a work of art placed before his eyes, and quite another thing to give him the intuition of all possible forms of truth and beauty, independent of everything external. So there is a great difference between that influence which enables the soul to discern the things "freely given to us of God" (1 Cor. ii. 12) in his Word, and the immediate revelation to the mind of all the contents of that word, or of their equivalents.

¹ Vaughan, Hours with the Mystics, vol. i. p. 45.

² Taylor, Elements of Thought. See Fleming, word "Theosophism."

The doctrines of spiritual illumination and of Mysticism differ not only in the object, but secondly, in the manner in which that object is to be attained. The inward teaching of the Spirit is to be sought by prayer, and the diligent use of the appointed means; the intuitions of the Mystic are sought in the neglect of all means, in the suppression of all activity inward and outward, and in a passive waiting for the influx of God into the soul. They differ, thirdly, in their effects. The effect of spiritual illumination is, that the Word dwells in us "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding" (Col. i. 9). What dwells in the mind of the Mystic are his own imaginings, the character of which depends on his own subjective state; and whatever they are, they are of man and not of God.

It differs from the Doctrine of the "Leading of the Spirit."

Neither is Mysticism to be confounded with the doctrine of spiritual guidance. Evangelical Christians admit that the children of God are led by the Spirit of God; that their convictions as to truth and duty, their inward character and outward conduct, are moulded by his influence. They are children unable to guide themselves, who are led by an ever-present Father of infinite wisdom and love. This guidance is partly providential, ordering their external circumstances; partly through the Word, which is a lamp to their feet; and partly by the inward influence of the Spirit on the mind. This last, however, is also through the Word, making it intelligible and effectual; bringing it suitably to remembrance.

God leads his people by the cords of a man, i. e., in accordance with the laws of his nature. This is very different from the doctrine that the soul, by yielding itself passively to God, is filled with all truth and goodness; or, that in special emergencies it is controlled by blind, irrational impulses.

It differs from the Doctrine of "Common Grace."

Finally, Mysticism differs from the doctrine of common grace as held by all Augustinians, and that of sufficient grace as held by Arminians. All Christians believe that as God is everywhere present in the material world, guiding the operation of second causes so that they secure the results which He designs; so his Spirit is everywhere present with the minds of men, exciting to good and restraining from evil, effectually controlling human character and conduct, consistently with the laws of rational beings. According to the Arminian theory this "common grace" is sufficient, if properly cultured and obeyed, to lead men to salvation, whether Pagans, Mohammedans, or Christians. There is little analogy, however, between this doctrine of common, or sufficient grace, and Mysticism as it has revealed itself in the history of the Church. The one assumes an influence of the Spirit on all men analogous to the providential efficiency of God in nature, the other an influence analogous to that granted to prophets and apostles, involving both revelation and inspiration.

§ 2. Mysticism in the Early Church.

A. Montanism.

The Montanists who arose toward the close of the second century had, in one aspect, some affinity to Mysticism. Montanus taught that as the ancient prophets predicted the coming of the Messiah through whom new revelations were to be made; so Christ predicted the coming of the Paraclete through whom further communications of the mind of God were to be made to his people. Tertullian, by whom this system was reduced to order and commended to the higher class of minds, did indeed maintain that the rule of faith was fixed and immutable; but nevertheless that there was need of a continued supernatural revelation of truth, at least as to matters of duty and discipline. This supernatural revelation was made through the Paraclete; whether, as was perhaps the general idea among the Montanists, by communications granted, from time to time, to special individuals, who thereby became Christian prophets; or by an influence common to all believers, which however some more than others experienced and improved. The following passage from Tertullian¹ gives clearly the fundamental principle of the system, so far as this point is concerned: "Regula quidem fidei una omnino est, sola immobilis et irreformabilis. . . . Hac lege fidei manente, cetera jam disciplinæ et conversationis admittunt novitatem correctionis; operante scilicet et proficiente usque in finem gratia Dei. . . . Propterea Paracletum misit Dominus, ut, quoniam humana mediocritas omnia semel capere non poterat, paulatim dirigeretur et ordinaretur et ad perfectum perduceretur disciplina ab illo vicario Domini Spiritu Sancto. Quæ est ergo Paracleti administratio nisi hæc, quod disciplina dirigitur, quod Scripturæ revelantur, quod intellectus reformatur, quod ad meliora proficitur? Justitia primo fuit in rudimentis, natura Deum metuens; dehinc per legem et prophetas promovit in infantiam; dehinc per evangelium efferbuit in juventutem; nunc per Paracletum componitur in maturitatem."

The points of analogy between Montanism and Mysticism are that both assume the insufficiency of the Scriptures and the ordinances of the Church for the full development of the Christian life; and both assert the necessity of a continued, supernatural, revelation from the Spirit of God. In other respects the two tendencies were divergent. Mysticism was directed to the inner life; Montanism to the outward. It concerned itself with the reformation of manners and strictness of discipline. It enjoined fasts, and other ascetic practices. As it depended on the supernatural and continued guidance of the Spirit, it was on the one hand opposed to speculation, or the attempt to develop Christianity by philosophy; and on the other to the dominant authority of the bishops. Its denunciatory and exclusive spirit led to its condemnation as heretical. As the Montanists excommunicated the Church, the Church excommunicated them.²

B. The so-called Dionysius, the Areopagite.

Mysticism, in the common acceptation of the term, is antagonistic to speculation. And yet they are often united. There have been speculative or philosophical Mystics. The father indeed of Mysticism in the Christian Church, was a philosopher. About the year A. D. 528, during the Monothelite controversy certain writings were quoted as of authority as being the productions of Dionysius the Areopagite. The total silence respecting them during the preceding centuries; the philosophical views which they express; the allusions to the state of the Church with which they abound, have produced the conviction, universally entertained, that they were the work of some author who lived in the latter part of the fifth century. The most learned investigators, however, confess their inability to fix with certainty or even with probability on any writer to whom they can be referred. Though their authorship is unknown, their influence has been confessedly great. The works which bear the pseudonym of Dionysius are, "The Celestial Hierarchy," "The Terrestrial Hierarchy," "Mystical Theology," and "Twelve Epistles." Their contents show that their author belonged to the school of the New Platonists, and that his object was to propagate the peculiar views of that school in the Christian Church. The writer attempts to show that the real, esoteric doctrines of Christianity are identical with those of his own school of philosophy. In other words, he taught New Platonism, in the terminology of the Church. Christian ideas were entirely excluded, while the language of the Bible was retained. Thus in our day we have had the philosophy of Schelling and Hegel set forth in the formulas of Christian theology.

¹ De Virgg. Veland c. 1. — Edit. Basle, 1562, p. 490.

² See Neander's Dogmengeschichte, vol. 1. Schwegler, F. C. (disciple of Baur) Der Montanismus und die Christliche Kirche des Zweiten Jahrhunderts, Tub. 1841-48. A concise and clear account of Montanism is given in Mosheim's Commentaries on the Affairs of Christians before the Time of Constantine, vol. i. § 66, pp. 497 ff. of Murdock's edition.

New Platonism.

The New Platonists taught that the original ground and source of all things was simple being, without life or consciousness; of which absolutely nothing could be known, beyond that it is. They assumed an unknown quantity, of which nothing can be predicated. The pseudo-Dionysius called this original ground of all things God, and taught that God was mere being without attributes of any kind, not only unknowable by man, but of whom there was nothing to be known, as absolute being is in the language of the modern philosophy, — Nothing; nothing in itself, yet nevertheless the δύναμις τῶν πάντων.

The universe proceeds from primal being, not by any exercise of conscious power or will, but by a process or emanation. The familiar illustration is derived from the flow of light from the sun. With this difference, however. That the sun emits light, is a proof that it is itself luminous; but the fact that intelligent beings emanate from the "ground-being," is not admitted as proof that it is intelligent. The fact that the air produces cheerfulness, say these philosophers, does not prove that the atmosphere experiences joy. We can infer nothing as to the nature of the cause from the nature of the effects.

These emanations are of different orders; decreasing in dignity and excellence as they are distant from the primal source. The first of these emanations is mind, νοῦς, intelligence individualized in different ranks of spiritual beings. The next, proceeding from the first, is soul, which becomes individualized by organic or vital connection with matter. There is, therefore, an intelligence of intelligences, and also a soul of souls; hence their generic unity. Evil arises from the connection of the spiritual with the corporeal, and yet this connection so far as souls are concerned, is necessary to their individuality. Every soul, therefore, is an emanation from the soul of the world, as that is from God, through the Intelligence.

As there is no individual soul without a body, and as evil is the necessary consequence of union with a body, evil is not only necessary or unavoidable, it is a good.

The end of philosophy is the immediate vision of God, which gives the soul supreme blessedness and rest. This union with God is attained by sinking into ourselves; by passivity. As we are a form, or mode of God's existence, we find God in ourselves, and are consciously one with him, when this is really apprehended; or, when we suffer God, as it were, to absorb our individuality.

The primary emanations from the ground of all being, which the heathen called gods (as they had gods many and lords many); the New Platonists, spirits or intelligences; and the Gnostics, æons; the pseudo-Dionysius called angels. These he divided into three triads: (1.) thrones, cherubim, and seraphim; (2.) powers, lordships, authorities; (3.) angels, archangels, principalities. He classified the ordinances and officers and members of the Church into corresponding triads: (1.) The sacraments, — baptism, communion, anointing, — these were the means of initiation or consecration; (2.) The initiators, — bishops, priests, deacons; (3.) The initiated, — monks, the baptized, catechumens.

The terms God, sin, redemption, are retained in this system, but the meaning attached to them was entirely inconsistent with the sense they bear in the Bible and in the Christian Church. The pseudo-Dionysius was a heathen philosopher in the vestments of a Christian minister. The philosophy which he taught he claimed to be the true sense of the doctrines of the Church, as that sense had been handed down by a secret tradition. Notwithstanding its heathen origin and character, its influence in the Church was great and long continued. The writings of its author were translated, annotated and paraphrased, centuries after his death. As there is no effect without an adequate cause, there must have been power in this system and an adaptation to the cravings of a large class of minds.

Causes of the Influence of the Writings of the pseudo-Dionysius.

To account for its extensive influence it may be remarked: (1.) That it did not openly shock the faith or prejudices of the Church. It did not denounce any received doctrine or repudiate any established institution or ordinance. It pretended to be Christian. It undertook to give a deeper and more correct insight into the mysteries of religion. (2.) It subordinated the outward to the inward. Some men are satisfied with rites, ceremonies, symbols, which may mean anything or nothing; others, with knowledge or clear views of truth. To others, the inner life of the soul, intercourse with God, is the great thing. To these this system addressed itself. It proposed to satisfy this craving after God, not indeed in a legitimate way, or by means of God's appointment. Nevertheless it was the high end of union with him that it proposed, and which it professed to secure. (3.) This system was only one form of the doctrine which has such a fascination for the human mind, and which underlies so many forms of religion in every age of the world; the doctrine, namely, that the universe is an efflux of the life of God, — all things flowing from him, and back again to him from everlasting to everlasting. This doctrine quiets the conscience, as it precludes the idea of sin; it gives the peace which flows from fatalism; and it promises the absolute rest of unconsciousness when the individual is absorbed in the bosom of the Infinite.¹

§ 3. Mysticism during the Middle Ages.

A. General Characteristics of this Period.

The Middle Ages embrace the period from the close of the sixth century to the Reformation. This period is distinguished by three marked characteristics. First, the great development of the Latin Church in its hierarchy, its worship, and its formulated doctrines, as well as in its superstitions, corruptions, and power. Secondly, the extraordinary intellectual activity awakened in the region of speculation, as manifested in the multiplication of seats of learning, in the number and celebrity of their teachers, and in the great multitude of students by which they were attended, and in the interest taken by all classes in the subjects of learned discussion. Thirdly, by a widespread and variously manifested movement of, so to speak, the inner life of the Church, protesting against the formalism, the corruption, and the tyranny of the external Church. This protest was made partly openly by those whom Protestants are wont to call "Witnesses for the Truth;" and partly within the Church itself. The opposition within the Church manifested itself partly among the people, in the formation of fellowships or societies for benevolent effort and spiritual culture, such as the Beguines, the Beghards, the Lollards, and afterwards, "The Brethren of the Common Lot;" and partly in the schools, or by the teachings of theologians.

¹ See Rixner's Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. i. §§ 168-172. Ritter's Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie, vol. ii. pp. 115-135. Herzog's Encyclopædie.

It was the avowed aim of the theologians of this period to justify the doctrines of the Church at the bar of reason; to prove that what was received on authority as a matter of faith, was true as a matter of philosophy. It was held to be the duty of the theologian to exalt faith into knowledge. Or, as Anselm¹ expresses it: "rationabili necessitate intelligere, esse oportere omnia illa, quæ nobis fides catholica de Christo credere præcipit." Richard à St. Victore still more strongly asserts that we are bound, "quod tenemus ex fide, ratione apprehendere et demonstrativæ certitudinis attestazione firmare."

The First Class of Mediæval Theologians.

Of these theologians, however, there were three classes. First, those who avowedly exalted reason above authority, and refused to receive anything on authority which they could not for themselves, on rational grounds, prove to be true. John Scotus Erigena (Eringeborne, Irish-born) may be taken as a representative of this class. He not only held, that reason and revelation, philosophy and religion, are perfectly consistent, but that religion and philosophy are identical. "Conficitur," he says, "inde veram philosophiam esse veram religionem conversimque veram religionem esse veram philosophiam."² And on the crucial question, Whether faith precedes science, or science faith, he decided for the latter. Reason, with him, was paramount to authority, the latter having no force except when sustained by the former. "Auctoritas siquidem ex vera ratione processit, ratio vero nequaquam ex auctoritate. Omnis autem auctoritas, quæ vera ratione non approbatur, infirma videtur esse. Vera autem ratio, quam virtutibus suis rata atque immutabilis munitur, nullius auctoritatis adstipulatione roborari indiget."¹ His philosophy as developed in his work, "De Divisione Naturæ," is purely pantheistic. There is with him but one being, and everything real is thought. His system, therefore, is nearly identical with the idealistic pantheism of Hegel; yet he had his trinitarianism, his soteriology, and his eschatology, as a theologian.

¹ Cur Deus Homo, lib. i. cap. 25.

² De Prædest. cap. i. 1, Migne, Patr. vol. cxxii. p. 358, a.

The Second Class.

The second and more numerous class of the mediæval theologians took the ground that faith in matters of religion precedes science; that truths are revealed to us supernaturally by the Spirit of God, which truths are to be received on the authority of the Scriptures and the testimony of the Church. But being believed, then we should endeavor to comprehend and to prove them; so that our conviction of their truth should rest on rational grounds. It is very evident that everything depends on the spirit with which this principle is applied, and on the extent to which it is carried. In the hands of many of the schoolmen, as of the Fathers, it was merely a form of rationalism. Many taught that while Christianity was to be received by the people on authority as a matter of faith, it was to be received by the cultivated as a matter of knowledge. The human was substituted for the divine, the authority of reason for the testimony of God. With the better class of the schoolmen the principle in question was held with many limitations. Anselm, for example, taught: (1.) That holiness of heart is the essential condition of true knowledge. It is only so far as the truths of religion enter into our personal experience, that we are able properly to apprehend them. Faith, therefore, as including spiritual discernment, must precede all true knowledge. "Qui secundum carnem vivit, carnalis sive animalis est, de quo dicitur: animalis homo non percipit ea, quæ sunt Spiritus Dei. . . . Qui non crediderit, non intelliget, nam qui non crediderit, non experietur, et qui expertus non fuerit, non intelliget."² "Neque enim quæro intelligere, ut credam, sed credo, ut intelligam. Nam et hoc credo, quia, nisi credidero, non intelligam."³ (2.) He held that rational proof was not needed as a help to faith. It was as absurd, he said, for us to presume to add authority to the testimony of God by our reasoning, as for a man to prop up Olympus. (3.) He taught that there are doctrines of revelation which transcend our reason, which we cannot rationally pretend to comprehend or prove, and which are to be received on the simple testimony of God. "Nam Christianus per fidem debet ad intellectum proficere, non per intellectum ad fidem accedere, aut si intelligere non valet, a fide recedere. Sed cum ad intellectum valet pertinere, delectatur, cum vero nequit, quod capere non potest, veneratur."¹

¹ De Div. Nat. i. 69 f., Migne, ut supra, p. 513, b.

² De Fide Trin. 2.

³ Prosl. 1.

A third class of the schoolmen, while professing to adhere to the doctrines of the Church, consciously or unconsciously, explained them away.

B. Medieval Mystics.

Mystics were to be found in all these classes, and therefore they have been divided, as by Dr. Shedd,² into the heretical, the orthodox, and an intermediate class, which he designates as latitudinarian. Much to the same effect, Neudöcker,³ classifies them as Theosophist, Evangelical, and Separatist. Ullmann⁴ makes a somewhat different classification. The characteristic common to these classes, which differed so much from each other, was not that in all there was a protest of the heart against the head, of the feelings against the intellect, a reaction against the subtleties of the scholastic theologians, for some of the leading Mystics were among the most subtle dialecticians. Nor was it a common adherence to the Platonic as opposed to the Aristotelian philosophy, or to realism as opposed to nominalism. But it was the belief, that oneness with God was the great end to be desired and pursued, and that that union was to be sought, not so much through the truth, or the Church, or ordinances, or Christian fellowship; but by introspection, meditation, intuition. As very different views were entertained of the nature of the "oneness with God," which was to be sought, so the Mystics differed greatly from each other. Some were extreme pantheists; others were devout theists and Christians. From its essential nature, however, the tendency of Mysticism was to pantheism. And accordingly undisguised pantheism was not only taught by some of the most prominent Mystics, but prevailed extensively among the people.

Pantheistic tendency of Mysticism.

It has already been remarked, that the system of the pseudo-Dionysius, as presented in his "Mystical Theology" and other writings, was essentially pantheistic. Those writings were translated ¹ De Fide Trin. 2. Ritter's Geschichte, vol. iii. pp. 315-354.

² History of Christian Doctrine, vol. i. p. 79.

³ Lexicon, art. "Mystik."

⁴ Reformers before the Reformation.

by Scotus Erigena, himself the most pronounced pantheist of the Middle Ages. Through the joint influence of these two men, a strong tendency to panthoism was developed to a greater or less degree among the mediæval Mystics. Even the associations among the people, such as the Beghards and Lollards, although at first exemplary and useful, by adopting a system of mystic pantheism became entirely corrupt.¹ Believing themselves to be modes of the divine existence, all they did God did, and all they felt inclined to do was an impulse from God, and therefore nothing could be wrong. In our own day the same principles have led to the same consequences in one wing of the German school of philosophy.

It was not only among the people and in these secret fellowships that this system was adopted. Men of the highest rank in the schools, and personally exemplary in their deportment, became the advocates of the theory which lay at the foundation of these practical evils. Of these scholastic pantheistical Mystics, the most distinguished and influential was Henry Eckart, whom some modern writers regard "as the deepest thinker of his age, if not of any age." Neither the time nor the place of his birth is known. He first appears in Paris as a Dominican monk and teacher. In 1304 he was Provincial of the Dominicans in Saxony. Soon after he was active in Strasburg as a preacher. His doctrines were condemned as heretical, although he denied that he had in any respect departed from the doctrines of the Church. From the decision of his archbishop and his provincial council, Eckart appealed to the Pope, by whom the sentence of condemnation was confirmed. This decision, however, was not published until 1329, when Eckart was already dead. It is not necessary here to give the details of his system. Suffice it to say, that he held that God is the only being; that the universe is the self-manifestation of God; that the highest destiny of man is to come to the consciousness of his identity with God; that that end is to be accomplished partly by philosophical abstraction and partly by ascotic self renunciation.

"Although union with God is effected mainly by thinking and consciousness, still it also requires a corresponding act of the will, something practical, such as self-denial and privation, by which man rises above all that is finite. Not only must he lay aside all created things, the world and earthly good, and mortify desire, but more than all he must resign his 'I,' reduce himself to nothing, and become what he was before he issued forth into this temporal state. Nay, man must rise above the chief good, above virtue, piety, blessedness, and God himself, as things external and superior to his spirit, and it is only when he has thus annihilated self, and all that is not God within him, that nothing remains except the pure and simple divine essence, in which all division is brought into absolute unity.”¹

¹ Ullmann, vol. ii. ch. 2.

Another distinguished and influential writer of the same class was John Ruysbroek, born 1293, in a village of that name not far from Brussels. Having entered the service of the Church he devoted himself to the duties of a secular priest until his sixtieth year, when he became prior of a newly instituted monastery. He was active and faithful, gentle and devout. Whether he was a theist or a pantheist is a matter of dispute. His speculative views were formed more or less under the influence of the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius and of Eckart. Gerson, himself a Mystic, objected to his doctrines as pantheistic; and every one acknowledges that there are not only forms of expression but also principles to be found in his writings which imply the pantheistic theory. He speaks of God as the super-essential being including all beings. All creatures, he taught, were in God, as thoughts before their creation. “God saw and recognized them in himself, as somehow, but not wholly, different from himself, for what is in God, is God.” “In the act of self-depletion, the spirit loses itself in the enjoyment of love, and imbibes directly the brightness of God, yea, becomes the very brightness which it imbibes. All who are raised to the sublimity of this contemplative life are one with deifying (deifica) brightness, and become one and the same light as that which they behold. To such a height is the spirit elevated above itself, and made one with God, in respect that in the oneness of that living original in which, according to its uncreated being, it possesses itself, it enjoys and contemplates boundless treasures in the same manner as God himself.” Ullmann, who quotes these and similar passages, still maintains that Ruysbroek was a theist, because, as he says, Ruysbroek “distinctly recognizes not only the immanence of God, but what no pantheist can do, his transcendence.” Moreover, he “too frequently and too solicitously avers that, in the oneness of the contemplative man with God, he still recognizes a difference between the two, to permit us to ascribe to him the doctrine of an absolute solution of the individual into the Divine substance.”² A man may aver a difference between the waves and the ocean, between the leaves and the tree, and yet in both cases assert a substantial unity. It is true that no one can intelligently affirm the transcendence of God, and still hold the extreme form of pantheism which makes the world the existence-form of God, his whole intelligence, power, and life. But he may be a Monist. He may believe that there is but one Being in the universe, that everything is a form of God, and all life the life of God. Pantheism is Protean. Some moderns speak of a Christian Pantheism. But any system which hinders our saying "Thou," to God, is fatal to religion.

¹ Ullmann, Translation in Clark's Library, vol. ii. p. 27.

² Ibid. p. 47.

Evangelical Mystics.

Bernard of Clairvaux, Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, Gerson, Thomas à Kempis and others, are commonly referred to the class of evangelical Mystics. These eminent and influential men differed much from each other, but they all held union with God, not in the Scriptural, but in the mystical sense of that term, as the great object of desire. It was not that they held that "the beatific vision of God," the intuition of his glory, which belongs to heaven, is attainable in this world and attainable by abstraction, ecstatic apprehension, or passive reception, but that the soul becomes one with God, if not in substance, yet in life. These men, however, were great blessings to the Church. Their influence was directed to the preservation of the inward life of religion in opposition to the formality and ritualism which then prevailed in the Church; and thus to free the conscience from subjection to human authority. The writings of Bernard are still held in high esteem, and "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas à Kempis, has diffused itself like incense through all the aisles and alcoves of the Universal Church.¹

§ 4. Mysticism at, and after the Reformation.

A. Effect of the Reformation on the Popular Mind.

Such a great and general movement of the public mind as occurred during the sixteenth century, when the old foundations of doctrine and order in the Church, were overturned, could hardly fail to be attended by irregularities and extravagancies in the inward and outward life of the people. There are two principles advanced, both Scriptural and both of the last importance, which are specially liable to abuse in times of popular excitement.

¹ See Tholuck, Sufismus seu Theosophia Persarum Pantheistica. C. Schmidt, Essai sur les Mystiques du 14^{me} Siècle. This writer is the author of most of the excellent articles in Herzog's Encyclopædie on the Mediæval Mystics. Ullmann's Reformers before the Reformation. Poiret, Bibliotheca Mysticorum. Vaughan's Hours with the Mystics. Helfferich's Christliche Mystik. Dörner, Geschichte der Protestantischen Theologie, 48-59.

The first is, the right of private judgment. This, as understood by the Reformers, is the right of every man to decide what a revelation made by God to him, requires him to believe. It was a protest against the authority assumed by the Church (i. e. the Bishops), of deciding for the people what they were to believe. It was very natural that the fanatical, in rejecting the authority of the Church, should reject all external authority in matters of religion. They understood by the right of private judgment, the right of every man to determine what he should believe from the operations of his own mind and from his own inward experience, independently of the Scriptures. But as it is palpably absurd to expect, on such a subject as religion, a certainty either satisfactory to ourselves or authoritative for others, from our own reason or feelings, it was inevitable that these subjective convictions should be referred to a supernatural source. Private revelations, an inward light, the testimony of the Spirit, came to be exalted over the authority of the Bible.

Secondly, the Reformers taught that religion is a matter of the heart, that a man's acceptance with God does not depend on his membership in any external society, on obedience to its officers, and on sedulous observance of its rites and ordinances; but on the regeneration of his heart, and his personal faith in the Son of God, manifesting itself in a holy life. This was a protest against the fundamental principle of Romanism, that all within the external organization which Romanists call the Church, are saved, and all out of it are lost. It is not a matter of surprise that evil men should wrest this principle, as they do all other truths, to their own destruction. Because religion does not consist in externals, many rushed to the conclusion that externals, — the Church, its ordinances, its officers, its worship, — were of no account. These principles were soon applied beyond the sphere of religion. Those who regarded themselves as the organs of God, emancipated from the authority of the Bible and exalted above the Church, came to claim exemption from the authority of the State. To this outbreak the grievous and long-continued oppression of the peasantry greatly contributed, so that this spirit of fanaticism and revolt rapidly spread over all Germany, and into Switzerland and Holland.

The Popular Disorders not the Effects of the Reformation.

The extent to which these disorders spread, and the rapidity with which they diffused themselves, show that they were not the mere outgrowth of the Reformation. The principles avowed by the Reformers, and the relaxation of papal authority occasioned by the Reformation, served but to inflame the elements which had for years been slumbering in the minds of the people. The numerous associations and fellowships, of which mention was made in the preceding section, had leavened the public mind with the principles of pantheistic Mysticism, which were the prolific source of evil. Men who imagined themselves to be forms in which God existed and acted, were not likely to be subject to any authority human or divine, nor were they apt to regard anything as sinful which they felt inclined to do.

These men also had been brought up under the Papacy. According to the papal theory, especially as it prevailed during the Middle Ages, the Church was a theocracy, whose representatives were the subjects of a constant inspiration rendering them infallible as teachers and absolute as rulers. All who opposed the Church were rebels against God, whom to destroy was a duty both to God and man. These ideas Münzer and his followers applied to themselves. They were the true Church. They were inspired. They were entitled to determine what is true in matters of doctrine. They were entitled to rule with absolute authority in church and state. All who opposed them, opposed God, and ought to be exterminated. Münzer died upon the scaffold; thus was fulfilled anew our Lord's declaration, "Those who take the sword, shall perish by the sword."

B. Mystics among the Reformers.

Few of the theologians contemporary with Luther took any part in this fanatical movement. To a certain extent this however was done by Carlstadt (Bodenstein), archdeacon and afterwards professor of theology at Wittenberg. At first he coöperated zealously with the great Reformer, but when Storch and Stübener claiming to be prophets, came to Wittenberg during Luther's confinement at Wartburg, and denounced learning and Church institutions, and taught that all reliance was to be placed on the inward light, or supernatural guidance of the Spirit, Carlstadt gave them his support and exhorted the students to abandon their studies and to betake themselves to manual labor. Great disorder following these movements, Luther left his place of seclusion, appeared upon the scene, and succeeded in allaying the tumult. Carlstadt then withdrew from Wittenberg, and ultimately united himself with Schwenkfeld, a more influential opponent of Luther, and who was equally imbued with the spirit of Mysticism.

Schwenkfeld.

Schwenkfeld, a nobleman born 1490, in the principality of Lignitz, in Lower Silesia, was a man of great energy and force of character, exemplary in his conduct, of extensive learning and indefatigable diligence. He at first took an active part in promoting the Reformation, and was on friendly terms with Luther, Melancthon, and the other leading Reformers. Being a man not only of an independent way of thinking, but confident and zealous in maintaining his peculiar opinions, he soon separated himself from other Protestants and passed his whole life in controversy; condemned by synods and proscribed by the civil authorities, he was driven from city to city, until his death, which occurred in 1561.

That Schwenkfeld differed not only from the Romanists, but from Lutherans and Reformed on all the great doctrines then in controversy, is to be referred to the fact that he held, in common with the great body of the Mystics of the Middle Ages, that union or oneness with God, not in nature or character only, but also in being or substance, was the one great desideratum and essential condition of holiness and felicity. To avoid the pantheistic doctrines into which the majority of the Mystics were led, he held to a form of dualism. Creatures exist out of God, and are due to the exercise of his power. In them there is nothing of the substance of God, and therefore nothing really good. With regard to men, they are made good and blessed by communicating to them the substance of God. This communication is made through Christ. Christ is not, even as to his human nature, a creature. His body and soul were formed out of the substance of God. While on earth, in his state of humiliation, this substantial unity of his humanity with God, was undeveloped and unrevealed. Since his exaltation it is completely deified, or lost in the divine essence. It followed from these principles, First, That the external church, with its ordinances and means of grace, was of little importance. Especially that the Scriptures are not, even instrumentally, the source of the divine life. Faith does not come by hearing, but from the Christ within; i. e. from the living substance of God communicated to the soul. This communication is to be sought by abnegation, renunciation of the creature, by contemplation and prayer. Secondly, as to the sacrament of the supper, which then was the great subject of controversy, Schwenkfeld stood by himself. Not admitting that Christ had any material body or blood, he could not admit that the bread and wine were transubstantiated into his body and blood, as Romanists teach; nor that his body and blood were locally present in the sacrament, in, with, and under the bread and wine, as Luther held; nor could he admit the dynamic presence of Christ's body, as taught by Calvin; nor that the Lord's Supper was merely a significant and commemorative ordinance, as Zwingli taught. He held his own doctrine. He transposed the words of Christ. Instead of "This (bread) is my body," he said, the true meaning and intent of Christ was, "My body is bread;" that is, as bread is the staff and source of life to the body, so my body, formed of the essence of God, is the life of the soul.

A third inference from Schwenkfeld's fundamental principle was that the redemption of the soul is purely subjective; something wrought in the soul itself. He denied justification by faith as Luther taught that doctrine, and which Luther regarded as the life of the Church. He said that we are justified not by what Christ has done for us, but by what He does within us. All we need is the communication of the life or substance of Christ to the soul. With him, as with Mystics generally, the ideas of guilt and expiation were ignored.

Later Mystics.

The succession of mystical writers was kept up by such men as Paracelsus, Weigel, Jacob Boehme, and others. The first named was a physician and chemist, who combined natural philosophy and alchemy with his theosophy. He was born in 1493 and died in 1541. Weigel, a pastor, was born in Saxony in 1533, and died in 1588. His views were formed under the influence of Tauler, Schwenkfeld, and Paracelsus. He taught, as his predecessors had done, that the inner word, and not the Scriptures, was the source of true knowledge, that all that God creates is God himself, and that all that is good in man is of the substance of God. The most remarkable writer of this class was Jacob Boehme, who was born near Gorlitz in Silesia, in 1575. His parents were peasants, and he himself a shoemaker. That such a man should write books which have proved a mine of thoughts to Schelling, Hegel, and Coleridge, as well as to a whole class of theologians, is decisive evidence of his extraordinary gifts. In character he was mild, gentle, and devout; and although denounced as a heretic, he constantly professed his allegiance to the faith of the Church. He regarded himself as having received in answer to prayer, on three different occasions, communications of divine light and knowledge which he was impelled to reveal to others. He did not represent the primordial being as without attributes or qualities of which nothing could be predicated, but as the seat of all kinds of forces seeking development. What the Bible teaches of the Trinity, he understood as an account of the development of the universe out of God and its relation to him. He was a theosophist in one sense, in which Vaughan¹ defines the term, "One who gives you a theory of God or of the works of God, which has not reason, but an inspiration of his own for its basis." "The theosophists," says Fleming,² "are a school of philosophers who mix enthusiasm with observation, alchemy with theology, metaphysics with medicine, and clothe the whole with a form of mystery and inspiration."³

§ 5. Quietism.

A. Its general character.

Tholuck⁴ says "There is a law of seasons in the spiritual, as well as in the physical world, in virtue of which when the time has come, without apparent connection, similar phenomena reveal themselves in different places. As towards the end of the fifteenth century an ecclesiastical-doctrinal reformatory movement passed over the greater part of Europe, in part without apparent connection; so at the end of the seventeenth a mystical and spiritual tendency was almost as extensively manifested. In Germany, it took the form of Mysticism and Pietism; in England, of Quakerism; in France, of Jansenism and Mysticism; and in Spain and Italy, of Quietism." This movement was in fact what in our day would be called a revival of religion. Not indeed in a form free from grievous errors, but nevertheless it was a return to the religion of the heart, as opposed to the religion of forms. The Mystics of this period, although they constantly appealed to the mediæval Mystics, even to the Areopagite, and although they often used the same forms of expression, yet they adhered much more faithfully to Scriptural doctrines and to the faith of the Church. They did not fall into Pantheism, or believe in the absorption of the soul into the substance of God. They held, however, that the end to be attained was union with God. By this was not meant what Christians generally understand by that term; congeniality with God, delight in his perfections, assurance of his love, submission to his will, perfect satisfaction in the enjoyment of his favour. It was

¹ Hours with Mystics, vol. i. p. 45.

² Vocabulary of Philosophy.

³ See Baur's Christliche Gnosis; Dorner's History of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ, and his History of Protestant Theology; Hamberger, Die Lehre des Deutschen Philosophen J. Boehme, 1844.

⁴ Herzog's Encyclopædie, art. "Molinos."

something more than all this, something mystical and therefore inexplicable; a matter of feeling, not something to be understood or explained. A state in which all thought, all activity was suspended. A state of perfect quietude in which the soul is lost in God, — an “écoulement et liquefaction de l’âme en Dieu,” as it is expressed by St. Francis de Sales. This state is reached by few. It is to be attained not by the use of the means of grace or ordinances of the Church. The soul should be raised above the need of all such aids. It rises even above Christ, insomuch that it is not He whom the soul seeks, nor God in him; but God as God; the absolute, infinite God. The importance of the Scriptures, of prayer, of the sacraments, and of the truth concerning Christ, was not denied; but all these were regarded as belonging to the lower stages of the divine life. Nor was this rest and union with God to be attained by meditation; for meditation is discursive. It implies an effort to bring truth before the mind, and fixing the attention upon it. All conscious self-activity must be suspended in order to this perfect rest in God. It is a state in which the soul is out of itself; a state of ecstasy, according to the etymological meaning of the word.

This state is to be reached in the way prescribed by the older Mystics; first, by negation or abstraction; that is, the abstraction of the soul from everything out of God, from the creature, from all interest, concern, or impression from sensible objects. Hence the connection between Mysticism, in this form, and asceticism. Not only must the soul become thus abstracted from the creature, but it must be dead to self. All regard to self must be lost. There can be no prayer, for prayer is asking something for self; no thanksgiving, for thanksgiving implies gratitude for good done to self. Self must be lost. There must be no preference for heaven over hell. One of the points most strenuously insisted upon was a willingness to be damned, if such were the will of God. In the controversy between Fénelon and Bossuet, the main question concerned disinterested love, whether in loving God the soul must be raised above all regard to its own holiness and happiness. This pure or disinterested love justifies, or renders righteous in the sight of God. Although the Mystics of this period were eminently pure as well as devout, they nevertheless sometimes laid down principles, or at least used expressions, which gave their enemies a pretext for charging them with Antinomianism. It was said, that a soul filled with this love, or reduced to this entire negation of self, cannot sin; “sin is not in, but outside of him;” which was made to mean, that nothing was sin to the perfect. It is an instructive psychological fact that when men attempt or pretend to rise above the law of God, they sink below it; that Perfectionism has so generally led to Antinomianism.

B. Leaders of this Movement.

The principal persons engaged in promoting this remarkable religious movement were Molinos, Madame Guyon, and Archbishop Fénelon. Michael Molinos, born 1640, was a Spanish priest. About 1670 he became a resident of Rome, where he gained a great reputation for piety and mildness, and great influence from his position as confessor to many families of distinction. He enjoyed the friendship of the highest authorities in the Church, including several of the cardinals, and the Pope, Innocent XI., himself. In 1675 he published his "Spiritual Guide," in which the principles above stated were presented. Molinos did not claim originality, but professed to rely on the Mystics of the Middle Ages, several of whom had already been canonized by the Church. This, however, did not save him from persecution. His first trial indeed before the Inquisition resulted in his acquittal. But subsequently, through the influence of the Jesuits and of the court of Louis XIV., he was, after a year's imprisonment, condemned. Agreeably to his principle of entire subjection to the Church, he retracted his errors, but failed to secure the confidence of his judges. He died in 1697. His principal work, "Manuductio Spiritualis," or Spiritual Guide, was translated into different languages, and won for him many adherents in every part of the Catholic world. When he was imprisoned, it is said, that twenty thousand letters from all quarters, and many of them from persons of distinction, were found among his papers, assuring him of the sympathy of their authors with him in his spirit and views. This is proof that there were at that time thousands in the Romish Church who had not bowed the knee to the Baal of formalism.

Madame Guyon.

The most prominent and influential of the Quietists, as they were called, was Madame Guyon, born 1648 and died 1717. She belonged to a rich and noble family; was educated in a cloister, married at sixteen to a man of rank and wealth and of three times her age; faithful and devoted, but unhappy in her domestic relations; adhering zealously to her Church, she passed a life of incessant labour, and that, too, embittered by persecution. When still in the cloister she came under the influence of the writings of St. Francis de Sales, which determined her subsequent course. Enthusiastic in temperament, endowed with extraordinary gifts, she soon came to regard herself as the recipient of visions, revelations, and inspirations by which she was impelled to write, and, in the first instance, to devote herself to the conversion of Protestants. Failing in this, she considered it her vocation to become the mother of spiritual children, by bringing them to adopt her views of the inner life. To this object she devoted herself with untiring energy and great success, her adherents, secret and avowed, being numbered by thousands, or, as she supposed, by millions. She thus drew upon herself, although devoted to the Church, the displeasure of the authorities, and was imprisoned for seven years in the Bastille and other prisons in France. The latter years of her life she spent in retirement in the house of her daughter, burdened with physical infirmities, hearing mass every day in her private chapel and communicating every other day. Her principal works were, "La Bible avec des Explications et Réflexions, qui regardent la Vie Intérieure," "Moyen court et très-facile de faire Oraison." This little work excited great attention and great opposition. She was obliged to defend it in an "Apologie du Moyen Court," in 1690, and "Justifications" in 1694, and in 1695 she was forced to retract thirty-five propositions selected therefrom. She published an allegorical poem under the title "Les Torrens." Her minor poetic pieces called "Poésies Spirituelles," in four volumes, are greatly admired for the genius which they display.

Archbishop Fénelon, one of the greatest lights of the Gallican Church, espoused the cause of Madame Guyon, and published, 1697, "Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la Vie Intérieure." As the title intimates, the principles of this book are derived from the earlier Mystics, and specially from the latest of the saints, St. Francis de Sales, who was canonized in 1665, only thirty-three years after his death. Although Fénelon carefully avoided the extravagances of the Mystics of his own day, and although he taught nothing which men venerated in the Church had not taught before him, his book forfeited for him the favour of the court, and was finally condemned by the authorities at Rome. To this condemnation he submitted with the greatest docility. He not only made no defence, but read the brief of condemnation in his own pulpit, and forbade his book being read within his diocese. To this his conscience constrained him, although he probably did not change his views. As the Pope decided against him he was willing to admit that what he said was wrong, and yet what he intended to say he still held to be right.

§ 6. The Quakers or Friends.

This widely extended and highly respected body of professing Christians constitute the most permanent and best organized representatives of the principles of Mysticism which have appeared in the Church. They have existed as an organized society nearly two centuries and a half, and number in Europe and America several hundred thousands.

A. Their Origin and Early History.

They took their origin and name from George Fox, who was born at Drayton, Leicestershire, England, in 1624. He received only the rudiments of an English education, and was by trade a shoemaker. From boyhood he was remarkable for his quiet, secluded habits. He devoted his leisure to the reading of the Scriptures and meditation. The age in which he lived was one of corruption in the Church and agitation in the State. He was so impressed by the evils which he saw around him that he lost confidence in the teachers of religion and in the ordinances of the church. At last he felt himself called of God, by direct revelation and inspiration, to denounce the existing Church, its organization and officers, and to proclaim a new and spiritual dispensation. This dispensation was to be new only relatively to what had long existed. It was designed as a restoration of the apostolic age, when the church was guided and extended by the Spirit, without the intervention of the written Word, or, as Fox and his followers maintained, of a special order of ministers, but every man and every woman spake as the Spirit gave them utterance.¹

They were called Quakers either because they themselves trembled when under the influence of the Spirit, or because they were in the habit of calling on those whom they addressed to quake in fear of the judgment of God. The designation has long ceased to be appropriate, as they are characteristically quiet in their worship, and gentle toward those who are without. They call themselves Friends because opposed to violence, contention, and especially to war. At first, however, they were chargeable with many irregularities, which, in connection with their refusing to pay tithes, to take oaths, and to perform military service, gave pretext to frequent and long continued persecutions.

¹ One of the most important works of William Penn bears the title, Primitive Christianity revived in the Faith and Practice of the People called Quakers.

The Quakers were at first, as a class, illiterate, but men from the educated classes soon joined them, and by their influence the irregularities connected with the movement were corrected, and the society reduced to a regularly organized form. The most prominent of these men were George Keith, Samuel Fisher, and William Penn. The last named, the son of a British admiral, proved his sincerity by the sacrifices and sufferings to which his adherence to a sect, then despised and persecuted, subjected him. From the influence which he possessed, as the friend and favorite of James II., he was able to do much for his brethren, and having received a grant from the crown, of what is now Pennsylvania, he transported a colony of them to this country and founded one of the most important States of the American Union. The man, however, who did most to reduce the principles of George Fox to order, and to commend them to the religious and literary public, was Robert Barclay. Barclay was a member of a prominent Scottish family, and received the benefit of an extended and varied education. He was born in 1648, and died in 1690. His principal work, "Theologiæ Christianæ Apologia," is an exposition of fifteen theses which he had previously written and printed under the title, "Theses Theologicæ omnibus Clericis et præsertim universis Doctoribus, Professoribus et Studiosis Theologiæ in Academiis Europæ versantibus sive Pontificis sive Protestantibus oblatae."

B. Their Doctrines.

It is impossible to give a satisfactory view of the doctrines of the Quakers. They have no authoritative creed or exposition of doctrine which all who call themselves Quakers acknowledge. Their most prominent writers differ in their views on many important points. The opinions of no one, nor of several authors, can be fairly taken as representing the views of the Society. There are in fact three classes of Quakers.

First. Those who call themselves orthodox, and who differ very little from the great body of evangelical Christians. To this belongs the great majority of the Society both in this country and in Great Britain. This appears from the testimonies repeatedly issued by the "Yearly Meetings," the representative bodies of the Society. This is a much more satisfactory witness of the general faith of the body than the declarations of individual writers, however eminent, for which the Society is not responsible. A very clear and comprehensive summary of the doctrine of Friends is to be found in the "History of Religious Denominations in the United States," compiled by I. Daniel Rupp. The articles in this work were written by eminent men belonging to the several denominations whose views are represented. That which relates to the Quakers was written by the late Thomas Evans, a prominent minister of the Society, and a truly representative man. Without referring to the peculiar doctrines of the Society, the following extracts show how near the orthodox Quakers (i. e., the Society itself, as represented in its yearly meetings) come to the common faith of Protestant churches.

Doctrines of the Orthodox Friends.

1. As to God, it is said, Quakers "Believe in one only wise, omnipotent, and everlasting God, the creator and upholder of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, the mediator between God and man; and in the Holy Spirit which proceedeth from the Father and the Son; one God blessed forever. In expressing their views relative to the awful and mysterious doctrine of "the Three that bear record in heaven," they have carefully avoided the use of unscriptural terms, invented to define Him who is undefinable, and have scrupulously adhered to the safe and simple language of Holy Scripture, as contained in Matt. xxviii. 18, 19."

2. As to the person and work of Christ, "They own and believe in Jesus Christ, the beloved and only begotten Son of God, who was conceived of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary. . . . They believe that He alone is the Redeemer and Saviour of man, the captain of salvation, who saves from sin as well as from hell and the wrath to come, and destroys the works of the devil. He is the seed of the woman that bruises the serpent's head; even Christ Jesus, the Alpha and Omega, the first and last. He is, as the Scriptures of truth say of him, our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, neither is there salvation in any other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we may be saved."

"The Society of Friends have uniformly declared their belief in the divinity and manhood of the Lord Jesus: that He was both true God and perfect man, and that his sacrifice of himself upon the cross was a propitiation and atonement for the sins of the whole world, and that the remission of sins which any partake of, is only in, and by virtue of, that most satisfactory sacrifice."

3. As to the Holy Ghost, "Friends believe in the Holy Spirit, or Comforter, the promise of the Father, whom Christ declared he would send in his name, to lead and guide his followers into all truth, to teach them all things, and to bring all things to their remembrance. . . . They believe that the saving knowledge of God and Christ cannot be attained in any other way than by the revelation of this Spirit ; — for the Apostle says, ‘ What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him ? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God.’ If, therefore, the things which properly appertain to man cannot be discerned by any lower principle than the spirit of man ; those things which properly relate to God and Christ, cannot be known by any power inferior to that of the Holy Spirit.”

4. As to man, “ They believe that man was created in the image of God, capable of understanding the divine law, and of holding communion with his Maker. Through transgression he fell from this blessed state, and lost the heavenly image. His posterity come into the world in the image of the earthly man ; and, until renewed by the quickening and regenerating power of the heavenly man, Christ Jesus, manifested in the soul, they are fallen, degenerated, and dead to the divine life in which Adam originally stood, and are subject to the power, nature, and seed of the serpent ; and not only their words and deeds, but their imaginations, are evil perpetually in the sight of God. Man, therefore, in this state can know nothing aright concerning God ; his thoughts and conceptions of spiritual things, until he is disjoined from this evil seed and united to the divine light, Christ Jesus, are unprofitable to himself and to others.”

5. As to the future state, “ The Society of Friends believe that there will be a resurrection both of the righteous and the wicked ; the one to eternal life and blessedness, and the other to everlasting misery and torment, agreeably to Matt. xxv. 31-46 ; John v. 25-30 ; 1 Cor. xv. 12-58. That God will judge the world by that man whom He hath ordained, even Christ Jesus the Lord, who will render unto every man according to his works.”

6. As to the Scriptures, “ The religious Society of Friends has always believed that the Holy Scriptures were written by divine inspiration, and contain a declaration of all the fundamental doctrines and principles relating to eternal life and salvation, and that whatsoever doctrine or practice is contrary to them, is to be rejected as false and erroneous ; that they are a declaration of the mind and will of God, in and to the several ages in which they were written, and are obligatory on us, and are to be read, believed, and fulfilled by the assistance of divine grace. . . . It looks upon them as the only fit outward judge and test of controversies among Christians, and is very willing that all its doctrines and practices should be tried by them, freely admitting that whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, be condemned as a delusion of the devil."

It thus appears that the orthodox Friends are in sympathy, on all fundamental doctrines, with the great body of their fellow Christians.

Heterodox Friends.

Secondly. There is a class calling themselves Friends, and retaining the organization of the Society, and its usages as to dress, language, and mode of worship, who are really Deists. They admit of no higher authority, in matters of religion, than the natural reason and conscience of man, and hold little if anything as true beyond the truths of natural religion. This class has been disowned by the Society in its representative capacity.

Thirdly. There is a third class which does not constitute an organized or separate body, but includes men of very different views. As has been already remarked, great diversity of opinion existed among the Quakers, especially during the early period of their history. This diversity related to the common doctrines of Christianity, to the nature of the inward guiding light in which all professed to believe, and to the authority due to the sacred Scriptures. Some explicitly denied the doctrine of the Trinity and the satisfaction of Christ; some seemed to ignore the historical Christ altogether, and to refer everything to the Christ within. Others, while admitting the historical verity of the life of Christ, and of his work on earth, regarded his redemption as altogether subjective. He saves us not by what He has done for us, but exclusively by what He does in us. This, as we have seen, is the characteristic tendency of Mysticism in all its modifications.

C. The Doctrine of Friends as to the Inward Light given to all Men.

Still greater diversity of views prevailed as to the nature of the inward light which constitutes the distinguishing doctrine of the Society. The orthodox Quakers on this subject, in the first place, carefully distinguish this "light" from the natural reason and conscience of men; and also from spiritual discernment, or that inward work of the Spirit, which all Christians acknowledge, by which the soul is enabled to know "the things of the Spirit" as they are revealed in the Scriptures, and without which there can be no saving faith, and no holiness of heart or life. This spiritual illumination is peculiar to the true people of God; the inward light, in which the Quakers believe, is common to all men. The design and effect of the "inward light" are the communication of new truth, or of truth not objectively revealed, as well as the spiritual discernment of the truths of Scripture. The design and effect of spiritual illumination are the proper apprehension of truth already speculatively known.

Secondly. By the inner light the orthodox Quakers understand the supernatural influence of the Holy Spirit, concerning which they teach,—(1.) That it is given to all men. (2.) That it not only convinces of sin, and enables the soul to apprehend aright the truths of Scripture, but also communicates a knowledge of "the mysteries of salvation." "A manifestation of this Spirit they believe is given to every man to profit withal; that it convicts of sin, and, as attended to, gives power to the soul to overcome and forsake it; it opens the mind to the mysteries of salvation, enables it savingly to understand the truths recorded in the Holy Scriptures, and gives it the living, practical, and heartfelt experience of those things which pertain to its everlasting welfare." "He hath communicated a measure of the light of his own Son, a measure of the grace of the Holy Spirit — by which he invites, calls, exhorts, and strives with every man, in order to save him; which light or grace, as it is received and not resisted, works the salvation of all, even of those who are ignorant of Adam's fall, and of the death and sufferings of Christ; both by bringing them to a sense of their own misery, and to be sharers of the sufferings of Christ, inwardly; and by making them partakers of his resurrection, in becoming holy, pure, and righteous, and recovered out of their sins."¹

Thirdly. The orthodox Friends teach concerning this inward light, as has been already shown, that it is subordinate to the Holy Scriptures, inasmuch as the Scriptures are the infallible rule of faith and practice, and everything contrary thereto is to be rejected as false and destructive.

Barclay's Views.

While such are the views of the orthodox Friends, it must be admitted that many hold a different doctrine. This is true not only of those whom the Society has disowned, but of many men most prominent in their history. This difference relates both to what this light is, and to its authority. As to the former of these points the language employed is so diverse, and so figurative, that it is difficult to determine its real meaning. Some of the early Quakers spoke as though they adopted the doctrine of the earlier Mystics, that this inward principle was God himself, the divine substance. Others speak of it as Christ, or even the body of Christ, or his life. Others as "a seed," which is declared to be no part of the nature of man; no remains of the image of God in which Adam was created; neither is it the substance of God. Nevertheless, it is declared to be "a spiritual substance," in which the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are present. This seed comes from Christ, and is communicated to every man. In some it lies as a seed upon a rock, which never shows any sign of life. But when the soul receives a visitation of the Spirit, if his influence be not resisted, that seed is vivified, and develops into holiness of heart and life; by which the soul is purified and justified. We are not justified by our works. Everything is due to Christ. He is both "the giver and the gift." Nevertheless our justification consists in this subjective change.¹ He distinguished indeed between a twofold redemption; the one "performed and accomplished by Christ for us in his crucified body without us; the other is the redemption wrought by Christ in us." "The first is that whereby a man, as he stands in the fall, is put in a capacity of salvation, and hath conveyed unto him a measure of that power, virtue, spirit, life, and grace that was in Christ Jesus, which, as the free gift of God, is able to counterbalance, overcome, and root out the evil seed, wherewith we are naturally, as in the fall, leavened. The second is that whereby we witness and know this pure and perfect redemption in ourselves, purifying, cleansing, and redeeming us from the power of corruption, and bringing us into unity, favour, and friendship with God."²

¹ Evans.

With regard to the authority of this inward light, while the orthodox make it subordinate to the Scriptures, many of the early Friends made the written, subordinate to the inner, word; and others, as Barclay himself, make the two coördinate. Although in this matter he is hardly consistent with himself. He expressly denies that the Scriptures are to us "the fountain" of truth; that they are "the principal ground of all truth and knowledge, or yet the adequate primary rule of faith and manners." They are, however, "to be esteemed a secondary rule subordinate to the Spirit." Nevertheless, he teaches with equal plainness that what "cannot be proved by Scripture, is no necessary article of faith."¹ Again, he says: We are "willing to admit it as a positive and certain maxim, that whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the devil."² He "freely subscribes to that saying, Let him that preacheth any other gospel than that which hath already been preached by the Apostles, and according to the Scriptures, be accursed."³ We look on the Scriptures, he says, "as the only fit outward judge of controversies among Christians, and that whatsoever doctrine is contrary unto their testimony, may therefore justly be rejected as false."⁴ His whole book, therefore, is an effort to prove from Scripture all the peculiar doctrines of Quakerism.

¹ See Barclay's Apology, Philadelphia edition, pp. 152, 153.

² Ibid., p. 218.

His theory is, (1.) That all men since the fall are in a state of spiritual death from which they are utterly unable to deliver themselves. He is severe in his denunciation of all Pelagian and semi-Pelagian doctrine. (2.) That God determined, through his Son our Lord Jesus Christ, to make provision for the salvation of all men. (3.) The work of Christ secures the opportunity and means of salvation for every man. (4.) Through him and for his sake "a seed" is given to every man which, under the influence of the Spirit, may be developed into righteousness and holiness, restoring the soul to the image and fellowship of God. (5.) To every man is granted "a day of visitation" in which the Spirit comes to him and exerts an influence which, if not resisted, vivifies this divine seed, and thus gives the opportunity of being saved. (6.) The measure of this divine influence is not the same in all cases. In some it is irresistible, in others, not. In some it is as abundant as in the prophets and Apostles, rendering its subjects as authoritative as teachers as the original Apostles. (7.) The office of the Spirit is to teach and to guide. It is not merely intended to enlighten the mind in the knowledge of truths contained in the Scriptures. It presents truth objectively to the mind. It does not reveal new doctrines, much less doctrines opposed to those revealed in the Scriptures; but it makes a new and independent revelation of old doctrines. On this point Barclay is very explicit.⁵ His discussion of his second and third propositions, — the one concerning "immediate revelation," and the other, "the Scriptures," — sets forth this

¹ Barclay's Apology, p. 106.

⁴ Ibid., p. 100.

² Ibid., p. 100.

³ Ibid., p. 105.

⁵ See pp. 62-64, 105.

doctrine at length. "We distinguish," he says, "between a revelation of a new gospel and new doctrines, and a new revelation of the good old gospel and doctrines; the last we plead for, but the first we utterly deny." Natural reason reveals certain doctrines, but this is not inconsistent with a new revelation of the same doctrines in the Scriptures. So the fact that the gospel is revealed in the Scriptures is not inconsistent with its immediate objective revelation to the soul by the Spirit.

Besides the great doctrines of salvation, there are many things the Christian needs to know which are not contained in the Scriptures. In these matters he is not left to his own guidance. The Spirit "guides into all truth." "Therefore," says Barclay, "the Spirit of God leadeth, instructeth, and teacheth every true Christian whatsoever is needful for him to know." For example, whether he is to preach; and, if called to preach, when, where, and what he shall preach; where he is to go, and in any emergency what he ought to do. So the Spirit teaches us when and where we are to pray, and what we are to pray for. As the Spirit's guidance extends to everything, it should be sought and obeyed in all things.

Quakerism ignores the distinction between inspired and uninspired men, except as to the measure of the Spirit's influence. He dwells in all believers, and performs the same office in all. As the saints of old, before the giving of the law, were under his instruction and guidance, so they continued to enjoy his teaching after the law was given. All through the Old Testament dispensation the people of God received immediate revelations and directions. When Christ came there was a more copious communication of this influence. These communications were not confined to either sex, or to any class in the Church. They were not peculiar to the Apostles, or to ministers, but to every one was given a manifestation of the Spirit to profit withal. The state of the Church, as set forth in the New Testament as to this matter, continues to the present time, except that the gifts bestowed are not of the same miraculous character now that they were then. But as to his revealing, enlightening, teaching, guiding operations, He is as much present with believers now as during the apostolic age. Then all spake as the Spirit gave them utterance. When Christians assembled together every one had his gift: one a psalm, one a doctrine, another a revelation, another an interpretation. Every one could speak; but it was to be done decently and in order. If anything were revealed to one sitting by, he was to hold his peace until his time came; for God is not the author of confusion. In 1 Cor. xiv. we have the Quaker ideal or model of a Christian assembly. And as the Apostles went hither and thither, not according to their own judgment, but supernaturally guided by the Spirit, so the Spirit guides all believers in the ordinary affairs of life, if they wait for the intimations of his will.

As this doctrine of the Spirit's guidance is the fundamental principle of Quakerism, it is the source of all the peculiarities by which the Society of Friends has ever been distinguished. If every man has within himself an infallible guide as to truth and duty, he does not need external teaching. If it be the office of the Spirit to reveal truth objectively to the mind, and to indicate on all occasions the path of duty; and if his revealing and guiding influence be universal, and immediate, self-evidencing itself as divine, it must of necessity supersede all others; just as the Scriptures supersede reason in matters of religion. The Quakers, therefore, although, as has been shown, acknowledging the divine authority of the Scriptures, make far less of them than other denominations of evangelical Christians. They make very little of the Church and its ordinances; of the Sabbath; of a stated ministry; and nothing of the sacraments as external ordinances and means of grace. In all these respects their influence has been hurtful to the cause of Christ, while it is cheerfully admitted that some of the best Christians of our age belong to the Society of Friends.

§ 7. Objections to the Mystical Theory.

The idea on which Mysticism is founded is Scriptural and true. It is true that God has access to the human soul. It is true that He can, consistently with his own nature and with the laws of our being, supernaturally and immediately reveal truth objectively to the mind, and attend that revelation with evidence which produces an infallible assurance of its truth and of its divine origin. It is also true that such revelations have often been made to the children of men. But these cases of immediate supernatural revelation belong to the category of miracles. They are rare and are to be duly authenticated.

The common doctrine of the Christian Church is, that God has at sundry times and in divers manners spoken to the children of men; that what eye hath not seen, or ear heard, what never could have entered into the heart of man, God has revealed by his Spirit to those whom He selected to be his spokesmen to their fellow-men; that these revelations were authenticated as divine, by their character, their effects, and by signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost; that these holy men of old who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, communicated the revelations which they had received not only orally, but in writing, employing not the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; so that we have in the sacred Scriptures the things of the Spirit recorded in the words of the Spirit; which Scriptures, therefore, are the Word of God, — i. e., what God says to man; what He declares to be true and obligatory, — and constitute for his Church the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

Romanists, while admitting the infallibility of the written Word, still contend that it is not sufficient; and hold that God continues in a supernatural manner to guide the Church by rendering its bishops infallible teachers in all matters pertaining to truth and duty.

Mystics, making the same admission as to the infallibility of Scripture, claim that the Spirit is given to every man as an inward teacher and guide, whose instructions and influence are the highest rule of faith, and sufficient, even without the Scriptures, to secure the salvation of the soul.

Mysticism has no Foundation in the Scriptures.

The objections to the Romish and Mystical theory are substantially the same.

1. There is no foundation for either in Scriptures. As the Scriptures contain no promise of infallible guidance to bishops, so they contain no promise of the Spirit as the immediate revealer of truth to every man. Under the Old Testament dispensation the Spirit did indeed reveal the mind and purposes of God; but it was to selected persons chosen to be prophets, authenticated as divine messengers, whose instructions the people were bound to receive as coming from God. In like manner, under the new dispensation, our Lord selected twelve men, endowed them with plenary knowledge of the Gospel, rendered them infallible as teachers, and required all men to receive their instructions as the words of God. It is true that during the apostolic age there were occasional communications made to a class of persons called prophets. But this "gift of prophecy," that is, the gift of speaking under the inspiration of the Spirit, was analogous to the gift of miracles. The one has as obviously ceased as the other.

It is true, also, that our Lord promised to send the Spirit, who was to abide with the Church, to dwell in his people, to be their teacher, and to guide them into the knowledge of all truth. But what truth? Not historical or scientific truth, but plainly revealed truth; truth which He himself had taught, or made known by his authorized messengers. The Spirit is indeed a teacher; and without his instructions there is no saving knowledge of divine things, for the Apostle tells us, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." (1 Cor. ii. 14.) Spiritual discernment, therefore, is the design and effect of the Spirit's teaching. And the things discerned are "the things freely given to us of God," i. e., as the context shows, the things revealed to the Apostles and clearly made known in the Scriptures.

The Apostle John tells his readers, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things" (1 John ii. 20), and again, ver. 27, "The anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in Him." These passages teach what all evangelical Christians admit. First, that true knowledge, or spiritual discernment of divine things, is due to the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit; and secondly, that true faith, or the infallible assurance of the truths revealed, is due in like manner to the "demonstration of the Spirit." (1 Cor. ii. 4.) The Apostle John also says: "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself." (1 John v. 10.) Saving faith does not rest on the testimony of the Church, nor on the outward evidence of miracles and prophecy, but on the inward testimony of the Spirit with and by the truth in our hearts. He who has this inward testimony needs no other. He does not need to be told by other men what is truth; this same anointing teaches him what is truth, and that no lie is of the truth. Christians were not to believe every spirit. They were to try the spirits whether they were of God. And the test or criterion of trial was the external, authenticated revelation of God, as spiritually discerned and demonstrated by the inward operations of the Spirit. So now when errorists come and tell the people there is no God, no sin, no retribution, no need of a Saviour, or of expiation, or of faith; that Jesus of Nazareth is not the Son of God, God manifest in the flesh, the true Christian has no need to be told that these are what the Apostle calls lies. He has an inward witness to the truth of the record which God has given of his Son.

If the Bible gives no support to the Mystical doctrine of the inward, supernatural, objective revelation of truth made by the Spirit to every man, that doctrine is destitute of all foundation, for it is only by the testimony of God that any such doctrine can be established.

Mysticism is contrary to the Scriptures.

2. The doctrine in question is not only destitute of support from Scripture, but it contradicts the Scriptures. It is not only opposed to isolated declarations of the Word of God, but to the whole revealed plan of God's dealing with his people. Everywhere, and under all dispensations, the rule of faith and duty has been the teaching of authenticated messengers of God. The appeal has always been "to the law and testimony." The prophets came saying, "Thus saith the Lord." Men were required to believe and obey what was communicated to them, and not what the Spirit revealed to each individual. It was the outward and not the inward word to which they were to attend. And under the gospel the command of Christ to his disciples, was, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mar. xvi. 15, 16), — believeth, of course, the gospel which they preached. Faith cometh by hearing. "How," asks the Apostle, "shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. x. 14.) God, he tells us, hath determined to save men by the foolishness of preaching. (1 Cor. i. 21.) It is the preaching of the cross he declares to be the power of God. (Verse 18.) It is the gospel, the external revelation of the plan of salvation through Jesus Christ, he says in Rom. i. 16, "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek; for therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." This idea runs through the whole New Testament. Christ commissioned his disciples to preach the gospel. He declared that to be the way in which men were to be saved. They accordingly went forth preaching everywhere. This preaching was to continue to the end of the world. Therefore, provision was made for continuing the ministry. Men called and qualified by the Spirit, were to be selected and set apart to this work by divine command. And it is in this way, so far, the world has been converted. In no case do we find the Apostles calling upon the people, whether Jews or Gentiles, to look within themselves, to listen to the inner Word. They were to listen to the outward Word; to believe what they heard, and were to pray for the Holy Spirit to enable them to understand, receive, and obey what was thus externally made known to them.

Contrary to the Facts of Experience.

8. The doctrine in question is no less contrary to fact than it is to Scripture. The doctrine teaches that by the inward revelation of the Spirit saving knowledge of truth and duty is given to every man. But all experience shows that without the written Word, men everywhere and in all ages, are ignorant of divine things, — without God, without Christ, and without hope in the world. The sun is not more obviously the source of light, than the Bible is the source of divine knowledge. The absence of the one is as clearly indicated as the absence of the other. It is incredible that an inward revelation of saving truth is made to every man by the Holy Spirit, if the appropriate effects of that revelation are nowhere manifested. It is to be remembered that without the knowledge of God, there can be no religion. Without right apprehensions of the Supreme Being, there can be no right affections towards him. Without the knowledge of Christ, there can be no faith in him. Without truth there can be no holiness, any more than there can be vision without light. As right apprehensions of God, and holiness of heart and life, are nowhere found where the Scriptures are unknown, it is plain that the Scriptures, and not an inward light common to all men, are, by the ordinance of God, the only source to us of saving and sanctifying knowledge.

There is a sense in which, as all evangelical Christians believe, the Spirit is given to every man. He is present with every human mind exciting to good and restraining from evil. To this the order, and what there is of morality in the world, are due. Without this "common grace," or general influence of the Spirit, there would be no difference between our world and hell; for hell is a place or state in which men are finally given up of God. In like manner, there is a general providential efficiency of God by which He coöperates with second causes, in the productions of the wonderful phenomena of the external world. Without that coöperation — the continued guidance of mind — the cosmos would become chaos. But the fact that this providential efficiency of God is universal, is no proof that He everywhere works miracles, that He constantly operates without the intervention of second causes. So, also, the fact that the Spirit is present with every human mind, and constantly enforces the truth present to that mind, is no proof that He makes immediate, supernatural revelations to every human being. The fact is, we cannot see without light. We have the sun to give us light. It is vain to say that every man has an inward light sufficient to guide him without the sun. Facts are against the theory.

No Criterion by which to judge of the Source of Inward Suggestions.

4. A fourth objection to the Mystical doctrine is that there is no criterion by which a man can test these inward impulses or revelations, and determine which are from the Spirit of God, and which are from his own heart or from Satan, who often appears and acts as an angel of light. This objection, Barclay says, "Bespeaketh much ignorance in the opposers. . . . For it is one thing to affirm that the true and undoubted revelation of God's Spirit is certain and infallible; and another thing to affirm that this or that particular person or people is led infallibly by this revelation in what they speak or write, because they affirm themselves to be so led by the inward and immediate revelation of the Spirit."¹ It is admitted that there is an inward and infallible testimony of the Spirit in the hearts of believers to the truths objectively revealed in the Scriptures. It is admitted, also, that there have been immediate revelations of truth to the mind, as in the case of the prophets and Apostles, and that these revelations authenticate themselves, or are attended with an infallible assurance that they come from God. But these admissions do not invalidate the objection as above stated. Granted that a man who receives a true revelation knows that it is from God; how is the man who receives a false revelation to know that it is not from God? Many men honestly believe themselves to be inspired, who are under the influence of some evil spirit,—their own it may be. The assurance or certainty of conviction may be as strong in one case as in the other. In the one it is well founded, in the other it is a delusion. Irresistible conviction is not enough. It may satisfy the subject of it himself. But it cannot either satisfy others, or be a criterion of truth. Thousands have been, and still are, fully convinced that the false is true, and that what is wrong is right. To tell men, therefore, to look within for an authoritative guide, and to trust to their irresistible convictions, is to give them a guide which will lead them to destruction. When God really makes revelations to the soul, He not only gives an infallible assurance that the revelation is divine, but accompanies it with evidence satisfactory to others as well as to the recipient that it is from God. All his revelations have had the seal both of internal and external evidence. And when the believer is assured, by the testimony of the Spirit, of the truths of Scripture, he has only a new kind of evidence of what is already authenticated beyond all rational contradiction. Our blessed Lord himself said to the Jews, "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works." (John x. 37, 38.) He even goes so far as to say, "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin." (John xv. 24.) The inward teaching and testimony of the Spirit are Scriptural truths, and truths of inestimable value. But it is ruinous to put them in the place of the divinely authenticated written Word.

¹ Barclay's Apology, p. 67.

The Doctrine productive of Evil.

5. Our Lord says of men, "By their fruits ye shall know them." The same rule of judgment applies to doctrines. Mysticism has always been productive of evil. It has led to the neglect or undervaluing of divine institutions, — of the Church, of the ministry, of the sacraments, of the Sabbath, and of the Scriptures. History shows that it has also led to the greatest excesses and social evils. The Society of Friends has in a good degree escaped these evils. But it has been by a happy inconsistency. They have not carried out their principle. For, while they teach that the inward revelations of the Spirit present the "formal object" of faith; that they are clear and certain, forcing "the well-disposed understanding to assent, irresistibly moving it thereto;" that they are the primary, immediate, and principal source of divine knowledge; that they are not "to be subjected to the examination either of the outward testimony of the Scriptures, or of the natural reason of man, as to a more noble or certain rule or touchstone;"¹ yet they also teach that nothing not contained in the Scriptures can be an article of faith; that we are bound to believe all the Bible teaches; that everything contrary to its teaching is to be rejected as "a delusion of the devil," no matter from what source it may come; and that the Scriptures are the judge of controversies among Christians; and thus they, as a society, have been preserved from the excesses into which Mystics have generally run. Nevertheless, the Mystical principle of immediate, objective revelation of truth to every man, as his principal and primary rule of faith and practice, has wrought with Friends its legitimate fruit, inasmuch as it has led to comparative neglect of the Scriptures and of the ordinances of the Church.

¹ Barclay's Second Proposition.

CHAPTER V.

ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINE CONCERNING THE RULE OF FAITH.

§ 1. Statement of the Doctrine.

1. ROMANISTS reject the doctrine of the Rationalists who make human reason either the source or standard of religious truth. It is one of their principles, that faith is merely human when either its object or ground is human. Faith to be divine must have truth supernaturally revealed as its object, and the evidence on which it rests must be the supernatural testimony of God.

2. They reject the Mystical doctrine that divine truth is revealed to every man by the Spirit. They admit an objective, supernatural revelation.

3. They maintain, however, that this revelation is partly written and partly unwritten; that is, the rule of faith includes both Scripture and tradition. Moreover, as the people cannot certainly know what books are of divine origin, and, therefore, entitled to a place in the canon; and as they are incompetent to decide on the meaning of Scripture, or which among the multitude of traditionary doctrines and usages are divine, and which are human, God has made the Church an infallible teacher by which all these points are determined, whose testimony is the proximate and sufficient ground of faith to the people.

So far as the Romish doctrine concerning the Rule of Faith differs from that of Protestants, it presents the following points for consideration: First, The doctrine of Romanists concerning the Scriptures. Second, Their doctrine concerning tradition. Third, Their doctrine concerning the office and authority of the Church as a teacher.

§ 2. Roman Catholic Doctrine concerning the Scriptures.

On this subject Romanists agree with Protestants, (1.) In teaching the plenary inspiration and consequent infallible authority of the sacred writings. Of these writings the Council of Trent says that God is their author, and that they were written by the dictation of the Holy Spirit ("Spiritu sancto dictante").

(2.) They agree with us in receiving into the sacred canon all the books which we regard as of divine authority.

Romanists differ from Protestants in regard to the Scriptures, —

1. In receiving into the canon certain books which Protestants do not admit to be inspired, namely: Tobit, Judith, Sirach, parts of Esther, the Wisdom of Solomon, First, Second, and Third Books of the Maccabees (the Third Book of Maccabees, however, is not included in the Vulgate), Baruch, the Hymn of the Three Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon. These books are not all included by name in the list given by the Council of Trent. Several of them are parts of the books there enumerated. Thus, the Hymn of the Three Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon, appear as parts of the book of Daniel. Some modern theologians of the Romish Church refer all the apocryphal books to what they call "The Second Canon," and admit that they are not of equal authority with those belonging to the First Canon.¹ The Council of Trent, however, makes no such distinction.

Incompleteness of the Scriptures.

2. A second point of difference is that Romanists deny, and Protestants affirm, the completeness of the sacred Scriptures. That is, Protestants maintain that all the extant supernatural revelations of God, which constitute the rule of faith to his Church, are contained in his written word. Romanists, on the other hand, hold that some doctrines which all Christians are bound to believe, are only imperfectly revealed in the Scriptures; that others are only obscurely intimated; and that others are not therein contained at all. The Preface to the Romish Catechism (Quest. 12) says, "Omnis doctrinæ ratio, quæ fidelibus tradenda sit, verbo Dei continetur, quod in scripturam traditionesque distributum est." Bel-larmin² says expressly, "Nos asserimus, in Scripturis non contineri expressè totam doctrinam necessariam, sive de fide sive de moribus; et proinde præter verbum Dei scriptum requiri etiam verbum Dei non-scriptum, i. e., divinas et apostolicas traditiones." On this point the Romish theologians are of one mind; but what the doctrines are, which are thus imperfectly revealed in the Scriptures, or merely implied, or entirely omitted, has never been authoritatively decided by the Church of Rome. The theologians of that Church, with more or less unanimity, refer to one or the other of these classes the following doctrines: (1.) The canon of Scripture. (2.) The inspiration of the sacred writers. (3.) The full doctrine of the Trinity. (4.) The personality and divinity of the Holy Spirit. (5.) Infant baptism. (6.) The observance of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath. (7.) The threefold orders of the ministry. (8.) The government of the Church by bishops. (9.) The perpetuity of the apostleship. (10.) The grace of orders. (11.) The sacrificial nature of the Eucharist. (12.) The seven sacraments. (13.) Purgatory. It lies in the interests of the advocates of tradition to depreciate the Scriptures, and to show how much the Church would lose if she had no other source of knowledge of divine truth but the written word. On this subject the author of No. 85 of the Oxford Tracts, when speaking even of essential doctrines, says,¹ "It is a near thing that they are in the Scriptures at all. The wonder is that they are all there. Humanly judging they would not be there but for God's interposition; and, therefore, since they are there by a sort of accident, it is not strange they shall be but latent there, and only indirectly producible thence." "The gospel doctrine," says the same writer, "is but indirectly and covertly recorded in Scripture under the surface."

¹ See B. Lamy, Apparatus Bibl. lib. ii. c. 5. Jahn's Einleitung, Th. i. s. 132. Moehler's Symbolik.

² De Verbo Dei, iv. 3, tom. i. p. 163, e. edit. Paris, 1608.

Tradition is always represented by Romanists as not only the interpreter, but the complement of the Scriptures. The Bible, therefore, is, according to the Church of Rome, incomplete. It does not contain all the Church is bound to believe; nor are the doctrines which it does contain therein fully or clearly made known.

Obscurity of the Scriptures.

3. The third point of difference between Romanists and Protestants relates to the perspicuity of Scripture, and the right of private judgment. Protestants hold that the Bible, being addressed to the people, is sufficiently perspicuous to be understood by them, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; and that they are entitled and bound to search the Scripture, and to judge for themselves what is its true meaning. Romanists, on the other hand, teach that the Scriptures are so obscure that they need a visible, present, and infallible interpreter; and that the people, being incompetent to understand them, are bound to believe whatever doctrines the Church, through its official organs, declares to be true and divine. On this subject the Council of Trent (Sess. 4), says: "Ad coercenda petulantia ingenia decernit (Synodus), ut nemo, suæ prudentiæ innixus, in rebus fidei et morum ad ædificationem doctrinæ Christianæ pertinentium, Sacram Scripturam ad suas sensus contorquens contra eum sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater Ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione Scripturarum Sanctarum, aut etiam contra unanimem consensum patrum ipsam scripturam sacram interpretari audeat, etiamsi hujus modi interpretationes nullo nunquam tempore in lucem edendæ forent. Qui contravenerint, per ordinarios declarentur et pœnis a jure statutis puniantur." Bellarmin¹ says: "Non ignorabat Deus multas in Ecclesia exorituras difficultates circa fidem, debuit igitur judicem aliquem Ecclesiæ providere. At iste judex non potest esse Scriptura, neque Spiritus revelans privatus, neque princeps secularis, igitur princeps ecclesiasticus vel solus vel certe cum consilio et consensu coepiscoporum."

¹ Pages 34 and 35.

From this view of the obscurity of Scripture it follows that the use of the sacred volume by the people, is discountenanced by the Church of Rome, although its use has never been prohibited by any General Council. Such prohibitions, however, have repeatedly been issued by the Popes; as by Gregory VII., Innocent III., Clemens XI., and Pius IV., who made the liberty to read any vernacular version of the Scriptures, dependent on the permission of the priest. There have been, however, many Romish prelates and theologians who encouraged the general reading of the Bible. The spirit of the Latin Church and the effects of its teaching, are painfully manifested by the fact that the Scriptures are practically inaccessible to the mass of the people in strictly Roman Catholic countries.

The Latin Vulgate.

4. The fourth point of difference concerns the authority due to the Latin Vulgate. On this subject the Council of Trent (Sess. 4), says: "Synodus considerans non parum utilitatis accedere posse Ecclesiæ Dei, si ex omnibus Latinis editionibus quæ circumferantur, sacrorum librorum, quænam pro authentica habenda sit, innotescat: statuit et declarat, ut hæc ipsa vetus et vulgata editio, quæ longo tot seculorum usu in ipsa Ecclesia probata est, in publicis lectionibus, disputationibus, prædicationibus et expositionibus pro authentica habeatur et nemo illam rejicere quovis prætextu audeat vel præsumat." The meaning of this decree is a matter of dispute among Romanists themselves. Some of the more modern and liberal of their theologians say that the Council simply intended to determine which among several Latin versions was to be used in the service of the Church. They contend that it was not meant to forbid appeal to the original Scriptures, or to place the Vulgate on a par with them in authority. The earlier and stricter Romanists take the ground that the Synod did intend to forbid an appeal to the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, and to make the Vulgate the ultimate authority. The language of the Council seems to favor this interpretation. The Vulgate was to be used not only for the ordinary purposes of public instruction, but in all theological discussions, and in all works of exegesis.

¹ De Verbo Dei, iii. 9, tom. i. p. 151, d. ut sup.

§ 3. Tradition.

The word tradition (παράδοσις) means, (1.) The art of delivering over from one to another. (2.) The thing delivered or communicated. In the New Testament it is used (a.) For instructions delivered from some to others, without reference to the mode of delivery, whether it be orally or by writing; as in 2 Thess. ii. 15, "Hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle;" and iii. 6, "Withdraw yourself from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us." (b.) For the oral instructions of the fathers handed down from generation to generation, but not contained in the Scriptures, and yet regarded as authoritative. In this sense our Lord so frequently speaks of "the traditions of the Pharisees." (c.) In Gal. i. 14, where Paul speaks of his zeal for the traditions of his fathers, it may include both the written and unwritten instructions which he had received. What he was so zealous about, was the whole system of Judaism as he had been taught it.

In the early Church the word was used in this wide sense. Appeal was constantly made to "the traditions," i. e., the instructions which the churches had received. It was only certain churches at first which had any of the written instructions of the Apostles. And it was not until the end of the first century that the writings of the Evangelists and Apostles were collected, and formed into a canon, or rule of faith. And when the books of the New Testament had been collected, the fathers spoke of them as containing the traditions, i. e., the instructions derived from Christ and his Apostles. They called the Gospels "the evangelical traditions," and the Epistles "the apostolical traditions." In that age of the Church the distinction between the written and unwritten word had not yet been distinctly made. But as controversies arose, and disputants on both sides of all questions appealed to "tradition," i. e., to what they had been taught; and when it was found that these traditions differed, one church saying their teachers had always taught them one thing, and another that theirs had taught them the opposite, it was felt that there should be some common and authoritative standard. Hence the wisest and best of the fathers insisted on abiding by the written word, and receiving nothing as of divine authority not contained therein. In this, however, it must be confessed they were not always consistent. Whenever prescription, usage, or conviction founded on unwritten evidence, was available against an adversary, they did not hesitate to make the most of it. During all the early centuries, therefore, the distinction between Scripture and tradition was not so sharply drawn as it has been since the controversies between Romanists and Protestants, and especially since the decisions of the Council of Trent.

Tridentine Doctrine.

That Council, and the Latin Church as a body, teach on this subject, — (1.) That Christ and his Apostles taught many things which were not committed to writing, i. e., not recorded in the Sacred Scriptures. (2.) That these instructions have been faithfully transmitted, and preserved in the Church. (3.) That they constitute a part of the rule of faith for all believers.

These particulars are included in the following extracts from the acts of the Council: “Synodus — perspicuens hanc veritatem et disciplinam contineri in libris scriptis et sine scripto traditionibus, quæ ex ipsius Christi ore ab apostolis acceptæ, aut ab ipsis apostolis, Spiritu Sancto dictante, quasi per manus traditæ, ad nos usque pervenerunt; orthodoxorum patrum exempla secuta, omnes libros tam Veteris quam Novi Testamenti, cum utriusque unus Deus sit auctor, nec non traditiones ipsas, tum ad fidem tum ad mores pertinentes, tanquam vel ore tenus a Christo, vel a Spiritu Sancto dictatas, et continuâ successione in Ecclesia Catholica conservatas, pari pietatis affectu et reverentia suscipit et venerationi.”¹

Bellarmin² divides traditions into three classes: divine, apostolical, and ecclesiastical. “Divinæ dicuntur quæ acceptæ sunt ab ipso Christo apostolos docente, et nusquam in divinis literis inveniuntur. . . . Apostolicæ traditiones proprie dicuntur illæ, quæ ab apostolis institutæ sunt, non tamen sine assistentia Spiritus Sancti et nihilominus non extant scriptæ in eorum epistolis. . . . Ecclesiasticæ traditiones proprie dicuntur consuetudines quædam antiquæ vel a prælatis vel a populis inchoatæ, quæ paulatim tacito consensu populorum vim legis obtinuerunt.

¹ Trent. Sess. iv.

² De Verbo Dei, iv. 1.

Et quidem traditiones divinæ eandem vim habent, quam divina præcepta sive divina doctrina scripta in Evangeliiis. Et similiter apostolicæ traditiones non scriptæ eandem vim habent, quam apostolicæ traditiones scriptæ. . . . Ecclesiasticæ autem traditiones eandem vim habent, quam decreta et constitutiones ecclesiasticæ scriptæ."

Petrus à Soto, quoted by Chemnitz¹ says, "Infallibilis est regula et catholica. Quacunque credit, tenet, et servat Romana Ecclesia, et in Scripturis non habentur, illa ab apostolis esse tradita; item quarum observationum initium, author et origo ignoretur, vel inveniri non potest, illas extra omnem dubitationem ab apostolis tradita esse."

From this it appears, 1. That these traditions are called unwritten because not contained in the Scriptures. They are, for the most part, now to be found written in the works of the Fathers, decisions of councils, ecclesiastical constitutions, and rescripts of the Popes.

2. The office of tradition is to convey a knowledge of doctrines, precepts, and institutions not contained in Scripture; and also to serve as a guide to the proper understanding of what is therein written. Tradition, therefore, in the Church of Rome, is both the supplement and interpretation of the written word.

3. The authority due to tradition is the same as that which belongs to the Scriptures. Both are to be received "pari pietatis affectu et reverentia." Both are derived from the same source; both are received through the same channel; and both are authenticated by the same witness. This authority, however, belongs properly only to traditions regarded as divine or apostolical. Those termed ecclesiastical are of less importance, relating to rites and usages. Still for them is claimed an authority virtually divine, as they are enjoined by a church which claims to have been endowed by Christ with full power to ordain rites and ceremonies.

4. The criteria by which to distinguish between true and false traditions, are either antiquity and catholicity, or the testimony of the extant Church. Sometimes the one, and sometimes the other is urged. The Council of Trent gives the former; so does Bellarmine, and so do the majority of Romish theologians. This is the famous rule established by Vincent of Lerins in the fifth century, "quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus." On all occasions, however, the ultimate appeal is to the decision of the Church. Whatever the Church declares to be a part of the revelation committed to her, is to be received as of divine authority, at the peril of salvation.

¹ Examen Concilii Tridentini, p. 85, edit. Frankfort, 1574.

§ 4. The Office of the Church as Teacher.

1. Romanists define the Church to be the company of men professing the same faith, united in the communion of the same sacraments, subject to lawful pastors, and specially to the Pope. By the first clause they exclude from the Church all infidels and heretics; by the second, all the unbaptized; by the third, all who are not subject to bishops having canonical succession; and by the fourth, all who do not acknowledge the Bishop of Rome to be the head of the Church on earth. It is this external, visible society thus constituted, that God has made an authoritative and infallible teacher.

2. The Church is qualified for this office: first, by the communication of all the revelations of God, written and unwritten; and secondly, by the constant presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit preserving it from all error in its instructions. On this point the "Roman Catechisin,"¹ says: "Quemadmodum hæc una Ecclesia errare non potest in fidei ac morum disciplina tradenda, cum a Spiritu Sancto gubernetur; ita ceteras omnes, quæ sibi ecclesiæ nomen arrogant, ut quæ Diaboli spiritu ducantur, in doctrinæ et morum perniciosissimis erroribus versari necesse est." And Bellarmin,² "Nostre sententiæ est Ecclesiam absolute non posse errare nec in rebus absolute necessariis nec in aliis, quæ credenda vel facienda nobis proponit, sive habeantur expresse in Scripturis, sive non."

3. The Church, according to these statements, is infallible only as to matters of faith and morals. Its infallibility does not extend over the domains of history, philosophy, or science. Some theologians would even limit the infallibility of the Church, to essential doctrines. But the Church of Rome does not make the distinction, recognized by all Protestants, between essential and non-essential doctrines. With Romanists, that is essential, or necessary, which the Church pronounces to be a part of the revelation of God. Bellarmin — than whom there is no greater authority among Romish theologians — says that the Church can err "nec in rebus absolute necessariis nec in aliis," i. e., neither in things in their own nature necessary, nor in those which become necessary when determined and enjoined. It has been disputed among Romanists, whether the Church is infallible in matters of fact as well as in matters of doctrine. By facts, in this discussion, are not meant facts of history or science, but facts involved in doctrinal decisions. When the Pope condemned certain propositions taken from the works of

¹ Part 1. cap. x. quest. 15.

² De Ecclesia Militante, c. 14.

Jansenius, his disciples had to admit that those propositions were erroneous; but they denied that they were contained, in the sense condemned, in the writings of their master. To this the Jesuits replied, that the infallibility of the Church extended in such cases as much to the fact as to the doctrine. This the Jansenists denied.

The Organs of the Church's Infallibility.

4. As to the organs of the Church in its infallible teaching, there are two theories, the Episcopal and Papal, or, as they are designated from their principal advocates, the Gallican and the Transmontane. According to the former, the bishops, in their collective capacity, as the official successors of the Apostles, are infallible as teachers. Individual bishops may err, the body or college of bishops cannot err. Whatever the bishops of any age of the Church unite in teaching, is, for that age, the rule of faith. This concurrence of judgment need not amount to entire unanimity. The greater part, the common judgment of the episcopate, is all that is required. To their decision all dissentients are bound to submit. This general judgment may be pronounced in a council, representing the whole Church, or in any other way in which agreement may be satisfactorily indicated. Acquiescence in the decisions of even a provincial council, or of the Pope, or the several bishops, each in his own diocese, teaching the same doctrine, is sufficient proof of consent.

The Transmontane Theory.

According to the Papal, or Transmontane theory, the Pope is the organ through which the infallible judgment of the Church is pronounced. He is the vicar of Christ. He is not subject to a general council. He is not required to consult other bishops before he gives his decision. This infallibility is not personal, but official. As a man the Pope may be immoral, heretical, or infidel; as Pope, when speaking ex cathedra, he is the organ of the Holy Ghost. The High-Priest among the Jews might be erroneous in faith, or immoral in conduct, but when consulting God in his official capacity, he was the mere organ of divine communication. Such, in few words, is the doctrine of Romanists concerning the Rule of Faith.

In the recent Ecumenical Council, held in the Vatican, after a protracted struggle, the Transmontane doctrine was sanctioned. It is, therefore, now obligatory on all Romanists to believe that the Pope, when speaking ex cathedra, is infallible.

§ 5. Examination of the Romish Doctrine.

Hundreds of volumes have been written in the discussion of the various points included in the theory above stated. Only a most cursory view of the controversy can be given in such a work as this. So far as Romanists differ from us on the canon of Scripture, the examination of their views belongs to the department of Biblical literature. What concerns their doctrine of the incompleteness and obscurity of the written word, and the consequent necessity of an infallible, visible interpreter, can better be said under the head of the Protestant doctrine of the Rule of Faith. The two points to be now considered are Tradition, and the office of the Church as a teacher. These subjects are so related that it is difficult to keep them distinct. Tradition is the teaching of the Church, and the teaching of the Church is tradition. These subjects are not only thus intimately related, but they are generally included under the same head in the Catholic Symbols. Nevertheless, they are distinct, and involve very different principles. They should, therefore, be considered separately.

§ 6. Examination of the Doctrine of the Church of Rome on Tradition.

A. Difference between Tradition and the Analogy of Faith.

1. The Romish doctrine of tradition differs essentially from the Protestant doctrine of the analogy of faith. Protestants admit that there is a kind of tradition within the limits of the sacred Scriptures themselves. One generation of sacred writers received the whole body of truth taught by those who preceded them. There was a tradition of doctrine, a traditionary usus loquendi, traditionary figures, types, and symbols. The revelation of God in his Word begins in a fountain, and flows in a continuous stream ever increasing in volume. We are governed by this tradition of truth running through the whole sacred volume. All is consistent. One part cannot contradict another. Each part must be interpreted so as to bring it into harmony with the whole. This is only saying that Scripture must explain Scripture.

2. Again, Protestants admit that as there has been an uninterrupted tradition of truth from the protevangelium to the close of the Apocalypse, so there has been a stream of traditionary teaching flowing through the Christian Church from the day of Pentecost to the present time. This tradition is so far a rule of faith that nothing contrary to it can be true. Christians do not stand isolated, each holding his own creed. They constitute one body, having one common creed. Rejecting that creed, or any of its parts, is the rejection of the fellowship of Christians, incompatible with the communion of saints, or membership in the body of Christ. In other words, Protestants admit that there is a common faith of the Church, which no man is at liberty to reject, and which no man can reject and be a Christian. They acknowledge the authority of this common faith for two reasons. First, because what all the competent readers of a plain book take to be its meaning, must be its meaning. Secondly, because the Holy Spirit is promised to guide the people of God into the knowledge of the truth, and therefore that which they, under the teachings of the Spirit, agree in believing must be true. There are certain fixed doctrines among Christians, as there are among Jews and Mohammedans, which are no longer open questions. The doctrines of the Trinity, of the divinity and incarnation of the eternal Son of God; of the personality and divinity of the Holy Spirit; of the apostasy and sinfulness of the human race; the doctrines of the expiation of sin through the death of Christ and of salvation through his merits; of regeneration and sanctification by the Holy Ghost; of the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and of the life everlasting, have always entered into the faith of every recognized, historical church on the face of the earth, and cannot now be legitimately called into question by any pretending to be Christians.

Some of the more philosophical of the Romish theologians would have us believe that this is all they mean by tradition. They insist, they say, only on the authority of common consent. Thus Moehler, Professor of Theology at Munich, in his "Symbolik, oder Darstellung der Dogmatischen Gegensätze," says, "Tradition, in the subjective sense of the word, is the common faith, or consciousness of the Church."¹ "The ever-living word in the hearts of believers."² It is, he says, what Eusebius means by the ἐκκλησιαστικὸν φρόνημα; and what Vincent of Lerins intends by the ecclesiastica intelligentia, and the Council of Trent by the universus ecclesiæ sensus. "In the objective sense of the word," Moehler says that "Tradition is the common faith of the Church as presented in external, historical witnesses through all centuries." "In this latter sense," he tells us, "tradition is commonly viewed when spoken of as a guide to the interpretation of the rule of faith."³ He admits that in this sense "Tradition contains nothing beyond what is taught in Scripture; the two as to their contents are one and the same.”¹ Nevertheless, he acknowledges that in the Church of Rome many things were handed down from the Apostles which are not contained in the Scriptures. This fact he does not deny. He admits that such additional revelations, or such revelations in addition to those contained in the written word, are of the highest importance. But he soon dismisses the subject, and devotes his strength to the first-mentioned view of the nature and office of tradition, and holds that up as the peculiar doctrine of Romanism as opposed to the Protestant doctrine. Protestants, however, admit the fact and the authority of a common consciousness, and a common faith, or common sense of the Church, while they reject the real and peculiar doctrine of Rome on this subject.

¹ Page 356.² Page 357.³ Page 358.

B. Points of Difference between the Romish Doctrine and that of Protestants on Common Consent.

The points of difference between the Protestant doctrine concerning the common faith of the Church and the Roman Catholic doctrine of tradition are :—

First. When Protestants speak of common consent of Christians, they understand by Christians the true people of God. Romanists, on the other hand, mean the company of those who profess the true faith, and who are subject to the Pope of Rome. There is the greatest possible difference between the authority due to the common faith of truly regenerated, holy men, the temples of the Holy Ghost, and that due to what a society of nominal Christians profess to believe, the great majority of whom may be worldly, immoral, and irreligious.

Secondly. The common consent for which Protestants plead concerns only essential doctrines; that is, doctrines which enter into the very nature of Christianity as a religion, and which are necessary to its subjective existence in the heart, or which if they do not enter essentially into the religious experience of believers, are so connected with vital doctrines as not to admit of separation from them. Romanists, on the contrary, plead the authority of tradition for all kinds of doctrines and precepts, for rites and ceremonies, and ecclesiastical institutions, which have nothing to do with the life of the Church, and are entirely outside of the sphere of the promised guidance of the Spirit. Our Lord, in promising the Spirit to guide his people into the knowledge of truths necessary to their salvation, did not promise to preserve them from error in subordinate matters, or to give them supernatural knowledge of the organization of the Church, the number of the sacraments, or the power of bishops. The two theories, therefore, differ not only as to the class of persons who are guided by the Spirit, but also as to the class of subjects in relation to which that guidance is promised.

Thirdly. A still more important difference is, that the common faith of the Church for which Protestants contend, is faith in doctrines plainly revealed in Scripture. It does not extend beyond those doctrines. It owes its whole authority to the fact that it is a common understanding of the written word, attained and preserved under that teaching of the Spirit, which secures to believers a competent knowledge of the plan of salvation therein revealed. On the other hand, tradition is with the Romanists entirely independent of the Scriptures. They plead for a common consent in doctrines not contained in the Word of God, or which cannot be proved therefrom.

Fourthly. Protestants do not regard "common consent" either as an informant or as a ground of faith. With them the written word is the only source of knowledge of what God has revealed for our salvation, and his testimony therein is the only ground of our faith. Whereas, with Romanists, tradition is not only an informant of what is to be believed, but the witness on whose testimony faith is to be yielded. It is one thing to say that the fact that all the true people of God, under the guidance of the Spirit, believe that certain doctrines are taught in Scripture, is an unanswerable argument that they are really taught therein, and quite another thing to say that because an external society, composed of all sorts of men, to whom no promise of divine guidance has been given, agree in holding certain doctrines, therefore we are bound to receive those doctrines as part of the revelation of God.

C. Tradition and Development.

The Romish doctrine of tradition is not to be confounded with the modern doctrine of development. All Protestants admit that there has been, in one sense, an uninterrupted development of theology in the Church, from the apostolic age to the present time. All the facts, truths, doctrines, and principles, which enter into Christian theology, are in the Bible. They are there as fully and as clearly at one time as at another; at the beginning as they are now. No addition has been made to their number, and no new explanation has been afforded of their nature or relations. The same is true of the facts of nature. They are now what they have been from the beginning. They are, however, far better known, and more clearly understood now than they were a thousand years ago. The mechanism of the heavens was the same in the days of Pythagoras as it was in those of La Place ; and yet the astronomy of the latter was immeasurably in advance of that of the former. The change was effected by a continual and gradual progress. The same progress has taken place in theological knowledge. Every believer is conscious of such progress in his own experience. When he was a child, he thought as a child. As he grew in years, he grew in knowledge of the Bible. He increased not only in the compass, but in the clearness, order, and harmony of his knowledge. This is just as true of the Church collectively as of the individual Christian. It is, in the first place, natural, if not inevitable, that it should be so. The Bible, although so clear and simple in its teaching, that he who runs may read and learn enough to secure his salvation, is still full of the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God ; full of τὰ βᾶθη τοῦ θεοῦ, the profoundest truths concerning all the great problems which have taxed the intellect of man from the beginning. These truths are not systematically stated, but scattered, so to speak, promiscuously over the sacred pages, just as the facts of science are scattered over the face of nature, or hidden in its depths. Every man knows that there is unspeakably more in the Bible than he has yet learned, as every man of science knows that there is unspeakably more in nature than he has yet discovered, or understands. It stands to reason that such a book, being the subject of devout and laborious study, century after century, by able and faithful men, should come to be better and better understood. And as in matters of science, although one false theory after another, founded on wrong principles or on an imperfect induction of facts, has passed away, yet real progress is made, and the ground once gained is never lost, so we should naturally expect it to be with the study of the Bible. False views, false inferences, misapprehensions, ignoring of some facts, and misinterpretations, might be expected to come and go, in endless succession, but nevertheless a steady progress in the knowledge of what the Bible teaches be accomplished. And we might also expect that here, too, the ground once surely gained would not again be lost.

But, in the second place, what is thus natural and reasonable in itself is a patent historical fact. The Church has thus advanced in theological knowledge. The difference between the confused and discordant representations of the early fathers on all subjects connected with the doctrines of the Trinity and of the person of Christ, and the clearness, precision, and consistency of the views presented after ages of discussion, and the statement of these doctrines by the Councils of Chalcedon and Constantinople, is as great almost as between chaos and cosmos. And this ground has never been lost. The same is true with regard to the doctrines of sin and grace. Before the long-continued discussion of these subjects in the Augustinian period, the greatest confusion and contradiction prevailed in the teachings of the leaders of the Church; during those discussions the views of the Church became clear and settled. There is scarcely a principle or doctrine concerning the fall of man, the nature of sin and guilt, inability, the necessity of the Spirit's influence, etc., etc., which now enters into the faith of evangelical Christians, which was not then clearly stated and authoritatively sanctioned by the Church. In like manner, before the Reformation, similar confusion existed with regard to the great doctrine of justification. No clear line of discrimination was drawn between it and sanctification. Indeed, during the Middle Ages, and among the most devout of the schoolmen, the idea of guilt was merged in the general idea of sin, and sin regarded as merely moral defilement. The great object was to secure holiness. Then pardon would come of course. The apostolic, Pauline, deeply Scriptural doctrine, that there can be no holiness until sin be expiated, that pardon, justification, and reconciliation, must precede sanctification, was never clearly apprehended. This was the grand lesson which the Church learned at the Reformation, and which it has never since forgot. It is true then, as an historical fact, that the Church has advanced. It understands the great doctrines of theology, anthropology, and soteriology, far better now, than they were understood in the early post-apostolic age of the Church.

Modern Theory of Development.

Very distinct from the view above presented is the modern theory of the organic development of the Church. This modern theory is avowedly founded on the pantheistic principles of Schelling and Hegel. With them the universe is the self-manifestation and evolution of the absolute Spirit. Dr. Schaff¹ says, that this theory "has left an impression on German science that can never be effaced; and has contributed more than any other influence to diffuse a clear conception of the interior organism of history." In his work on the "Principles of Protestantism,"² Dr. Schaff says that Schelling and Hegel taught the world to recognize in history "the ever opening sense of eternal thoughts, an always advancing rational development of the idea of humanity, and its relations to God." This theory of historical development was adopted, and partially Christianized by Schleiermacher, from whom it has passed over to Dr. Schaff, as set forth in his work above quoted, as well as to many other equally devout and excellent men. The basis of this modified theory is realism. Humanity is a generic life, an intelligent substance. That life became guilty and polluted in Adam. From him it passed over by a process of natural, organic development (the same numerical life and substance) to all his posterity, who therefore are guilty and polluted. This generic life the Son of God assumed into union with his divine nature, and thus healed it and raised it to a higher power or order. He becomes a new starting-point. The origin of this new form of life in Him is supernatural. The constitution of his person was a miracle. But from Him this life is communicated by a natural process of development to the Church. Its members are partakers of this new generic life. It is, however, a germ. Whatever lives grows. "Whatever is done is dead." This new life is Christianity. Christianity is not a form of doctrine objectively revealed in the Scriptures. Christian theology is not the knowledge, or systematic exhibition of what the Bible teaches. It is the interpretation of this inner life. The intellectual life of a child expresses itself in one way, of a boy in another way, and of a man in another and higher way. In each stage of his progress the man has views, feelings, and modes of thinking, appropriate to that stage. It would not do for a man to have the same views and thoughts as the child. Yet the latter are just as true, as right, and as proper, for the child, as those of the man for the man. It is thus with the Church. It passes through these stages of childhood, youth, and manhood, by a regular process. During the first centuries the Church had the indistinctness, vagueness, and exaggeration of views and doctrines, belonging to a period of infancy. In the Middle Ages it had a higher form. At the Reformation it advanced to the entrance on another stage. The form assumed by Christianity during the mediæval period, was for that period the true and proper, but not the permanent form. We have not reached that form as to doctrine yet. That will be reached in the Church of the future.

¹ What is Church History? p. 75.

² Page 150.

Development as held by some Romanists.

There is still another and very different form of the doctrine of development. It does not assume the Mystical doctrine of the indwelling of the substance of Christ, in the soul, the development of which works out its illumination in the knowledge of the truth, and finally its complete redemption. It admits that Christianity is, or includes a system of doctrine, and that those doctrines are in the Scriptures; but holds that many of them are there only in their rudiments. Under the constant guidance and tuition of the Spirit, the Church comes to understand all that these rudiments contain, and to expand them in their fulness. Thus the Lord's Supper has been expanded into the doctrine of transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass; anointing the sick, into the sacrament of extreme unction; rules of discipline into the sacrament of penance, of satisfactions, of indulgences, of purgatory, and masses and prayers for the dead; the prominence of Peter, into the supremacy of the Pope. The Old Testament contains the germ of all the doctrines unfolded in the New; and so the New Testament contains the germs of all the doctrines unfolded, under the guidance of the Spirit, in the theology of the mediæval Church.

Although attempts have been made by some Romanists and Anglicans to resolve the doctrine of tradition into one or other of these theories of development, they are essentially different. The only point of analogy between them is, that in both cases, little becomes much. Tradition has made contributions to the faith and institutions of the Christian Church; and development (in the two latter forms of the doctrine above mentioned) provides for a similar expansion.

The Real Question.

The real status questionis, on this subject, as between Romanists and Protestants, is not (1) Whether the Spirit of God leads true believers into the knowledge of the truth; nor (2) whether true Christians agree in all essential matters as to truth and duty; nor (3) whether any man can safely or innocently dissent from this common faith of the people of God; but (4) whether apart from the revelation contained in the Bible, there is another supplementary and explanatory revelation, which has been handed down outside of the Scriptures, by tradition. In other words, whether there are doctrines, institutions, and ordinances, having no warrant in the Scriptures, which we as Christians are bound to receive and obey on the authority of what is called common consent. This Romanists affirm and Protestants deny.

D. Arguments against the Doctrine of Tradition.

The heads of argument against the Romish doctrine on this subject are the following:—

1. It involves a natural impossibility. It is of course conceded that Christ and his Apostles said and did much that is not recorded in the Scriptures; and it is further admitted that if we had any certain knowledge of such unrecorded instructions, they would be of equal authority with what is written in the Scriptures. But Protestants maintain that they were not intended to constitute a part of the permanent rule of faith to the Church. They were designed for the men of that generation. The showers which fell a thousand years ago, watered the earth and rendered it fruitful for men then living. They cannot now be gathered up and made available for us. They did not constitute a reservoir for the supply of future generations. In like manner the unrecorded teachings of Christ and his Apostles did their work. They were not designed for our instruction. It is as impossible to learn what they were, as it is to gather up the leaves which adorned and enriched the earth when Christ walked in the garden of Gethsemane. This impossibility arises out of the limitations of our nature, as well as its corruption consequent on the fall. Man has not the clearness of perception, the retentiveness of memory, or the power of presentation, to enable him (without supernatural aid) to give a trustworthy account of a discourse once heard, a few years or even months after its delivery. And that this should be done over and over from month to month for thousands of years, is an impossibility. If to this be added the difficulty in the way of this oral transmission, arising from the blindness of men to the things of the Spirit, which prevents their understanding what they hear, and from the disposition to pervert and misrepresent the truth to suit their own prejudices and purposes, it must be acknowledged that tradition cannot be a reliable source of knowledge of religious truth. This is universally acknowledged and acted upon, except by Romanists. No one pretends to determine what Luther and Calvin, Latimer and Cranmer, taught, except from contemporaneous written records. Much less will any sane man pretend to know what Moses and the prophets taught except from their own writings.

Romanists admit the force of this objection. They admit that tradition would not be a trustworthy informant of what Christ and the Apostles taught, without the supernatural intervention of God.

Tradition is to be trusted not because it comes down through the hands of fallible men, but because it comes through an infallibly guided Church. This, however, is giving up the question. It is merging the authority of tradition into the authority of the Church. There is no need of the former, if the latter be admitted. Romanists, however, keep these two things distinct. They say that if the Gospels had never been written, they would know by historical tradition the facts of Christ's life; and that if his discourses and the epistles of the Apostles had never been gathered up and recorded, they would by the same means know the truths which they contain. They admit, however, that this could not be without a special divine intervention.

No Promise of Divine Intervention.

2. The second objection of Protestants to this theory is, that it is unphilosophical and irreligious to assume a supernatural intervention on the part of God, without promise and without proof, merely to suit a purpose, — Deus ex machina.

Our Lord promised to preserve his Church from fatal apostasy; He promised to send his Spirit to abide with his people, to teach them; He promised that He would be with them to the end of the world. But these promises were not made to any external, visible organization of professing Christians, whether Greek or Latin; nor did they imply that any such Church should be preserved from all error in faith or practice; much less do they imply that instructions not recorded by the dictation of the Spirit, should be preserved and transmitted from generation to generation. There is no such promise in the Word of God, and as such preservation and transmission without divine, supernatural interposition, would be impossible, tradition cannot be a trustworthy informant of what Christ taught.

No Criterion.

3. Romanists again admit that many false traditions have prevailed in different ages and in different parts of the Church. Those who receive them are confident of their genuineness, and zealous in their support. How shall the line be drawn between the true and false? By what criterion can the one be distinguished from the other? Protestants say there is no such criterion, and therefore, if the authority of tradition be admitted, the Church is exposed to a flood of superstition and error. This is their third argument against the Romish doctrine on this subject. Romanists, however, say they have a sure criterion in antiquity and universality. They have formulated their rule of judgment in the famous dictum of Vincent of Lerins: "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus."

Common Consent not a Criterion.

To this Protestants reply, — First, That they admit the authority of common consent among true Christians as to what is taught in the Scriptures. So far as all the true people of God agree in their interpretation of the Bible, we acknowledge ourselves bound to submit. But this consent is of authority only, (a) So far as it is the consent of true believers; (b) So far as it concerns the meaning of the written word; and, (c) So far as it relates to the practical, experimental, or essential doctrines of Christianity. Such consent as to matters outside of the Bible, or even supposed to be in the Bible, if they do not concern the foundation of our faith, is of no decisive weight. The whole Christian world, without one dissenting voice, believed for ages that the Bible taught that the sun moves round the earth. No man now believes it.

Secondly, Common consent as to Christian doctrine cannot be pleaded except within narrow limits. It is only on the gratuitous and monstrous assumption that Romanists are the only Christians, that the least plausibility can be given to the claim of common consent. The argument is really this: The Church of Rome receives certain doctrines on the authority of tradition. The Church of Rome includes all true Christians. Therefore, the common consent of all Christians may be claimed in favour of those doctrines.

But, thirdly, admitting that the Church of Rome is the whole Church, and admitting that Church to be unanimous in holding certain doctrines, that is no proof that that Church has always held them. The rule requires that a doctrine must be held not only ab omnibus, but semper. It is, however, a historical fact that all the peculiar doctrines of Romanism were not received in the early Church as matters of faith. Such doctrines as the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome; the perpetuity of the apostleship; the grace of orders; transubstantiation; the propitiatory sacrifice of the Mass; the power of the priests to forgive sins; the seven sacraments; purgatory; the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, etc., etc., can all be historically traced in their origin, gradual development, and final adoption. As it would be unjust to determine the theology of Calvin and Beza from the Socinianism of modern Geneva; or that of Luther from the theology of the Germans of our day; so it is utterly unreasonable to infer that because the Latin Church believes all that the Council of Trent pronounced to be true, that such was its faith in the first centuries of its history. It is not to be denied that for the first hundred years after the Reformation the Church of England was Calvinistic; then under Archbishop Laud and the Stnarts it became almost thoroughly Romanized; then it became to a large extent Rationalistic, so that Bishop Burnet said of the men of his day, that Christianity seemed to be regarded as a fable "among all persons of discernment." To this succeeded a general revival of evangelical doctrine and piety; and that has been followed by a like revival of Romanism and Ritualism. Mr. Newman¹ says of the present time: "In the Church of England, we shall hardly find ten or twenty neighboring clergymen who agree together; and that, not in non-essentials of religion, but as to what are its elementary and necessary doctrines; or as to the fact whether there are any necessary doctrines at all, any distinct and definite faith required for salvation." Such is the testimony of history. In no external, visible Church, has there been a consent to any form of faith, semper et ab omnibus.

The Latin Church is no exception to this remark. It is an undeniable fact of history that Arianism prevailed for years both in the East and West; that it received the sanction of the vast majority of the bishops, of provincial and ecumenical councils, and of the Bishop of Rome. It is no less certain that in the Latin Church, Augustinianism, including all the characteristic doctrines of what is now called Calvinism, was declared to be the true faith by council after council, provincial and general, and by bishops and popes. Soon, however, Augustinianism lost its ascendancy. For seven or eight centuries no one form of doctrine concerning sin, grace, and predestination prevailed in the Latin Church. Augustinianism, Semi-Pelagianism, and Mysticism (equally irreconcilable with both), were in constant conflict; and that, too, on questions on which the Church had already pronounced its judgment. It was not until the beginning of the sixteenth century that the Council of Trent, after long conflict within itself, gave its sanction to a modified form of Semi-Pelagianism.

The claim, therefore, for common consent, as understood by Romanists, is contrary to history. It is inconsistent with undeniable facts. This is virtually admitted by Romanists themselves. For with them it is common to say, We believe because the fifth century believed. But this is a virtual admission that their peculiar faith is not historically traceable beyond the fifth century. This admission of a want of all historical evidence of "common consent" is also involved, as before remarked, in their constant appeal to the authority of the Church. What the Church says is a matter of faith, we, the traditionists affirm, are bound to believe, has always been a matter of faith. The passage from "Petrus & Soto," quoted above, puts the case very concisely: "Quæcunque credit, tenet et servat Romana ecclesia, et in Scripturis non habentur illa ab Apostolis esse tradita." The argument amounts to this. The Church believes on the ground of common consent. The proof that a thing is a matter of common consent, and always has been, is that the Church now believes it.

¹ Lectures on Prophetic Office of the Church, Lond. 1837, pp. 394, 395.

Inadequacy of the Evidences of Consent.

The second objection to the argument of Romanists from common consent in support of their traditions, is, that the evidence which they adduce of such consent is altogether inadequate. They appeal to the ancient creeds. But there was no creed generally adopted before the fourth century. No creed adopted before the eighth century contains any of the doctrines peculiar to the Church of Rome. Protestants all receive the doctrinal statements contained in what is called the Apostles' creed, and in those of Chalcedon, and of Constantinople, adopted A. D. 681.

They appeal also to the decisions of councils. To this the same reply is made. There were no general councils before the fourth century. The first six ecumenical councils gave no doctrinal decisions from which Protestants dissent. They, therefore, present no evidence of consent in those doctrines which are now peculiar to the Church of Rome.

They appeal again to the writings of the fathers. But to this Protestants object, —

First. That the writings of the apostolic fathers are too few to be taken as trustworthy representatives of the state of opinion in the Church for the first three hundred years. Ten or twenty writers scattered over such a period cannot reasonably be assumed to speak the mind of the whole Church.

Secondly. The consent of these fathers, or of the half of them, cannot be adduced in favour of any doctrine in controversy between Protestants and Romanists.

Thirdly. Almost unanimous consent can be quoted in support of doctrines which Romanists and Protestants unite in rejecting. The Jewish doctrine of the millennium passed over in its grossest form to the early Christian Church. But that doctrine the Church of Rome is specially zealous in denouncing Fourthly. The consent of the fathers cannot be proved in support of doctrines which Protestants and Romanists agree in accepting. Not that these doctrines did not then enter into the faith of the Church, but simply that they were not presented.

Fifthly. Such is the diversity of opinion among the fathers themselves, such the vagueness of their doctrinal statements, and such the unsettled usus loquendi as to important words, that the authority of the fathers may be quoted on either side of any disputed doctrine. There is no view, for example, of the nature of the Lord's supper, which has ever been held in the Church, for which the authority of some early father cannot be adduced. And often the same father presents one view at one time, and another at a different time.

Sixthly. The writings of the fathers have been notoriously corrupted. It was a matter of great complaint in the early Church that spurious works were circulated; and that genuine works were recklessly interpolated. Some of the most important works of the Greek fathers are extant only in a Latin translation. This is the case with the greater part of the works of Irenæus, translated by Rufinus, whom Jerome charges with the most shameless adulteration.

Another objection to the argument from consent is, that it is a Procrustean bed which may be extended or shortened at pleasure. In every Catena Patrum prepared to prove this consent in certain doctrines, it will be found that two or more writers in a century are cited as evincing the unanimous opinion of that century, while double or fourfold the number, of equally important writers, belonging to the same period, on the other side, are passed over in silence. There is no rule to guide in the application of this test, and no uniformity in the manner of its use.

While, therefore, it is admitted that there has been a stream of doctrine flowing down uninterruptedly from the days of the Apostles, it is denied, as a matter of fact, that there has been any uninterrupted or general consent in any doctrine not clearly revealed in the Sacred Scriptures; and not even in reference to such clearly revealed doctrines, beyond the narrow limits of essential truths. And it is, moreover, denied that in any external, visible, organized Church, can the rule, quod semper, quod ab omnibus, be applied even to essential doctrines. The argument, therefore, of Romanists in favor of their peculiar doctrines, derived from general consent, is utterly untenable and fallacious. This is virtually admitted by the most zealous advocates of tradition. "Not only," says Professor Newman,¹ "is the Church Catholic bound to teach the truth, but she is divinely guided to teach it; her witness of the Christian faith is a matter of promise as well as of duty; her discernment of it is secured by a heavenly, as well as by a human rule. She is indefectible in it; and therefore has not only authority to enforce it, but is of authority in declaring it. The Church not only transmits the faith by human means, but has a supernatural gift for that purpose; that doctrine which is true, considered as an historical fact, is true also because she teaches it." The author of the Oxford Tract, No. 85, after saying, "We believe mainly because the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries unanimously believed,"² adds, "Why should not the Church be divine? The burden of proof surely is on the other side. I will accept her doctrines, and her rites, and her Bible—not one, and not the other, but all,—till I have clear proof that she is mistaken. It is I feel God's will that I should do so; and besides, I love these her possessions—I love her Bible, her doctrines, and her rites; and therefore, I believe."³ The Romanist then believes because the Church believes. This is the ultimate reason. The Church believes, not because she can historically prove that her doctrines have been received from the Apostles, but because she is supernaturally guided to know the truth. "Common consent," therefore, is practically abandoned, and tradition resolves itself into the present faith of the Church.

Tradition not available by the People.

4. Protestants object to tradition as part of the rule of faith, because it is not adapted to that purpose. A rule of faith to the people must be something which they can apply; a standard by which they can judge. But this unwritten revelation is not contained in any one volume accessible to the people, and intelligible by them. It is scattered through the ecclesiastical records of eighteen centuries. It is absolutely impossible for the people to learn what it teaches. How can they tell whether the Church in all ages has taught the doctrine of transubstantiation, the sacrifice of the Mass, or any other popish doctrine. They must take all such doctrines upon trust, i. e., on the faith of the extant Church. But this is to deny that to them tradition is a rule of faith. They are required to believe, on the peril of their souls, doctrines, the pretended evidence of which it is impossible for them to ascertain or appreciate.

¹ Lectures, ut supra, pp. 225, 226.

³ Ibid. p. 115.

² Oxford Tracts, No. 85, p. 102.

5. Romanists argue that such is the obscurity of the Scriptures, that not only the people, but the Church itself needs the aid of tradition in order to their being properly understood. But if the Bible, a comparatively plain book, in one portable volume, needs to be thus explained, What is to explain the hundreds of folios in which these traditions are recorded? Surely a guide to the interpretation of the latter must be far more needed than one for the Scriptures.

Tradition destroys the Authority of the Scriptures.

6. Making tradition a part of the rule of faith subverts the authority of the Scriptures. This follows as a natural and unavoidable consequence. If there be two standards of doctrine of equal authority, the one the explanatory, and infallible interpreter of the other, it is of necessity the interpretation which determines the faith of the people. Instead, therefore, of our faith resting on the testimony of God as recorded in his Word, it rests on what poor, fallible, often fanciful, prejudiced, benighted men, tell us is the meaning of that word. Man and his authority take the place of God. As this is the logical consequence of making tradition a rule of faith, so it is an historical fact that the Scriptures have been made of no account wherever the authority of tradition has been admitted. Our Lord said, that the Scribes and Pharisees made the word of God of no effect by their traditions; that they taught for doctrines the commandments of men. This is no less historically true of the Church of Rome. A great mass of doctrines, rites, ordinances, and institutions, of which the Scriptures know nothing, has been imposed on the reason, conscience, and life of the people. The Roman Catholic religion of our day, with its hierarchy, ritual, image and saint worship; with its absolutions, indulgences, and its despotic power over the conscience and the life of the individual, is as little like the religion of the New Testament, as the present religion of the Hindus with its myriad of deities, its cruelties, and abominations, is like the simple religion of their ancient Vedas. In both cases similar causes have produced similar effects. In both there has been a provision for giving divine authority to the rapidly accumulating errors and corruptions of succeeding ages.

7. Tradition teaches error, and therefore cannot be divinely controlled so as to be a rule of faith. The issue is between Scripture and tradition. Both cannot be true. The one contradicts the other. One or the other must be given up. Of this at least no true Protestant has any doubt. All the doctrines peculiar to Romanism, and for which Romanists plead the authority of Scripture, Protestants believe to be anti-scriptural; and therefore they need no other evidence to prove that tradition is not to be trusted either in matters of faith or practice.

The Scriptures not received on the Authority of Tradition.

8. Romanists argue that Protestants concede the authority of tradition, because it is on that authority they receive the New Testament as the word of God. This is not correct. We do not believe the New Testament to be divine on the ground of the testimony of the Church. We receive the books included in the canonical Scriptures on the twofold ground of internal and external evidence. It can be historically proved that those books were written by the men whose names they bear; and it can also be proved that those men were the only authenticated organs of the Holy Ghost. The historical evidence which determines the authorship of the New Testament is not exclusively that of the Christian fathers. The testimony of heathen writers is, in some respects, of greater weight than that of the fathers themselves. We may believe on the testimony of English history, ecclesiastical and secular, that the Thirty-Nine Articles were framed by the English Reformers, without being traditionists. In like manner we may believe that the books of the New Testament were written by the men whose names they bear without admitting tradition to be a part of the rule of faith.

Besides, external evidence of any kind is a very subordinate part of the ground of a Protestant's faith in the Scripture. That ground is principally the nature of the doctrines therein revealed, and the witness of the Spirit, with and by the truth, to the heart and conscience. We believe the Scriptures for much the same reason that we believe the Decalogue.

The Church is bound to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made it free, and not to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage, — a bondage not only to human doctrines and institutions, but to soul-destroying errors and superstitions.

§ 7. Office of the Church as a Teacher.

A. The Romish Doctrine on this subject.

Romanists teach that the Church, as an external, visible society, consisting of those who profess the Christian religion, united in communion of the same sacraments and subjection to lawful pastors, and especially to the Pope of Rome, is divinely appointed to be the infallible teacher of men in all things pertaining to faith and practice. It is qualified for this office by the plenary revelation of the truth in the written and unwritten word of God, and by the supernatural guidance of the Holy Spirit vouchsafed to the bishops as official successors of the Apostles, or, to the Pope as the successor of Peter in his supremacy over the whole Church, and as vicar of Christ on earth.

There is something simple and grand in this theory. It is wonderfully adapted to the tastes and wants of men. It relieves them of personal responsibility. Everything is decided for them. Their salvation is secured by merely submitting to be saved by an infallible, sin-pardoning, and grace-imparting Church. Many may be inclined to think that it would have been a great blessing had Christ left on earth a visible representative of himself clothed with his authority to teach and govern, and an order of men dispersed through the world endowed with the gifts of the original Apostles, — men everywhere accessible, to whom we could resort in all times of difficulty and doubt, and whose decisions could be safely received as the decisions of Christ himself. God's thoughts, however, are not as our thoughts. We know that when Christ was on earth, men did not believe or obey Him. We know that when the Apostles were still living, and their authority was still confirmed by signs, and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, the Church was nevertheless distracted by heretics and schisms. If any in their sluggishness are disposed to think that a perpetual body of infallible teachers would be a blessing, all must admit that the assumption of infallibility by the ignorant, the erring, and the wicked, must be an evil inconceivably great. The Romish theory if true might be a blessing; if false it must be an awful curse. That it is false may be demonstrated to the satisfaction of all who do not wish it to be true, and who, unlike the Oxford Tractarian, are not determined to believe it because they love it.

B. The Romish definition of the Church is derived from what the Church of Rome now is.

Before presenting a brief outline of the argument against this theory, it may be well to remark that the Romish definition of the Church is purely empirical. It is not derived from the signification or usage of the word ἐκκλησία in the New Testament; nor from what is there taught concerning the Church. It is merely a statement of what the Church of Rome now is. It is a body professing the same faith, united in the communion of the same sacraments, subject to pastors (i. e., bishops) assumed to be lawful, and to the Pope as the vicar of Christ. Now in this definition it is gratuitously assumed, —

1. That the Church to which the promise of divine guidance is given, is an external, visible organization; and not the people of God as such in their personal and individual relation to Christ. In other words, it is assumed that the Church is a visible society, and not a collective term for the people of God; as when it is said of Paul that he persecuted the Church; and of Christ that He loved the Church and gave himself for it. Christ certainly did not die for any external, visible, organized Society.

2. The Romish theory assumes, not only that the Church is an external organization, but that it must be organized in one definite, prescribed form. But this assumption is not only unreasonable, it is unscriptural, because no one form is prescribed in Scripture as essential to the being of the Church; and because it is contrary to the whole spirit and character of the gospel, that forms of government should be necessary to the spiritual life and salvation of men. Moreover, this assumption is inconsistent with historical facts. The Church in all its parts has never been organized according to one plan.

3. But conceding that the Church is an external society, and that it must be organized according to one plan, it is a gratuitous and untenable presumption, that that plan must be the episcopal. It is a notorious fact that diocesan episcopacy did not exist during the apostolic age. It is equally notorious that that plan of government was gradually introduced. And it is no less notorious that a large part of the Church in which Christ dwells by his presence, and which He in every way acknowledges and honours, has no bishops until the present day. The government of the Church by bishops, Romanists admit is one of the institutions which rest not on Scripture, but on tradition for their authority.

4. But should everything else be conceded, the assumption that subjection to the Pope, as the vicar of Christ, is necessary to the existence of the Church, is utterly unreasonable. This is the climax. There is not the slightest evidence in the New Testament or in the apostolic age, that Peter had any such primacy among the Apostles as Romanists claim. There is not only the absence of all evidence that he exercised any jurisdiction over them, but there is abundant evidence to the contrary. This is clear from

Peter, James, and John, being mentioned together as those who appeared to be pillars (Gal. ii. 9), and this distinction was due not to office, but to character. It is moreover clear from the full equality in gifts and authority which Paul asserted for himself, and proved to the satisfaction of the whole Church that he possessed. It is clear from the subordinate position occupied by Peter in the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.), and from the severe reproof he received from Paul at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11-21). It is a plain historical fact, that Paul and John were the master-spirits of the Apostolic Church. But admitting the primacy of Peter in the college of Apostles, there is no evidence that such primacy was intended to be perpetual. There is no command to elect a successor to him in that office; no rules given as to the mode of such election, or the persons by whom the choice was to be made; and no record of such election having actually been made. Everything is made out of the air. But admitting that Peter was constituted the head of the whole Church on earth, and that such headship was intended to be continued, what evidence is there that the Bishop of Rome was to all time entitled to that office? It is very doubtful whether Peter ever was in Rome. The sphere of his labors was in Palestine and the East. It is certain he never was Bishop of the Church in that city. And even if he were, he was Primate, not as Bishop of Rome, but by appointment of Christ. According to the theory, he was Primate before he went to Rome, and not because he went there. The simple historical fact is, that as Rome was the seat of the Roman empire, the Bishop of Rome aspired to be the head of the Church, which claim after a long struggle came to be acknowledged, at least in the West.

It is on the four gratuitous and unreasonable assumptions above mentioned, namely, that the Church to which the promise of the Spirit was made is an external, visible organization; that a particular mode of organization is essential to its existence; that that mode is the episcopal; and that it must be papal, i. e., the whole episcopacy be subject to the Bishop of Rome; — it is on these untenable assumptions that the whole stupendous system of Romanism rests. If any one of them fail, the whole falls to the ground. These assumptions are so entirely destitute of any adequate historical proof, that no reasonable man can accept them on their own evidence. It is only those who have been taught or induced to believe the extant Church to be infallible, who can believe them. And they believe not because these points can be proved, but on the assertion of the Church. The Romish Church says that Christ constituted the Church on the papal system, and therefore, it is to be believed. The thing to be proved is taken for granted. It is a petitio principii from beginning to end.

C. The Romish Doctrine of Infallibility founded on a Wrong Theory of the Church.

The first great argument of Protestants against Romanism concerns the theory of the Church.

God entered into a covenant with Abraham. In that covenant there were certain promises which concerned his natural descendants through Isaac, which promises were suspended on the national obedience of the people. That covenant, however, contained the promise of redemption through Christ. He was the seed in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. The Jews came to believe that this promise of redemption, i. e., of the blessings of the Messiah's reign, was made to them as a nation; and that it was conditioned on membership in that nation. All who were Jews either by descent or proselytism, and who were circumcised, and adhered to the Law, were saved. All others would certainly perish forever. This is the doctrine which our Lord so pointedly condemned, and against which St. Paul so strenuously argued. When the Jews claimed that they were the children of God, because they were the children of Abraham, Christ told them that they might be the children of Abraham, and yet the children of the devil (John viii. 33-44); as John, his forerunner, had before said, say not "We have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." (Matt. iii. 9.) It is against this doctrine the epistles to the Romans and Galatians are principally directed. The Apostle shows, (1.) That the promise of salvation was not confined to the Jews, or to the members of any external organization. (2.) And therefore that it was not conditioned on descent from Abraham, nor on circumcision, nor on adherence to the Old Testament theocracy. (3.) That all believers (οἱ ἐκ πίστεως) are the sons, and, therefore, the heirs of Abraham. (Gal. iii. 7.) (4.) That a man might be a Jew, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, circumcised on the eighth day, and touching the righteousness which is of the law blameless, and yet it avail him nothing. (Phil. iii. 4-6.) (5.) Because he is not a Jew who is one outwardly; and circumcision is of the heart. (Romans ii. 28-29.) (6.) And consequently that God could cast off the Jews as a nation, without acting inconsistently with his covenant with Abraham, because the promise was not made to the Israel κατὰ σάρκα, but to the Israel κατὰ πνεῦμα. (Rom. ix. 6-8.)

Romanists have transferred the whole Jewish theory to the Christian Church; while Protestants adhere to the doctrine of Christ and his Apostles. Romanists teach, (1.) That the Church is essentially an external, organized community, as the commonwealth of Israel. (2.) That to this external society, all the attributes, prerogatives, and promises of the true Church belong. (3.) That membership in that society is the indispensable condition of salvation; as it is only by union with the Church that men are united to Christ, and, through its ministrations, become partakers of his redemption. (4.) That all who die in communion with this external society, although they may, if not perfect at death, suffer for a longer or shorter period in purgatory, shall ultimately be saved. (5.) All outside of this external organization perish eternally. There is, therefore, not a single element of the Jewish theory which is not reproduced in the Romish.

Protestant Doctrine of the Nature of the Church.

Protestants, on the other hand, teach on this subject, in exact accordance with the doctrine of Christ and the Apostles: (1.) That the Church as such, or in its essential nature, is not an external organization. (2.) All true believers, in whom the Spirit of God dwells, are members of that Church which is the body of Christ, no matter with what ecclesiastical organization they may be connected, and even although they have no such connection. The thief on the cross was saved, though he was not a member of any external Church. (3.) Therefore, that the attributes, prerogatives, and promises of the Church do not belong to any external society as such, but to the true people of God collectively considered; and to external societies only so far as they consist of true believers, and are controlled by them. This is only saying what every man admits to be true, that the attributes, prerogatives, and promises pertaining to Christians belong exclusively to true Christians, and not to wicked or worldly men who call themselves Christians. (4.) That the condition of membership in the true Church is not union with any organized society, but faith in Jesus Christ. They are the children of God by faith; they are the sons of Abraham, heirs of the promise of redemption made to him by faith; whether they be Jews or Gentiles, bond or free; whether Protestants or Romanists, Presbyterians or Episcopalians; or whether they be so widely scattered, that no two or three of them are able to meet together for worship.

Protestants do not deny that there is a visible Church Catholic on earth, consisting of all those who profess the true religion, together with their children. But they are not all included in any one external society. They also admit that it is the duty of Christians to unite for the purpose of worship and mutual watch and care. They admit that to such associations and societies certain prerogatives and promises belong; that they have, or ought to have the officers whose qualifications and duties are prescribed in the Scriptures; that there always have been, and probably always will be, such Christian organizations, or visible churches. But they deny that any one of these societies, or all of them collectively, constitute the Church for which Christ died; in which He dwells by his Spirit; to which He has promised perpetuity, catholicity, unity, and divine guidance into the knowledge of the truth. Any one of them, or all of them, one after another, may apostatize from the faith, and all the promises of God to his Church be fulfilled. The Church did not fail, when God reserved to himself only seven thousand in all Israel who had not bowed the knee unto Baal.

Almost all the points of difference between Protestants and Romanists depend on the decision of the question, "What is the Church?" If their theory be correct; if the Church is the external society of professing Christians, subject to apostle-bishops (i. e., to bishops who are apostles), and to the Pope as Christ's vicar on earth; then we are bound to submit to it; and then too beyond the pale of that communion there is no salvation. But if every true believer is, in virtue of his faith, a member of that Church to which Christ promises guidance and salvation, then Romanism falls to the ground.

The Opposing Theories of the Church.

That the two opposing theories of the Church, the Romish and Protestant, are what has been stated above is so generally known and so unquestioned, that it is unnecessary to cite authorities on either side. It is enough, so far as the doctrine of Romanists is concerned, to quote the language of Bellarmin,¹ that the marks of the Church are three: "Professio veræ fidei, sacramentorum communio, et subjectio ad legitimum pastorem, Romanum Pontificem. — Atque hoc interest inter sententiam nostram et alias omnes, quod omnes aliæ requirunt internas virtutes ad constituendum aliquem in Ecclesia, et propterea Ecclesiam veram invisibilem faciunt; nos autem credimus in Ecclesia inveniri omnes virtutes, — tamen ut aliquis aliquo modo dici possit pars veræ Ecclesiæ, — non putamus requiri ullam internam virtutem, sed tantum externam professionem

¹ De Ecclesia Militante, II. Disputationes, edit. Paris, 1608, vol. II. p. 108, d.

fidei, et sacramentorum communionem, quæ sensu ipso percipitur. Ecclesia enim est cœtus hominum ita visibilis et palpabilis, ut est cœtus Populi Romani, vel regnum Galliæ aut respublica Venetorum." The Lutheran Symbols define the Church as, "Congregatio sanctorum."¹ "Congregatio sanctorum et vere credentium."² "Societas fidei et Spiritus Sancti in cordibus."³ "Congregatio sanctorum, qui habent inter se societatem ejusdem evangelii seu doctrinæ, et ejusdem Spiritus Sancti, qui corda eorum renovat, sanctificat et gubernat;" and ⁴ "Populus spiritualis, non civilibus ritibus distinctus a gentibus, sed verus populus Dei renatus per Spiritum Sanctum."⁵

The Symbols of the Reformed Churches present the same doctrine.⁶ The Confessio Helvetica says, "Oportet semper fuisse, nunc esse et ad finem usque seculi futuram esse Ecclesiam, i. e., e mundo evocatum vel collectum cœtum fidelium, sanctorum inquam omnium communionem, eorum videlicet, qui Deum verum in Christo servatore per verbum et Spiritum Sanctum vere cognoscunt et rite colunt, denique omnibus bonis per Christum gratuito oblati fide participant."⁷ Confessio Gallicana: "Affirmamus ex Dei verbo, Ecclesiam esse fidelium cœtum, qui in verbo Dei sequendo et pura religione colenda consentiunt, in qua etiam quotidie proficiunt."⁸ Confessio Belgica: "Credimus et confitemur unicam Ecclesiam catholicam seu universalem, quæ est sancta congregatio seu cœtus omnium fidelium Christianorum, qui totam suam salutem ab uno Jesu Christo expectant, abluti ipsius sanguine et per Spiritum ejus sanctificati atque obsignati. Hæc Ecclesia sancta nullo est aut certo loco sita et circumscripta, aut ullis certis personis astricta aut alligata: sed per omnem orbem terrarum sparsa atque diffusa est."⁹ The same doctrine is found in the answer to the fifty-fourth question in the Heidelberg Catechism. In the Geneva Catechism to the question, "Quid est Ecclesia?" the answer is, "Corpus ac societas fidelium, quos Deus ad vitam æternam prædestinavit."¹⁰

Winer in his "Comparative Darstellung,"¹¹ thus briefly states the two theories concerning the Church. Romanists, he says, "define the Church on earth, as the community of those baptized in the name of Christ, united under his Vicar, the Pope, its visible head. Protestants, on the other hand, as the communion

¹ Augsburg Confession, art. 7.

² Apol. A. C., art. 4, pp. 144, 145, Hase.

³ See Hase, Libri Symbolici.

⁷ II. cap. 17, p. 499, Niem.

⁹ Art. 27, p. 379, ibid.

¹¹ Page 165.

² Ibid, art. 8.

⁴ Ibid, p. 146.

⁶ See Niemeyer, Coll. Confess.

⁸ Art. 27, p. 336, ibid.

¹⁰ Page 135, ibid.

of saints, that is, of those who truly believe on Christ, in which the gospel is purely preached and the sacraments properly administered."

Proof of the Protestant Doctrine of the Church.

This is not the place to enter upon a formal vindication of the Protestant doctrine of the nature of the Church. That belongs to the department of ecclesiology. What follows may suffice for the present purpose.

The question is not whether the word Church is not properly used, and in accordance with the Scriptures, for visible, organized bodies of professing Christians, or for all such Christians collectively considered. Nor is it the question, whether we are to regard as Christians those who, being free from scandal, profess their faith in Christ, or societies of such professors organized for the worship of Christ and the administration of his discipline, as being true churches. But the question is, whether the Church to which the attributes, prerogatives, and promises pertaining to the body of Christ belong, is in its nature a visible, organized community; and specially, whether it is a community organized in some one exclusive form, and most specially on the papal form; or, whether it is a spiritual body consisting of true believers. Whether when the Bible addresses a body of men as "the called of Jesus Christ," "beloved of God," "partakers of the heavenly calling;" as "the children of God, joint heirs with Christ of a heavenly inheritance;" as "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification and sprinkling of the blood of Christ;" as "partakers of the like precious faith with the Apostles;" as "those who are washed, and sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God;" as those who being dead in sin, had been "quickened and raised up and made to sit together in heavenly places with Christ Jesus;" it means the members of an external society as such, and because such, or, the true people of God? The question is, whether when to the men thus designated and described, Christ promised to be with them to the end of the world, to give them his Spirit, to guide them unto the knowledge of the truth, to keep them through the power of the Spirit, so that the gates of hell should not prevail against them—he means his sincere or his nominal disciples,—believers or unbelievers? These questions admit of but one answer. The attributes ascribed to the Church in Scripture belong to true believers alone. The promises made to the Church are fulfilled only to believers. The relation in which the Church stands to God and Christ is sustained alone by true believers. They only are the children and heirs of God; they only are the body of Christ in which He dwells by his Spirit; they only are the temple of God, the bride of Christ, the partakers of his glory. The doctrine that a man becomes a child of God and an heir of eternal life by membership in any external society, overturns the very foundations of the gospel, and introduces a new method of salvation. Yet this is the doctrine on which the whole system of Romanism rests. As, therefore, the Apostle shows that the promises made to Israel under the Old Testament, the promise of perpetuity, of extension over the whole earth, of the favour and fellowship of God, and all the blessings of the Messiah's reign, were not made to the external Israel as such, but to the true people of God; so Protestants contend that the promises made to the Church as the body and bride of Christ are not made to the external body of professed Christians, but to those who truly believe on him and obey his gospel.

The absurdities which flow from the substitution of the visible Church for the invisible, from transferring the attributes, prerogatives, and promises which belong to true believers, to an organized body of nominal or professed believers, are so great that Romanists cannot be consistent. They cannot adhere to their own theory. They are forced to admit that the wicked are not really members of the Church. They are "in it" but not "of it." Their connection with it is merely external, as that of the chaff with the wheat. This, however, is the Protestant doctrine. The Romish doctrine is precisely the reverse. Romanists teach that the chaff is the wheat; that the chaff becomes wheat by external connection with the precious grain. Just so certain, therefore, as that chaff is not wheat; that nominal Christians, as such, are not true Christians; just so certain is it that no external society consisting of good and bad, is that Church to which the promise of Christ's presence and salvation is made. It is as Turretin says,¹ "πρώτον ψεύδος pontificiorum in tota controversia est, ecclesiam metiri velle ex societatis civilis modulo, ut ejus essentia in externis tantum et in sensus incurrentibus consistat, et sola professio fidei sufficiat ad membrum ecclesiæ constituendum, nec ipsa fides et pietas interna ad id necessario requirantur."

D. The Doctrine of Infallibility founded on the False Assumption of the Perpetuity of the Apostleship.

As the first argument against the doctrine of Romanists as to the infallibility of the Church is, that it makes the Church of Rome to be the body to which the attributes, prerogatives, and promises of Christ to true believers belong; the second is that it limits the promise of the teaching of the Spirit, to the bishops as successors of the Apostles. In other words, Romanists falsely assume the perpetuity of the Apostleship. If it be true that the prelates of the Church of Rome, or of any other church, are apostles, invested with the same authority to teach and to rule as the original messengers of Christ, then we must be bound to yield the same faith to their teaching, and the same obedience to their commands, as are due to the inspired writings of the New Testament. And such is the doctrine of the Church of Rome.

¹ LOCUS XVIII. II. 12.

Modern Prelates are not Apostles.

To determine whether modern bishops are apostles, it is necessary in the first place to determine the nature of the Apostleship, and ascertain whether modern prelates have the gifts, qualifications, and credentials of the office. Who then were the Apostles? They were a definite number of men selected by Christ to be his witnesses, to testify to his doctrines, to the facts of his life, to his death, and specially to his resurrection. To qualify them for this office of authoritative witnesses, it was necessary, (1.) That they should have independent and plenary knowledge of the gospel. (2.) That they should have seen Christ after his resurrection. (3.) That they should be inspired, i. e., that they should be individually and severally so guided by the Spirit as to be infallible in all their instructions. (4.) That they should be authenticated as the messengers of Christ, by adherence to the true gospel, by success in preaching (Paul said to the Corinthians that they were the seal of his apostleship, 1 Cor. ix. 2); and by signs and wonders and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost. Such were the gifts and qualifications and credentials of the original Apostles; and those who claimed the office without possessing these gifts and credentials, were pronounced false apostles and messengers of Satan.

When Paul claimed to be an apostle, he felt it necessary to prove, (1.) That he had been appointed not by man nor through men, but immediately by Jesus Christ. (Gal. i. 1.) (2.) That he had not been taught the gospel by others, but received his knowledge by immediate revelation. (Gal. i. 12.) (3.) That he had seen Christ after his resurrection. (1 Cor. ix. 1 and xv. 8.) (4.) That he was inspired, or infallible as a teacher, so that men were bound to recognize his teachings as the teaching of Christ.

(1 Cor. xiv. 37.) (5.) That the Lord had authenticated his apostolic mission as fully as he had done that of Peter. (Gal. ii. 8.) (6.) "The signs of an apostle," he tells the Corinthians, "were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." (2 Cor. xii. 12.)

Modern prelates do not claim to possess any one of these gifts. Nor do they pretend to the credentials which authenticated the mission of the Apostles of Christ. They claim no immediate commission; no independent knowledge derived from immediate revelation; no personal infallibility; no vision of Christ; and no gift of miracles. That is, they claim the authority of the office, but not its reality. It is very plain, therefore, that they are not apostles. They cannot have the authority of the office without having the gifts on which that authority was founded, and from which it emanated. If a man cannot be a prophet without the gift of prophecy; or a miracle-worker without the gift of miracles; or have the gift of tongues without the ability to speak other languages than his own; no man can rightfully claim to be an apostle without possessing the gifts which made the original Apostles what they were. The deaf and dumb might as reasonably claim to have the gift of tongues. The world has never seen or suffered a greater imposture than that weak, ignorant, and often immoral men, should claim the same authority to teach and rule that belonged to men to whom the truth was supernaturally revealed, who were confessedly infallible in its communication, and to whose divine mission God himself bore witness in signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost. The office of the Apostles as described in the New Testament, was, therefore, from its nature incapable of being transmitted, and has not in fact been perpetuated.

There is no command given in the New Testament to keep up the succession of the Apostles. When Judas had apostatized, Peter said his place must be filled, but the selection was to be confined to those, as he said, "which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John unto that same day that He was taken up from us." (Acts i. 21, 22.) The reason assigned for this appointment was not that the Apostleship might be continued, but that the man selected might be "a witness with us of his resurrection." "And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven Apostles." And that was the end. We never hear of Matthias afterward. It is very doubtful whether this appointment of Matthias had any validity. What is here recorded (Acts, i. 15-26), took place before the Apostles had been endued with power from on high (Acts i. 8), and, therefore, before they had any authority to act in the premises. Christ in his own time and way completed the number of his witnesses by calling Paul to be an Apostle. But, however this may be, here if ever exceptio probat regulam. It proves that the ranks of the Apostles could be filled, and the succession continued only from the number of those who could bear independent witness of the resurrection and doctrines of Christ.

Besides the fact that there is no command to appoint apostles, there is clear evidence that the office was not designed to be perpetuated. With regard to all the permanent officers of the Church, there is, (1.) Not only a promise to continue the gifts which pertained to the office, and the command to appoint suitable persons to fill it, but also a specification of the qualifications to be sought and demanded; and (2.) a record of the actual appointment of incumbents; and (3.) historical evidence of their continuance in the Church from that day to this. With regard to the Apostleship, all this is wanting. As we have seen, the gifts of the office have not been continued, there is no command to perpetuate the office, no directions to guide the Church in the selection of proper persons to be apostles, no record of their appointment, and no historical evidence of their continuance; on the contrary, they disappear entirely after the death of the original twelve. It might as well be asserted that the Pharaohs of Egypt, or the twelve Cæsars of Rome have been continued, as that the race of apostles has been perpetuated.

It is true that there are a few passages in which persons other than the original twelve seem to be designated as apostles. But from the beginning of the Church until of late, no one has ventured on that account to regard Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, and Titus, as apostles, in the official sense of the word. All the designations given to the officers of the Church in the New Testament, are used in different senses. Thus, "presbyter" or "elder," means, an old man, a Jewish officer, an officer of the Church. The word "deacon," means, a domestic, sometimes a secular officer, sometimes any minister of the Church; sometimes the lowest order of church officers. Because Paul and Peter call themselves "deacons," it does not prove that their office was to serve tables. In like manner the word "apostle" is sometimes used in its etymological sense "a messenger," sometimes in a religious sense, as we use the word "missionary;" and sometimes in its strict official sense, in which it is confined to the immediate messengers of Christ. Nothing can be plainer from the New Testament than that neither Silas nor Timothy, nor any other person, is ever spoken of as the official equal of the twelve Apostles. These constitute a class by themselves. They stand out in the New Testament as they do in all Church history, as the authoritative founders of the Christian Church, without peers or colleagues.

If, then, the Apostleship, from its nature and design, was incapable of transmission ; if there be this decisive evidence from Scripture and history, that it has not been perpetuated, then the whole theory of the Romanists concerning the Church falls to the ground. That theory is founded on the assumption that prelates are apostles, invested with the same authority to teach and rule, as the original messengers of Christ. If this assumption is unfounded, then all claim to the infallibility of the Church must be given up ; for it is not pretended that the mass of the people is infallible nor the priesthood, but simply the episcopate. And bishops are infallible only on the assumption that they are apostles, in the official sense of the term. This they certainly are not. The Church may make priests, and bishops, and even popes ; but Christ alone can make an Apostle. For an Apostle was a man endowed with supernatural knowledge, and with supernatural power.

E. Infallibility founded on a False Interpretation of the Promise of Christ.

The third decisive argument against the infallibility of the Church is, that Christ never promised to preserve it from all error. What is here meant is that Christ never promised the true Church, that is, "the company of true believers," that they should not err in doctrine. He did promise that they should not fatally apostatize from the truth. He did promise that He would grant his true disciples such a measure of divine guidance by his Spirit, that they should know enough to be saved. He, moreover, promised that He would call men into the ministry, and give them the qualifications of faithful teachers, such as were the presbyters whom the Apostles ordained in every city. But there is no promise of infallibility either to the Church as a whole, or to any class of men in the Church. Christ promised to sanctify his people ; but this was not a promise to make them perfectly holy in this life. He promised to give them joy and peace in believing ; but this is not a promise to make them perfectly happy in this life, — that they should have no trials or sorrows. Then, why should the promise to teach be a promise to render infallible. As the Church has gone through the world bathed in tears and blood, so has she gone soiled with sin and error. It is just as manifest that she has never been infallible, as that she has never been perfectly holy. Christ no more promised the one than the other.

F. The Doctrine contradicted by Facts.

The fourth argument is that the Romish doctrine of the infallibility of the Church is contradicted by undeniable historical facts. It therefore cannot be true. The Church has often erred, and therefore it is not infallible.

Protestants believe that the Church, under all dispensations, has been the same. It has always had the same God; the same Redeemer; the same rule of faith and practice (the written Word of God, at least from the time of Moses), the same promise of the presence and guidance of the Spirit, the same pledge of perpetuity and triumph. To them, therefore, the fact that the whole visible Church repeatedly apostatized during the old economy — and that, not the people only, but all the representatives of the Church, the priests, the Levites, and the elders — is a decisive proof that the external, visible Church may fatally err in matters of faith. No less decisive is the fact that the whole Jewish Church and people, as a church and nation, rejected Christ. He came to his own, and his own received him not. The vast majority of the people, the chief priests, the scribes and the elders, refused to recognize him as the Messiah. The Sanhedrim, the great representative body of the Church at that time, pronounced him worthy of death, and demanded his crucifixion. This, to Protestants, is overwhelming proof that the Church may err.

Romanists, however, make such a difference between the Church before and after the advent of Christ, that they do not admit the force of this argument. That the Jewish Church erred, they say, is no proof that the Christian Church can err. It will be necessary, therefore, to show that according to the principles and admissions of Romanists themselves, the Church has erred. It taught at one time what it condemned at another, and what the Church of Rome now condemns. To prove this, it will suffice to refer to two undeniable examples.

It is to be borne in mind that by the Church, in this connection, Romanists do not mean the true people of God; nor the body of professing Christians; nor the majority of priests, or doctors of divinity, but the episcopate. What the body of bishops of any age teach, all Christians are bound to believe, because these bishops are so guided by the Spirit as to be infallible in their teaching.

The Arian Apostasy.

The first great historical fact inconsistent with this theory is, that the great majority of the bishops, both of the Eastern and Western Church, including the Pope of Rome, taught Arianism, which the whole Church, both before and afterwards, condemned. The decision of three hundred and eighty bishops at the Council of Nice, ratified by the assent of the great majority of those who did not attend that Council, is fairly taken as proof that the visible Church at that time taught, as Rome now teaches, that the Son is consubstantial with the Father. The fact that some dissented at the time, or that more soon joined in that dissent; or, that in a few years, in the East, the dissentients were in the majority, is not considered as invalidating the decision of that Council as the decision of the Church; because a majority of the bishops, as a body, were still in favor of the Nicene doctrine. Then, by parity of reasoning, the decisions of the two contemporary councils, one at Seleucia in the East, the other at Ariminum in the West, including nearly eight hundred bishops, ratified as those decisions were by the great majority of the bishops of the whole Church (including Liberius, the bishop of Rome), must be accepted as the teaching of the visible Church of that age. But those decisions, according to the previous and subsequent judgment of the Church, were heretical. It has been urged that the language adopted by the Council of Ariminum admits of an orthodox interpretation. In answer to this, it is enough to say, (1.) That it was drawn up, proposed, and urged by the avowed opponents of the Nicene Creed. (2.) That it was strenuously resisted by the advocates of that creed, and renounced as soon as they gained the ascendancy. (3.) That Mr. Palmer himself admits that the Council repudiated the word "consubstantial" as expressing the relation of the Son to the Father. But this was the precise point in dispute between the Orthodox and semi-Arians.

Ancients and moderns unite in testifying to the general prevalence of Arianism at that time. Gregory Nazianzen says,¹ "Nam si per paucos exceperis, . . . omnes (pastores) temporis obsecuti sunt: hoc tantum inter eos discriminis fuit, quod alii citius, alii serius in eam fraudem inciderunt, atque, alii impietatis duces antistitesque se præbuerunt." Jerome says: "Ingemuit totus orbis terrarum, et Arianum se esse miratus est.”¹ He also says: ² “Ecclesia non parietibus consistit, sed in dogmatum veritate, Ecclesia ibi est ubi fides vera est. Ceterum ante annos quindecim aut viginti parietes omnes hic ecclesiarum hæretici (Ariani) possidebant, Ecclesia autem vera illic erat, ubi vera fides erat.” It is here asserted that the whole world had become Arian; and that all the churches were in the possession of heretics. These statements must be taken with due allowance. They nevertheless prove that the great majority of the bishops had adopted the Arian, or semi-Arian Creed. To the same effect Athanasius says: “Quæ nunc ecclesia libere Christum adorat? Si quidem ea, si pia est, periculo subjacet? Nam si alicubi pii et Christi studiosi (sunt autem ubique tales permulti) illi itidem, ut Prophetæ et magnus ille Elias, absconduntur, et in speluncas et cavernas terræ sese abstrudunt, aut in solitudine aberrantes commorantur.”³ Vincent of Lerins⁴ says: “Arianorum venenum non jam portiunculam quamdam, sed pene orbem totum contaminaverat, adeo ut prope cunctis Latini sermonis episcopis partim vi partim fraude decoptis caligo quædam mentibus effunderetur.” To these ancient testimonies any number of authorities from modern theologians might be added. We give only the testimony of Dr. Jackson, one of the most distinguished theologians of the Church of England: “After this defection of the Romish Church in the bishop Liberius, the whole Roman empire was overspread with Arianism.”⁵

¹ Orat. xxi. t. i. p. 387, edition Paris, 1699.

Whatever doubt may exist as to details, the general fact of this apostasy cannot be doubted. Through defection from the truth, through the arts of the dominant party, through the influence of the emperor, the great majority of the bishops did join in condemnation of Athanasius, and in subscribing a formula of doctrine drawn up in opposition to the Nicene Creed; a formula afterwards renounced and condemned; a formula which the Bishop of Rome was banished for two years for refusing to sign, and restored to his see when he consented to subscribe. If, then, we apply to this case the same rules which are applied to the decisions of the Nicene Council, it must be admitted that the external Church apostatized as truly under Constantius, as it professed the true faith under Constantine. If many signed the Eusebian or Arian formula in-

¹ Dialogus contra Luciferanos, 19, vol. ii. p. 172 c., edit. Migne, Paris, 1845.

² Comment. on Ps. cxxxiii., vol. vii. p. 1223 a, edit. Migne.

³ “Ad Solitariam Vitam Agentes Epist.,” Works, p. 846, edit. Paris, 1827.

⁴ Comm. l. iv. p. 642, vol. i. Migne, Patrol., Paris, 1846.

⁵ On the Church, p. 160. Edited by W. Goode. Philadelphia, 1844.

sincerely, so did many hypocritically assent to the decrees of Nice. If many were overborne by authority and fear in the one case, so they were in the other. If many revoked their assent to Arianism, quite as many withdrew their consent to the Athanasian doctrine.

The Romish Evasion of this Argument.

In dealing with this undeniable fact, Romanists and Romanizers are forced to abandon their principle. Their doctrine is that the external Church cannot err, that the majority of the bishops living at any one time cannot fail to teach the truth. But under the reign of the Emperor Constantius, it is undeniable that the vast majority, including the Bishop of Rome, did renounce the truth. But, says Bellarmin,¹ the Church continued and was conspicuous in Athanasius, Hilary, Eusebius, and others. And Mr. Palmer, of Oxford says,² "The truth was preserved under even Arian bishops." But the question is not, whether the truth shall be preserved and confessed by the true children of God? but, whether any external, organized body, and specially the Church of Rome, can err in its teaching? Romanists cannot be allowed, merely to meet an emergency, to avail themselves of the Protestant doctrine that the Church may consist of scattered believers. It is true as Jerome teaches in the passage above quoted, "Ubi fides vera est, ibi Ecclesia est." But that is our doctrine, and not the doctrine of Rome. Protestants say with full confidence, "Ecclesia manet et manebit." But whether in conspicuous glory as in the time of David, or in scattered believers as in the days of Elias, is not essential.

The Church of Rome rejects the Doctrines of Augustine.

A second case in which the external church (and specially the Church of Rome) has departed from what it had itself declared to be true, is in the rejection of the doctrines known in history as Augustinian. That the peculiar doctrines of Augustine, including the doctrine of sinful corruption of nature derived from Adam, which is spiritual death, and involves entire inability on the part of the sinner to convert himself or to coöperate in his own regeneration; the necessity of the certainly efficacious operation of divine grace; the sovereignty of God in election and reprobation, and the certain perseverance of the saints; were sanctioned by the whole Church, and specially by the Church of Rome, cannot be disputed. The eighteenth chapter of Wiggers' "Augustinianism and Pelagianism," is headed, "The final adoption of the Augustinian system for all Christendom by the third ecumenical council of Ephesus, A. D. 431." It is not denied that many of the eastern bishops, perhaps the majority of them, were secretly opposed to that system in its essential features. All that is insisted upon is that the whole Church, through what Romanists recognize as its official organs, gave its sanction to Augustine's peculiar doctrines; and that so far as the Latin Church is concerned this assent was not only for the time general but cordial. It is no less certain that the Council of Trent, while it condemned Pelagianism, and even the peculiar doctrine of semi-Pelagians, who said that man began the work of conversion, thus denying the necessity of preventing grace (gratia preveniens), nevertheless repudiated the distinguishing doctrines of Augustine and anathematized all who held them.

¹ De Ecclesia, lib. iii. c. 16.

² On the Church, vol. ii. p. 187.

G. The Church of Rome now teaches Error.

A fifth argument against the infallibility of the Church of Rome, is that, that Church now teaches error. Of this there can be no reasonable doubt, if the Scriptures be admitted as the standard of judgment.

1. It is a monstrous error, contrary to the Bible, to its letter and spirit, and shocking to the common sense of mankind, that the salvation of men should be suspended on their acknowledging the Pope to be the head of the Church in the world, or the vicar of Christ. This makes salvation independent of faith and character. A man may be sincere and intelligent in his faith in God and Christ, and perfectly exemplary in his Christian life, yet if he does not acknowledge the Pope, he must perish forever.

2. It is a grievous error, contrary to the express teachings of the Bible, that the sacraments are the only channels of communicating to men the benefits of redemption. In consequence of this false assumption, Romanists teach that all who die unbaptized, even infants, are lost.

3. It is a great error to teach as the Church of Rome does teach, that the ministers of the gospel are priests; that the people have no access to God or Christ, and cannot obtain the remission of sins or other saving blessings, except through their intervention and by their ministrations; that the priests have the power not only of declarative, but of judicial and effective absolution, so that those and those only whom they absolve stand acquitted at the bar of God. This was the grand reason for the Reformation, which was a rebellion against this priestly domination; a demand on the part of the people for the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free,— the liberty to go immediately to him with their sins and sorrows, and find relief without the intervention or permission of any man who has no better right of access than themselves.

4. The doctrine of the merit of good works as taught by Romanists is another most prolific error. They hold that works done after regeneration have real merit (meritum condigni), and that they are the ground of the sinner's justification before God. They hold that a man may do more than the law requires of him, and perform works of supererogation, and thus obtain more merit than is necessary for his own salvation and beatification. That this superfluous merit goes into the treasury of the Church, and may be dispensed for the benefit of others. On this ground indulgences are granted or sold, to take effect not only in this life but in the life to come.

5. With this is connected the further error concerning Purgatory. The Church of Rome teaches that those dying in the communion of the Church, who have not in this life made full satisfaction for their sins, or acquired sufficient merit to entitle them to admission into heaven, do at death pass into a state of suffering, there to remain until due satisfaction is made and proper purification is effected. There is no necessary termination to this state of purgatory but the day of judgment or the end of the world. It may last for a thousand or many thousands of years. But Purgatory is under the power of the keys. The sufferings of souls in that state may be alleviated or shortened by the authorized ministers of the Church. There is no limit to the power of men who are believed to hold the keys of heaven in their hand, to shut and no man opens, and open and no man shuts. Of all incredibilities the most incredible is that God would commit such power as this, to weak, ignorant, and often wicked men.

6. The Romish Church teaches grievous error concerning the Lord's Supper. It teaches, (1.) That when consecrated by the priest the whole substance of the bread and the whole substance of the wine are transmuted into the substance of the body and blood of Christ. (2.) That as his body is inseparable from his soul and divinity, where the one is there the other must be. The whole Christ, therefore, body, soul, and divinity, is present in the consecrated wafer, which is to be worshipped as Christ himself is worshipped. This is the reason why the Church of England in her Homilies pronounces the service of the Mass in the Romish Church idolatrous. (3.) That Church further teaches that the body and blood of Christ thus locally and substantially present in the Eucharist are offered as a true propitiatory sacrifice for the forgiveness of sin, the application of which is determined by the intention of the officiating priests.

7. Idolatry consists not only in the worship of false gods, but in the worship of the true God by images. The second Commandment of the Decalogue expressly forbids the bowing down to, or serving the likeness of anything in heaven above or in the earth beneath. In the Hebrew the words used are, וְשַׁתְּכֹנֶן and עֲבֹד. In the Septuagint the words are, οὐ προσκυνήσεις αὐτοῖς, οὐδὲ μὴ λατρεύσεις αὐτοῖς. In the Vulgate it reads, "Non adorabis ea neque coles." The precise thing, therefore, that is forbidden is that which the Church of Rome permits and enjoins, namely, the use of images in religious worship, prostration before them, and doing them reverence.

8. Another great error of the Church of Rome is the worship of saints and angels, and especially of the Virgin Mary. It is not merely that they are regarded as objects of reverence, but that the service rendered them involves the ascription of divine attributes. They are assumed to be everywhere present, able to hear and answer prayer, to help and to save. They become the ground of confidence to the people, and the objects of their religious affections. They are to them precisely what the gods of the heathen were to the Greeks and Romans.

Such are some of the errors taught by the Church of Rome, and they prove that that Church instead of being infallible, is so corrupt that it is the duty of the people of God to come out of it and to renounce its fellowship.

H. The Recognition of an Infallible Church incompatible with either Religious or Civil Liberty.

A church which claims to be infallible, ipso facto, claims to be the mistress of the world; and those who admit its infallibility, thereby admit their entire subjection to its authority. It avails nothing to say that this infallibility is limited to matters of faith and morals, for under those heads is included the whole life of man, religious, moral, domestic, social, and political.

A church which claims the right to decide what is true in doctrine and obligatory in morals, and asserts the power to enforce submission to its decisions on the pain of eternal perdition, leaves no room for any other authority upon earth. In the presence of the authority of God, every other disappears.

With the claim to infallibility is inseparably connected the claim to pardon sin. The Church does not assume merely the right to declare the conditions on which sin will be forgiven at the bar of God, but it asserts that it has the prerogative to grant, or to withhold that forgiveness. "Ego te absolvo," is the formula the Church puts into the mouth of its priesthood. Those who receive that absolution are saved; those whom the Church refuses to absolve must bear the penalty of their offenses.

An infallible church is thus the only institute of salvation. All within its pale are saved; all without it perish. Those only are in the Church who believe what it teaches, who do what it commands, and are subject to its officers, and especially its head, the Roman pontiff. Any man, therefore, whom the Church excommunicates is thereby shut out of the kingdom of heaven; any nation placed under its ban is not only deprived of the consolations of religious services, but of the necessary means of salvation.

If the Church be infallible, its authority is no less absolute in the sphere of social and political life. It is immoral to contract or to continue an unlawful marriage, to keep an unlawful oath, to enact unjust laws, to obey a sovereign hostile to the Church. The Church, therefore, has the right to dissolve marriages, to free men from the obligations of their oaths, and citizens from their allegiance, to abrogate civil laws, and to depose sovereigns. These prerogatives have not only been claimed, but time and again exercised by the Church of Rome. They all of right belong to that Church, if it be infallible. As these claims are enforced by penalties involving the loss of the soul, they cannot be resisted by those who admit the Church to be infallible. It is obvious, therefore, that where this doctrine is held there can be no liberty of opinion, no freedom of conscience, no civil or political freedom. As the recent ecumenical Council of the Vatican has decided that this infallibility is vested in the Pope, it is henceforth a matter of faith with Romanists, that the Roman pontiff is the absolute sovereign of the world. All men are bound, on the penalty of eternal death, to believe what he declares to be true, and to do whatever he decides is obligatory.

CHAPTER VI.

THE PROTESTANT RULE OF FAITH.

§ 1. Statement of the Doctrine."

ALL Protestants agree in teaching that "the word of God, as contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, is the only infallible rule of faith and practice."

In the Smalcald Articles,¹ the Lutheran Church says: "Ex patrum — verbis et factis non sunt extruendi articuli fidei — Regulam autem aliam habemus, ut videlicet verbum Dei condat articulos fidei et præterea nemo, ne angelus quidem." In the "Form of Concord,"² it is said: "Credimus, confitemur et docemus, unicam regulam et normam secundum quam omnia dogmata omnesque doctores æstimari et judicari oporteat, nullam omnino aliam esse, quam prophetica et apostolica scripta cum V. tum N. Testamenti."

The symbols of the Reformed churches teach the same doctrine. Confessio Helvetica, II.³ says: "In scriptura sancta habet universalis Christi Ecclesia plenissime exposita, quæcunque pertinent cum ad salvificam fidem, tum ad vitam Deo placentem.⁴ Non alium in causa fidei iudicem, quam ipsum Deum per Scripturas sacras pronuntiantem, quid verum sit, quid falsum, quid sequendum sit quidne fugiendum. Confessio Gallicana:⁵ Quum hæc (SS.) sit omnis veritatis summa, complectens quidquid ad cultum Dei et salutem nostram requiritur, neque hominibus neque ipsis etiam angelis fas esse dicimus quicquam ei verbo adjicere vel detrachere vel quicquam prorsus in eo immutare." In the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England,⁶ it is said: "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." The *Westminster Confession*⁷ teaches: "Under the name of Holy Scripture, or the Word of God written, are now contained all the books of the Old and New Testament, which are these: etc. . . . All

¹ Part II. 2, 15; Hase Lib. Sym. p. 303.

² C. i. p. 467, ibid.

³ Art. v. p. 330, ibid.

⁶ Art. 6.

² Page 570, ibid.

⁴ C. ii. p. 479, ibid.

⁷ Ch. i. § 2.

which are given by inspiration of God, to be the rule of faith and life.¹ The whole counsel of God concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man's salvation, faith, and life, is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture; unto which nothing at any time is to be added whether by new revelations of the Spirit or traditions of men.² All things in Scripture are not alike plain in themselves, nor alike clear unto all; yet those things which are necessary to be known, believed, and observed, for salvation, are so clearly propounded and opened in some place of Scripture or other, that not only the learned, but the unlearned, in a due use of the ordinary means, may attain unto a sufficient understanding of them."

From these statements it appears that Protestants hold, (1.) That the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the Word of God, written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and are therefore infallible, and of divine authority in all things pertaining to faith and practice, and consequently free from all error whether of doctrine, fact, or precept. (2.) That they contain all the extant supernatural revelations of God designed to be a rule of faith and practice to his Church. (3.) That they are sufficiently perspicuous to be understood by the people, in the use of ordinary means and by the aid of the Holy Spirit, in all things necessary to faith or practice, without the need of any infallible interpreter

The Canon.

Before entering on the consideration of these points, it is necessary to answer the question, What books are entitled to a place in the canon, or rule of faith and practice? Romanists answer this question by saying, that all those which the Church has decided to be divine in their origin, and none others, are to be thus received. Protestants answer it by saying, so far as the Old Testament is concerned, that those books, and those only, which Christ and his Apostles recognized as the written Word of God, are entitled to be regarded as canonical. This recognition was afforded in a twofold manner: First, many of the books of the Old Testament are quoted as the Word of God, as being given by the Spirit; or the Spirit is said to have uttered what is therein recorded. Secondly, Christ and his Apostles refer to the sacred writings of the Jews — the volume which they regarded as divine — as being what it claimed to be, the Word of God. When we refer to the Bible as of divine authority, we refer to it as a volume and recognize all the writings which it contains as given by the inspiration of the Spirit. In like manner when Christ or his Apostles quote the "Scriptures," or the "law and the prophets," and speak of the volume then so called, they give their sanction to the divine authority of all the books which that volume contained. All, therefore, that is necessary to determine for Christians the canon of the Old Testament, is to ascertain what books were included in the "Scriptures" recognized by the Jews of that period. This is a point about which there is no reasonable doubt. The Jewish canon of the Old Testament included all the books and no others, which Protestants now recognize as constituting the Old Testament Scriptures. On this ground Protestants reject the so-called apocryphal books. They were not written in Hebrew and were not included in the canon of the Jews. They were, therefore, not recognized by Christ as the Word of God. This reason is of itself sufficient. It is however confirmed by considerations drawn from the character of the books themselves. They abound in errors, and in statements contrary to those found in the undoubtedly canonical books.

² Ibid. § 8.

² Ibid. § 7.

The principle on which the canon of the New Testament is determined is equally simple. Those books, and those only which can be proved to have been written by the Apostles, or to have received their sanction, are to be recognized as of divine authority. The reason of this rule is obvious. The Apostles were the duly authenticated messengers of Christ, of whom He said, "He that heareth you, heareth me."

§ 2. The Scriptures are Infallible, i. e., given by Inspiration of God.

The infallibility and divine authority of the Scriptures are due to the fact that they are the word of God; and they are the word of God because they were given by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

A. The Nature of Inspiration. Definition.

The nature of inspiration is to be learnt from the Scriptures; from their didactic statements, and from their phenomena. There are certain general facts or principles which underlie the Bible, which are assumed in all its teachings, and which therefore must be assumed in its interpretation. We must, for example, assume, (1.) That God is not the unconscious ground of all things; nor an unintelligent force; nor a name for the moral order of the universe; nor mere causality; but a Spirit, — a self-conscious, intelligent, voluntary agent, possessing all the attributes of our spirits without limitation, and to an infinite degree. (2.) That He is the creator of the world, and extra-mundane, existing before, and independently of it; not its soul, life, or animating principle; but its maker, preserver, and ruler. (8.) That as a spirit He is everywhere present, and everywhere active, preserving and governing all his creatures and all their actions. (4.) That while both in the external world and in the world of mind He generally acts according to fixed laws and through secondary causes, He is free to act, and often does act immediately, or without the intervention of such causes, as in creation, regeneration, and miracles. (5.) That the Bible contains a divine, or supernatural revelation. The present question is not, Whether the Bible is what it claims to be; but, What does it teach as to the nature and effects of the influence under which it was written?

On this subject the common doctrine of the Church is, and ever has been, that inspiration was an influence of the Holy Spirit on the minds of certain select men, which rendered them the organs of God for the infallible communication of his mind and will. They were in such a sense the organs of God, that what they said God said.

B. Inspiration Supernatural.

This definition includes several distinct points. First. Inspiration is a supernatural influence. It is thus distinguished, on the one hand, from the providential agency of God, which is everywhere and always in operation; and on the other hand, from the gracious operations of the Spirit on the hearts of his people. According to the Scriptures, and the common views of men, a marked distinction is to be made between those effects which are due to the efficiency of God operating regularly through second causes, and those which are produced by his immediate efficiency without the intervention of such causes. The one class of effects is natural; the other, supernatural. Inspiration belongs to the latter class. It is not a natural effect due to the inward state of its subject, or to the influence of external circumstances.

No less obvious is the distinction which the Bible makes between the gracious operations of the Spirit and those by which extraordinary gifts are bestowed upon particular persons. Inspiration, therefore, is not to be confounded with spiritual illumination. They differ, first, as to their subjects. The subjects of inspiration are a few selected persons; the subjects of spiritual illumination are all true believers. And, secondly, they differ as to their design. The design of the former is to render certain men infallible as teachers; the design of the latter is to render men holy; and of course they differ as to their effects. Inspiration in itself has no sanctifying influence. Balaam was inspired. Saul was among the prophets. Caiaphas uttered a prediction which "he spake not of himself." (John xi. 51.) In the last day many will be able to say to Christ, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?" To whom he will say: "I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity." (Matt. vii. 22, 23.)

C. Distinction between Revelation and Inspiration.

Second. The above definition assumes a difference between revelation and inspiration. They differ, first, as to their object. The object of revelation is the communication of knowledge. The object or design of inspiration is to secure infallibility in teaching. Consequently they differ, secondly, in their effects. The effect of revelation was to render its recipient wiser. The effect of inspiration was to preserve him from error in teaching. These two gifts were often enjoyed by the same person at the same time. That is, the Spirit often imparted knowledge, and controlled in its communication orally or in writing to others. This was no doubt the case with the Psalmists, and often with the Prophets and Apostles. Often, however, the revelations were made at one time, and were subsequently, under the guidance of the Spirit, committed to writing. Thus the Apostle Paul tells us that he received his knowledge of the gospel not from man, but by revelation from Jesus Christ; and this knowledge he communicated from time to time in his discourses and epistles. In many cases these gifts were separated. Many of the sacred writers, although inspired, received no revelations. This was probably the fact with the authors of the historical books of the Old Testament. The evangelist Luke does not refer his knowledge of the events which he records to revelation, but says he derived it from those "which from the beginning were eyewitnesses, and ministers of the Word." (Luke i. 2.) It is immaterial to us where Moses obtained his knowledge of the events recorded in the book of Genesis; whether from early documents, from tradition, or from direct revelation. No more causes are to be assumed for any effect than are necessary. If the sacred writers had sufficient sources of knowledge in themselves, or in those about them, there is no need to assume any direct revelation. It is enough for us that they were rendered infallible as teachers.

This distinction between revelation and inspiration is commonly made by systematic writers. Thus Quenstedt (1685) ¹says: "Distingue inter revelationem et inspirationem. Revelatio vi vocis est manifestatio rerum ignotarum et occultarum, et potest fieri multis et diversis modis. . . . Inspiratio . . . est interna conceptum suggestio, seu infusio, sive res conceptæ jam ante scriptori fuerint cognitæ, sive occultæ. Illa potuit tempore antecedere scriptionem, hæc cum scriptione semper fuit conjuncta et in ipsam scriptionem influebat." Often, however, the distinction in question is overlooked. In popular language, inspiration is made to include both the supernatural communication of truth to the mind, and a supernatural control in making known that truth to others. The two gifts, however, differ in their nature, and should therefore be distinguished. Confounding them has sometimes led to serious error. When no revelation was necessary, no inspiration is admitted. Thus Grotius says: "Vere dixi non omnes libros qui sunt in Hebræo Canone dictatos a Spiritu Sancto. Scriptos esse cum pio animi motu, non nego; et hoc est quod judicavit Synagoga Magna, cujus judicio in hac re stant Hebræi. Sed a Spiritu Sancto dictari historias nihil fuit opus: satis fuit scriptorem memoria valere circa res spectatas, aut diligentia in describendis veterum commentariis."² It is an illogical conclusion, however, to infer that because a historian did not need to have the facts dictated to him, that therefore he needed no control to preserve him from error.

D. Inspired Men the Organs of God.

A third point included in the Church doctrine of inspiration is, that the sacred writers were the organs of God, so that what they taught, God taught. It is to be remembered, however, that when God uses any of his creatures as his instruments, He uses them according to their nature. He uses angels as angels, men as men, the elements as elements. Men are intelligent voluntary agents; and as such were made the organs of God. The sacred writers were not made unconscious or irrational. The spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets. (1 Cor. xiv. 32.) They were not like calculating machines which grind out logarithms with infallible correctness. The ancients, indeed, were accustomed to say, as some theologians have also said, that the sacred writers were as pens in the hand of the Spirit; or as harps, from which He drew what sounds He pleased. These representations were, however, intended simply to illustrate one point, namely, that the words uttered or recorded by inspired men were the words of God. The Church has never held what has been stigmatized as the mechanical theory of inspiration. The sacred writers were not machines. Their self-consciousness was not suspended; nor were their intellectual powers superseded. Holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. It was men, not machines; not unconscious instruments, but living, thinking, willing minds, whom the Spirit used as his organs. Moreover, as inspiration did not involve the suspension or suppression of the human faculties, so neither did it interfere with the free exercise of the distinctive mental characteristics of the individual. If a Hebrew was inspired, he spake Hebrew; if a Greek, he spake Greek; if an educated man, he spoke as a man of culture; if uneducated, he spoke as such a man is wont to speak. If his mind was logical, he reasoned, as Paul did; if emotional and contemplative, he wrote as John wrote. All this is involved in the fact that God uses his instruments according to their nature. The sacred writers impressed their peculiarities on their several productions as plainly as though they were the subjects of no extraordinary influence. This is one of the phenomena of the Bible patent to the most cursory reader. It lies in the very nature of inspiration that God spake in the language of men; that He uses men as his organs, each according to his peculiar gifts and endowments. When He ordains praise out of the mouth of babes, they must speak as babes, or the whole power and beauty of the tribute will be lost. There is no reason to believe that the operation of the Spirit in inspiration revealed itself any more in the consciousness of the sacred writers, than his operations in sanctification reveal themselves in the consciousness of the Christian. As the believer seems to himself to act, and in fact does act out of his own nature; so the inspired penmen wrote out of the fulness of their own thoughts and feelings, and employed the language and modes of expression which to them were the most natural and appropriate. Nevertheless, and none the less, they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and their words were his words.

¹ I. p. 68. Schmid, Dogmatik, p. 27.

² "Votum pro Pace Ecclesiastica." Opera, Londini, 1679, t. iii. p. 672.

E. Proof of the Doctrine.

That this is the Scriptural view of inspiration; that inspired men were the organs of God in such a sense that their words are to be received not as the words of men, but as they are in truth, as the words of God (1 Thess. ii. 13), is proved, —

1. From the signification and usage of the word. It is, of course, admitted that words are to be understood in their historical sense. If it can be shown what idea the men living in the apostolic age attached to the word θεόπνευστος and its equivalents, that is the idea which the Apostles intended to express by them. All nations have entertained the belief not only that God has access to the human mind and can control its operations, but that He at times did take such possession of particular persons as to make them the organs of his communications. Such persons were called by the Greeks θεοφάροι (those who bore a God within them); or, ἐνθεος (those in whom a God dwelt). In the Septuagint the word πνευματοφόρος is used in the same sense. In Josephus,¹ the idea is expressed by the phrase “τῷ θεῷ πνεύματι κεκινήμενος;” to which the words of Peter (2 Peter i. 21) exactly answer, ἐπὶ πνεύματος φερόμενοι; and what is written by men under this influence of the Spirit is called γραφὴ θεόπνευστος. (2 Tim. iii. 16.) Gregory of Nyssa,² having quoted the words of our Lord in Matt. xxii. 43, “How then doth David in Spirit call him Lord,” adds, οὐκοῦν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Πνεύματος οἱ θεοφορούμενοι τῶν ἁγίων ἐμπνέονται, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος λέγεται, διὰ τὸ τῆς θείας ἐμπνεύσεως εἶναι διδασκαλίαν, that is, “Hence those of the saints who by the power of the Spirit are full of God are inspired, and therefore all Scripture is called θεόπνευστος, because the instruction is by divine inspiration.” The idea of inspiration is therefore fixed. It is not to be arbitrarily determined. We must not interpret the word or the fact, according to our theories of the relation of God to the world, but according to the usage of antiquity, sacred and profane, and according to the doctrine which the sacred writers and the men of their generation are known to have entertained on the subject. According to all antiquity, an inspired man was one who was the organ of God in what he said, so that his words were the words of the god of which he was the organ. When, therefore, the sacred writers use the same words and forms of expression which the ancients used to convey that idea, they must in all honesty be assumed to mean the same thing.

Argument from the Meaning of the Word Prophet.

2. That this is the Scriptural idea of inspiration is further proved from the meaning of the word prophet. The sacred writers divide the Scriptures into the “law and the prophets.” As the law was written by Moses, and as Moses was the greatest of the prophets, it follows that all the Old Testament was written by prophets. If, therefore, we can determine the Scriptural idea of a prophet, we shall thereby determine the character of their writings and the authority due to them. A prophet, then, in the Scriptural sense of the term, is a spokesman, one who speaks for another, in his name, and by his authority; so that it is not the spokesman but the person for whom he acts, who is responsible for the truth of what is said. In Exodus vii. 1, it is said, "See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet," i. e., thy spokesman. This is explained by what is said in Exodus iv. 14-16, "Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. . . . Thou shalt speak unto him, and put words into his mouth; and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people; and he shall be, even he shall be, to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God." (See Jeremiah xxxvi. 17, 18.) This determines definitely, what a prophet is. He is the mouth of God; one through whom God speaks to the people; so that what the prophet says God says. So when a prophet was consecrated, it was said, "Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth." (Jer. i. 9; Is. li. 16.) That this is the Scriptural idea of a prophet is moreover evident from the formulas, constantly recurring, which relate to his duties and mission. He was the messenger of God; he spoke in the name of God; the words, "Thus saith the Lord," were continually in his mouth. "The word of the Lord" is said to have come to this prophet and on that; "the Spirit came upon," "the power," or "hand" of God was upon him; all implying that the prophet was the organ of God, that what he said, he said in God's name and by his authority. It is true, therefore, as Philo¹ says, προφήτης γὰρ ἴδιον οὐδὲν ἀποφθέγγεται ἀλλότρια δὲ πάντα ὑπηχοῦντος ἐτέρου.

¹ Antiquities iv. 6, 5.

² Contra Eunomium Orat. vi. t. ii. p. 187; Paris, 1615.

This is precisely what the Apostle Peter teaches when he says (2 Peter i. 20, 21), "No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men spake as they were moved (φερόμενοι, borne along as a ship by the wind) by the Holy Ghost." Prophecy, i. e., what a prophet said, was not human, but divine. It was not the prophet's own interpretation of the mind and will of God. He spoke as the organ of the Holy Ghost.

What the Prophets said God said.

3. It is another decisive proof that the sacred writers were the organs of God in the sense above stated, that whatever they said the Spirit is declared to have said. Christ himself said that David by the Spirit called the Messiah Lord. (Matt. xxii. 43.) David in the 95th Psalm said, "To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart;" but the Apostle (Heb. iii. 7), says that these were the words of the Holy Ghost. Again, in ch. x. 15, the same Apostle says, "Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord." Thus quoting the language of Jeremiah xxxi. 33, as the language of the Holy Ghost. In Acts iv. 25, the assembled Apostles said, "with one accord," "Lord thou art God. . . . Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage?" In Acts xxviii. 25, Paul said to the Jews, "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers." It is in this way that Christ and his Apostles constantly refer to the Scriptures, showing beyond doubt that they believed and taught, that what the sacred writers said the Holy Ghost said.

¹ Opera, t. iv. p. 116, ed. Pfeiff.

Inspiration of the New Testament Writers.

This proof bears specially, it is true, only on the writings of the Old Testament. But no Christian puts the inspiration of the Old Testament above that of the New. The tendency, and we may even say the evidence, is directly the other way. If the Scriptures of the old economy were given by inspiration of God, much more were those writings which were penned under the dispensation of the Spirit. Besides, the inspiration of the Apostles is proved, (1.) From the fact that Christ promised them the Holy Spirit, who should bring all things to their remembrance, and render them infallible in teaching. It is not you, He said, that speak, but the Spirit of my Father speaketh in you. He that heareth you heareth me. He forbade them to enter upon their office as teachers until they were endued with power from on high. (2.) This promise was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, when the Spirit descended upon the Apostles as a mighty rushing wind, and they were filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak as the Spirit gave them utterance (dabat eloqui, as the Vulgate more literally renders the words). From this moment they were new men, with new views, with new spirit, and with new power and authority. The change was sudden. It was not a development. It was something altogether supernatural; as when God said, Let there be light, and there was light. Nothing can be more unreasonable than to ascribe this sudden transformation of the Apostles from narrow-minded, bigoted Jews, into enlightened, large-minded, catholic Christians, to mere natural causes. Their Jewish prejudices had resisted all the instructions and influence of Christ for three years, but gave way in a moment when the Spirit came upon them from on high. (3.) After the day of Pentecost the Apostles claimed to be the infallible organs of God in all their teachings. They required men to receive what they taught not as the word of man but as the word of God (1 Thess. ii. 13); they declared, as Paul does (1 Cor. xiv. 37), that the things which they wrote were the commandments of the Lord. They made the salvation of men to depend on faith in the doctrines which they taught. Paul pronounces anathema even an angel from heaven who should preach any other gospel than that which he had taught. (Gal. i. 8.) John says that whoever did not receive the testimony which he bore concerning Christ, made God a liar, because John's testimony was God's testimony. (1 John v. 10.) "He that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us." (iv. 6.) This assertion of infallibility, this claim for the divine authority of their teaching, is characteristic of the whole Bible. The sacred writers all, and everywhere, disclaim personal authority; they never rest the obligation to faith in their teachings, on their own knowledge or wisdom; they never rest it on the truth of what they taught as manifest to reason or as capable of being proved by argument. They speak as messengers, as witnesses, as organs. They declare that what they said God said, and, therefore, on his authority it was to be received and obeyed.

The Testimony of Paul.

The Corinthians objected to Paul's preaching that he did not attempt any rational or philosophical proof of the doctrines which he propounded; that his language and whole manner of discourse were not in accordance with rhetorical rules. He answers these objections, — first, by saying that the doctrines which he taught were not the truths of reason, were not derived from the wisdom of men, but were matters of divine revelation; that he simply taught what God declared to be true; and secondly, that as to the manner of presenting these truths, he was the mere organ of the Spirit of God. In 1 Cor. ii. 7–13, he sets forth this whole subject in the clearest and most concise manner. The things which he taught, which he calls "the wisdom of God," "the things of the Spirit," i. e., the gospel, the system of doctrine taught in the Bible, he says, had never entered into the mind of man. God had revealed those truths by his Spirit; for the Spirit is the only competent source of such knowledge. "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so, the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." So much for the source of knowledge, and the ground on which the doctrines he taught were to be received. As to the second objection, which concerned his language and mode of presentation, he says, These things of the Spirit, thus revealed, we teach "not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth; but which the Holy Ghost teacheth," πνευματικαῖς πνευματικὰ συγκρίνοντες, combining spiritual with spiritual, i. e., clothing the truths of the Spirit in the words of the Spirit. There is neither in the Bible nor in the writings of men, a simpler or clearer statement of the doctrines of revelation and inspiration. Revelation is the act of communicating divine knowledge by the Spirit to the mind. Inspiration is the act of the same Spirit, controlling those who make the truth known to others. The thoughts, the truths made known, and the words in which they are recorded, are declared to be equally from the Spirit. This, from first to last, has been the doctrine of the Church, notwithstanding the endless diversity of speculations in which theologians have indulged on the subject. This then is the ground on which the sacred writers rested their claims. They were the mere organs of God. They were his messengers. Those who heard them, heard God; and those who refused to hear them, refused to hear God. (Matt. x. 40; John xiii. 20.)

4. This claim to infallibility on the part of the Apostles was duly authenticated, not only by the nature of the truths which they communicated, and by the power which those truths have ever exerted over the minds and hearts of men, but also by the inward witness of the Spirit of which St. John speaks, when he says, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself" (1 John v. 10); "an unction from the Holy One." (1 John ii. 20.) It was confirmed also by miraculous gifts. As soon as the Apostles were endued with power from on high, they spake in "other tongues;" they healed the sick, restored the lame and the blind. "God also," as the Apostle says (Heb. ii. 4), "bearing them witness, both with signs, and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will." And Paul tells the Corinthians that the signs of an Apostle had been wrought among them "in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." (2 Cor. xii. 12.) The mere working of miracles was not an evidence of a divine commission as a teacher. But when a man claims to be the organ of God, when he says that God speaks through him, then his working of miracles is the testimony of God to the validity of his claims. And such testimony God gave to the infallibility of the Apostles.

The above considerations are sufficient to show, that according to the Scriptures, inspired men were the organs, or mouth of God, in the sense that what they said and taught has the sanction and authority of God.

F. Inspiration extends equally to all Parts of Scripture.

This is the fourth element of the Church doctrine on this subject. This means, first, that all the books of Scripture are equally inspired. All alike are infallible in what they teach. And secondly, that inspiration extends to all the contents of these several books. It is not confined to moral and religious truths, but extends to the statements of facts, whether scientific, historical, or geographical. It is not confined to those facts the importance of which is obvious, or which are involved in matters of doctrine. It extends to everything which any sacred writer asserts to be true.

This is proved, (1) Because it is involved in, or follows as a necessary consequence from, the proposition that the sacred writers were the organs of God. If what they assert, God asserts, which, as has been shown, is the Scriptural idea of inspiration, their assertions must be free from error. (2.) Because our Lord expressly says, "The Scripture cannot be broken" (John x. 35), i. e., they cannot err. (3.) Because Christ and his Apostles refer to all parts of the Scriptures, or to the whole volume, as the word of God. They make no distinction as to the authority of the Law, the Prophets, or the Hagiographa. They quote the Pentateuch, the historical books, the Psalms, and the Prophets, as all and equally the word of God. (4.) Because Christ and the writers of the New Testament refer to all classes of facts recorded in the Old Testament as infallibly true. Not only doctrinal facts, such as those of the creation and probation of man; his apostasy; the covenant with Abraham; the giving the law upon Mount Sinai; not only great historical facts, as the deluge, the deliverance of the people out of Egypt, the passage of the Red Sea, and the like; but incidental circumstances, or facts of apparently minor importance, as e. g. that Satan tempted our first parents in the form of a serpent; that Moses lifted up a serpent in the wilderness; that Elisha healed Naaman, the Syrian, and was sent to the widow in Sarepta; that David ate the shew-bread in the temple; and even that great stumbling-block, that Jonah was three days in the whale's belly, are all referred to by our Lord and his Apostles with the sublime simplicity and confidence with which they are received by little children. (5.) It lies in the very idea of the Bible, that God chose some men to write history; some to indite psalms; some to unfold the future; some to teach doctrines. All were equally his organs, and each was infallible in his own sphere. As the principle of vegetable life pervades the whole plant, the root, stem, and flower; as the life of the body belongs as much to the feet as to the head, so the Spirit of God pervades the whole Scripture, and is not more in one part than in another. Some members of the body are more important than others; and some books of the Bible could be far better spared than others. There may be as great a difference between St. John's Gospel and the Book of Chronicles as between a man's brain and the hair of his head; nevertheless the life of the body is as truly in the hair as in the brain.

G. The Inspiration of the Scriptures extends to the Words.

1. This again is included in the infallibility which our Lord ascribes to the Scriptures. A mere human report or record of a divine revelation must of necessity be not only fallible, but more or less erroneous.

2. The thoughts are in the words. The two are inseparable. If the words, priest, sacrifice, ransom, expiation, propitiation, purification by blood, and the like, have no divine authority, then the doctrine which they embody has no such authority.

3. Christ and his Apostles argue from the very words of Scripture. Our Lord says that David by the Spirit called the Messiah Lord, i. e., David used that word. It was in the use of a particular word, that Christ said (John x. 35), that the Scriptures cannot be broken. "If he call them gods unto whom the word of God came, and the Scripture cannot be broken," etc. The use of that word, therefore, according to Christ's view of the Scripture, was determined by the Spirit of God. Paul, in Gal. iii. 16, lays stress on the fact, that in the promise made to Abraham, a word used is singular and not plural, "seed," "as of one," and not "seeds as of many." Constantly it is the very words of Scripture which are quoted as of divine authority.

4. The very form in which the doctrine of inspiration is taught in the Bible, assumes that the organs of God in the communication of his will were controlled by Him in the words which they used. "I have put my words in thy mouth." (Jer. i. 9.) "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." (Matt. x. 20.) They spake "as the Spirit gave them utterance." (Acts ii. 4.) "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (2 Pet. i. 21.) All these, and similar modes of expression with which the Scriptures abound, imply that the words uttered were the words of God. This, moreover, is the very idea of inspiration as understood by the ancient world. The words of the oracle were assumed to be the words of the divinity, and not those selected by the organ of communication. And this, too, as has been shown, was the idea attached to the gift of prophecy. The words of the prophet were the words of God, or he could not be God's spokesman and mouth. It has also been shown that in the most formally didactic passage in the whole Bible on this subject (1 Cor. ii. 10-18), the Apostle expressly asserts that the truths revealed by the Spirit, he communicated in words taught by the Spirit.

Plenary Inspiration.

The view presented above is known as the doctrine of plenary inspiration. Plenary is opposed to partial. The Church doctrine denies that inspiration is confined to parts of the Bible; and affirms that it applies to all the books of the sacred canon. It denies that the sacred writers were merely partially inspired; it asserts that they were fully inspired as to all that they teach, whether of doctrine or fact. This of course does not imply that the sacred writers were infallible except for the special purpose for which they were employed. They were not imbued with plenary knowledge. As to all matters of science, philosophy, and history, they stood on the same level with their contemporaries. They were infallible only as teachers, and when acting as the spokesmen of God. Their inspiration no more made them astronomers than it made them agriculturists. Isaiah was infallible in his predictions, although he shared with his countrymen the views then prevalent as to the mechanism of the universe. Paul could not err in anything he taught, although he could not recollect how many persons he had baptized in Corinth. The sacred writers also, doubtless, differed as to insight into the truths which they taught. The Apostle Peter intimates that the prophets searched diligently into the meaning of their own predictions. When David said God had put "all things" under the feet of man, he probably little thought that "all things" meant the whole universe. (Heb. ii. 8.) And Moses, when he recorded the promise that childless Abraham was to be the father "of many nations," little thought that it meant the whole world.

(Rom. iv 13). Nor does the Scriptural doctrine on this subject imply that the sacred writers were free from errors in conduct. Their infallibility did not arise from their holiness, nor did inspiration render them holy. Balaam was inspired, and Saul was among the prophets. David committed many crimes, although inspired to write psalms. Peter erred in conduct at Antioch; but this does not prove that he erred in teaching. The influence which preserved him from mistakes in teaching was not designed to preserve him from mistakes in conduct.

H. General Considerations in Support of the Doctrine.

On this point little need be said. If the questions, What is the Scriptural doctrine concerning inspiration? and, What is the true doctrine? be considered different, then after showing what the Scriptures teach on the subject, it would be necessary to prove that what they teach is true. This, however, is not the position of the Christian theologian. It is his business to set forth what the Bible teaches. If the sacred writers assert that they are the organs of God; that what they taught He taught through them; that they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, so that what they said the Holy Spirit said, then, if we believe their divine mission, we must believe what they teach as to the nature of the influence under which they spoke and wrote. This is the reason why in the earlier period of the Church there was no separate discussion of the doctrine of inspiration. That was regarded as involved in the divine origin of the Scriptures. If they are a revelation from God, they must be received and obeyed; but they cannot be thus received without attributing to them divine authority, and they cannot have such authority without being infallible in all they teach.

The organic unity of the Scriptures proves them to be the product of one mind. They are not only so united that we cannot believe one part without believing the whole; we cannot believe the New Testament without believing the Old; we cannot believe the Prophets without believing the Law; we cannot believe Christ without believing his Apostles; but besides all this they present the regular development, carried on through centuries and millenniums, of the great original promise, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." This development was conducted by some forty independent writers, many of whom understood very little of the plan they were unfolding, but each contributed his part to the progress and completion of the whole.

If the Bible be the work of one mind, that mind must be the mind of God. He only knows the end from the beginning. He only could know what the Bible reveals. No one, says the Apostle, knows the things of God but the Spirit of God. He only could reveal the nature, the thoughts, and purposes of God. He only could tell whether sin can be pardoned. No one knows the Son but the Father. The revelation of the person and work of Christ is as clearly the work of God as are the heavens in all their majesty and glory.

Besides, we have the witness in ourselves. We find that the truths revealed in the Bible have the same adaptation to our souls that the atmosphere has to our bodies. The body cannot live without air, which it receives and appropriates instinctively, with full confidence in its adaptation to the end designed. In like manner the soul receives and appropriates the truths of Scripture as the atmosphere in which alone it can breathe and live. Thus in receiving the Bible as true, we necessarily receive it as divino. In believing it as a supernatural revelation, we believe its plenary inspiration.

This doctrine involves nothing out of analogy with the ordinary operations of God. We believe that He is everywhere present in the material world, and controls the operations of natural causes. We know that He causes the grass to grow, and gives rain and fruitful seasons. We believe that He exercises a like control over the minds of men, turning them as the rivers of water are turned. All religion, natural and revealed, is founded on the assumption of this providential government of God. Besides this, we believe in the gracious operations of his Spirit, by which He works in the hearts of his people to will and to do; we believe that faith, repentance, and holy living are due to the ever-present influence of the Holy Spirit. If, then, this wonder-working God everywhere operates in nature and in grace, why should it be deemed incredible that holy men should speak as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, so that they should say just what He would have them say, so that their words should be his words.

After all Christ is the great object of the Christian's faith. We believe him and we believe everything else on his authority. He hands us the Old Testament and tells us that it is the Word of God; that its authors spoke by the Spirit; that the Scriptures cannot be broken. And we believe on his testimony. His testimony to his Apostles is no less explicit, although given in a different way. He promised to give them a mouth and a wisdom which their adversaries could not gainsay or resist. He told them to take no thought what they should say, "For the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say." (Luke xii. 12.) "It is not ye that speak but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." He said to them "he that receiveth you receiveth me"; and He prayed for those who should believe on Him through their word. We believe the Scriptures, therefore, because Christ declares them to be the Word of God. Heaven and earth may pass away, but his word cannot pass away.

I. Objections.

A large class of the objections to the doctrine of inspiration, which for many minds are the most effective, arise from the rejection of one or other of the presumptions specified on a preceding page. If a man denies the existence of a personal, extramundane God, he must deny the doctrine of inspiration, but it is not necessary in order to prove that doctrine that we should first prove the being of God. If he denies that God exerts any direct efficiency in the government of the world, and holds that everything is the product of fixed laws, he cannot believe what the Scriptures teach of inspiration. If the supernatural be impossible, inspiration is impossible. It will be found that most of the objections, especially those of recent date, are founded on unscriptural views of the relation of God to the world, or on the peculiar philosophical views of the objectors as to the nature of man or of his free agency.

A still larger class of objections is founded on misconceptions of the doctrine. Such objections are answered by the correct statement of what the Church believes on the subject. Even a man so distinguished for knowledge and ability as Coleridge, speaks with contempt of what he regards as the common theory of inspiration, when he utterly misunderstands the real doctrine which he opposes. He says: "All the miracles which the legends of monk or rabbi contain, can scarcely be put in competition, on the score of complication, inexplicableness, the absence of all intelligible use or purpose, and of circuitous self-frustration, with those that must be assumed by the maintainers of this doctrine, in order to give effect to the series of miracles by which all the nominal composers of the Hebrew nation before the time of Ezra, of whom there are any remains, were successively transformed into automaton compositors,"¹ etc. But if the Church doctrine of inspiration no more assumes that the sacred writers "were transformed into automaton compositors," than that every believer is thus transformed in whom God "works to will and to do," then all such objections amount to nothing. If God, without interfering with a man's free agency, can make it infallibly certain that he will repent and believe, He can render it certain that he will not err in teaching. It is in vain to profess to hold the common doctrine of Theism, and yet assert that God cannot control rational creatures without turning them into machines.

¹ "Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit," Works, Harpers, N. Y., 1853, vol. v. p. 612.

Discrepancies and Errors.

But although the theologian may rightfully dismiss all objections founded on the denial of the common principles of natural and revealed religion, there are others which cannot be thus summarily disposed of. The most obvious of these is, that the sacred writers contradict each other, and that they teach error. It is, of course, useless to contend that the sacred writers were infallible, if in point of fact they err. Our views of inspiration must be determined by the phenomena of the Bible as well as from its didactic statements. If in fact the sacred writers retain each his own style and mode of thought, then we must renounce any theory which assumes that inspiration obliterates or suppresses all individual peculiarities. If the Scriptures abound in contradictions and errors, then it is vain to contend that they were written under an influence which precludes all error. The question, therefore, is a question of fact. Do the sacred writers contradict each other? Do the Scriptures teach what from any source can be proved not to be true? The question is not whether the views of the sacred writers were incorrect, but whether they taught error? For example, it is not the question Whether they thought that the earth is the centre of our system? but, Did they teach that it is?

The objection under consideration, namely, that the Bible contains errors, divides itself into two. The first, that the sacred writers contradict themselves, or one the other. The second, that the Bible teaches what is inconsistent with the facts of history or science.

As to the former of these objections, it would require, not a volume, but volumes to discuss all the cases of alleged discrepancies. All that can be expected here is a few general remarks: (1.) These apparent discrepancies, although numerous, are for the most part trivial; relating in most cases to numbers or dates. (2.) The great majority of them are only apparent, and yield to careful examination. (3.) Many of them may fairly be ascribed to errors of transcribers. (4.) The marvel and the miracle is that there are so few of any real importance. Considering that the different books of the Bible were written not only by different authors, but by men of all degrees of culture, living in the course of fifteen hundred or two thousand years, it is altogether unaccountable that they should agree perfectly, on any other hypothesis than that the writers were under the guidance of the Spirit of God. In this respect, as in all others, the Bible stands alone. It is enough to impress any mind with awe, when it contemplates the Sacred Scriptures filled with the highest truths, speaking with authority in the name of God, and so miraculously free from the soiling touch of human fingers. The errors in matters of fact which skeptics search out bear no proportion to the whole. No sane man would deny that the Parthenon was built of marble, even if here and there a speck of sandstone should be detected in its structure. Not less unreasonable is it to deny the inspiration of such a book as the Bible, because one sacred writer says that on a given occasion twenty-four, and another says that twenty-three thousand, men were slain. Surely a Christian may be allowed to tread such objections under his feet.

Admitting that the Scriptures do contain, in a few instances, discrepancies which with our present means of knowledge, we are unable satisfactorily to explain, they furnish no rational ground for denying their infallibility. "The Scripture cannot be broken." (John x. 35.) This is the whole doctrine of plenary inspiration, taught by the lips of Christ himself. The universe teems with evidences of design, so manifold, so diverse, so wonderful, as to overwhelm the mind with the conviction that it has had an intelligent author. Yet here and there isolated cases of monstrosity appear. It is irrational, because we cannot account for such cases, to deny that the universe is the product of intelligence. So the Christian need not renounce his faith in the plenary inspiration of the Bible, although there may be some things about it in its present state which he cannot account for.

Historical and Scientific Objections.

The second great objection to the plenary inspiration of the Scripture is that it teaches what is inconsistent with historical and scientific truth.

Here again it is to be remarked, (1.) That we must distinguish between what the sacred writers themselves thought or believed, and what they teach. They may have believed that the sun moves round the earth, but they do not so teach. (2.) The language of the Bible is the language of common life; and the language of common life is founded on apparent, and not upon scientific truth.

It would be ridiculous to refuse to speak of the sun rising and setting, because we know that it is not a satellite of our planet. (3.) There is a great distinction between theories and facts. Theories are of men. Facts are of God. The Bible often contradicts the former, never the latter. (4.) There is also a distinction to be made between the Bible and our interpretation. The latter may come into competition with settled facts; and then it must yield. Science has in many things taught the Church how to understand the Scriptures. The Bible was for ages understood and explained according to the Ptolemaic system of the universe; it is now explained without doing the least violence to its language, according to the Copernican system. Christians have commonly believed that the earth has existed only a few thousands of years. If geologists finally prove that it has existed for myriads of ages, it will be found that the first chapter of Genesis is in full accord with the facts, and that the last results of science are embodied on the first page of the Bible. It may cost the Church a severe struggle to give up one interpretation and adopt another, as it did in the seventeenth century, but no real evil need be apprehended. The Bible has stood, and still stands in the presence of the whole scientific world with its claims unshaken. Men hostile or indifferent to its truths may, on insufficient grounds, or because of their personal opinions, reject its authority; but, even in the judgment of the greatest authorities in science, its teachings cannot fairly be impeached.

It is impossible duly to estimate the importance of this subject. If the Bible be the word of God, all the great questions which for ages have agitated the minds of men are settled with infallible certainty. Human reason has never been able to answer to its own satisfaction, or to the assurance of others, the vital questions, What is God? What is man? What lies beyond the grave? If there be a future state of being, what is it? and How may future blessedness be secured? Without the Bible, we are, on all these subjects, in utter darkness. How endless and unsatisfying have been the answers to the greatest of all questions, What is God? The whole Eastern world answers by saying, "That He is the unconscious ground of being." The Greeks gave the same answer for philosophers, and made all nature God for the people. The moderns have reached no higher doctrine. Fichte says the subjective Ego is God. According to Schelling, God is the eternal movement of the universe, subject becoming object, object becoming subject, the infinite becoming finite, and the finite infinite. Hegel says, Thought is God. Cousin combines all the German answers to form his own. Coleridge refers us to Schelling for an answer to the question, What is God? Carlyle makes force God. A Christian child says: "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." Men and angels veil their faces in the presence of that answer. It is the highest, greatest, and most fruitful truth ever embodied in human language. Without the Bible, we are without God and without hope. The present is a burden, and the future a dread.

§ 3. Adverse Theories.

Although substantial unanimity as to the doctrine of inspiration has prevailed among the great historical Churches of Christendom, yet there has been no little diversity of opinion among theologians and philosophical writers. The theories are too numerous to be examined in detail. They may, perhaps, be advantageously referred to the following classes.

A. Naturalistic Doctrine.

There is a large class of writers who deny any supernatural agency in the affairs of men. This general class includes writers who differ essentially in their views.

First. There are those who, although Theists, hold the mechanical theory of the universe. That is, they hold that God having created the world, including all that it contains, organic and inorganic, rational and irrational, and having endowed matter with its properties and minds with their attributes, leaves it to itself. Just as a ship, when launched and equipped, is left to the winds and to its crew. This theory precludes the possibility not only of all miracles, prophecy, and supernatural revelation, but even of all providential government, whether general or special. Those who adopt this view of the relation of God to the world, must regard the Bible from beginning to end as a purely human production. They may rank it as the highest, or as among the lowest of the literary works of men; there is no possibility of its being inspired in any authorized sense of that word.

Secondly. There are those who do not so entirely banish God from his works. They admit that He is everywhere present, and everywhere active; that his providential efficiency and control are exercised in the occurrence of all events. But they maintain that He always acts according to fixed laws; and always in connection and coöperation with second causes. According to this theory, also, all miracles and all prophecy, properly speaking, are excluded.

A revelation is admitted, or at least, is possible. But it is merely providential. It consists in such an ordering of circumstances, and such a combination of influences as to secure the elevation of certain men to a higher level of religious knowledge than that attained by others. They may also, in a sense, be said to be inspired in so far as that inward, subjective state is purer, and more devout, as well as more intelligent than that of ordinary men. There is no specific difference, however, according to this theory, between inspired and uninspired men. It is only a matter of degrees. One is more and another less purified and enlightened. This theory also makes the Bible a purely human production. It confines revelation to the sphere of human knowledge. No possible degree of culture or development can get anything more than human out of man. According to the Scriptures, and to the faith of the Church, the Bible is a revelation of the things of God; of his thoughts and purposes. But who knoweth the things of God, asks the Apostle, but the Spirit of God? The things which the Bible purports to make known, are precisely those things which lie beyond the ken of the human mind. This theory, therefore, for bread gives us a stone; for the thoughts of God, the thoughts of man.

Schleiermacher's Theory.

Thirdly. There is a theory far more pretentious and philosophical, and which of late years has widely prevailed, which in reality differs very little from the preceding. It agrees with it in the main point in that it denies anything supernatural in the origin or composition of the Bible. Schleiermacher, the author of this theory, was addicted to a philosophy which precluded all intervention of the immediate efficiency of God in the world. He admits, however, of two exceptions: the creation of man, and the constitution of the person of Christ. There was a supernatural intervention in the origin of our race, and in the manifestation of Christ. All else in the history of the world is natural. Of course there is nothing supernatural in the Bible; nothing in the Old Testament which the Adamic nature was not adequate to produce; and nothing in the New Testament, which Christianity, the life of the Church, a life common to all believers, is not sufficient to account for.

Religion consists in feeling, and specifically in a feeling of absolute dependence (or an absolute feeling of dependence) i. e., the consciousness that the finite is nothing in the presence of the Infinite, — the individual in the presence of the universal. This consciousness involves the unity of the one and all, of God and man.

"This system," says Dr. Ullmann, one of its more moderate and effective advocates, "is not absolutely new. We find it in another form in ancient Mysticism, especially in the German Mystics of the Middle Ages. With them, too, the ground and central point of Christianity is the oneness of Deity and humanity effected through the incarnation of God, and deification of man."¹

Christianity, therefore, is not a system of doctrine; it is not, subjectively considered, a form of knowledge. It is a life. It is the life of Christ. Ullmann again says explicitly: "The life of Christ is Christianity."² God in becoming man did not take upon himself, "a true body and a reasonable soul," but generic humanity; i. e., humanity as a generic life. The effect of the incarnation was to unite the human and divine as one life. And this life passes over to the Church precisely as the life of Adam passed over to his descendants, by a process of natural development. And this life is Christianity. Participation of this divine-human life makes a man a Christian.

The Christian revelation consists in the providential dispensations connected with the appearance of Christ on the earth. The effect of these dispensations and events was the elevation of the religious consciousness of the men of that generation, and specially of those who came most directly under the influence of Christ. This subjective state, this excitement and elevation of their religious life, gave them intuitions of religious truths, "eternal verities." These intuitions were by the logical understanding clothed in the form of doctrines. This, however, was a gradual process as it was effected only by the Church-life, i. e., by the working of the new divine-human life in the body of believers.³ Mr. Morell in expounding this theory, says:⁴ "The essential germ of the religious life is concentrated in the absolute feeling of dependence,—a feeling which implies nothing abject, but, on the contrary, a high and hallowed sense of our being inseparably related to Deity." On the preceding page he had said, "Let the subject become as nothing—not, indeed, from its intrinsic insignificance or incapacity of moral action, but by virtue of the infinity of the object to which it stands

¹ Studien und Kritiken, 1845, p. 59.

² Studien und Kritiken, January 1845; translated in The Mystical Presence, by Dr. J. W. Nevin.

³ The English reader may find this theory set forth, in Morell's Philosophy of Religion; in Archdeacon Wilberforce's work on the Incarnation; in Maurice's Theological Essays; in the Mystical Presence, by Dr. John W. Nevin, and in the pages of the Mercersburg Quarterly Review, a journal specially devoted to the defence of Schleiermacher's doctrines and of those of the same general character.

⁴ Philosophy of Religion, p. 77.

consciously opposed; and the feeling of dependence must become absolute; for all finite power is as nothing in relation to the Infinite."

Christianity, as just stated, is the life of Christ, his human life, which is also divine, and is communicated to us as the life of Adam was communicated to his descendants. Morell, rather more in accordance with English modes of thought, says,¹ "Christianity, like every other religion, consists essentially in a state of man's inner consciousness, which develops itself into a system of thought and activity only in a community of awakened minds; and it was inevitable, therefore, that such a state of consciousness should require time, and intercourse, and mutual sympathy, before it could become moulded into a decided and distinctive form." He represents the Apostles as often meeting together and deliberating on essential points, correcting each other's views; and, after years of such fellowship, Christianity was at last brought into form.

Revelation is declared to be a communication of truth to our intuitional consciousness. The outward world is a revelation to our sense-intuitions; beauty is a revelation to our esthetic intuitions; and "eternal verities," when intuitively perceived, are said to be revealed; and this intuition is brought about by whatever purifies and exalts our religious feelings. "Revelation," says Morell, "is a process of the intuitional consciousness, gazing upon eternal verities; while theology is the reflection of the understanding upon those vital intuitions, so as to reduce them to a logical and scientific expression."²

Inspiration is the inward state of mind which enables us to apprehend the truth. "Revelation and inspiration," says Morell, "indicate one united process, the result of which upon the human mind is, to produce a state of spiritual intuition, whose phenomena are so extraordinary, that we at once separate the agency by which they are produced from any of the ordinary principles of human development. And yet this agency is applied in perfect consistency with the laws and natural operations of our spiritual nature. Inspiration does not imply anything generically new in the actual processes of the human mind; it does not involve any form of intelligence essentially different from what we already possess; it indicates rather the elevation of the religious consciousness, and with it, of course, the power of spiritual vision, to a degree of intensity peculiar to the individuals thus highly favoured of God."³ The only difference, therefore, between the Apostles and ordinary Christians is as to their relative holiness.

¹ Philosophy of Religion, page 104.

² Page 141.

³ Page 151.

According to this theory there is no specific difference between genius and inspiration. The difference is simply in the objects apprehended and the causes of the inward excitement to which the apprehension is due. "Genius," says Morell, "consists in the possession of a remarkable power of intuition with reference to some particular object, a power which arises from the inward nature of a man being brought into unusual harmony with that object in its reality and its operations."¹ This is precisely his account of inspiration. "Let," he says, "there be a due purification of the moral nature, — a perfect harmony of the spiritual being with the mind of God, — a removal of all inward disturbances from the heart, and what is to prevent or disturb this immediate intuition of divine things."²

This theory of inspiration, while retaining its essential elements, is variously modified. With those who believe with Schleiermacher, that man "is the form in which God comes to conscious existence on our earth," it has one form. With Realists who define man to be "the manifestation of generic humanity in connection with a given corporeal organization;" and who believe that it was generic humanity which Christ took and united in one life with his divine nature, which life is communicated to the Church as his body, and thereby to all its members; it takes a somewhat different form. With those again who do not adopt either of these anthropological theories, but take the common view as to the constitution of man; it takes still a different, and in some respects, a lower, form. In all, however, inspiration is the intuition of divine truths due to the excitement of the religious nature, whatever that nature may be.

Objections to Schleiermacher's Theory.

To this theory in all its forms it may be objected, —

1. That it proceeds upon a wrong view of religion in general and of Christianity in particular. It assumes that religion is a feeling, a life. It denies that it is a form of knowledge, or involves the reception of any particular system of doctrine. In the subjective sense of the word, all religions (i. e., all religious doctrines) are true, as Twisten says,³ but all are not equally pure, or equally adequate expressions of the inward religious principle. According to the Scriptures, however, and the common conviction of Christians, religion (subjectively considered) is the reception of certain doctrines as true, and a state of heart and course of action in accordance with those doctrines. The Apostles pronounced a certain system of doctrines; they pronounced those to be Christians who received those doctrines so as to determine their character and life. They pronounced those who rejected those doctrines, who refused to receive their testimony, as antichristian; as having no part or lot with the people of God. Christ's command was to teach; to convert the world by teaching. On this principle the Apostles acted and the Church has ever acted from that day to this. Those who deny Theism as a doctrine, are atheists. Those who reject Christianity as a system of doctrine, are unbelievers. They are not Christians. The Bible everywhere assumes that without truth there can be no holiness; that all conscious exercises of spiritual life are in view of truth objectively revealed in the Scriptures. And hence the importance everywhere attributed to knowledge, to truth, to sound doctrine, in the Word of God.

¹ Philosophy of Religion, page 184.

² Page 186.

³ Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 2. "Das Verhältniss des Erkennen zur Religion." Hase's Dogmatik, "Jede Religion als Ergebniss einer Volksbildung ist angemessen oder subj. wahr; wahr an sich ist die, welche der vollendeten Ausbildung der Menschheit entspricht." See also his Hutterus Redivivus.

2. This theory is inconsistent with the Scriptural doctrine of revelation. According to the Bible, God presents truth objectively to the mind, whether by audible words, by visions, or by the immediate operations of his Spirit. According to this theory, revelation is merely the providential ordering of circumstances which awaken and exalt the religious feelings, and which thus enable the mind intuitively to apprehend the things of God.

3. It avowedly confines these intuitions, and of course revealed truth, to what are called "eternal verities." But the great body of truths revealed in Scripture are not "eternal verities." The fall of man; that all men are sinners; that the Redeemer from sin was to be of the seed of Abraham, and of the house of David; that He was to be born of a virgin, to be a man of sorrows; that He was crucified and buried; that He rose again the third day; that He ascended to heaven; that He is to come again without sin to salvation, although truths on which our salvation depends, are not intuitive truths; they are not truths which any exaltation of the religious consciousness would enable any man to discover of himself.

4. According to this theory the Bible has no normal authority as a rule of faith. It contains no doctrines revealed by God, and to be received as true on his testimony. It contains only the thoughts of holy men; the forms in which their understandings, without supernatural aid, clothed the "intuitions" due to their religious feelings. "The Bible," says Morell,¹ "cannot in strict accuracy of language be termed a revelation, since a revelation always implies an actual process of intelligence in a living mind; but it contains the records in which those minds who enjoyed the preliminary training or the first brighter revelation of Christianity, have described the scenes which awakened their own religious nature to new life, and the high ideas and aspirations to which that new life gave origin." The Old Testament is the product of "the religious consciousness" of men who lived under a rude state of culture; and is of no authority for us. The New Testament is the product of "the religious consciousness" of men who had experienced the sanctifying influence of Christ's presence among them. But those men were Jews, they had Jewish modes of thinking. They were familiar with the services of the old dispensation; were accustomed to think of God as approachable only through a priesthood; as demanding expiation for sin, and regeneration of heart; and promising certain rewards and forms of blessedness in a future state of existence. It was natural for them, therefore, to clothe their "intuitions" in these Jewish modes of thought. We, in this nineteenth century, may clothe ours in very different forms, i. e., in very different doctrines, and yet "the eternal verities" be the same.

¹ Philosophy of Religion, ch. 8, p. 143, London ed. 1849.

Different men carry this theory to very different lengths. Some have such an inward experience that they can find no form for expressing what they feel, so suitable as that given in the Bible, and therefore they believe all its great doctrines. But the ground of their faith is purely subjective. It is not the testimony of God given in his Word, but their own experience. They take what suits that, and reject the rest. Others with less Christian experience, or with no experience distinctively Christian, reject all the distinctive doctrines of Christianity, and adopt a form of religious philosophy which they are willing to call Christianity.

5. That this theory is antisciptural has already been said. The Bible makes revelation as therein contained to be the communication of doctrines to the understanding by the Spirit of God. It makes those truths or doctrines the immediate source of all right feeling. The feelings come from spiritual apprehension of the truth, and not the knowledge of truth from the feelings. Knowledge is necessary to all conscious holy exercises. Hence the Bible makes truth of the greatest importance. It pronounces those blessed who receive the doctrines which it teaches, and those accursed who reject them. It makes the salvation of men to depend upon their faith. This theory makes the creed of a man or of a people of comparatively little consequence.

In the Church, therefore, Christianity has always been regarded as a system of doctrine. Those who believe these doctrines are Christians; those who reject them, are, in the judgment of the Church, infidels or heretics. If our faith be formal or speculative, so is our Christianity; if it be spiritual and living, so is our religion. But no mistake can be greater than to divorce religion from truth, and make Christianity a spirit or life distinct from the doctrines which the Scriptures present as the objects of faith.

B. Gracious Inspiration.

This theory belongs to the category of natural or supernatural, according to the meaning assigned to those terms. By natural effects are commonly understood those brought about by natural causes under the providential control of God. Then the effects produced by the gracious operations of the Spirit, such as repentance, faith, love, and all other fruits of the Spirit, are supernatural. And consequently the theory which refers inspiration to the gracious influence of the Spirit, belongs to the class of the supernatural. But this word is often used in a more limited sense, to designate events which are produced by the immediate agency or volition of God without the intervention of any second cause. In this limited sense, creation, miracles, immediate revelation, regeneration (in the limited sense of that word), are supernatural. As the sanctification of men is carried on by the Spirit by the use of the means of grace, it is not a supernatural work, in the restricted sense of the term.

There are many theologians who do not adopt either of the philosophical theories of the nature of man and of his relation to God, above mentioned; and who receive the Scriptural doctrine as held by the Church universal, that the Holy Spirit renews, sanctifies, illuminates, guides, and teaches all the people of God; and yet who regard inspiration to be one of the ordinary fruits of the Spirit. Inspired and uninspired men are not distinguished by any specific difference. The sacred writers were merely holy men under the guidance of the ordinary influence of the Spirit. Some of those who adopt this theory extend it to revelation as well as to inspiration. Others admit a strictly supernatural revelation, but deny that the sacred writers in communicating the truths revealed were under any influence not common to ordinary believers. And as to those parts of the Bible (as the Hagiographa and Gospels), which contain no special revelations, they are to be regarded as the devotional writings or historical narratives of devout but fallible men. Thus Coleridge, who refers inspiration to that "grace and communion with the Spirit which the Church, under all circumstances, and every regenerate member of the Church, is permitted to hope and instructed to pray for;" makes an exception in favour of "the law and the prophets, no jot or tittle of which can pass unfulfilled."¹ The remainder of the Bible, he holds, was written under the impulse and guidance of the gracious influence of the Spirit given to all Christian men. And his friends and followers, Dr. Arnold, Archdeacon Hare, and specially Maurice, ignore this distinction and refer the whole Bible "to an inspiration the same as what every believer enjoys."² Thus Mauriee says,³ "We must forego the demand which we make on the conscience of young men, when we compel them to declare that they regard the inspiration of the Bible as generically unlike that which God bestows on His children in this day."

Objections to the Doctrine that Inspiration is common to all Believers.

That this theory is anti-scriptural is obvious. 1. Because the Bible makes a marked distinction between those whom God chose to be his messengers, his prophets, his spokesmen, and other men. This theory ignores that distinction, so far as the people of God is concerned.

2. It is inconsistent with the authority claimed by these special messengers of God. They spoke in his name. God spoke through them. They said, "Thus saith the Lord," in a sense and way in which no ordinary believer dare use those words. It is inconsistent with the authority not only claimed by the sacred writers, but attributed to them by our Lord himself. He declared that the Scripture could not be broken; that it was infallible in all its teachings. The Apostles declare those anathema who did not receive their doctrines. This claim to divine authority in teaching was confirmed by God himself in signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost.

3. It is inconsistent with the whole nature of the Bible, which is and professes to be a revelation of truths not only undiscoverable by human reason, but which no amount of holiness could enable the mind of man to perceive. This is true not only of the strictly prophetic revelations relating to the future, but also of all things concerning the mind and will of God. The doctrines of the Bible are called μυστήρια, things concealed, unknown and unknowable, except as revealed to the holy Apostles and prophets by the Spirit. (Eph. iii. 5.)

¹ "Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit," Letter 7, Works, N. Y., 1853, vol. v. p. 619.

² See Bannerman, Inspiration of the Scriptures, Edinburgh, 1865; pp. 145, 232.

³ Theological Essays, p. 339, Cambridge, 1853.

4. It is inconsistent with the faith of the Church universal, which has always made the broadest distinction between the writings of the inspired men and those of ordinary believers. Even Romanists, with all their reverence for the fathers, never presumed to place their writings on a level with the Scriptures. They do not attribute to them any authority but as witnesses of what the Apostles taught. If the Bible has no more authority than is due to the writings of pious men, then our faith is vain and we are yet in our sins. We have no sure foundation for our hopes of salvation.

C. Partial Inspiration.

Under this head are included several different doctrines.

1. Many hold that only some parts of Scripture are inspired, i. e., that the writers of some books were supernaturally guided by the Spirit, and the writers of others were not. This, as mentioned above, was the doctrine of Coleridge, who admitted the inspiration of the Law and the Prophets, but denied that of the rest of the Bible. Others admit the New Testament to be inspired to an extent to which the Old was not. Others again hold the discourses of Christ to be infallible, but no other part of the sacred volume.

2. Others limit the inspiration of the sacred writers to their doctrinal teaching. The great object of their commission was to give a faithful record of the revealed will and purpose of God, to be a rule of faith and practice to the Church. In this they were under an influence which rendered them infallible as religious and moral teachers. But beyond these limits they were as liable to error as other men. That there should be scientific, historical, geographical mistakes; errors in the citation of passages, or in other unessential matters; or discrepancies as to matters of fact between the sacred writers, leaves their inspiration as religious teachers untouched.

3. Another form of the doctrine of partial, as opposed to plenary inspiration, limits it to the thoughts, as distinguished from the words of Scripture. Verbal inspiration is denied. It is assumed that the sacred writers selected the words they used without any guidance of the Spirit, to prevent their adopting improper or inadequate terms in which to express their thoughts.

4. A fourth form of the doctrine of partial inspiration was early introduced and has been widely adopted. Maimonides, the greatest of the Jewish doctors since the time of Christ, taught as early as the twelfth century that the sacred writers of the Old Testament enjoyed different degrees of divine guidance. He placed the inspiration of the Law much above that of the Prophets; and that of the Prophets higher than that of the Hagiographa. This idea of different degrees of inspiration was adopted by many theologians, and in England for a long time it was the common mode of representation. The idea was that the writers of Kings and Chronicles needed less, and that they received less of the divine assistance than Isaiah or St. John.¹

In attempting to prove the doctrine of plenary inspiration the arguments which bear against all these forms of partial inspiration were given or suggested. The question is not an open one. It is not what theory is in itself most reasonable or plausible, but simply, What does the Bible teach on the subject? If our Lord and his Apostles declare the Old Testament to be the Word of God; that its authors spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; that what they said, the Spirit said; if they refer to the facts and to the very words of Scripture as of divine authority; and if the same infallible divine guidance was promised to the writers of the New Testament, and claimed by themselves; and if their claim was authenticated by God himself; then there is no room for, as there is no need of, these theories of partial inspiration. The whole Bible was written under such an influence as preserved its human authors from all error, and makes it for the Church the infallible rule of faith and practice.

§ 4. The Completeness of the Scriptures.

By the completeness of the Scriptures is meant that they contain all the extant revelations of God designed to be a rule of faith and practice to the Church. It is not denied that God reveals himself, even his eternal power and Godhead, by his works, and has done so from the beginning of the world. But all the truths thus revealed are clearly made known in his written Word. Nor is it denied that there may have been, and probably were, books written by inspired men, which are no longer in existence. Much less is it denied that Christ and his Apostles delivered many discourses which were not recorded, and which, could they now be known and authenticated, would be of equal authority with the books now regarded as canonical. All that Protestants insist upon is, that the Bible contains all the extant revelations of God, which He designed to be the rule of faith and practice for his Church; so that nothing can rightfully be imposed on the consciences of men as truth or duty which is not taught directly or by necessary implication in the Holy Scriptures. This excludes all unwritten traditions, not only; but also all decrees of the visible Church; all resolutions of conventions, or other public bodies, declaring this or that to be right or wrong, true or false. The people of God are bound by nothing but the Word of God. On this subject little need be said. The completeness of Scripture, as a rule of faith, is a corollary of the Protestant doctrine concerning tradition. If that be true, the former must also be true. This Romanists do not deny. They make the Rule of Faith to consist of the written and unwritten word of God, i. e., of Scripture and tradition. If it be proved that tradition is untrustworthy, human, and fallible, then the Scriptures by common consent stand alone in their authority. As the authority of tradition has already been discussed, further discussion of the completeness of the Scriptures becomes unnecessary.

¹ This view of different degrees of inspiration was adopted by Lowth: Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments. Whitby, in the Preface to his Commentary. Doddridge, Dissertation on the Inspiration of the New Testament. Hill, Lectures on Divinity. Dick, Essay on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. Wilson, Evidences of Christianity. Henderson, Divine Inspiration.

It is well, however, to bear in mind the importance of this doctrine. It is not by Romanists only that it is denied, practically at least, if not theoretically. Nothing is more common among Protestants, especially in our day, than the attempt to coerce the conscience of men by public opinion; to make the opinions of men on questions of morals a rule of duty for the people, and even for the Church. If we would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, we must adhere to the principle that in matters of religion and morals the Scriptures alone have authority to bind the conscience.

§ 5. Perspicuity of the Scriptures. The Right of Private Judgment.

The Bible is a plain book. It is intelligible by the people. And they have the right, and are bound to read and interpret it for themselves; so that their faith may rest on the testimony of the Scriptures, and not on that of the Church. Such is the doctrine of Protestants on this subject.

It is not denied that the Scriptures contain many things hard to be understood; that they require diligent study; that all men need the guidance of the Holy Spirit in order to right knowledge and true faith. But it is maintained that in all things necessary to salvation they are sufficiently plain to be understood even by the unlearned.

It is not denied that the people, learned and unlearned, in order to the proper understanding of the Scriptures, should not only compare Scripture with Scripture, and avail themselves of all the means in their power to aid them in their search after the truth, but they should also pay the greatest deference to the faith of the Church. If the Scriptures be a plain book, and the Spirit performs the functions of a teacher to all the children of God, it follows inevitably that they must agree in all essential matters in their interpretation of the Bible. And from that fact it follows that for an individual Christian to dissent from the faith of the universal Church (i. e., the body of true believers), is tantamount to dissenting from the Scriptures themselves.

What Protestants deny on this subject is, that Christ has appointed any officer, or class of officers, in his Church to whose interpretation of the Scriptures the people are bound to submit as of final authority. What they affirm is that He has made it obligatory upon every man to search the Scriptures for himself; and determine on his own discretion what they require him to believe and to do.

The arguments in support of the former of these positions have already been presented in the discussion concerning the infallibility of the Church. The most obvious reasons in support of the right of private judgment are,—

1. That the obligations to faith and obedience are personal. Every man is responsible for his religious faith and his moral conduct. He cannot transfer that responsibility to others; nor can others assume it in his stead. He must answer for himself; and if he must answer for himself, he must judge for himself. It will not avail him in the day of judgment to say that his parents or his Church taught him wrong. He should have listened to God, and obeyed Him rather than men.

2. The Scriptures are everywhere addressed to the people, and not to the officers of the Church either exclusively, or specially. The prophets were sent to the people, and constantly said, "Hear, O Israel," "Hearken, O ye people." Thus, also, the discourses of Christ were addressed to the people, and the people heard him gladly. All the Epistles of the New Testament are addressed to the congregation, to the "called of Jesus Christ;" "to the beloved of God;" to those "called to be saints;" "to the sanctified in Christ Jesus;" "to all who call on the name of Jesus Christ our Lord; "to the saints which are in (Ephesus), and to the faithful in Jesus Christ;" or "to the saints and faithful brethren which are in (Colosse);" and so in every instance. It is the people who are addressed. To them are directed these profound discussions of Christian doctrine, and these comprehensive expositions of Christian duty. They are everywhere assumed to be competent to understand what is written, and are everywhere required to believe and obey what thus came from the inspired messengers of Christ. They were not referred to any other authority from which they were to learn the true import of these inspired instructions. It is, therefore, not only to deprive the people of a divine right, to forbid the people to read and interpret the Scriptures for themselves; but it is also to interpose between them and God, and to prevent their hearing his voice, that they may listen to the words of men.

The People commanded to search the Scriptures.

3. The Scriptures are not only addressed to the people, but the people were called upon to study them, and to teach them unto their children. It was one of the most frequently recurring injunctions to parents under the old dispensation, to teach the Law unto their children, that they again might teach it unto theirs. The "holy oracles" were committed to the people, to be taught by the people; and taught immediately out of the Scriptures, that the truth might be retained in its purity. Thus our Lord commanded the people to search the Scriptures, saying, "They are they which testify of me." (John v. 39.) He assumed that they were able to understand what the Old Testament said of the Messiah, although its teachings had been misunderstood by the scribes and elders, and by the whole Sanhedrim. Paul rejoiced that Timothy had from his youth known the Holy Scriptures, which were able to make him wise unto salvation. He said to the Galatians (i. 8, 9), "Though we, or an angel from heaven, — if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." This implies two things, — first, that the Galatian Christians, the people, had a right to sit in judgment on the teaching of an Apostle, or of an angel from heaven; and secondly, that they had an infallible rule by which that judgment was to be determined, namely, a previous authenticated revelation of God. If, then, the Bible recognizes the right of the people to judge of the teaching of Apostles and angels, they are not to be denied the right of judging of the doctrines of bishops and priests. The principle laid down by the Apostle is precisely that long before given by Moses (Dent. xiii.

1-3), who tells the people that if a prophet should arise, although he worked wonders, they were not to believe or obey him, if he taught them anything contrary to the Word of God. This again assumes that the people had the ability and the right to judge, and that they had an infallible rule of judgment. It implies, moreover, that their salvation depended upon their judging rightly. For if they allowed these false teachers, robed in sacred vestments, and surrounded by the insignia of authority, to lead them from the truth, they would inevitably perish.

4. It need hardly be remarked that this right of private judgment is the great safeguard of civil and religious liberty. If the Bible be admitted to be the infallible rule of faith and practice in accordance with which men are bound on the peril of their souls, to frame their creed and conduct; and if there be a set of men who have the exclusive right of interpreting the Scripture, and who are authorized to impose their interpretations on the people as of divine authority, then they may impose on them what conditions of salvation they see fit. And the men who have the salvation of the people in their hands are their absolute masters. Both reason and experience fully sustain the dictum of Chillingworth,¹ when he says, "He that would usurp an absolute lordship and tyranny over any people, need not put himself to the trouble and difficulty of abrogating and disannulling the laws, made to maintain the common liberty; for he may frustrate their intent, and compass his own design as well, if he can get the power and authority to interpret them as he pleases, and add to them what he pleases, and to have his interpretations and additions stand for laws; if he can rule his people by his laws, and his laws by his lawyers." This is precisely what the Church of Rome has done, and thereby established a tyranny for which there is no parallel in the history of the world. What renders this tyranny the more intolerable, is, that, so far as the mass of the people is concerned, it resolves itself into the authority of the parish priest. He is the arbiter of the faith and morals of his people. No man can believe unless the ground of faith is present to his mind. If the people are to believe that the Scriptures teach certain doctrines, then they must have the evidence that such doctrines are really taught in the Bible. If that evidence be that the Church so interprets the sacred writings, then the people must know what is the Church, i. e., which of the bodies claiming to be the Church, is entitled to be so regarded. How are the people, the uneducated masses, to determine that question? The priest tells them. If they receive his testimony on that point, then how can they tell how the Church interprets the Scriptures? Here again they must take the word of the priest. Thus the authority of the Church as an interpreter, which appears so imposing, resolves itself into the testimony of the priest, who is often wicked, and still oftener ignorant. This cannot be the foundation of the faith of God's elect. That foundation is the testimony of God himself speaking his word, and authenticated as divine by the testimony of the Spirit with and by the truth in the heart of the believer.

¹ Works, p. 105.

§ 6. Rules of Interpretation.

If every man has the right, and is bound to read the Scriptures, and to judge for himself what they teach, he must have certain rules to guide him in the exercise of this privilege and duty. These rules are not arbitrary. They are not imposed by human authority. They have no binding force which does not flow from their own intrinsic truth and propriety. They are few and simple.

1. The words of Scripture are to be taken in their plain historical sense. That is, they must be taken in the sense attached to them in the age and by the people to whom they were addressed. This only assumes that the sacred writers were honest, and meant to be understood.

2. If the Scriptures be what they claim to be, the word of God, they are the work of one mind, and that mind divine. From this it follows that Scripture cannot contradict Scripture. God cannot teach in one place anything which is inconsistent with what He teaches in another. Hence Scripture must explain Scripture. If a passage admits of different interpretations, that only can be the true one which agrees with what the Bible teaches elsewhere on the same subject. If the Scriptures teach that the Son is the same in substance and equal in power and glory with the Father, then when the Son says, "The Father is greater than I," the superiority must be understood in a manner consistent with this equality. It must refer either to subordination as to the mode of subsistence and operation, or it must be official. A king's son may say, "My father is greater than I," although personally his father's equal. This rule of interpretation is sometimes called the analogy of Scripture, and sometimes the analogy of faith. There is no material difference in the meaning of the two expressions.

3. The Scriptures are to be interpreted under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, which guidance is to be humbly and earnestly sought. The ground of this rule is twofold: First, the Spirit is promised as a guide and teacher. He was to come to lead the people of God into the knowledge of the truth. And secondly, the Scriptures teach, that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." (1 Cor. ii. 14.) The unrenewed mind is naturally blind to spiritual truth. His heart is in opposition to the things of God. Congeniality of mind is necessary to the proper apprehension of divine things. As only those who have a moral nature can discern moral truth, so those only who are spiritually minded can truly receive the things of the Spirit.

The fact that all the true people of God in every age and in every part of the Church, in the exercise of their private judgment, in accordance with the simple rules above stated, agree as to the meaning of Scripture in all things necessary either in faith or practice, is a decisive proof of the perspicuity of the Bible, and of the safety of allowing the people the enjoyment of the divine right of private judgment.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

PART I.

THEOLOGY PROPER.

CHAPTER I.

ORIGIN OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

ALL men have some knowledge of God. That is, they have the conviction that there is a Being on whom they are dependent, and to whom they are responsible. What is the source of this conviction? In other words, what is the origin of the idea of God? To this question three answers have been given. First, that it is innate. Second, that it is a deduction of reason; a conclusion arrived at by a process of generalization. Third, that it is to be referred to a supernatural revelation, preserved by tradition.

§ 1. The Knowledge of God is Innate.

A. What is meant by Innate Knowledge.

By innate knowledge is meant that which is due to our constitution, as sentient, rational, and moral beings. It is opposed to knowledge founded on experience; to that obtained by ab extra instruction; and to that acquired by a process of research and reasoning.

It cannot be doubted that there is such knowledge, i. e., that the soul is so constituted that it sees certain things to be true immediately in their own light. They need no proof. Men need not be told or taught that the things thus perceived are true. These immediate perceptions are called intuitions, primary truths, laws of belief, innate knowledge, or ideas. Provided we understand what is meant, the designation is of minor importance. The doctrine of innate knowledge, or intuitive truths, does not imply that the child is born with knowledge in conscious exercise in the mind. As knowledge is a form or state of the intelligence, and as that is a state of consciousness, knowledge, in the sense of the act of knowing, must be a matter of consciousness; and, therefore, it is said, cannot be innate. The new-born child has no conscious conviction of the existence of God. But the word knowledge is sometimes used in a passive sense. A man knows what lies dormant in his mind. Most of our knowledge is in that state. All the facts of history stored in the memory, are out of the domain of consciousness, until the mind is turned to them. It is not inconceivable, therefore, that the soul as it comes into the world may be stored with these primary truths which lie dormant in the mind, until roused by the due occasion. This, however, is not what is meant by innate knowledge. The word innate simply indicates the source of the knowledge. That source is our nature; that which is born with us. Nor does the doctrine of innate knowledge imply that the mind is born with ideas, in the sense of "patterns, phantasms, or notions," as Locke calls them; nor that it is furnished by nature with a set of abstract principles, or general truths. All that is meant is, that the mind is so constituted that it perceives certain things to be true without proof and without instruction.

These intuitive truths belong to the several departments of the senses, the understanding, and our moral nature. In the first place, all our sense perceptions are intuitions. We apprehend their objects immediately, and have an irresistible conviction of their reality and truth. We may draw erroneous conclusions from our sensations; but our sensations, as far as they go, tell us the truth. When a man feels pain, he may refer it to the wrong place, or to a wrong cause; but he knows that it is pain. If he sees an object, he may be mistaken as to its nature; but he knows that he sees, and that what he sees is the cause of the sensation which he experiences. These are intuitions, because they are immediate perceptions of what is true. The conviction which attends our sensations is due not to instruction but to the constitution of our nature.

In the second place, there are intuitions of the intellect. That is, there are certain truths which the mind perceives to be true immediately, without proof or testimony. Such are the axioms of geometry. No man needs to have it proved to him that the part of a thing is less than the whole; or that a straight line is the shortest distance between two given points. It is an intuitive truth that "nothing" cannot be a cause; that every effect must have a cause; this conviction is not founded on experience. Because experience is of necessity limited. And the conviction is not merely that every effect which we or other men have observed has had a cause; but that in the nature of things there can be no effect without an adequate cause. This conviction is said to be an innate truth, not because the child is born with it so that it is included in its infant consciousness, nor because the abstract principle is laid up in the mind, but simply because such is the nature of the mind, that it cannot but see these things to be true. As we are born with the sense of touch and sight, and take cognizance of their appropriate objects as soon as they are presented; so we are born with the intellectual faculty of perceiving these primary truths as soon as they are presented.

In the third place, there are moral truths which the mind intuitively recognizes as true. The essential distinction between right and wrong; the obligation of virtue; responsibility for character and conduct; that sin deserves punishment; are examples of this class of truths. No man needs to be taught them. No one seeks for further evidence of their being truths than that which is found in their nature.

There is another remark to be made in reference to the intuitions of the mind. The power of intuitional perception is capable of being increased. It is in fact greater in one man than in other men. The senses of some persons are far more acute than those of others. The senses of hearing and touch are greatly exalted in the case of the blind. It is the same with the intellect. What is self-evident to one man, has to be proved to another. It is said that all the propositions of the First Book of Euclid were as plain at first sight to Newton as the axioms. The same is true in our moral and religious nature. The more that nature is purified and exalted, the clearer is its vision, and the wider the scope of its intuitions. It is not easy to see, therefore, why Sir William Hamilton should make simplicity a characteristic of intuitive truths. If a proposition be capable of resolution into simpler factors, it may still to a powerful intellect be seen as self-evidently true. What is seen immediately, without the intervention of proof, to be true, is, according to the common mode of expression, said to be seen intuitively.

It is, however, only of the lower exercises of this power that we can avail ourselves in our arguments with our fellow men. Because a truth may be self-evident to one mind, it does not follow that it must be so to all other minds. But there is a class of truths so plain that they never fail to reveal themselves to the human mind, and to which the mind cannot refuse its assent. Hence the criteria of those truths which are accepted as axioms, and which are assumed in all reasoning, and the denial of which renders all faith and all knowledge impossible, are universality and necessity. What all believe, and what all men must believe, is to be assumed as undeniably true. These criteria indeed include each other. If a truth be universally admitted, it must be because no man can rationally call it to question. And if it be a matter of necessary belief, it must be accepted by all who possess the nature out of the constitution of which the necessity arises.

B. Proof that the Knowledge of God is Innate.

The question now is, Whether the existence of God is an intuitive truth? Is it given in the very constitution of our nature? Is it one of those truths which reveal themselves to every human mind, and to which the mind is forced to assent? In other words, has it the characteristics of universality and necessity? It should be remarked that when universality is made a criterion of intuitive truths, it is intended to apply to those truths only which have their foundation or evidence in the constitution of our nature. As to the external world, if ignorance be universal, error may be universal. All men, for example, for ages believed that the sun moves round the earth; but the universality of that belief was no evidence of its truth.

When it is asked, Whether the existence of God is an intuitive truth, the question is equivalent to asking, Whether the belief in his existence is universal and necessary? If it be true that all men do believe there is a God, and that no man can possibly disbelieve his existence, then his existence is an intuitive truth. It is one of those given in the constitution of our nature; or which, our nature being what it is, no man can fail to know and to acknowledge.

Such has been the common opinion in all ages. Cicero¹ says: "Esse Deos, quoniam insitas eorum, vel potius innatas cognitiones habemus." Tertullian² says of the heathen of his day, that the common people had a more correct idea of God than the philosophers. Calvin³ says: "Hoc quidem recte judicantibus semper constabit, insculptum mentibus humanis esse divinitatis sensum, qui deleri nunquam potest." The whole tendency in our day is to make the existence of God so purely a matter of intuition as to lead to the disparagement of all argument in proof of it. This extreme, however, does not justify the denial of a truth so important as that God has not left any human being without a knowledge of his existence and authority.

The word God, however, is used in a very wide sense. In the Christian sense of the word, "God is a spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." This sublime idea of God no human mind ever attained either intuitively or discursively, except under the light of a supernatural revelation. On the other hand, some philosophers dignify motion, force, or the vague idea of the infinite, with the name of God. In neither of these senses of the word is the knowledge of God said to be innate, or a matter of intuition. It is in the general sense of a Being on whom we are dependent, and to whom we are responsible, that the idea is asserted to exist universally, and of necessity, in every human mind. It is true that if this idea is analyzed, it will be found to embrace the conviction that God is a person, and that He possesses moral attributes, and acts as a moral governor. Nothing is asserted as to how far this analysis is made by uneducated and uncivilized men. All that is maintained is that this sense of dependence and accountability to a being higher than themselves exists in the minds of all men.

¹ De Natura Deorum, i. 17.

² Testimonium Animæ.

³ Institutio, i. iii. 3.

The Knowledge of God is Universal.

In proof of this doctrine, reference may be made —

1. To the testimony of Scripture. The Bible asserts that the knowledge of God is thus universal. This it does both directly and by necessary implication. The Apostle directly asserts in regard to the heathen as such without limitation, that they have the knowledge of God, and such knowledge as to render their impiety and immorality inexcusable. "Because that when they knew God," he says, "they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful." (Rom. i. 19-21.) He says of the most depraved of men, that they know the righteous judgment of God, that those who commit sin are worthy of death. (Rom. i. 32.) The Scripture everywhere addresses men as sinners; it calls upon them to repent; it threatens them with punishment in case of disobedience; or promises pardon to those who turn from their sins. All this is done without any preliminary demonstration of the being of God. It assumes that men know that there is a God, and that they are subject to his moral government. It is true that the Bible at times speaks of the heathen as not knowing God, and says that they are without God. But this, as explained by the context in which such declarations appear, and by the general teaching of the Scriptures, only means that the heathen are without correct, or saving knowledge of God; that they are without his favour, do not belong to the number of his people, and of course are not partakers of the blessedness of those whose God is the Lord. In teaching the universal sinfulness and condemnation of men; their inexcusableness for their idolatry and immorality; and in ascertaining that even the most degraded are conscious of guilt and just exposure to the divine judgment, the Bible takes for granted that the knowledge of God is universal, that it is written on the heart of every man.

This is still more apparent from what the Bible teaches of the law as written on the heart. The Apostle tells us that those who have a written revelation, shall be judged by that revelation; that those who have no externally revealed law, shall be judged by the law written on the heart. That the heathen have such a law, he proves first, from the fact that "they do by nature the things contained in the law," i. e., they do under the control of their nature the things which the law prescribes; and secondly, from the operations of conscience. When it condemns, it pronounces something done, to be contrary to the moral law; and when it approves, it pronounces something to be conformed to that law. (Rom. ii. 12-16.) The recognition of God, therefore, that is, of a being to whom we are responsible, is involved in the very idea of accountability. Hence every man carries in the very constitution of his being as a moral agent, the evidence of the existence of God. And as this sense of sin and responsibility is absolutely universal, so must also, according to the Bible, be the knowledge of God.

2. The second argument in favor of the universality of this knowledge, is the historical one. History shows that the religious element of our nature is just as universal as the rational or social one. Wherever men exist, in all ages and in all parts of the world, they have some form of religion. The idea of God is impressed on every human language. And as language is the product and revelation of human consciousness, if all languages have some name for God, it proves that the idea of God, in some form, belongs to every human being.

Objections to the Assumption that the Knowledge of God is Universal.

There are two objections often urged against the doctrine that the knowledge of God results from the very constitution of our nature, and is therefore universal. The one is, that travellers and missionaries report the existence of some tribes so degraded that they could discover in them no traces of this knowledge. Even if the fact be admitted that such tribes have no idea of God, it would not be conclusive. Should a tribe of idiots be discovered, it would not prove that reason is not an attribute of our nature. If any community should come to light in which infanticide was universal, it would not prove that parental love was not one of the instincts of humanity. But the probability is that the fact is not as reported. It is very difficult for foreigners to get acquainted with the interior life of those who differ from themselves so much in their intellectual and moral condition. And besides, Christians attach such an exalted meaning to the word God, that when they see no evidence of the presence of that exalted conception in the minds of the heathen, they are apt to conclude that all knowledge of God is wanting. Unless such people show that they have no sense of right and wrong, no consciousness of responsibility for character and conduct, there is no evidence that they have no knowledge of such a being as God.

The other objection is drawn from the case of the deaf and dumb, who sometimes say that previous to instruction, the idea of God never entered their minds. To this the same answer may be given. The knowledge obtained by Christian instruction so much surpasses that given by intuition, that the latter seems as nothing. It is hardly conceivable that a human soul should exist in any state of development, without a sense of responsibility, and this involves the idea of God. For the responsibility is felt to be not to self, nor to men, but to an invisible Being, higher than self, and higher than man.

The Belief in God Necessary.

But if it be admitted that the knowledge of God is universal among men, is it also a necessary belief? Is it impossible for the mind to dispossess itself of the conviction that there is a God? Necessity, as remarked above, may be considered as involved in universality, at least in such a case as this. There is no satisfactory way of accounting for the universal belief in the existence of God, except that such belief is founded on the very constitution of our nature. Nevertheless, these two criteria of intuitive truths are generally distinguished, and are in some aspects distinct.

The question then is, Is it possible for a sane man to disbelieve in the existence of God? This question is commonly answered in the negative. It is objected, however, that facts prove the contrary. No man has ever been found, who denies that two and two make four, whereas atheists abound in every age and in every part of the world.

There, are, however, different kinds of necessary truths.

1. Those the opposite of which is absolutely unthinkable. That every effect must have a cause, that a part of a given thing is less than the whole, are propositions the opposites of which cannot have any meaning. When a man says that something is nothing, he expresses no thought. He denies what he affirms, and therefore says nothing.

2. There are truths concerning external or material things, which have a power to constrain belief different from that power which pertains to truths concerning the mind. A man cannot deny that he has a body; and he cannot rationally deny that he has a will. The impossibility in both cases may be equal, but they are of different kinds, and affect the mind differently.

3. Again, there are truths which cannot be denied without doing violence to the laws of our nature. In such cases the denial is forced, and can only be temporary. The laws of our nature are sure sooner or later to assert themselves, and constrain an opposite belief. A pendulum when at rest hangs perpendicularly to the horizon. It may by extraneous force be made to hang at any degree of inclination. But as soon as such force is removed, it is sure to swing back to its normal position. Under the control of a metaphysical theory, a man may deny the existence of the external world, or the obligation of the moral law; and his disbelief may be sincere, and for a time persistent; but the moment the speculative reasons for his disbelief are absent from his mind, it of necessity reverts to its original and natural convictions. It is also possible that a man's hand may be so hardened or cauterized as to lose the sense of touch. But that would not prove that the hand in man is not normally the great organ of touch. So it is possible that the moral nature of a man may be so disorganized by vice or by a false philosophy as to have its testimony for the existence of God effectually silenced. This, however, would prove nothing as to what that testimony really is. Besides this, insensibility and the consequent unbelief cannot last. Whatever rouses the moral nature, whether it be danger, or suffering, or the approach of death, banishes unbelief in a moment. Men pass from skepticism to faith, in many cases, instantaneously; not of course by a process of argument, but by the existence of a state of consciousness with which skepticism is irreconcilable, and in the presence of which it cannot exist. This fact is illustrated continually, not only in the case of the uneducated and superstitious, but even in the case of men of the highest culture. The simple fact of Scripture and experience is, that the moral law as written upon the heart is indelible; and the moral law in its nature implies a lawgiver, one from whom that law emanates, and by whom it will be enforced. And, therefore, so long as men are moral creatures, they will and must believe in the existence of a Being on whom they are dependent, and to whom they are responsible for their character and their conduct. To this extent, and in this sense, therefore, it is to be admitted that the knowledge of God is innate and intuitive ; that men no more need to be taught that there is a God, than they need to be taught there is such a thing as sin. But as men are ignorant of the nature and extent of sin, while aware of its existence, until instructed by the Word of God, and enlightened by his Spirit ; so they greatly need the same sources of instruction to give them any adequate knowledge of the nature of God, and of their relations to Him.

§ 2. The Knowledge of God is not due to a Process of Reasoning.

Those who are unwilling to admit that the idea of God is innate as given in the very constitution of man, generally hold that it is a necessary, or, at least, a natural deduction of reason. Sometimes it is represented as the last and highest generalization of science. As the law of gravitation is assumed to account for a large class of the phenomena of the universe, and as it not only does account for them, but must be assumed in order to understand them ; so the existence of an intelligent first cause is assumed to account for the existence of the universe itself, and for all its phenomena. But as such generalizations are possible only for cultivated minds, this theory of the origin of the idea of God, cannot account for belief in his existence in the minds of all men, even the least educated.

Others, therefore, while regarding this knowledge to be the result of a course of reasoning, make the process far more simple. There are many things which children and illiterate persons learn, and can hardly avoid learning, which need not be referred to the constitution of their nature. Thus the existence of God, is so obviously manifested, by everything within and around us, the belief in that existence is so natural, so suited to what we see and what we need, that it comes to be generally adopted. We are surrounded by facts which indicate design ; by effects which demand a cause. We have a sense of the infinite which is vague and void, until filled with God. We have a knowledge of ourselves as spiritual beings, which suggests the idea of God, who is a spirit. We have the consciousness of moral qualities, of the distinction between good and evil, and this makes us think of God as a being of moral perfections. All this may be very true, but it is not an adequate account of the facts of the case. It does not give a satisfactory reason for the universality and strength of the conviction of the existence of God. Our own consciousness teaches us that this is not the ground of our own faith. We do not thus reason ourselves into the belief that there is a God; and it is very obvious that it is not by such a process of ratiocination, simple as it is, that the mass of the people are brought to this conclusion.

Moreover, the process above described does not account for the origin of our belief in God, but only gives the method by which that belief is confirmed and developed. Very little is given by intuition in any case, at least to ordinary minds. What is thus discovered needs to be expanded, and its real contents unfolded. If this be true with the intuitions of sense and of the understanding, why should it not be so of our religious nature.

The truth is, that all the faculties and feelings of our minds and bodies have their appropriate objects; and the possession of the faculties supposes the existence of those objects. The senses suppose the existence and reality of the objects of sense. The eye, in its very structure, supposes that there is such an element as light; the sense of hearing would be unaccountable and inconceivable without sound; and the sense of touch would be inconceivable were there no tangible objects. The same is true of our social affections; they necessitate the assumption that there are relations suited to their exercises. Our moral nature supposes that the distinction between right and wrong is not chimerical or imaginary. In like manner, our religious feelings, our sense of dependence, our consciousness of responsibility, our aspirations after fellowship with some Being higher than ourselves, and higher than anything which the world or nature contains, necessitates the belief in the existence of God. It is indeed said that if this belief is intuitive and necessary, there is no virtue in it. This objection overlooks the fact that the moral character of our feelings depends on their nature and not on their origin. They may spring from the constitution of our nature, and yet be good or evil as the case may be. A mother's love for her child is instinctive; the absence of the maternal affection in a mother is something unnatural and monstrous, the object of universal condemnation. The sense of pity, of justice, the feelings of benevolence, are instinctive, but none the less virtuous. The same is true of our religious feelings, and of the belief which they involve. We cannot help feeling that we are responsible, and it is right that we should feel so. The man who has brought himself to a state of insensibility to all moral obligation, is what the Scriptures call a "reprobate." Adam believed in God the moment he was created, for the same reason that he believed in the external world. His religious nature, unclouded and unde-filed, apprehended the one with the same confidence that his senses apprehended the other. It is of great importance that men should know and feel that they are by their very nature bound to believe in God; that they cannot emancipate themselves from that belief, without derationalizing and demoralizing their whole being.

§ 3. Knowledge of God not due exclusively to Tradition.

There are some theologians who are unable to believe that the knowledge of God can be referred either to the constitution of our nature, or to any process of reasoning. Not only the exalted view of the Divine Being presented in the Bible, but the simple and perverted apprehensions of his nature prevailing among the heathen, they say must be referred to an original supernatural revelation. Such a revelation was made to our first parents, and from them passed over to their descendants. When the knowledge thus communicated began to die out among men, God again revealed himself to Abraham, and made him and his posterity the depositaries of the truth. Either, therefore, from the remains of the primitive revelation, or by radiation from the chosen people, all the knowledge of God existing in the world has been derived. The attempt is made to show that the more remote any people were from the Jews, the less did they know of God; and the more any nation enjoyed of intercourse with the people to whom God had committed his oracles, the more correct and extended was their knowledge.

This view, although arising from reverence for the Word of God, is evidently extreme. It is true that the further we go back in the history of the world, the nearer we approach the primal revelation, the purer is the knowledge concerning Him. It may also be true, as a general rule, that the more any people were brought under the influence of the truth as held by the chosen people of God, the more enlightened they became. It may further be conceded that those who with the Bible in their hands reject its teachings, and give themselves up to their own speculations, turn, as the Apostle expresses it, "the truth of God into a lie," losing all knowledge of the living and true God. All this, however, does not prove that the knowledge of God is not written on the heart. Our intuitive perceptions need to be cherished, developed, and interpreted. We know from Scripture that the law is written in characters which cannot be obliterated, upon the souls of all men, and yet it has been perverted, misinterpreted, or disregarded by men in every age and in every part of the world.

§ 4. Can the Existence of God be proved?

A large class of theologians and philosophers deny that the existence of God is susceptible of proof. This is done on different grounds.

First. It is said that the knowledge of God being intuitive, it is not a proper subject of proof. This is the position taken by that class of theologians who resolve all religion into feeling, and by the modern school of speculative philosophers, who make such a wide distinction between the reason and the understanding; the former being the intuitional, and the latter the discursive faculty. Eternal and necessary truths belong to the province of the reason; subordinate truths to the sphere of the understanding. It is the understanding that argues and concludes. The reason apprehends by immediate vision. What relates to God, as the eternal, infinite, necessary Being, belongs to the province of reason, and not to that of the understanding. Even such theistic writers as Twisten¹ say that the good need no proof that God is, and that the wicked are not susceptible of conviction. You cannot prove that a thing is beautiful, or that it is good. So neither can you prove that there is a God. The fallacy of this statement is obvious. Beauty and goodness are qualities which must be discerned by the mind, just as the objects of sight are discerned by the eye. As it is true that you cannot prove to a blind man that an object is red, so you cannot prove to a peasant that the "Paradise Lost" is sublime. But the existence of God is an objective fact. It may be shown that it is a fact which cannot be rationally denied. Although all men have feelings and convictions which necessitate the assumption that there is a God; it is, nevertheless, perfectly legitimate to show that there are other facts which necessarily lead to the same conclusion.

Besides, it is to be remembered that theistical arguments are designed to prove not only that there is a necessity for the assumption of an extra-mundane and eternal Being, but mainly, to show what that Being is; that He is a personal Being, self-conscious, intelligent, moral. All this may lie inclosed in the primary intuition, but it needs to be brought out and established.

Secondly. Another class of objections against all theistical arguments, relates to the arguments themselves. They are pronounced fallacious, as involving a petitio principii; or declared to be invalid as derived from false premises; or leading to conclusions other than that intended to be established. Of this every man must judge for himself. They have been regarded as sound and conclusive by the wisest men, from Socrates to the present day. Of course the argument on the principle of causation must be invalid to those who deny that there is any such thing as an efficient cause; and the argument from design can have no force for those who deny the possibility of final causes.

¹ Vorlesungen.

Most of the objections to the conclusiveness of the arguments in question arises from a misapprehension of what they are intended to prove. It is often assumed that each argument must prove the whole doctrine of Theism; whereas one argument may prove one element of that doctrine; and other arguments different elements. The cosmological argument may prove the existence of a necessary and eternal Being; the telcological argument, that that Being is intelligent; the moral argument that He is a person possessing moral attributes. The arguments are not designed so much to prove the existence of an unknown being, as to demonstrate that the Being who reveals himself to man in the very constitution of his nature must be all that Theism declares him to be. Such writers as Hume, Kant, Coleridge, and the whole school of transcendental philosophers, have more or less expressly denied the validity of the ordinary arguments for the existence of a personal God.

CHAPTER II.

THEISM.

THEISM is the doctrine of an extra-mundane, personal God, the creator, preserver, and governor of the world. The design of all arguments on this subject is to show that the facts around us, and the facts of consciousness, necessitate the assumption of the existence of such a Being. The arguments usually urged on this subject are the Ontological, the Cosmological, the Teleological, and the Moral.

§ 1. The Ontological Argument.

This is a metaphysical à priori argument. It is designed to show that the real objective existence of God is involved in the very idea of such a Being. It is commonly made to include all arguments which are not à posteriori; that is, which do not proceed from effect to cause. It has, therefore, been presented in different forms. The principal of which are the following:—

1. That in which it is presented by Anselm in his “Monologium,” and more fully and definitely in his “Proslogium.” The argument is substantially this. That which exists in re is greater than that which exists only in the mind. We have an idea of an infinitely perfect Being; but actual existence is included in infinite perfection. Because, if actual existence be a perfection, and if God is not actually existent, then we can conceive of a Being greater than God. His words¹ are, “Et certe id, quo majus cogitari nequit, non potest esse in intellectu solo. Si enim vel in solo intellectu est, potest cogitari esse et in re, quod majus est. . . . Existit ergo procul dubio aliquid, quo majus cogitari non valet, et in intellectu et in re.”² This argument assumes that existence is of the nature of a perfection. It adds, however, nothing to the idea. The idea in itself may be complete, although there be no objective existence to answer to it. Anselm regarded the negation of the existence of God as impossible; for God is the highest truth, the highest being, the highest good, of whom all other truth and good are the manifestations. Necessity of existence is included, according to this doctrine, in the idea of absolute perfection. In other words, it is included in the idea of God. And as every man has the idea of God, he must admit his actual existence; for what is necessary is of course actual. It does not follow from our idea of a man, that he actually exists, because man is not necessarily existent. But it is absurd to say that a necessarily existing Being, does not exist. If this argument has any validity, it is unimportant. It is only saying that what must be actually is. If the idea of God as it exists in every man's mind includes that of actual existence, then so far as the idea goes, he who has the one has the other. But the argument does not show how the ideal implies the real.¹

¹ Proslogium ii.

² See Baur, Dreieinigkeitslehre.

Des Cartes' Argument.

2. Des Cartes' argument was in this form. We have the idea of an infinitely perfect Being. As we are finite, that idea could not have originated with us. As we are conversant only with the finite, it could not have originated from anything around us. It must, therefore, have come from God, whose existence is thus a necessary assumption. "Habemus ideam Dei, hujusque ideæ realitas objectiva nec formaliter nec eminenter in nobis continetur, nec in ullo alio præterquam in ipso Deo potest contineri; ergo hæc idea Dei, quæ in nobis est, requirit Deum pro causa; Deusque proinde existit."² It is true we have many ideas or conceptions to which there is no answering existence. But in such cases the ideas are arbitrary, or voluntary creations of our own minds. But the idea of God is necessary; we cannot help having it. And having it, there must be a Being who answers to it. Des Cartes illustrates his argument by saying, that as it is included in our idea of a triangle, that its angles are equal to two right angles, it is so in fact. The cases, however, are not parallel. It is only saying that a triangle is what it is, namely, a three-sided figure, whose angles are equal to two right angles. But the existence of God as a fact is not included in the definition of Him. Kant expresses this in philosophical language, saying that if the predicate be removed, the subject is removed. Because an analytic judgment is a mere analysis, or full statement of what is in the subject. The judgment that the angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles, is only an analysis of the subject. It is a simple statement of what a triangle is; and therefore, if you take away the equality of the angles, you take away the triangle. But in a synthetic judgment, there is a synthesis, a putting together. Something is added in the judgment which is not in the subject. In this case that something is actual existence. We may infer from the idea of a perfect being, that he is wise and good; but not that he actually is; because reality is something added to the mere idea.

¹ On this argument see Ritter's Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie, vol. iii. pp. 334-340. Shedd's History of Doctrine, i. pp. 229-237. Baur's Dreieinigkeitslehre, ii. 374.

² Meditationes de Prima Philosophia, prop. ii. p. 89, edit. Amsterdam, 1685.

The only difference between the argument of Des Cartes and that of Anselm, appears to be merely formal. The one infers the existence of God, in order to account for the idea; the other argues that actual existence is included in the idea. The same illustration, therefore, is employed by the advocates of both. The argument of Anselm is the same as that derived from the definition of a triangle. You cannot think of a triangle without thinking of it as having three angles; so you cannot think of God without thinking of Him as actually existent; because actual existence enters as essentially into the idea of God, as "triangularity" enters into that of a triangle. There are, doubtless, minds which are affected by this kind of reasoning; but it has no power over the generality of men.

Dr. Samuel Clarke's Argument.

3. Dr. Samuel Clarke, equally distinguished as a mathematician, as a linguist, and as a metaphysician, published in 1705, his celebrated "Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God." So far as the Being of God is concerned his argument is à priori. Nothing, he says, is necessarily existent, the non-existence of which is conceivable. We can conceive of the non-existence of the world; therefore the world is not necessarily existing and eternal. We cannot, however, conceive of the non-existence of space and duration; therefore space and duration are necessary and infinite. Space and duration, however, are not substances; therefore, there must be an eternal and necessary substance (i. e., God), of which they are the accidents. This argument at best gives us only the idea of a necessary and infinite something; which no class of anti-theists are disposed to deny. To determine what this eternal substance is, what attributes belong to it, reference must be made to the phenomenal world, and the argument becomes à posteriori. It has been objected to Dr. Clarke's argument that it is not properly à priori. It infers from the existence of time and space the existence of a substantial Being.

Cousin's Argument.

4. Cousin, in his "Elements of Psychology," repeats continually the same argument in a somewhat different form. The idea of the infinite, he says, is given in that of the finite. We cannot have the one without having the other. "These two ideas are logical correlatives; and in the order of their acquisition, that of the finite and imperfect precedes the other; but it scarcely precedes it. It is not possible for the reason, as soon as consciousness furnishes the mind with the idea of the finite and imperfect, not to conceive the idea of the infinite and perfect. Now, the infinite and perfect is God."¹ Here again the argument is, that that is real of which we have an idea. This is not indeed assumed as a general proposition. We can imagine, says Cousin, a gorgon, or centaur, and we can imagine them not to exist; but it is not in our power, when the finite and imperfect are given, not to conceive of the infinite and perfect. This is not a chimera, he says, it is the necessary product of reason; and, therefore, it is a legitimate product. The idea of the finite and imperfect is a primitive idea, given in the consciousness; and therefore, the correlative idea of the infinite and perfect given by necessity and by the reason, must also be primitive.² At other times he presents this subject in a different light. He teaches that, as the mind in perception takes cognizance of the object as a real existence, distinct from itself, so the reason has an apprehension, or immediate cognition of the Infinite, with a necessary conviction of its reality as distinguished (in one sense) from itself. Self, nature, and God are alike and equally involved in the intuitive apprehension of the mind; and they are inseparable. This is very different from the common doctrine of the knowledge of God as innate, or intuitive. The latter doctrine only assumes that such is the nature of the human soul that it is intuitively convinced of its dependence on, and responsibility to a Being other than, and higher than itself. The former assumes, with the German philosophers, especially Schelling, the immediate cognition of the Infinite by the reason.

Admitting with Cousin that the ideas of the finite and infinite are correlative; that we cannot have the one without having the other; and that the mind by a rational necessity is convinced that if there be a finite, there must be an infinite; it remains to be asked, What that Infinite is? With Cousin, the Infinite is the All. Theism therefore gains nothing from these metaphysical arguments.

¹ Elements of Psychology, p. 375. Translated by Prof. Henry, New York, 1856.

² Page 376.

§ 2. The Cosmological Argument.

This is founded on the principle of a sufficient cause. Syllogistically stated, the argument stands thus: Every effect must have an adequate cause. The world is an effect. Therefore the world must have had a cause outside of itself and adequate to account for its existence.

A. Causation.

The validity and the meaning of this argument, depend on the sense given to the words effect and cause. If an effect be correctly defined to be an event, or product, not due to anything in itself, but produced by something out of itself; and if by cause be understood, an antecedent to whose efficiency the effect is due; then the conclusion is inevitable, that the existence of the world supposes the existence of a cause adequate to its production, provided it can be proved that the world is an effect, i. e., that it is not self-caused or eternal.

It is well known, however, that since Hume propounded his theory, all efficient causes have been discarded by a large class of philosophers. The senses take cognizance of nothing but the sequence of events. One follows another. That which uniformly precedes, we call cause; that which uniformly follows, we call the effect. As sequence is all the senses detect, that is all we have any right to assume. The idea that there is anything in the antecedent which determines the effect to be as it is and no otherwise, is altogether arbitrary. A cause, therefore, is nothing but an invariable antecedent, and an effect an invariable consequent.

Mr. Stuart Mill¹ modified Hume's definition of cause as Dr. Brown of Edinburgh had done before him. The former says, "It is necessary to our using the word cause, that we should believe not only that the antecedent always has been followed by the consequent, but that, as long as the present constitution of things endures, it always will be so." So Dr. Brown² says, "A cause in the fullest definition which it philosophically admits of, may be said to be that which immediately precedes any change, and which, existing at any time in similar circumstances, has been always, and will be always immediately followed by a similar change." It is obvious that this definition is not only arbitrary, but that it is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of Hume's philosophy, and that of his followers, namely, that all our knowledge is founded on experience. Experience relates to the past. It cannot guarantee the future. If we believe that a given consequent always will follow a given antecedent, there must be some other ground for that conviction than that it always has done so. Unless there be something in the nature of the antecedent to secure the sequence of the effect, there is no rational ground for the belief that the future must be like the past.

¹ Logic, p. 203. New York, 1855.² Inquiry, p. 17. Edinburgh, 1813.

The Common Doctrine on the Subject.

The common doctrine on this subject includes the following points. (1.) A cause is something. It has a real existence. It is not merely a name for a certain relation. It is a real entity, a substance. This is plain because a nonentity cannot act. If that which does not exist can be a cause, then nothing can produce something, which is a contradiction. (2.) A cause must not only be something real, but it must have power or efficiency. There must be something in its nature to account for the effects which it produces. (3.) This efficiency must be adequate; that is, sufficient and appropriate to the effect. That this is a true view of the nature of a cause is plain. (1.) From our own consciousness. We are causes. We can produce effects. And all three of the particulars above mentioned are included in our consciousness of ourselves as cause. We are real existences; we have power; we have power adequate to the effects which we produce. (2.) We can appeal to the universal consciousness of men. All men attach this meaning to the word cause in their ordinary language. All men assume that every effect has an antecedent to whose efficiency it is due. They never regard mere antecedence, however uniform in the past, or however certain in the future, as constituting a causal relation. The succession of the seasons has been uniform in the past, and we are confident that it will continue uniform in the future; yet no man says that winter is the cause of summer. Every one is conscious that cause expresses an entirely different relation from that of mere antecedence. (3.) This view of the nature of causation is included in the universal and necessary belief, that every effect must have a cause. That belief is not that one thing must always go before another thing; but that nothing can occur, that no change can be produced, without the exercise of power or efficiency somewhere; otherwise something could come out of nothing.

This subject is discussed by all the metaphysicians from Aristotle downwards, and especially since the promulgation of the new doctrine adopted by Hume.¹ It is one of the great services rendered by Dr. McCosh to the cause of truth, that he has defended the authority of those primary beliefs which lie at the foundation of all knowledge.

¹ See Reid's Intellectual Powers; Stewart's Philosophical Essays; Brown's Inquiry, and
VOL. I. 14

Intuitive Conviction of the Necessity of a Cause.

But admitting a cause to be not merely an invariable antecedent, but that to whose power the effect is due, "Ens quod in se continet rationem, cur aliud existat,"¹ as it is defined by Wolf, it remains to be asked, What is the foundation of the universal belief that every effect must have a cause? Hume says it is founded on experience, and therefore is limited by it. We see that every effect within the sphere of our observation is preceded by a cause, and we may reasonably expect that the same is true beyond the sphere of our observation. But of this we know nothing. It would be presumptuous to determine from what takes place on our little globe, what must be the law of the universe. The fact that, as far as we see, every effect has a cause, gives us no right to assume that the universe must have had a cause. Kant says that the law of cause and effect is only in our minds. Men view things in that relation; but they have no assurance that that relation holds in the world outside of themselves.

The common doctrine of the schools is, that it is an intuitive truth, a first, or self-evident principle. That is, that it is something which all men do believe, and which all men must believe. There are no self-evident, intuitive truths, if the fact that they have been denied by one or more speculative philosophers be considered proof that they are not matters of universal and necessary belief. Personal identity, the real existence of the external world, the essential distinction between right and wrong, have all been denied. Nevertheless, all men do, and all men must believe these truths. The denial of them is forced and temporary. Whenever the mind reverts to its normal state, the belief returns. So the principle of causation has been denied; yet every man is forced by the constitution of his nature to admit it, and constantly to act upon it. A man may believe that the universe is eternal; but that it began to be without a cause — that it sprang out of nothing — it is impossible to believe.

We are reduced, therefore, to this alternative. The universe is. It therefore either has been from all eternity, or it owes its existence to a cause out of itself, adequate to account for its being what it is. The theistical argument is, that the world is an effect; that it has not the cause of existence in itself, that it is not eternal, and therefore we are necessitated to assume the existence of a great First Cause to whose efficiency the existence of the universe is to be referred.

Essay on Cause and Effect; Sir William Hamilton's Works; Dr. McCosh's Intuitions of the Mind.

¹ See his Ontologia, II. iii 2, § 881.

B. The World is an Effect.

1. The first argument to prove that the world as a whole is not self-existent and eternal, is, that all its parts, everything that enters into its composition, is dependent and mutable. A whole cannot be essentially different from its constituent parts. An infinite number of effects cannot be self-existent. If a chain of three links cannot support itself, much less can a chain of a million of links. Nothing multiplied by infinity is nothing still. If we do not find the cause of our existence in ourselves, nor our parents in themselves, nor their progenitors in themselves, going back ad infinitum is only adding nothing to nothing. What the mind demands is a sufficient cause, and no approach to it is made by going back indefinitely from one effect to another. We are forced, therefore, by the laws of our rational nature, to assume the existence of a self-existent cause, i. e., a Being endued with power adequate to produce this ever-changing phenomenal world. In all ages thinking men have been forced to this conclusion. Plato and Aristotle argued from the existence of motion, that there must be an αἰὲν κινούμενον ἐαυτὸ κινούμεν, an eternal self-moving power, or primum movens, as it was called by the Schoolmen. The validity of this argument is acknowledged by almost all classes of philosophers, at least so far as to admit that we are forced to assume the existence of an eternal and necessary Being. The theistical argument is, that if everything in the world be contingent, this eternal and necessary Being must be an extramundane First Cause.

Historical Argument.

2. The second argument is the historical one. That is, we have historical evidence that the race of man, for example, has existed only a few thousand years. That mankind has existed from eternity is absolutely incredible. Even if we adopt the development theory, it affords no relief. It only substitutes millions for thousands of years. Both are equally insignificant when compared to eternity. Darwin's germin-cell as necessarily demands a self-existing cause out of itself, as a fully developed man, or the whole race of man, or the universe itself. We are shut up to the conclusion that the universe sprang out of nothing, or that there is a self-existing, eternal, extramundane Being.

Geological Argument.

3. The geological argument is to the same effect. Geologists as a class agree as to the following facts: (1.) That the extant genera of plants and animals inhabiting our earth, began to be within a comparatively short period in the history of our globe. (2.) That neither experience nor science, neither fact nor reason, justify the assumption of spontaneous generation. That is, there is no evidence that any living organism is ever produced by mere physical causes. Every such organism is either immediately created, or is derived from some other organism having life, already existing. (3.) Genera and species are permanent. One never passes into another. A fish never becomes a bird, nor a bird a quadruped. Modern theorists have indeed questioned these facts; but they still are admitted by the great body of scientific men, and the evidence in their favour is overwhelming to the ordinary mind. If these principles be conceded, it follows that all the extant plants and animals on the earth began to be. And if they began to be, they were created, and therefore there must be a Creator. These considerations are merely collateral. The main argument is the one first mentioned, namely, the absolute impossibility of conceiving either of an infinite succession of contingent events, or of the origin of the universe out of nothing.

C. Objections. Hume's Doctrine.

There are only two objections to this cosmological argument which need be noticed. The one is directed to the principle on which it is founded, and the other to the conclusion drawn from it. Hume begins his "Treatise on Human Nature," by laying down the principle that the perceptions of the human mind resolve themselves into impressions and ideas. By impressions he means "all our sensations, passions, and emotions, as they make their first appearance in the soul." By ideas is meant "the faint images of these in thinking and reasoning."¹ There can, therefore, be no idea which is not derived from some previous impression. This is the fundamental principle of his whole system. From this it follows that all our knowledge is founded on experience. We have certain impressions made by external things, and certain passions and emotions; these are the only sources of our ideas, and therefore of our knowledge. When² he comes to apply this principle to the nature and origin of our idea of causation, he says, all we can know on the subject is that one object or event is contiguous and antecedent to another. This is all we perceive ; all of which we can have an "impression." We have no impression of power, efficacy, energy, force, or whatever equivalent term we may choose to use. Therefore, there is no such thing. There is no such thing as efficacy or power either in mind or matter. When we use such words : we have, he says, "really no distinct meaning."¹ When we see events or changes in uniform sequence, we get the habit, or, as he says, "we feel the determination,"² to expect the consequent when we see its accustomed antecedent. Necessity, force, power, efficacy, therefore, are nothing but "a determination to carry our thoughts from one object to another."³ "The necessity of power, which unites causes and effects, lies in the determination of the mind to pass from the one to the other. The efficacy or energy of causes is neither placed in the causes themselves, nor in the Deity, nor in the concurrence of these two principles ; but belongs entirely to the soul, which considers the union of two or more objects in all past instances."⁴ Hume was fully aware of the paradoxical character of his view of causation and of its far-reaching consequences, although he insisted that his argument in its support was unanswerable. In immediate connection with the preceding quotation, he says : "I am sensible, that of all the paradoxes which I have had, or shall hereafter have, occasion to advance in the course of this treatise, the present one is the most violent, and that 'tis merely by dint of solid proof and reasoning I can ever hope it will have admission, and overcome the inveterate prejudices of mankind."⁵ What he calls inveterate prejudices, are really laws of belief which God has impressed on our nature, and which all the sophistry of philosophers can never subvert.

¹ Treatise of Human Nature, Part i. § 1; Works, vol. i. Edinburgh, 1826.

² In Part iii. § 14.

The conclusions which Hume draws from his doctrine show his appreciation of its importance. (1.) It follows, he says, from his principle that there is no difference between causes as efficient, formal, material, exemplary, or final ; nor between cause and occasion. (2.) "That the common distinction betwixt moral and physical necessity is without any foundation in nature." "The distinction which we often make betwixt power and the exercise of it, is equally without foundation." (3.) "That the necessity of a cause to every beginning of existence is not founded on any arguments either demonstrative or intuitive." (4.) "We can never

¹ Treatise of Human Nature, vol. i. p. 216.

⁴ Page 220.

² Page 219.

³ Page 219.

⁵ Page 220.

have reason to believe that any object exists, of which we cannot form an idea.”¹ By this fourth corollary, he has reference to such things as substance, from which we receive no impression, and consequently of which we can have no idea, and therefore cannot rationally believe to exist. The same may be said of God.

In the beginning of the following section,² Hume with a boldness almost unparalleled says: “According to the precedent doctrine, there are no objects which, by the mere survey, without consulting experience, we can determine to be the causes of any other; and no objects which we can certainly determine in the same manner not to be causes. Anything may produce anything. Creation, annihilation, motion, reason, volition, all these may arise from one another, or from any other object we can imagine. Nor will this appear strange if we compare two principles explained above, that the constant conjunction of objects determines their causation; and that, properly speaking, no objects are contrary to each other but existence and non-existence. Where objects are not contrary, nothing hinders them from having that constant conjunction on which the relation of cause and effect totally depends.”

If there be any such argument as the reductio ad absurdum, surely this theory of Hume refutes itself. (1.) He admits the trustworthiness of consciousness so far as “impressions” are concerned; then how can he reject the intuitions of sense, reason, and conscience? (2.) If we have no knowledge which is not derived from impressions, and no right to believe in the existence of anything of which we have not an idea derived from an impression, then we cannot believe in substance, soul, or God. (3.) For the same reason we cannot believe that there is any such thing as power or efficiency, or any difference between efficient and final causes, i. e., between the expansive force of steam and the intention of the mechanist who makes a steam-engine. (4.) In like manner, we must believe that something can come out of nothing, that there is no reason that what begins to be should have a cause, even an antecedent; and, therefore, that “anything can produce anything,” e. g., a human volition, the universe. (5.) He cannot even state his theory without contradicting himself. He speaks of one thing “producing” another. But according to his doctrine there is no such thing as production, because he denies that there is any such thing as power or efficiency.

It is universally admitted that we have no foundation for knowledge or faith, but the veracity of consciousness. This principle must be kept constantly in view, and must be often reiterated. Any doctrine, therefore, which contradicts the facts of consciousness, or the laws of belief which God has impressed on our nature, must be false. If, therefore, it can be shown that there are certain truths which men are constrained by the constitution of their nature to believe, those truths are to be retained in despite of all the arts of sophistry. If, therefore, it be a fact of consciousness that we ourselves are something, an ens, a substance, and that we have power, that we can produce effects, then it is certain that there is such a thing as power, and efficient cause. If, moreover, it be an intuitive and necessary truth that every effect must have a cause, that ex nihilo nihil fit, then it is absolutely certain that if the world began to be, it had an adequate cause of its existence out of itself. And, therefore, if the arguments to prove that the world is not self-existing and eternal be sound, the cosmological argument is valid and conclusive.

¹ Treatise of Human Nature, vol. I. pp. 226-228.

² § 15.

The Second Objection.

The other form of objection is directed not against the premises on which the cosmological argument is founded, but against the conclusion which Theists draw from them. It is admitted that something now exists; that nonentity cannot be the cause of real existence; therefore, something must have existed from eternity. It is also admitted that a regressus ad infinitum, or an eternal series of effects, is impossible. There must, therefore, be an eternal, self-existing Being. This is all the cosmological argument fairly proves. It does not prove that this necessary Being is extramundane, much less that it is a personal God. It may be an eternal substance of which things mutable are the phenomena.¹

The cosmological argument is not intended to prove all that Theists hold to be true concerning God. It is enough that it proves that we must admit the existence of an eternal and necessary Being. Other arguments prove that that Being is self-conscious and intelligent. The argument, moreover, fairly proves that this Being is extramundane; for the principle of causation is that everything contingent must have the cause of its existence out of itself.

§ 3. The Teleological Argument.

A. Its Nature.

This argument also admits of being stated in a syllogistic form. Design supposes a designer. The world everywhere exhibits marks of design. Therefore the world owes its existence to an intelligent author.

¹ See Strauss's Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 382.

By design is intended,—(1.) The selection of an end to be attained. (2.) The choice of suitable means for its attainment. (3.) The actual application of those means for the accomplishment of the proposed end.

Such being the nature of design, it is a self-evident truth, or, even an identical proposition, that design is indicative of intelligence, will, and power. It is simply saying that intelligence in the effect implies intelligence in the cause.

It is moreover true that the intelligence indicated by design is not in the thing designed. It must be in an external agent. The mind indicated in a book is not in the book itself, but in the author and printer. The intelligence revealed by a calculating machine, or any similar work of art, is not in the material employed, but in the inventor and artist. Neither is the mind indicated in the structure of the bodies of plants and animals, in them, but in Him who made them. And in like manner the mind indicated in the world at large must be in an extramundane Being. There is, indeed, this obvious difference between the works of God and the works of man. In every product of human art dead materials are fashioned and united to accomplish a given end; but the organized works of nature are animated by a living principle. They are fashioned as it were from within outward. In other words, they grow; they are not constructed. In this respect there is a great difference between a house and a tree or the human body. But, nevertheless, in both cases, the mind is external to the thing produced; because the end, the thought, is prior to the product. As the thought or idea of a machine must be in the mind of the mechanist, before the machine is made; so the idea or thought of the eye must be anterior to its formation. "It is a simple and pregnant conclusion," says Trendelenburg,¹ "that so far as design is realized in the world, thought as its ground has preceded it." And this thought, he goes on to say, is not dead, as a figure or model, it is connected with will and power. It is, therefore, in the mind of a person who has the ability and purpose to carry it out. He further says, "tiefsinnige Zweckmässigkeit bewusstlos und blind," cannot be imagined, i. e., a blind and unconscious adaptation of means to an end is inconceivable.

As the conviction that design implies an intelligent agent is intuitive and necessary, it is not limited to the narrow sphere of our experience. The argument is not, Every house, ship, telescope, or other instrument or machine, we ever saw had an intelligent maker, therefore we may take it for granted that any similar work of art was not formed by chance or by the operation of blind, unconscious forces. The argument rather is, Such is the nature of design, that it of necessity implies an intelligent agent; and, therefore, wherever, or whenever we see evidence of design we are convinced that it is to be referred to the operation of mind. On this ground we are not only authorized, but compelled to apply the argument from design far beyond the limits of experience, and to say: It is just as evident that the world had an intelligent creator, as that a book had an author. If a man can believe that a book was written by chance, or by blind, unconscious force, then, and not otherwise, can he rationally deny the validity of the argument from design in proof of the existence of a personal God.

¹ Log. Untersuchungen, 2d edit. Leipzig, 1862, vol. ii. p. 28.

B. Evidences of Design in the World.

This is a boundless subject. One of the most important and valuable of the "Bridgewater Treatises," the volume by Dr. Charles Bell, is devoted to "The Hand, its mechanism and vital endowments as evincing design." Hundreds of volumes would not be sufficient to exhibit the evidence of the intelligent adaptation of means to an end, which the world everywhere affords. In the few pages now at command all that can be attempted, is an indication of the nature of this evidence.¹

Design in Single Organs.

1. No work of human art can compare with the nicety and completeness of the separate organs of organized bodies for the purpose for which they are designed. In the eye, for example, there is the most perfect optical instrument constructed in accordance with the hidden laws of light. We find there the only nerve in the body susceptible of the impressions of light and color. That nerve is spread out on the retina. The light is admitted through an orifice in the ball, which opening by the most delicate arrangement of muscles is enlarged or contracted, according to the degree of light which falls on the retina, which enlargement or contraction is not dependent on the will, but on the stimulus of the light itself. Light, however, merely passing through an orifice would make no image of the object from which it was reflected. It is, therefore, made to pass through lenses perfect in form so to refract the rays as to bring them to a proper focus on the retina. If the inner chamber of the eye were white, it would so reflect the rays entering the pupil at every angle as to render vision impossible. That chamber, and that alone, is lined with a black pigment. By a delicate muscular arrangement the eye is enabled to adapt itself to the distance of external objects so that the proper focus may be preserved. These are a small part of the wonders exhibited by this single organ of the body. This organ was fashioned in the darkness of the womb, with a self-evident reference to the nature and properties of light, of which the creature for whose use it was fashioned had neither knowledge or experience. If the eye, therefore, does not indicate the intelligent adaptation of means to an end, no such adaptation can be found in any work of human ingenuity.

¹ It may be well to give the titles of the valuable series of the Bridgewater Treatises devoted to this subject, besides the work of Dr. Bell mentioned in the text. The volumes are, The Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man, by Dr. Thomas Chalmers; On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Constitution of Man, by John Kidd; Astronomy and General Physics treated in Reference to Natural Theology, by William Whewell; Animal and Vegetable Physiology considered in Reference to Natural Theology, by Peter Mark Roget; Geology and Mineralogy considered in Reference to Natural Theology, by William Buckland; The Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as manifested in the Creation of Animals, by William Kirby; Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion considered in Reference to Natural Theology, by William Prout; The Ninth Bridgewater Treatise, by C. Babbage; Footprints of the Creator, by Hugh Miller; Théologie de la Nature, by H. Durkheim (1852, 3 vols. 8vo.); Butler's Analogy of Religion and Nature; Paley's Natural Theology; Dr. McCosh's Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation; Dr. James Buchanan's Faith in God and Modern Atheism compared, 2 vols. 8vo.; Dr. John Tulloch's (Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrew's) Theism; The Witness of Reason and Nature to an All-Wise and Beneficent Creator.

The same remarks apply to the ear. In its cavity lies the auditory nerve. A tortuous passage is formed in the bony structure of the skull. The orifice of that passage is covered by a membrane to receive the vibration of the air; on the centre of that membrane rests the termination of a small bone so connected as to convey those vibrations to the only nerve capable of receiving or interpreting them, or of transmitting them to the brain. It is by this organ, constructed according to the recondite principles of acoustics, that our intercourse with our fellow-men is principally kept up; through which the marvels of speech, all the charms of music and eloquence become possible for man.

We cannot live without a constant supply of oxygen, which must every moment be brought to act upon the blood, to vitalize it, and by combining with the carbon it contains fit it for renewed use. The infant, therefore, comes into the world with an apparatus prepared for that purpose. In its formative state, it did not breathe. Yet it had lungs. They were given for a foreseen necessity. Nothing can exceed the intricacy, complication, or beauty of the organ or system of organs thus prepared, for the absolutely necessary and continuous purification of the blood, and for its distribution in an uninterrupted flux and reflux to every part of the body. This process goes on without our supervision. It is as regular during sleep as during our waking hours.

Food is as necessary for our support as air. The unborn infant needs no food. It is included in the circulation of its mother. In the state on which it is soon to enter food will be a necessity. Full provision is made beforehand for its reception and use. Teeth are embedded in the jaw for its mastication; salivary glands to furnish the fluid for its chemical preparation for the stomach; an œsophagus to convey it to the stomach, where it meets with a fluid found nowhere else, capable of dissolving and digesting it. It then comes into contact with a set of absorbent vessels which select from it the elements suited for the wants of the body and reject all the rest. The valuable portion is poured into the blood by which it is distributed, each constituent going to its own place and answering its predestined purpose; carbon to be consumed to keep up the vital heat, lime to the bones, fibrine to the muscles, phosphorus to the brain and nerves.

The child before birth has no need of organs for locomotion or for apprehending external objects. But it was foreseen that it would need them, and therefore they are prepared beforehand. The bones are grooved for the reception of muscles, and have projections for points of support; joints of all kinds, hinge and ball and socket, for the flexure of the limbs; the instruments for motion, the contractile fibres, arranged and attached, according to the strict laws of mechanics, so as best to secure the two ends of symmetry and power. Thus the body is a perfect marvel of mechanical contrivances. The several organs, therefore, of the animal frame, viewed separately, present the most incontestible evidence of foresight, intelligence, and wisdom. This, however, is only a small part of the evidence of design furnished even by the body.

Design in the Relation of one Organ to Another.

2. Every animal is a complete whole. Each part has a designed and predetermined reference to every other part. The organs of sight, hearing, breathing, nutrition, locomotion, etc., are so arranged and adjusted as to answer a common purpose to the best advantage. Besides, these organs, although common to all animals (at least to all above the lowest), are modified in each genus and species to meet its peculiar necessities. If the animal is to live on the land all its organs are adapted to that condition. If it is to live in the water or move through the air, all is prepared beforehand for that destination. And more than this, if one organ be designed for some special use, all the rest are modified in accordance with that purpose. If the stomach is suited for the digestion of flesh, then the teeth, the limbs, the claws, are all adapted to secure and prepare the proper aliment. So complete is the adaptation that the anatomist can determine from a single bone the genus or species to which the animal belonged. Birds which wade in the water have long legs and long necks. Those which float on the surface, have web feet, and feathers impenetrable by water; two things which have causal relation, and which are united by a kind of intelligence external to the animal itself. Birds which fly in the air are fitted for their destiny by hollow bones, wide-spread wings, and great accumulation of muscles on the breast. Those which climb trees have feet and tail adapted for that purpose, and, as in the case of the wood-pecker, a sharp bill for boring the tree and a barbed tongue to seize its food. These modifications of animal structure are endless, all showing an external intelligence cognizant of the necessities of every distinct species.

The Adaptation of the Organs to the Instinct of Animals.

3. There is a correspondence between the organs of every animal and the instincts by which it is endowed. Beasts and birds of prey having the instinct to feed on flesh have all the organs requisite to satisfy this inward craving. Those having an instinct for vegetable food, have teeth and stomachs adapted for that purpose. The bee whose body secretes wax, has the instinct to build cells; the spider furnished with the peculiar viscid matter, and apparatus for spinning it, makes a web and watches for its prey. So it is throughout all animated nature. Here then are two very distinct things: instinct and corporeal organs; the instinct cannot account for the organs nor the organs for the instinct; and yet they are never found the one without the other. They of necessity, therefore, imply an intelligence which implants the instinct and furnishes the appropriate organs.

Argument from Prevision.

4. There cannot be a more decisive proof of intelligence than prevision; preparation for an event in the future. The world is full of evidence of such prevision. It is seen not only in the preparation of the organs of sight, hearing, breathing, nutrition, etc. for necessities still future; but still more strikingly in the provision made for the support of young animals as soon as they are born. In the mammalia before the birth of the offspring, the breast or udder begins to swell; it commences the secretion of milk, so that the moment the young animal enters the world he finds prepared the most nutritious and suitable food the world contains. The egg furnishes a still more instructive illustration. It consists of albumen and the yolk. To the yolk is attached a minute germ or cell. When by heat the germ begins to develop, if nourishment were not provided and at hand, it would of necessity perish. But the yolk is there to supply the needed material out of which the future animal is fashioned. If this does not indicate a foreseeing mind and a providing power, then the most skilful productions of human skill and kindness do not prove the intelligence of man. Where then is this intelligence? Not in the parent bird, for it understands nothing about it. Not in more blind forces of nature. There may possibly be room for question where to place it; but to deny that these provisions indicate an intelligent agency somewhere, is altogether irrational.

Vegetable Organisms.

5. The vegetable kingdom is as full of the indications of benevolent design as the animal. Plants have their organism and their physiology. Their structure, in their organs for growth and reproduction, is quite as marvellous as that of most species of the animal kingdom. They constitute an essential part in the great system of nature, without which there could be no sentient life on our globe. Animals cannot live on inorganic matter. It is the province of the plant to reduce this matter into such a state as to be fit for the support of animal life. If it were not therefore for the functions of the leaf which transmutes the inorganic into the organic, there could be no sentient life on our earth. Is there no design here? Is there no intelligent adaptation of one part of the great system of nature to another?

From the Adaptations of Nature.

6. This leads to another department of the subject. The evidences of design are not confined to the separate organs of the plant or animal; nor to the relations of these organs to each other; nor, in the case of animals, to the instinct which impels to the proper use of those organs; they are to be found just as abundantly in the adaptation of external nature to the necessities of animal and vegetable life. Neither plants nor animals could exist without light, air, heat, water, and soil, to produce the common food of all living things. Who created the light and heat and diffuses them over the whole earth? Who made the sun from which they radiate? Who constituted the atmosphere with its chemical adjustments, precisely what is necessary for the support of life, everywhere and always the same, and poured it round our globe? How is it that water at a certain temperature evaporates, rises in mist, is gathered into clouds, is carried everywhere by the winds, and falls in rain to fertilize the earth? The eye supposes light, as the lungs suppose air; the appetite of hunger supposes food, and the power of digestion. Food supposes soil, light, heat, and water. Surely this is one great system. There is unity and mutual relation in all its parts. It must have had one author, and He must be infinite in intelligence and goodness.

All living Creatures on the Earth have Organic Relations.

7. The design indicated in nature is, however, not confined to the individual organisms and to their relations to the world around them, but it has in the progress of science been discovered, that the whole vegetable and animal world has been constructed on one comprehensive plan. As there is a relation of one organ of a given plant or animal to all others and to the whole, so the whole race of plants, and the whole race of animals are related. There are certain typical forms of which all the infinite variety of plants are modifications; and certain other types of which the innumerable genera, species, and varieties of animals are only modifications; and these modifications are precisely of the kind to suit each species for its end, and for the circumstances in which it is to live. So obviously is this the case that Professor Agassiz's "Essay on Classification," is, to say the least, as strong an argument for the being of God as any of the "Bridgewater Treatises." And it is so regarded by its illustrious author. On page 10 of his "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States," he says, "I know those who hold it to be very unscientific to believe that thinking is not something inherent in matter, and that there is an essential difference between inorganic and living and thinking beings. I shall not be prevented by any such pretensions of a false philosophy from expressing my conviction that as long as it cannot be shown that matter or physical forces do actually reason, I shall consider any manifestation of thought as evidence of the existence of a thinking Being as the author of such thought, and shall look upon an intelligent and intelligible connection between the facts of nature as direct proof of the existence of a thinking God, as certainly as man exhibits the power of thinking, when he recognizes their natural relation."

Evidence that the Earth was designed for Man.

8. It is not only, however, the living organisms inhabiting our earth, which exhibit such evidence of an intelligent creator, but also the earth itself. If a father, who when he provides a home for his children, fits it up with all the necessities and all the luxuries which they can possibly need, gives indisputable evidence of intelligence and love, then are those attributes to be ascribed to Him who fitted up this world to be the home of his creatures. This is seen, as already intimated, in the constitution of the atmosphere, in the distribution of light and heat, of electricity and magnetism, in the establishment of those laws which secure the regular succession of the seasons, in the preparation of soil by the disintegration of rocks, the falling of rain, the deposition of dew which falls gently with life-giving power on the thirsty earth; in innumerable other provisions and dispositions of the forces of nature without which neither vegetable nor animal life could be sustained. There are many special provisions of this kind which fill the mind with gratitude and wonder. It is a general law that bodies contract as they become colder. Water, however, when it freezes expands and becomes lighter. If it were not for this benevolent exception to the general law, not only would the inhabitants of all our rivers perish, but the greater part of the temperate zone would be uninhabitable. It is no answer to this argument to say that there are a few other exceptions to this law. We may not know the final cause why bismuth should expand on cooling; but this does not prevent our knowing why ice is made lighter than water. Our not understanding one sentence in a book, does not prove that it has no meaning, nor that we cannot understand another sentence.

The whole configuration of the earth, its position in relation to the sun, and the inclination of its axis, are obviously intended to render it a suitable residence for the creatures by which it is inhabited. Their well-being depends on the distribution of land and water on its surface; on the elevation of its mountain ranges and plateaus, and on the ocean currents which are determined by the configuration of its coasts. If North and South America were not connected by the narrow Isthmus of Darien, Great Britain and the northwestern portions of Europe would be uninhabitable. They owe the moderate temperature which they enjoy to the immense body of warm water, which is prevented by that Isthmus from flowing into the Pacific, being floated in a northeasterly direction across the Atlantic. When we see such benevolent arrangements among men, we refer them instinctively and by a rational necessity to a benevolent and intelligent agent. No rational ground exists for refusing to ascribe like arrangements in nature to a similar source. Is it any more an evidence of prudent or benevolent foresight that a man should store away abundant fuel for himself or others, knowing that winter is approaching, than that God has laid up inexhaustible stores of coal in the bowels of the earth, for the use of his children on the earth?

Cosmical Arrangements.

9. The argument for design founded on cosmical arrangements is so vast a subject that it seems absurd even to refer to it, in a single paragraph. The simple facts are, that our globe is one of eight primary planets which revolve round the sun. The most distant of these planets is some three thousand millions of miles from the central luminary. These planets all move in the same direction, in nearly circular orbits, in nearly the same plane, and with so equable a motion that each performs its revolutions in the proper time. The stability of the system depends on these circumstances. To secure these results matter must attract matter according to its quantity and the square of its distance. The central body must be of such mass as to hold the planets in their course. The centrifugal and centripetal forces must be exactly balanced, to prevent the planets from flying off into space, or falling into the sun. Each planet must have been projected with a precise definite velocity to secure its orbit being nearly a circle, rather than any other curve. The central body alone, in accordance with the evident plan, is luminous and heat-producing. All the others are opaque and cold. These are facts, which Sir Isaac Newton says he is "forced to ascribe to the counsel and contrivance of a voluntary agent."¹ Since the time of Newton, indeed, it has been the commonly received theory that the planets were at one time fluid, highly heated, and luminous; and that they have become opaque in the process of cooling. But this only puts the argument one step back. The fact is that a most wonderful and beneficent result has been accomplished. The question How? is of minor importance. It is the beneficence of the result which indicates mind, and this indication of mind implies a "voluntary agent."

¹ Newton's First Letter to Bentley, quoted by Tulloch, Theism, edit. N. Y. 1855, p. 109.

Our solar system itself, therefore, is vast, varied, and well ordered. Our system, however, is one of probably hundreds of millions. At least astronomers assert their knowledge of a hundred million of suns, some of which are incalculably larger than ours. Sirius is calculated to shine with a light equal to two hundred and fifty of our suns; Alcyone with that of twelve thousand suns. The nearest of these stars is separated from the outer planet of our system twenty-one billions of miles. These millions of stars are not scattered equally through space, but are gathered into groups, the members of which bear an obvious relation to each other.

Besides these systems in which planets are assumed to revolve around suns, there are others in which suns revolve around suns, at distances proportioned to their magnitude. The light emanating from these great luminaries is of different colors, white, red, blue.

Then more distant in space float the unresolved nebulae. Whether these nebulae are vast continents of stars too distant to be distinguishable, or cosmical matter in a formative state, is still an open question with astronomers. Two thousand have been counted in the northern hemisphere, and one thousand in the southern. They assume every variety of form; some are spherical, some fan-shaped, some spiral, some in circular rings. It is estimated that the light of some of the stars has been many thousand years in reaching our earth, although travelling at the rate of more than ten millions of miles a minute.

Throughout this vast universe order reigns. In the midst of endless variety, there is unity. The same laws of gravitation, of light, and of heat everywhere prevail. Confusion and disorder are the uniform result of chance or blindly operating forces. Order is the sure indication of mind. What mind! what wisdom! what power! what beneficence! does this all but infinite universe display!

"The result of our whole experience," said Sir Gilbert Eliot, writing to Hume himself, "seems to amount to this:—There are but two ways in which we have ever observed the different parcels of matter to be thrown together,—either at random, or with design and purpose. By the first, we have never seen produced a regular complicated effect, corresponding to a certain end; by the second, we uniformly have. If, then, the works of nature and the productions of men resemble each other in this one general characteristic, will not even experience sufficiently warrant us to ascribe to both a similar, though proportionable, cause."¹

This argument from design is constantly urged in the Old Testament, which appeals to the heavens and the earth as revealing the being and perfections of God. The Apostle Paul says that the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea and all that is therein, hath not left himself without a witness. (Acts xiv. 15-17.) He demonstrated to the Athenians the nature of God from his works and from our relation to him as his offspring. (Acts xvii. 23-31.) To the Romans he said that the eternal power and Godhead of the Supreme Being, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. (Rom. i. 20.) The ancient philosophers drew the same conclusion from the same premises. Anaxagoras argued that vous, mind, must be admitted as controlling everything in the world, because everything indicates design. Socrates constantly dwells on this as the great proof of the being of God. Cicero² says that it is as impossible that an ordered world could be formed by the fortuitous concurrence of atoms, as that a book should be composed by the throwing about letters at random. Trendelenburg,³ after referring to that passage, says: "It is perhaps more difficult to assume, that by the blind combination of chemical and physical elements and forces, any one even of the organs of the body should be formed, — the eye, for example, so clear, sharp, and all-seeing, — much less the harmonious union of organs which make up the body, than that a book should be made by chance, by throwing types about."

Philo presents the argument in its simplest syllogistic form. "No work of art is self-made. The world is the most perfect work of art. Therefore, the world was made by a good and most perfect Author. Thus we have the knowledge of the existence of God."⁴ All the Christian fathers and subsequent theologians have reasoned in the same way. Even Kant, although denying its conclusiveness, says that the teleological argument should always be treated with respect. It is, he says, the oldest, the clearest, and the best adapted to the human mind.

¹ Dr. Buchanan's Analogy a Guide to Truth and an Aid to Faith, edit. Edinburgh, 1864, p. 414.

² De Natura Deorum, ii. 37.

³ Logische Untersuchungen, vol. ii. p. 64.

⁴ De Monarchia, i. § 4, edit. Leipsig, 1828, vol. iv. p. 290.

§ 4. *Objections to the Argument from Design.*A. The Denial of Final Causes.

The doctrine of final causes in nature must stand or fall with the doctrine of a personal God. The one cannot be denied without denying the other. And the admission of the one involves the admission of the other. By final cause is not meant a mere tendency, or the end to which events either actually or apparently tend; but the end contemplated in the use of means adapted to attain it. The contemplation of an end, is a mental act. The selection and use of means adapted to attain such end, are both intelligent and voluntary acts. But an intelligent voluntary agent is a person.¹ In other words, the use of means to accomplish a contemplated end is a function of personality, or at least of intelligent agency.

Such being the nature of final causes, they are of course denied, (1.) By the positivist, who believes nothing but facts of which the senses take cognizance; and who admits of no other causation than regularity of sequence. As efficiency, intention, and mind are not perceived by the senses, they are not, and cannot be philosophically admitted. (2.) By those who, while they admit such a thing as force, and, therefore, in that sense, a cause, allow of no distinction between physical, vital, and mental causes, or forces; and who maintain that the one can be resolved into either of the others. The advocates of this theory make thought a product of the brain; and have as their watch-word, "Ohne Phosphor kein Gedanke." Of course phosphorus must be before thought, and therefore there can be no final cause in the production of phosphorus, or of anything else. (3.) Final causes are denied by those who regard the universe as the development of the infinite Being under the operation of necessary law. Of that Being no intelligence, consciousness, or will can be predicated. Consequently there can be no preconceived design to be accomplished, either by the universe as a whole, or by any of its parts. According to Spinoza, therefore, final causes are "humana figmenta et deliria."

If you should ask a peasant, where a tree or the body of an animal came from, he would probably answer, "Why, it grew." That for him is the final fact. And so it is for all the advocates of the above-named theories. Thus it is that extremes (the peasant's thought and the savant's theory) meet. What more, what deeper thought is found in the words of Stuart Mill than in the peasant's answer, when the logician says: "Sequences entirely physical and material, as soon as they had become sufficiently familiar to the human mind, came to be thought perfectly natural, and were regarded not only as needing no explanation themselves, but as being capable of affording it to others, and even of serving as the ultimate explanation of things in general."¹

¹ This is in accordance with the accepted theological definition of a person as a "suppositum intelligens."

B. Objections of Hume and Kant.

Hume's answer to the argument from design, or final causes, is, that our knowledge is limited by experience. We have often seen houses, ships, engines, and other machines made, and therefore, when we see similar products of human skill we are authorized to infer that they too were constructed by an intelligent author. But the world belongs to an entirely different category; we have never seen a world made; and therefore we have no rational ground for assuming that this world had a maker. "When two species of objects," says Hume,² "have always been observed to be conjoined together, I can infer, by custom, the existence of one whenever I see the existence of the other, and this I call an argument from experience. But how this argument can have place, where the objects, as in the present case, are single, individual, without parallel, or specific resemblance, may be difficult to explain. And will any man tell me with a serious countenance, that an orderly universe must arise from some thought and art, like the human, because we have experience of it? To ascertain this reasoning, it were requisite that we had experience of the origin of worlds; and it is not sufficient surely that we have seen ships and cities arise from human art and contrivance." What experience teaches is that design implies intelligence; i. e., that we never see the adaptation of means to an end without having evidence that such adaptation is the work of an intelligent agent. And, therefore, even under the guidance of experience we infer that wherever we see design, whether in nature or in art, there must be an intelligent agent. But experience is not the ground or limit of this conviction. It is an intuitive truth, self-evident from its nature, that design cannot be accounted for on the ground of chance or necessity. Let any man try to persuade himself that a watch is the product of chance, and he will see how futile is the attempt.

Kant presents substantially the same objection as Hume when he says that the concatenation of cause and effect is confined to the external world, and therefore that it is illogical to apply the principle of causation to account for the existence of the external world itself. He further objects that the evidences of design in nature would prove only a deminrgus, or world-builder, and not an extramundane God. It is further urged against the sufficiency of the teleological argument, that even if it proved the author of the world to be distinct from it, it would not prove him to be infinite, because the world is finite, and we cannot infer an infinite cause from a finite effect.

¹ Logic, edit. London, 1851, vol. i. p. 366.

² "Dialogues on Natural Religion," Works, edit. Edinburgh, 1826, vol. ii. p. 449.

Answer to the Objections.

In answer to these objections it may be remarked that what the argument from design is intended to prove, and what it does prove, is, (1.) That the Author of the universe is an intelligent and voluntary agent. (2.) That He is extramundane and not merely the life, or soul of the world, for the design is shown not simply or chiefly by the moulding of organized bodies by a principle acting from within outward; but by the adaptation of things external to such organisms, to their various necessities; and by the disposition and orderly arrangement of immense bodies of matter, separated by millions, or even billions of miles. (3.) The immensity of the universe through the whole of which design is manifest, proves that its cause must be adequate to the production of such an effect; and if the effect be, as it is to us, incomprehensibly great, the cause must be so also. And incomprehensibly great and infinitely great, are practically equivalent. But besides, the cosmological argument proves that God is not only maker, but creator. And creation implies the possession of infinite power. Not only because the difference between existence and non-existence is infinite, but because in Scripture creation is always represented as the peculiar work of the infinite God. So far as we know all creature power is limited to self-action, or to the more or less limited control of what already exists.

What has already been said may be a sufficient answer to the objection that while design does indeed prove intelligence, yet that intelligence may be in matter itself, or in nature (a vis insita), as in the soul of the world. These points, as they are generally presented, concern more properly the relation of God to the world, than his existence. They involve the admission of the existence of an intelligence somewhere, adequate to account for all the phenomena of the universe. They involve consequently the denial that these phenomena are to be referred either to chance, or the action of mere physical laws. Where that intelligence is placed, is not the question. Wherever placed it must be a person; and not merely an unintelligent force acting according to necessary law. For the evidence of voluntary action and of benevolence is as clear as that of intelligence. And the considerations already urged prove that this voluntary, intelligent Being must be extramundane; a conclusion which is rendered still more evident from our relation to Him as responsible and dependent.

C. Miscellaneous Objections.

1. It is objected that both in the vegetable and animal kingdoms there are malformations, abnormal productions, which are inconsistent with the idea of the control of an infinite intelligence. This is at best merely an argument from our ignorance. Admitting that there are in nature some things which we cannot account for, this does not invalidate the argument drawn from the innumerable cases of benevolent design. If Mr. Babbage's calculating machine should once in many million of times present the wrong number, this would not prove that there was no intelligence manifested in its construction. It is not necessary even to assume that such apparently irregular action is to be referred to the imperfection of the machine. For what we know, its maker may have a reason for such action, which we cannot discover. In every extended piece of music, discords here and there occur, which pain the ear, and which those unskilled in music cannot account for, but which the competently instructed perceive are taken up and resolved into a higher harmony. If a prince should give us a chest containing millions in coin and jewels, we should not question his kind intention, even should we find among them a spurious dime for whose presence we could not account. It would be insane to reject the Bible with all its sublime and saving truths, because there may be in it a few passages which we cannot understand, and which in themselves seem inconsistent with the perfection of its author. No man refuses to believe in the sun and to rejoice in its light because there are dark spots on its surface for which he cannot account. Ignorance is a very healthful condition of our present state of being.

Useless Organs.

2. A second objection of much the same kind is founded on the fact that we find members in organized bodies for which they have no use. For example, men have mammæ; the whale has teeth which are never developed and which the animal does not need; animals have bones which they never use; birds and crocodiles have their skulls formed of separate bones as well as viviparous animals, although in their case there seems to be no utility in such arrangement. Even Professor Owen urges this objection. In his work on "Limbs,"¹ he says, "I think it will be obvious that the principle of final adaptation fails to satisfy all the conditions of the problem. That every segment and almost every bone which is present in the human hand and arm should exist in the fin of the whale," where they are not needed, does not appear consistent with the principle. Again, in another place, he says,² "The cranium of the bird, which is composed in the adult of a single bone, is ossified from the same number of points as in the human embryo, without the possibility of a similar purpose being subserved thereby, in the extrication of the chick from the fractured egg-shell These, and a hundred such facts force upon the contemplative anatomist the inadequacy of the teleological hypothesis."

On this it may be remarked: (1.) That the objection bears only on the individual organism of plants or animals, whereas the evidences of design are scattered over the whole universe. (2.) This objection also is founded on our ignorance. The argument is that because we cannot see the reason for a certain arrangement, no such reason exists. (3.) It takes the lowest view of utility, namely, that which contemplates the immediate wants of the individual organism. Things which are not needed for its necessities may answer a much higher end. In a great building use is not the only end contemplated; there are symmetry and unity, æsthetic ends of as much value as mere comfort or convenience. Scientific men have demonstrated that all animals are in their structure only modifications of four typical forms. These forms are preserved in all the genera and species included under these general classes. The presence, therefore, of these characteristic features of the type, even where not needed for the individual, serve to indicate the unity of the plan on which the whole animal kingdom is constructed. We must remember that what we do not see, cannot disprove the reality of what we do see.

Instinct.

3. A third objection is sometimes derived from the operations of instinct. Instinct, according to Dr. Reid, is "a natural blind impulse to certain actions, without having any end in view, without deliberation, and very often without any conception of what we do.”¹ Dr. Whately also says: “An instinct is a blind tendency to a mode of action independent of any consideration on the part of the agent, of the end to which the action leads.” Paley defines it to be “a propensity prior to experience and independent of instruction.”² The argument is that as “a blind impulse” contemplating no end, effects all the marvellous contrivances which we see in the works of irrational animals, similar contrivances in nature cannot prove intelligence in the author of nature. The answer to this argument is: —

¹ Page 39.

² Homologies, p. 73.

1. That it is founded on a wrong definition of instinct. It is not a blind impulse. It is that measure of intelligence given to animals which enables them to sustain their lives, to continue their race, and to answer the necessities of their being. Within certain limits this form of intelligence, both in man and in irrational animals, acts blindly. The impulse which leads the young of all animals to seek their nourishment in the appropriate way and in the proper place, is no doubt blind. The same is also probably true of the impulse which leads many animals to make provision in summer for the necessities of winter. Neither can it be supposed that the bee has always and everywhere constructed its cell according to the nicest mathematical principles, under the guidance of an intelligent apprehension of those principles. These operations which are performed without instructions, and always from age to age in the same way, indicate a guidance which may be called blind in so far that those under its influence do not devise the plan on which they act, although they may know the end they have in view. But the intelligence of animals goes far beyond these narrow limits. Not only does the beaver construct his dam according to the nature of the locality and the force of the stream on which he fixes his habitations, but we constantly see it, as well as other animals, varying its mode of operation to suit special emergencies. Instinct, therefore, as designating the principle which controls the action of irrational animals, is not blind, but intelligent. It admits of the contemplation of an end, and of the selection and application of means appropriate for its accomplishment. Even admitting, therefore, that the intelligence manifested in nature is of the same kind as that manifested by animals, yet the difference in degree is infinite.

2. No measure, however, of intellect of the grade or character of instinct is sufficient to account for the phenomena of the universe. Instinct is concerned with the wants of individual organism. But who adapts the organs of an animal to its instincts? Who adapts external nature, air, light, heat, water, food, etc., etc., to its necessities? What relation has instinct to the stellar universe?

¹ Active Powers, III. i. 2, vol. iv. p. 48: edit. Charlestown, 1815.

² Natural Theology, chap. xviii.

3. Moreover, these instincts themselves are among the phenomena to be accounted for. If they are blind impulses, can they be accounted for, in all their variety and in all their accommodation to the nature and wants of animals, by a blind impulse pervading all things? The fact is that the adaptation of external nature to the instincts of the different classes of animals, and of their instincts to external nature, affords one of the most convincing proofs of an intellect exterior to both, and ordering the one in relation to the other.

4. It is to be remembered, although the topic of a separate argument, that the soul of man with all its wonderful powers and capacities, intellectual, moral, and religious, is one of the facts to be accounted for. To trace the existence of the soul of man to "a blind impulse," is to assume that the effect immeasurably transcends its cause, which is assuming an effect without a cause.

5. All these objections take for granted the eternal existence of matter, and the eternity of physical forces. As these are, they must have existed from eternity, or have begun to be. If they began to be they must have had a cause outside of themselves. That cause cannot be nonentity. It must be a self-existing, eternal substance, having the intelligence, power, will, and benevolence adequate to account for the universe and all that it contains. That is, the cause of the universe must be a personal God.

§ 5. The Moral, or Anthropological Argument.

A. Nature of the Argument.

As the image of the sun reflected from a mirror, or the smooth surface of a lake, reveals to us that the sun is, and what it is; so the soul of man, just as clearly, and just as certainly, reveals that God is and what He is. The reflection of the sun does not teach us everything that is true concerning that luminary; it does not reveal its internal constitution, nor tell us how its light and heat are maintained from age to age. In like manner the soul, as the image of God, does not reveal all that God is. In both cases, and equally in both cases, what is revealed is true, that is, trustworthy.

It answers to the objective reality. As we know that the sun really is what its reflection represents him as being, so we know that God is what the nature of the human soul declares Him to be. Doubt in the one case is just as unreasonable, and we may say, just as impossible as in the other.

It has been shown in the preceding chapter that every man has in his own nature the evidence of the existence of God, an evidence which never can be obliterated, and which will force conviction on the most unwilling. It is no less true that every man has in himself the same irresistible evidence that God is an extramundane personal Being; that He is intelligent, voluntary, and moral; that He knows; that He has the right to command; and that He can punish and can save.

It may naturally be asked, If this be so; if every man has in his own nature a witness whose competency he cannot question, and whose testimony he cannot ignore, What is the use of arguing about the matter? For two reasons, first, because even self-evident truths are often denied; and secondly, because men, in their present moral state, are under a strong temptation to deny the existence of a holy and just God; and thirdly, because efforts are constantly made to pervert or contradict the testimony of our nature to the existence and nature of God.

B. Argument from the Existence of the Mind.

Every man has in his own consciousness the evidence of the existence of mind. He knows that he is an intelligent, personal being. He knows that his personality does not reside in his body, but in his soul. It is included in the facts of consciousness that the soul and body are distinct, that they are different substances having not only different but incompatible attributes. That such is the general conviction of men is plain from all languages recognizing the distinction; and from the fact that it is never denied except by speculative or theoretical writers. The common consciousness of men as revealed by their forms of speech, and by their avowals, and by the universal belief, in some form, of a state of conscious existence after death, bears witness to the truth that the soul is something different from, and far superior to the body. How is the existence of this immaterial, thinking, immortal substance which we call self, to be accounted for? That it has not always existed is undeniable. If it began to be, it must have the cause of its existence out of itself. That cause cannot be the soul of the parent, for that also is an effect. It began to be. And it is universally admitted that an infinite series of effects is unthinkable. If the soul cannot be accounted for by derivation in unending series of steps from those who preceded us, neither can it be conceived of as a product of the body, or of physical forces and combinations. It would seem to be a self-evident proposition, that the effect cannot contain in it more than is in its cause; that intelligence cannot be the product of what is unintelligent. This also is confirmed by all experience.

We are conversant in our present state, first, with matter, with its properties and laws or forces; secondly, with vegetable life; thirdly, with animal life; and fourthly, with mind, endowed with a life of a much higher order. Those different elements, or kinds of existence, although marvellously combined and intermingled, are distinct. As a fact of experience, mere matter with its physical forces never originates vegetable life; vegetable life of itself never originates or passes over into animal life; and animal life never originates, and is never developed into intellectual or spiritual life. There is an impassable gulf between these several departments of being. As soon as the principle of life leaves a plant or animal, the physical forces belonging to matter work its dissolution. These are facts indelibly impressed on the convictions of the mass of mankind. They are conclusions to which universal experience has led the minds of all men. They are indeed denied by certain scientific men; but the theory on which that denial is founded involves the denial of so many intuitive and necessary truths; it does such violence to the laws of belief impressed upon our nature, and on the validity of which all knowledge depends, that it can never be more than a precarious and temporary belief on the part of those who adopt it, and can never have control over the minds of men. This is not the place to enter upon the discussion of the theory of materialism. We have a right to appeal to the general conviction of mankind that mind cannot be the product of matter. If this be so, as our minds are not self-existent and eternal, it must be true, as even the heathen believed, that our spirits owe their existence to Him who is the Father of spirits.

C. From the Nature of the Soul.

There are two laws, or general facts, which seem to characterize all the works of nature. By nature is here meant all things out of God. The first of these laws is, that whatever capacities, necessities, or desires exist, or are found in any organism, adequate provision is made to meet and satisfy them all. This is obviously true with regard to the vegetable world. Plants have organs for the selection of the materials necessary for their growth and maturity, from the soil ; organs for the absorption of carbon from the atmosphere ; the capacity of being appropriately affected by light and heat ; organs of propagation designed for the continuance of each after its kind. All these necessities are met. Soil, atmosphere, light, heat, and water, are all provided. The same is no less true with regard to the animal world in all its endless variety of forms. Food, light, heat, air, and water, are suited to their several necessities ; to their organs, and to their instincts. If they have the appetite of hunger, they have organs for the appropriation of their food, and for its digestion ; the instinct for its selection, and food suited to each, is ever at hand. So of all the other necessities of their nature.

The second law, or general fact is, that all these living organisms reach perfection, and fully accomplish the end of their being. That is, they become all they are capable of being. All that belongs to their nature is fully developed. All their capacities are fully exercised, and all their wants fully satisfied.

These two things are true of every living creature within the compass of human knowledge, except Man. So far as his body is concerned, they are true in regard to him also. His physical necessities are all met by the present circumstances of his being. His body becomes all that it is capable of being, in this stage of existence. But these things are not true with regard to his soul. It has capacities which are not fully developed in this world, and never can be. It has desires, aspirations, and necessities for which the world does not furnish the appropriate objects. It is, therefore, as evidently designed and adapted for a higher and spiritual state of existence, as his body is adapted to the present order of things. The soul of man has, in the first place, intellectual powers capable of indefinite expansion, which in this world never reach their utmost limit. With these is connected a desire of knowledge which is never satisfied. In the second place, the soul of man has a capacity for happiness which nothing in the world, nor the whole world could it be attained, can by possibility fill. The animal is satisfied. Its capacity for happiness is here fully provided for. In the third place, the soul has aspirations to which nothing in this life corresponds. It longs for fellowship with what is far above itself ; what is boundless, and eternal. In the fourth place, with all these powers, desires, and aspirations, it is conscious of its weakness, insufficiency, and dependence. It must have an object to worship, to love, to trust ; a Being who can satisfy all its necessities, and under whose guardianship it can be safe from those powers of evil to which it knows that it is on all sides and at all times exposed; a Being whose existence, and whose relation to itself, can explain all the mysteries of its own being, and secure its felicity in the future, on which it knows it must soon enter. Just as certainly as hunger in the animal supposes that there is food adapted to still its cravings, so certainly does this hunger of the soul suppose that there is some Being in the universe to satisfy its necessities. In both cases the craving is natural, universal, and imperative.

It cannot be that man is an exception to the laws above-mentioned; that he alone, of all that lives, has capacities, desires, necessities, for which no provision has been made. God is the correlative of man, in the sense that the existence of such a creature as man necessitates the assumption of such a Being as God.

D. From the Moral Nature of Man.

The familiar facts of consciousness on this subject are, —

1. That we have, by the constitution of our nature, a sense of right and wrong; we perceive or judge some things to be right, and others to be wrong. This perception is immediate. As the reason perceives some things to be true, and others false; and as the senses take immediate knowledge of their appropriate objects, so the soul takes immediate cognizance of the moral character of feelings and acts. The reason, the senses, and the conscience are alike infallible within certain limits, and liable to error beyond those limits.

2. Our moral perceptions or judgments are sui generis. They have their peculiar, distinctive character, which belongs to no other of our states of consciousness. The right is as distinct from the true, the proper, the agreeable, or the expedient, as these latter are from our sensations. The right is that which we are bound to do and to approve; the wrong is that which we are bound to avoid and to disapprove. Moral obligation, as expressed by the word "ought," is a simple and primary idea. It can be understood only by those who have felt it. And it can be confounded with nothing else.

3. These moral judgments are independent. They are not under the control of the understanding or of the will. No man can will to regard an axiom as false, or think that black is white, or white black. Nor can any sophistry of the understanding lead him to such false judgment. In like manner, no man can will to believe that to be right which his conscience tells him to be wrong; nor can he argue himself into the conviction that he has done right, when his conscience tells him he has done wrong.

4. Our moral judgments, or, in other words, the conscience, has an authority from which we cannot emancipate ourselves. We can neither deny nor ignore it. It has a lordship. It commands, and it forbids. And we are bound to obey. It has power also to enforce its decisions. It can reward and punish. Its rewards are among the greatest blessings we can enjoy. Its punishments are the most intolerable agony the human soul can endure.

5. Our moral judgments involve the idea of law, i. e., of a rule or standard to which we are bound to be conformed. When we judge a thing to be right, we judge it to be conformed to the moral law; when we judge it to be wrong, we judge that it is not conformed to that law.

6. This law has an authority which it does not derive from us. It is essentially different from a sense of propriety, or perception of expediency. It is something imposed upon us, and to which we are required to be conformed by an authority out of ourselves.

7. Our moral nature involves, therefore, a sense of responsibility. We must answer for what we are, and for what we do. This responsibility is not to ourselves, not to society, nor to being in general. It must be to a person; that is, to a Being who knows what we are, what we do, and what we ought to be and do; who approves of the right, and disapproves of the wrong; and who has the power and the purpose to reward and punish us according to our character and conduct. Sin, from its very nature, as it reveals itself in our consciousness, involves not only a sense of pollution, or moral degradation, but also a sense of guilt; i. e., a conviction that we deserve punishment, that we ought to be punished, and, therefore, that punishment is inevitable.

If such be the facts of our moral nature, it is plain that we are under the necessity of assuming the existence of an extramundane, personal God, on whom we are dependent, and to whom we are responsible. This is undoubtedly the ground for the conviction of the being of God, which has universally prevailed among men. Having the idea given in the constitution of their nature, or being under an inward necessity of believing in such a Being, cultivated men have sought and found evidence of his existence in the world without them. But these external proofs have neither been as general nor as operative as those derived from what we ourselves are, and from what we know that we deserve. Such men, therefore, as Kant, and Sir William Hamilton, while denying the validity of all other arguments for the existence of God, admit that our nature forces us to believe that He is, and that He is a person.

Our Moral Feelings not due to Education.

It is indeed objected that these phenomena of our moral nature are due to education or to superstition. To this it is answered, first, that moral truths have a self-evidencing light. They can no more be denied than the intuitions of sense and reason. It may even be said that our moral judgments have greater certainty than any other of our convictions. Men believe absurdities. They believe what contradicts the evidence of their senses. But no man ever has, or ever can believe that malignity is a virtue. In the second place, what is universal cannot be accounted for by peculiarities of culture. All men are moral beings; all have this sense of moral obligation, and of responsibility; and no man can free himself from these convictions. The Apostle, therefore, speaking out of the common consciousness of men, as well as under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, speaks of sinners as "knowing the judgment of God" (Rom. i. 32); that is, a sense of sin involves the knowledge of a righteous God.

We then are placed in the midst of a vast universe, of which we constitute a part. We are forced not merely by the desire of knowledge, but from the necessities of our nature, to ask, How did this universe originate? How is it sustained? To what does it tend? What are we? Whence did we come? Whither are we going? These questions must be answered. This complicated problem must be solved. To refer everything to chance, is no solution. It is a frivolous denial that any solution is necessary, that such questions need any answer. To refer everything to necessity, is to say that the existence of things as they are is the ultimate fact. The universe is, and always has been, and always must be. It is the evolution of necessary being by necessary laws. This is all we can know, and all that need be known. This, however, is no solution. It is merely the denial that any solution is possible. Could this theory be accepted with regard to the outward world, it leaves all the phenomena of man's nature — intellectual, moral, and religious — unaccounted for. Theism is a solution. It assumes the existence of an eternal and necessary Being; a Spirit, and therefore intelligent, voluntary, self-conscious, and endowed with moral perfections. This hypothesis accounts for the origin of the universe. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." This is a satisfactory answer to the first question. It accounts for all the universe is, its immensity, its variety, its order, its numberless organisms, the adaptation of external nature to the wants of all living things. It accounts for the nature of man. It gives what that nature demands,—an infinite object of love, confidence, and adoration. It reveals who it is to whom we are responsible, and on whom we are dependent. We know that this solution is true, because it is a solution. It meets all the facts of the case. And it so meets them that it cannot fail to be accepted as true, either intelligently or blindly. The God whom all men ignorantly worship, the Scriptures reveal, not only in the certainty of his existence, but in the plenitude of his perfections.

CHAPTER III.

ANTI-THEISTIC THEORIES.

§ 1. What is meant by Anti-Theism.

As Theism is the doctrine of an extramundane, personal God, the creator, preserver, and governor of all things, any doctrine which denies the existence of such a Being is anti-theistic. Not only avowed Atheism, therefore, but Polytheism, Hylozoism, Materialism, and Pantheism, belong to the class of anti-theistic theories.

Atheism.

Atheism does not call for any separate discussion. It is in itself purely negative. It affirms nothing. It simply denies what Theism asserts. The proof of Theism is, therefore, the refutation of Atheism. Atheist is, however, a term of reproach. Few men are willing to call themselves, or to allow others to call them by that name. Hume, we know, resented it. Hence those who are really atheists, according to the etymological and commonly received meaning of the word, repudiate the term. They claim to be believers in God, although they assign to that word a meaning which is entirely unauthorized by usage. Thus Helvetius¹ says, "There is no man of understanding who does not admit an active principle in nature; therefore there is no atheist. He is not an atheist who says that motion is God; because in fact motion is incomprehensible, as we have no clear idea of it, because it only manifests itself by its effects, and by it all things are performed in the universe." Cousin² says, "Atheism is impossible, because the existence of God is implied in every affirmation. If a man believes that he exists, he must believe in the power of thought, and that is God." In like manner Herbert Spencer claims to be religious. He does not oppose religion, but dogmas. He acknowledges inscrutable power. He reduces all our knowledge to the two facts, "That force is," and "Force is persistent." Force, however, is perfectly inscrutable and incomprehensible. On this principle he attempts to reconcile religion and science. The ultimate principle of religion, that in which all religions agree, is that there is an inscrutable power which is the cause of all things. This also is the ultimate principle of science. They have therefore a common ground. Nothing can be predicated of this cause; not consciousness; not intelligence; not will; only that it is a force. This is all the God the new philosophy leaves us.¹

¹ "De l'Homme," Works, edit. Paris, 1793, vol. iii. p. 221, note.

² Introduction to the General History of Philosophy, vol. i. p. 169.

Language, however, has its rights. The meaning of words cannot be changed at the pleasure of individuals. The word God, and its equivalents in other languages, have a definite meaning, from which no man is at liberty to depart. If any one says he believes in God, he says he believes in the existence of a personal, self-conscious being. He does not believe in God, if he only believes in "motion," in "force," in "thought," in "moral order," in "the incomprehensible," or in any other abstraction.

Theists also have their rights. Theism is a definite form of belief. For the expression of that belief, the word Theism is the established and universally recognized term. We have the right to retain it; and we have the right to designate as Atheism, all forms of doctrine which involve the denial of what is universally understood by Theism.

Is Atheism possible?

The question has often been discussed, Whether Atheism is possible? The answer to the question depends on the meaning of the term. If the question be, Whether a man can emancipate himself from the conviction that there is a personal Being to whom he is responsible for his character and conduct, and who will punish him for his sins? it must be answered in the negative. For that would be to emancipate himself from the moral law, which is impossible. If, however, the question means, Whether a man may, by speculation or otherwise, bring himself into such a state as to lose the consciousness of the belief of God as written in his heart, and free himself, for a time, from its power? it must be answered affirmatively. A man may, in this sense, deny his individuality or identity; the real, objective existence of soul or body, mind or matter; the distinction between right and wrong. But this is unnatural, and cannot last. It is like deflecting a spring by force. The moment the force is removed, the spring returns to its normal position. Men, therefore, often pass in a moment from a state of entire skepticism to a state of unquestioning faith; not of course by a process of argument, but by a change in their inward state. This transition from unbelief to faith, though thus sudden, and although not produced by an intellectual process, is perfectly rational. The feelings which rise in the mind contain evidence of the truth which the understanding cannot resist. It is also a familiar psychological fact, that skepticism and faith may, in a certain sense, coexist in the mind. An idealist while abiding by his theory, has nevertheless an inward conviction of the reality of the external world. So the speculative atheist lives with the abiding conviction that there is a God to whom he must render an account.

¹ See First Principles of a New System of Philosophy, by Herbert Spencer.

§ 2. Polytheism.

As the word implies, Polytheism is the theory which assumes the existence of many gods. Monotheism was the original religion of our race. This is evident not only from the teachings of the Scriptures, but also from the fact that the earliest historical form of religious belief is monotheistic. There are monotheistic hymns in the Vedas, the most ancient writings now extant, unless the Pentateuch be an exception.

The first departure from monotheism seems to have been nature worship. As men lost the knowledge of God as creator, they were led to reverence the physical elements with which they were in contact, whose power they witnessed, and whose beneficent influence they constantly experienced. Hence not only the sun, moon, and stars, the great representatives of nature, but fire, air, and water, became the objects of popular worship. We accordingly find that the Vedas consist largely of hymns addressed to these natural elements.

These powers were personified, and soon it came to be generally believed that a personal being presided over each. And these imaginary beings were the objects of popular worship.

While the mass of the people really believed in beings that were "called gods" (1 Cor. viii. 5), many of the more enlightened were monotheists, and more were pantheists. The early introduction and wide dissemination of pantheism are proved from the fact that it lies at the foundation of Brahminism and Buddhism, the religions of the larger part of the human race for thousands of years.

There can be little doubt that when the Aryan tribes entered India, fifteen hundred or two thousand years before Christ, pantheism was their established belief. The unknown, and "unconditioned" infinite Being, reveals itself according to the Hindu system, as Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva,—that is, as Creator, Preserver, and Restorer. These were not persons, but modes of manifestation. It was in this form that the idea of an endless process of development of the infinite into the finite, and of the return of the finite into the infinite, was expressed. It was from this pantheistic principle that the endless polytheism of the Hindus naturally developed itself; and this determined the character of their whole religion. As all that is, is only a manifestation of God, everything remarkable, and especially the appearance of any remarkable man, was regarded as an “avatar,” or incarnation of God, in one or other of his modes of manifestation, as Brahma, Vishnu, or Shiva. And as evil is as actual as good, the one is as much a manifestation, or, modus existendi, of the infinite Being as the other. And hence there are evil gods as well as good. In no part of the world has pantheism had such a field for development as in India, and nowhere has it brought forth its legitimate effects in such a portentous amount of evil. Nowhere has polytheism been carried to such revolting extremes.

Among the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans polytheism assumed a form determined by the character of the people. The Greeks rendered it bright, beautiful, and sensual; the Romans were more decorous and sedate. Among barbarous nations it has assumed forms much more simple, and in many cases more rational.

In the Bible the gods of the heathen are declared to be “vanity,” and “nothing,” mere imaginary beings, without power either to hurt or to save. (Jer. ii. 28; Isa. xli. 29; xlii. 17; Ps. cvi. 28.) They are also represented as δαίμονια (1 Cor. x. 20). This word may express either an imaginary, or a real existence. The objects of heathen worship are called gods, even when declared to be nonentities. So they may be called “demons,” without intending to teach that they are “spirits.” As the word, however, generally in the New Testament, does mean “evil spirits,” it is perhaps better to take it in that sense when it refers to the objects of heathen worship. This is not inconsistent with the doctrine that the gods of the heathen are “vanities and lies.” They are not what men take them to be. They have no divine power. Paul says of the heathen before their conversion, “ἐδουλεύσατε τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσι θεοῖς” (Gal. iv. 8). The prevalence and persistency of Polytheism show that it must have a strong affinity with fallen human nature. Although, except in pantheism, it has no philosophical basis, it constitutes a formidable obstacle to the progress of true religion in the world.

§ 3. Hylozoism.

Hylozoism, from ὑλη, matter, and ζωή, life, is properly the doctrine that matter is endued with life. And this is the form in which the doctrine was held by many of its advocates. All matter, and every particle of matter, besides its physical properties, has a principle of life in itself, which precludes the necessity of assuming any other cause for the phenomena of life exhibited in the world. In this form Hylozoism does not differ from Materialism.

Most commonly, however, the term is used to designate a system which admits a distinction between mind and matter, but considers them as intimately and inseparably united, as the soul and body in man. God, according to this view, is the soul of the world; an intelligent power everywhere present, to which are to be referred all the manifestations of design in the external world, and all the activity of the human soul. The relation, however, of the soul to the body, is a very imperfect illustration of the relation of God to the world according to the hylozoistic system. The soul is really exterior to the body, and independent of it, at least for its existence and activity. It is not the life of the body. It neither fashions nor preserves it. It is not even conscious of the vital activity by which the body is developed and sustained. Whereas according to the hylozoistic theory, the soul of the world is its plastic principle, the inward source of all its organizations and of all its activities.

The leading principles of this theory as developed by the Stoics are, (1.) There are two constituent principles of the universe, one active, the other passive. The passive principle is matter, without form and without properties, i. e., inert. The active principle is mind, dwelling in matter its organizing formative power, i. e., God. (2.) The universe is therefore to be viewed under three aspects: (a.) As the all-forming power; the natura naturans, or, ἡ φύσις τεχνική. (b.) The world as formed by this living, inward principle. The living κόσμος, or natura naturata. (c.) The identity of the two, as they form one whole. It is only by an act of the mind that the one is distinguished from the other. Therefore the world, as including both, or as the identity of both, is formed with the greatest wisdom, and by a necessary process, for the laws of nature are the laws of reason. Cicero,¹ expounding this system, says, "Natura, non artificiosa solum, sed plane artifex ab eodem Zenone dicitur; consultrix, et provida utilitatum opportunitatumque omnium. Censet [Zeno] enim artis maxime proprium est creare et gignere, quodque in operibus nostrarum artium manus officiet, id multo artificiosius naturam officere."

¹ De Natura Deorum, li. 22, p. 1116, edit. Leipzig, 1850.

(3.) The universe, therefore (The All-one), of which God is the soul and Nature the body, is living, immortal, rational, and perfect (ζῶον ἀθάνατον, λογικόν, τέλειον). God, as the controlling, operative principle in all things, acts according to necessary, although rational laws. (4.) The souls of men are of the same nature with the soul of the world, but as individual existences, passing away when the life of the body ceases. (5.) The highest end of life is virtue; and virtue is living according to reason.¹

This system in one of its forms is nearly identical with Materialism, and in the other with Pantheism. There is no personal God to whom we are responsible, no freedom of the will; therefore, no sin, and no conscious existence after death.

§ 4. Materialism.

Materialism is that system which ignores the distinction between matter and mind, and refers all the phenomena of the world, whether physical, vital, or mental, to the functions of matter.

A. The Doctrine of Epicurus.

Epicurus taught, (1.) That as ex nihilo nihil fit, the universe has always existed, and must continue to exist forever. (2.) That space, and the number of bodies which it contains, are infinite. (3.) These bodies are of two kinds, simple and compound. The simple bodies are atoms possessing form, magnitude, and weight. They are indivisible, unalterable, and indestructible. This is also the doctrine of modern science. Faraday² says, "A particle of oxygen is ever a particle of oxygen, — nothing can in the least wear it. If it enters into combination, and disappears as oxygen; if it pass through a thousand combinations, animal, vegetable, and mineral — if it lie hid for a thousand years, and then be evolved, it is oxygen with its first qualities, neither more nor less. It has all its original force, and only that; the amount of force which it disengaged when hiding itself, has again to be employed in a reverse direction when it is set at liberty." (4.) These atoms have their peculiar forces, distinct from their mere gravity. This, too, is the doctrine of modern science. It is included in what Faraday says in the passage just quoted. "Molecules," say the scientific men of our day, "have been endowed with forces which give rise to various chemical qualities, and these never change either in their nature or in their amount.”¹ (5.) Epicurus taught that the quantity of matter, and of course the amount of force in the world, is always the same. Neither can be increased or diminished. (6.) The atoms, of which the number is infinite, move through space with incredible velocity under the guidance of necessary physical laws. (7.) By the combination of these atoms under the influence of gravity and other physical forces, the universe was formed, and became a cosmos. This is very nearly the nebular hypothesis. (8.) The soul is material; or, in other words, all mental phenomena are due to the properties of matter. This, also, is proclaimed as the last result of modern science. (9.) The soul, of course, ceases to exist when the body dies; i. e., as death is the cessation of the vital, so it is also of the intellectual functions of the individual. The atoms of which the man is composed, with the forces which belong to them, continue to exist, and may enter into the composition of other men. But the man, as an individual, ceases to exist. This, almost in so many words, is the avowed doctrine of many physicists of the present day. (10.) Sensation is for us the only source of knowledge. By remembering former sensations, we form ideas, and by the combination of ideas we form judgments. Almost the very words of Hume, and the doctrine of the whole school of which he is the representative. (11.) As Epicurus held that nothing is incorporeal except a vacuum, he of necessity includes all the forms of existence under the head of matter. As there is no mind or spirit, there is no God, and no moral law. Virtue is only a prudent regard to happiness. In a certain sense he admitted the existence of Gods, but they were corporeal beings having no concern with the affairs of men.²

¹ See Rixner's Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. i. sect. 120.

² See Youmans' Conservation and Correlation of Forces, p. 372.

A recent German writer,³ in Herzog's "Encyklopädie," under the head of Materialismus, says that notwithstanding the great progress of modern science, the Materialists of our day have not advanced a step upon the system of Epicurus. That system, probably owing to the dominant influence of the higher philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, did not exert much influence on the ancient mind, or on the progress of human thought. It was not until modern times that Materialism gained any great power as a philosophical theory.

¹ Croonian Lectures on Matter and Force. Given at the Royal College of Physicians, in 1868. By Henry Bruce Jones, A. M., M. D., F. R. S., London, 1868, p. 17.

² Rixner's Geschichte der Philosophie, i. 303-318. Ritter's History of Philosophy, translated by A. J. W. Morrison, iii. 399-447.

³ F. Fabri.

B. Materialism in England during the Eighteenth Century.

Hobbes (1588-1679) anticipated the movement towards Materialism which manifested itself in England during the last century. "He made sensation the real basis of every mental operation, the sole originator of our ideas, the sole medium and test of truth.¹ As, therefore, we can perceive through sensation only what is material, he concluded that matter is the only reality, and that whatever exists to us must accordingly be a part of the material universe. The whole process of scientific investigation was thus reduced to the doctrine of bodies, beyond which, he maintained, there can be no knowledge whatever accessible to the human mind. This knowledge, however, does not refer simply to the existence of bodies, but also to their changes, of all which changes the ultimate principle is motion. The doctrine of bodies, therefore, includes the knowledge of all phenomena in relation to their probable causes; and of all possible causes as known from their observed effects. . . . The mind itself he viewed as wholly material, the phenomena of consciousness being the direct result of our organization. The one great and fundamental fact of mind is sensation, which is nothing more or less than the effect of material objects around us, exerted by means of pressure or impact upon that material organization which we term the mind."² Thus it appears that Hobbes anticipated the great result of modern science, that all force may be resolved into motion.

Locke (1632-1704).

The introduction of Materialism into England during the last century is generally attributed to the influence of Locke's philosophy. Locke himself was far from being a Materialist, and the advocates of his system strenuously insist that his principles have no legitimate tendency to obliterate the distinction between matter and mind. Locke, however, in combatting the doctrine of "innate ideas," in the sense of abstract truths, seemed to deny that the mind was so constituted as to apprehend truth intuitively, and beyond the range of experience. He compared the mind to a "tabula rasa." This figure suggests that all our knowledge is from without, as the slate contributes nothing to the matter written upon it. He defined ideas to be "anything with which the mind is immediately occupied when we think." The origin of these ideas, he said, was sensation and reflection. If by reflection he meant the observation of the phenomena of the mind, his theory is one thing. If it mean the process of recalling, combining, analyzing, and otherwise elaborating the impressions upon us from without, his theory is another. Probably Locke himself, and certainly many of his followers, took it in the latter sense; and thus the two sources of ideas, or of knowledge, are reduced to one, and that one is sensation. But as sensation can give us the knowledge only of what is external and material, the theory in this form seemed to leave no room for the higher ideas of eternal and necessary truths. Locke attempts to account for our ideas, of time, space, infinity, cause, and even of right and wrong, from observation, i. e., from observation of what is without, or from impressions made upon our senses. It is a common criticism upon Locke's great work, that in it he does not distinguish between the occasion and the source of our ideas. Our experience furnishes the occasion, and it may be the necessary condition, of waking the mind to the perception not only of the fact experienced, but also of the intuitive apprehension of the universal and necessary truth which the fact involves. If we did not see effects produced around us, and did not ourselves exercise efficiency, we might never have the idea of causation; but the conviction that every effect must have a cause is an intuitive judgment, which experience can neither produce nor limit. It is not from the observed tendency of some acts to produce happiness, and of others to produce misery, that we get the idea of the essential distinction between right and wrong; but from the constitution of the mind. Although Locke, and many of his disciples, were satisfied with his method of accounting for our ideas of God, of spirit, and of moral and religious truths, yet it is also certain that many of his followers felt justified on his principles to discard them.

¹ Leviathan, chap. i.

² Morell's History of Modern Philosophy, New York, 1848, pp. 71, 72.

Hartley (1705-1757).

Hartley was a physician and a physiologist. Physiology and psychology have intimate relations. It is perhaps natural that those who devote themselves specially to the former, should make little of the latter. It is the marked characteristic of our age, so far as physicists are concerned, that it tries to merge psychology entirely into physiology. Hartley adopted the principles of Locke, and endeavored to show how it is that external things produce sensation and thought. This he did by his theory of vibrations. "The objects of the external world affect in some manner the extremiends of the nerves, which spread from the brain as centre to every part of the body. This affection produces a vibration, which is continued along the nerve by the agency of an elastic ether, until it reaches the brain, where it constitutes the phenomenon we term sensation. When a sensation has been experienced several times, the vibratory movement from which it arises acquires the tendency to repeat itself spontaneously, even when the external object is not present. These repetitions or relics of sensations are ideas, which in their turn possess the property of recalling each other by virtue of mutual association among themselves.”¹ This doctrine of association of ideas is the most important part of his system. He insists principally on the following law: “An idea is sometimes associated with another through the medium of a third; but in process of time this intermediate idea may be disregarded, and yet the connection between the first and third may, notwithstanding, remain. Thus the idea of pleasure, which is so indissolubly connected with money, arises from the conveniences which it is able to procure, while in the mind of the miser the conveniences are lost sight of, and the very possession of the money itself is regarded as containing the whole enjoyment. In this way Hartley accounts for almost all the emotions and passions of the human mind. The domestic affections, for instance, arise from the transference of the pleasure derived from parental kindness to the parent itself; the social and patriotic affections from transferring the pleasures of society to the country which affords them; in like manner, also, the moral and religious affections, the love of virtue and the love of God, arise from the pleasures connected with virtuous and pious conduct, being transferred to the law of action, or to the supreme Lawgiver, from whom these pleasures have emanated.”² The connection of this theory with Materialism is obvious. If vibrations of the brain constitute sensation, and if the relics, or spontaneous repetitions of these vibrations constitute thought and feeling, then all mental and moral acts are mere affections of our material organism. It is also obvious that, according to this theory, there is no more freedom in volition than in sensation. The former is a mode, or relic of the latter. Although this tendency of his system was undeniable, and although his successors drew these conclusions from his principles, Hartley himself was not a Materialist. He was a very religious man. It is not at all uncommon for a man to hold a speculative theory inconsistent with his faith.

Morell³ quotes the following criticism of Hartley's doctrine from the "Edinburgh Review": "There may be," says the reviewer, "little shakings in the brain, for anything we know, and there may even be shakings of a different kind accompanying every act of thought or perception; — but that the shakings themselves are the thought or perception, we are so far from admitting, that we find it absolutely impossible to comprehend what is meant by the assertion. The shakings are certain throbbings, vibrations, or stirrings, in a whitish, half-fluid substance like custard, which we might see perhaps, or feel, if we had eyes and fingers sufficiently small or fine for the office. But what should we see or feel, upon the supposition that we could detect by our senses, everything that actually took place in the brain? We should see the particles of this substance change their place a little, move a little up or down, to the right or the left, round about or zigzag, or in some other course or direction. This is all that we could see, if Dr. Hartley's conjecture were proved by actual observation; because this is all that exists in motion, according to our conception of it, and all that we mean when we say that there is motion in any substance. Is it intelligible, then, to say, that this motion, the whole of which we see and comprehend, is thought and feeling, and that thought and feeling will exist, wherever we can excite a similar motion in a similar substance? — In our humble apprehension the proposition is not so much false, as utterly unmeaning and incomprehensible."¹

¹ Observations on Man, chap. i. sect. 2, and Morell, p. 98.

² Page 97.

³ Morell, p. 99.

If history repeats itself, so does philosophy. What the "Edinburgh Review" said of Hartley nearly seventy years ago, Professor Tyndall says of the Materialists of our day. "The passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable. Granted that a definite thought and a definite molecular action in the brain occur simultaneously; we do not possess the intellectual organ, nor apparently any rudiment of the organ, which would enable us to pass, by a process of reasoning, from the one phenomenon to the other. They appear together, but we do not know why. Were our minds and senses so expanded, strengthened, and illuminated, as to enable us to see and feel the very molecules of the brain; were we capable of following all their motions, all their grouping, all their electric discharges, if such there be; and were we intimately acquainted with the corresponding states of thought and feeling, we should probably be as far as ever from the solution of the problem, How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness? The chasm between the two classes of phenomena would still remain intellectually impassable. Let the consciousness of love, for example, be associated with a right-handed spiral motion of the molecules of the brain, and the consciousness of hate with a left-handed spiral motion. We should then know when we love that the motion is in one direction, and when we hate that the motion is in the other, but the 'Why?' would still remain unanswered. In affirming that the growth of the body is mechanical, and that thought, as exercised by us, has its correlative in the physics of the brain, I think the position of the 'Materialist' is stated as far as that position is a tenable one. I think the Materialist will be able finally to maintain this position against all attacks; but I do not think, as the human mind is at present constituted, that he can pass beyond it. I do not think he is entitled to say that his molecular grouping and his molecular motions explain everything. In reality they explain nothing."¹

¹ Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1806, p. 157.

Priestley (1733-1804).

Priestley owes his permanent reputation to his important discoveries in the department of physical science. He was, however, prominent during his life for the part he took in philosophical and theological controversies. Devoted to science, the senses were for him the great sources of knowledge; all others, except supernatural revelation which he admitted, he distrusted. He adopted with enthusiasm the theory of Hartley which resolved thought and feeling into vibrations of the brain. Hartley, he said, had done more for the doctrine of mind than Newton accomplished for the theory of the material universe. He did not hesitate to avow himself a Materialist. "Priestley," says Morell,² "rested the truth of Materialism upon two deductions. The first was, that thought and sensation are essentially the same thing — that the whole variety of our ideas, however abstract and refined they may become, are, nevertheless, but modifications of the sensational faculty. . . . The second deduction was, that all sensation, and, consequently, all thought, arises from the affections of our material organization, and therefore consists entirely in the motion of the material particles of which the nerves and brain are composed." He was a necessitarian, and in morals a utilitarian. Believing, however, in God and in divine revelation, he admitted a future state of existence. As the Bible teaches the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, Priestley believed that man would be restored to conscious existence when that event occurred. His principal works bearing on this subject are: "Examination of Reid, Beattie, and Oswald," "Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity Explained," "Disquisitions relating to Matter and Spirit," and "Hartley's Theory of the Human Mind, with Essays relating to the subject of it."

¹ "Address before British Association," Athenæum, for August 29, 1868. Quoted in Perowne's Hulsean Lectures, for 1867; Appendix, Note A.

² Page 102.

Hume is regarded as their master by the most advanced physicists of the modern scientific school, so far as their general principles and method of philosophizing are concerned. He was neither a Materialist nor an Idealist, but rather a Nihilist, as his great object was to show that no certainty could be attained in any department of knowledge. He affirmed nothing and denied everything. Such knowledge as we have comes from sensation, therefore, he maintained that as we have no sensation of efficiency, we can have no idea of it, and no evidence of its reality. A cause is not that which produces an effect, but simply that which uniformly precedes it. Consequently, anything can be the cause of anything. Again, as we have no perception by the senses of substance, there can be no such thing. This applies to mind as well as matter. Nothing exists to us but our thoughts and feelings. We are "nothing but a bundle or collection of different perceptions, which succeed each other with an inconceivable rapidity, and are in perpetual flux and movement."

C. Materialism in France during the Eighteenth Century.

The sensational philosophy, as it is called, found a much more congenial soil in France than in England. Locke's "Essay" was translated into the language of that country and made the subject of comments and lectures. His leading principles were adopted without the limitations and qualifications with which he had presented them, and conclusions drawn from them which Locke would have been the first to repudiate.

Condillac, one of the first and most influential of the disciples of Locke, in his first work, 'Essai sur l'Origine des Connaissances Humaines,' differed comparatively little from the English philosopher. But in his "Traité des Sensations," he virtually discarded "reflection" as a source of our ideas, and regarded all thoughts, feelings, and volitions as "transformed sensations." "While he answered the question concerning the relation between the soul and body, by assuming their identity, he took theistic ground in accounting for the origin of the world. This middle ground was occupied also, at least ostensibly, by Diderot and D'Alembert in the French

"Encyclopédie," who, notwithstanding their sensational theory as to the source of our knowledge, and their making happiness the ground of morals and end of life, not only maintained theistic principles, but insisted on the necessity of a divine revelation. This, however, was probably more a matter of prudence than of conviction."¹

These, however, were only the first steps. The extreme of materialistic atheism was soon reached and avowed. La Mettrie published his "L'Histoire Naturelle de l'Âme" in 1745, his "L'Homme Machine," the same year, and his "L'Homme Planté" in 1749. Helvetius published his work "De l'Esprit" in 1758. His book entitled "De l'Homme" was published after his death. The climax was reached by Baron d'Holbach in his "Système de la Nature," in which Materialism, fatalism, and atheism were openly avowed. According to this system matter and motion are eternal; thought is an agitation of the nerves; the soul the result of our corporeal organization; the will the strongest sensation; the ground of morals a regard to our own happiness. There is no freedom, no morality, no future existence, no God. When these principles got hold of the popular mind, then came the end.

D. Positivism.

Comte, the author of the "Positive Philosophy," was born in 1798, and died in 1859. The greater part of his life was passed in poverty and neglect. His only occupation was teaching. Ten years were devoted to the preparation of a course of lectures on philosophy which secured him wealth and fame. He called his system "Philosophie Positive," because it purported "to assume nothing beyond the content of observed facts."

The fundamental principle of the "Positive Philosophy" is the one so often referred to, namely, that the senses are the only source of our knowledge, hence nothing exists but matter. There is no mind distinct from matter; no such thing as efficiency; no causes, whether first or final; no God; no future state of existence for man. Theology and psychology are, therefore, banished from the domain of science. Science is solely occupied in the observation of facts, and in deducing from them the laws by which they are determined. These laws, however, are not forces operating in a uniform manner, but simply statements of the actual order in the sequence of events. This sequence is not only uniform but necessary. Our business is simply to ascertain what it is. The only method by which this can be done is observation. This task is much easier in some departments than in others; for in some the facts to be observed are less numerous and less complicated. In mathematics and astronomy the facts are all of one kind; whereas in physiology and sociology they are of very different kinds, and vastly more complicated. The same rule, however, applies to all departments. In all, the sequence of events is uniform and necessary; and if we can only, by a sufficient induction of facts, ascertain what the law of sequence is, we shall be able to predict the future as certainly in one department as in another. The astronomer can tell what will be the position of the stars and planets a century hence. The Positivist will be able to foretell with equal certainty how a man will act in any given circumstances, and what will be the progress and state of society in time to come.

¹ F. Fabri in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, art. "Materialismus."

It follows, therefore, according to the Positive Philosophy,—

- (1.) That all our knowledge is confined to physical phenomena.
- (2.) That all we can know of such phenomena is, that they are, and the relations in which they stand to each other.
- (3.) That these relations are all included under the heads of sequence and resemblance.
- (4.) These relations constitute the laws of nature, and are invariable.
- (5.) As everything that exists is material, these laws, or “invariable relations of succession and resemblance,” control all the phenomena of mind, as we call it, and of social life and of history, as well as those of nature, in the common sense of that word.
- (6.) As everything is included in the department of physics, everything is controlled by physical laws, and there is no more freedom in human acts than in the motions of the stars; and, therefore, the one can be predicted with the same certainty as the other.

The following quotations from the “Philosophie Positive,” “freely translated and condensed by Harriet Martineau,”¹ include all the points above mentioned.

“The first characteristic of the Positive Philosophy is that it regards all phenomena as subjected to invariable natural laws. Our business is, — seeing how vain is any research into what are called causes, whether first or final, — to pursue an accurate discovery of these laws, with a view to reducing them to the smallest possible number.”² “Our positive method of connecting phenomena is by one or other of two relations, — that of similitude or that of succession, — the mere fact of such resemblance or succession being all that we can pretend to know; and all that we need to know; for this perception comprehends all knowledge which consists in elucidating something by something else, — in now explaining, and now foreseeing certain phenomena, by means of the resemblance or sequence of other phenomena.”¹ “If we regard these functions [of the mind] under their statical aspect, — that is, if we consider the conditions under which they exist, — we must determine the organic circumstances of the case, which inquiry involves it with anatomy and physiology. If we look at the dynamic aspect, we have to study simply the exercise and results of the intellectual powers of the human race, which is neither more nor less than the general object of the Positive Philosophy.”²

¹ New York, 1855.

² Vol. i. p. 5.

Comte is obliged to use the word “power,” and to speak of its exercise, yet all his philosophy denies the existence of any such thing as efficiency. The laws which determine events are nothing more than facts of uniform sequence. According to the passage just quoted, one department of psychology (the statical) belongs to anatomy and physiology; the other (the dynamic) to the observed sequence of certain facts called intellectual. The sequence is invariable. The intervention of will is necessarily excluded, because philosophy, at least Positivism, is nothing unless it secures the power of prevision. But free acts cannot be foreseen by man. Hence Comte says, “The arbitrary can never be excluded while political phenomena are referred to will, divine or human, instead of being connected with invariable natural laws.”³ “If social events were always exposed to disturbance by the accidental intervention of the legislator, human or divine, no scientific prevision of them would be possible.”⁴

Intellectual exercises being regarded as a function of the brain, Comte says, “The positive theory of the intellectual and affective functions is therefore henceforth unchangeably regarded as consisting in the study, both rational and experimental, of the various phenomena of internal sensibility, which are proper to the cerebral ganglia, apart from their external apparatus. It is, therefore, simply a prolongation of animal physiology, properly so called, when this is extended so as to include the fundamental and ultimate attributes.”⁵

Comte, being an ardent phrenologist, founded one of the arguments for his system on the organization of the brain; but his great dependence was upon the law of human development. He admitted no essential difference between man and irrational animals. The superiority of man is only in the degree of his intelli-

¹ Philosophie Positive, vol. ii. p. 515.

⁴ Ibid. p. 73.

² Vol. i. p. 11.

³ Vol. ii. p. 47.

⁵ See Prof. Porter's Human Intellect, p. 54.

gence, which is due to his better physical organization. According to Comte, the whole human race, and every individual man, passes through three distinct stages, which he calls the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. During the first stage all events are referred to supernatural causes. In the first part of this stage of their progress, men were fetich-worshippers; then they gradually became polytheists, and monotheists. This he endeavors to prove historically in regard to the Greeks, the Romans, and the inhabitants of western Europe. As men outgrew the fetich age, so they outgrew the polytheistic and monotheistic forms of belief. That is, they ceased to refer phenomena to the agency of supernatural beings.

During the metaphysical stage, phenomena are referred to unseen causes, to occult powers, or forces, that is, to something which the senses cannot detect. This also has passed away, and men have come to recognize the great fact that there are no spiritual agencies in the universe, no efficient causes, nothing but events to be arranged according to the laws of sequence and resemblance. The order of events is invariable and necessary. What it has been in the past, it will be in the future. As this is the law of the development of the race collectively, so it is of the individual man. Every one, in his progress from infancy to manhood, passes through these several stages, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. We first believe in supernatural agencies (witches, ghosts, souls, angels, etc.); then in occult causes; then only in facts discerned by the senses. The history of the race and the experience of the individual man are thus made the broad and sure foundation of the Positive Philosophy.

Remarks.

1. Considering that the advocates of this philosophy are a mere handful; considering that nine hundred and ninety-nine millions of the thousand millions of our race still believe in God, it is a rather violent assumption that mankind have reached the stage of Positivism. It may be readily admitted that the progress of science and of Christianity has banished alchemy, astrology, witchcraft, and necromancy from enlightened portions of our race, but it has had a scarcely discernible effect in banishing belief in mind as distinct from matter, or in efficient causes, or in God. Admitting, therefore, the principle of the argument to be correct, the conclusion arrived at is contradicted by facts.

2. The principle itself, however, is a groundless assumption.

There has been no such development of the race, and there is no such development of the individual man, as the argument supposes. Much less is it true, as Comte maintains, that these several methods of dealing with phenomena are antagonistic and mutually exclusive; that if we believe in spiritual agents, we cannot believe in unseen, metaphysical causes; and that if we believe in the latter we cannot believe in the former. The fact is, the great mass of mankind, educated and uneducated, believe in both. They believe in God and mind, as well as in occult causes, such as electricity, magnetism, and other physical forces; which, in Comte's sense of the word, are metaphysical.

With regard to this assumed law of progress, Prof. Huxley, who is as completely emancipated from the trammels of authority as any man of science now living, says, in the first place, that Comte contradicts himself as to this fundamental principle. In proof he quotes a long passage from the "Philosophie Positive," in which Comte teaches,—“(a.) As a matter of fact, the human intellect has not been invariably subjected to the law of the three states, and, therefore, the necessity of the law cannot be demonstrable à priori. (b.) Much of our knowledge of all kinds has not passed through the three states, and more particularly, as M. Comte is careful to point out, not through the first. (c.) The positive state has more or less coexisted with the theological, from the dawn of human intelligence. And, by way of completing the series of contradictions, the assertion that the three states are ‘essentially different and even radically opposed,’ is met a little lower on the same page by the declaration that ‘the metaphysical state is, at bottom, nothing but a simple general modification of the first.’” “Men of science,” he adds, “are not in the habit of paying much attention to ‘laws’ stated in this fashion.”¹

After showing that the individual man does not pass through these several states, Prof. Huxley says, “What is true of the individual is, mutatis mutandis, true of the intellectual development of the species. It is absurd to say of men in a state of primitive savagery, that all their conceptions are in a theological state. Nine tenths of them are eminently realistic, and as ‘positive’ as ignorance and narrowness can make them.”²

Besides, it is not true that the race of men now existing on the earth, were in their primitive state fetich-worshippers, or that they gradually rose to polytheism and monotheism. The reverse is true. Not only revelation, but all history and tradition, go to show that the primitive state of our race was its highest state, at least so far as religion is concerned. Monotheism was the earliest form of religion among men. To that succeeded nature-worship and pantheism, and to that polytheism. It is a historical fact that monotheism was not reached by a process of development. Monotheism was first; it gradually perished from among men, except as miraculously preserved among the Hebrews, and from them diffused through the medium of, or rather, in the form of, Christianity. It extends nowhere beyond the influence, direct or indirect, of the supernatural revelation contained in the Bible. This is a fact which scientific men should not overlook in their deductions.

¹ Lay Sermons, pp. 174, 175.

² Huxley's Lay Sermons, Addresses, etc., London, 1870, No. VIII. “The Scientific Aspects of Positivism,” p. 178.

3. Comte was guilty of the unfairness of confining his survey to a small portion of the nations of the earth; and that the portion too which had been brought under the influence of Christianity. If the law which he sought to establish be universal and necessary, it must have operated from the beginning in India and China as well as in Europe. The millions of those regions have not reached the monotheistic, much less the metaphysical, and still less the positive stage of development. India especially furnishes a striking refutation of this theory. The Hindus are a highly intellectual race. Their language and literature are on a par with those of Greeco and Rome. Their philosophers, nearly three thousand years ago, anticipated the highest results reached by the Schellings and Hegels of our day. Yet of all the nations of the earth the Hindus are the least materialistic, or positive, in their views of nature. With them the supernatural or spiritual is alone real. The Hindus, therefore, cannot be subject to that universal and necessary law of development which is assumed as the foundation of the Positive Philosophy.

4. It is of course presumptuous and idle to attempt to reason men out of their senses, or to convince them that what their very nature teaches them is true, is utterly false and untrustworthy. This, however, Comte not only attempts, but his whole system is founded on the assumption that our nature is a delusion and a lie. That is, it is founded on the assumption that intuitive truths are false. It is intuitively true that we are free agents. This Comte denies. It is intuitively true that there is a specific and essential difference between right and wrong. This is denied. It is intuitively true that every effect has an efficient cause. This too is denied. It is intuitively true that there is a God to whom men are responsible for their character and conduct. This also is denied. Had all the intellect and all the knowledge ever possessed by men and angels been concentrated in the person of Comte, it had still been folly in him to attempt to found a system involving the denial of such truths as these. The Christian is not afraid to say one thing more. It is intuitively true, to all who have eyes to see, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and that his gospel is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation, and that it is absolutely impossible that any theory which is opposed to these divine intuitions can be true.

Another illustration of the presumptuous character of this philosophy is found in what it teaches concerning Sociology. Scientific men of all countries have long been laboriously engaged in making meteorological observations, and yet such are the number and complexity of the causes which determine the state of the weather, that no man is able to predict how the wind will blow forty-eight hours, much less, a year, in advance. The causes which determine human action in the individual and in society, are far more complex and inscrutable than those which determine the state of the weather. Yet Comte assumes to have reduced Sociology to a science, vying with mathematics in certainty. "I will venture to say," is his confident assertion, "that Sociological science, though only established by this book, already rivals mathematical science itself, not in precision and fecundity, but in positivity and rationality."¹

Practical Applications of Positivism.

The practical applications of this philosophy are very serious. Positivism claims the right of absolute and universal control over all human affairs; over education, politics, social organization, and religion. As the progress of science has banished all liberty of opinion or of action from the departments of mathematics and astronomy, so it must banish it from every other department of human thought and activity. Speaking of liberty of conscience, Comte says: "Negative as we now see this dogma to be, signifying release from old authority, while waiting for the necessity of positive science, the absolute character supposed to reside in it gave it energy to fulfil its revolutionary destination. . . . This dogma can never be an organic principle; and, moreover, it constitutes an obstacle to reorganization, now that its activity is no longer absorbed by the demolition of the old political order. . . . Can it be supposed," he asks, "that the most important and the most delicate conceptions, and those which by their complexity are accessible to only a small number of highly prepared understandings, are to be abandoned to the arbitrary and variable decisions of the least competent minds."¹ This argument is conclusive. If social life, the acts of men, are as much and as certainly determined by physical laws as material changes, those who have ascertained these laws are entitled to control all other men. As it would be preposterous to allow men to build our houses or navigate our ships who would not obey the laws of nature, so it would be absurd, on this hypothesis, to allow those ignorant of social laws to govern society. Comte avows his admiration, not of popish doctrine, but of the papal organization, which in the new order of things he proposes to continue. "Papal infallibility," he says,² "was a great intellectual and social advance." Prof. Huxley pithily characterizes Positivism, in this regard, as "Catholicism minus Christianity."

¹ Philosophie Positive, vol. ii. p. 516.

Religion is not excepted from this absolute subjection. The Positive Philosophy, as it denies the existence of the soul and the being of God, would seem to leave no place for religion. Comte placed on the title-page of his "Discours sur l'Ensemble du Positivisme," the announcement that his design was to reorganize society "sans Dieu ni Roi." Nevertheless, as men must have, as they always have had, some religion, a philosophy which aspired to absolute dominion over all the departments of human life, must make some provision for this universal, although imaginary, necessity of our nature. Comte, therefore, published a catechism of religious belief, and a ritual of religious worship. The object of worship was to be the aggregate of humanity formed by the absorption of the successive generations of men. Every great man has two forms of existence: one conscious before death; the other after death, unconscious, in the hearts and intellects of other men. The God of the Positive Philosophy is, therefore, the aggregate of the memories of great men. "Undoubtedly," says Huxley, "'Dien' disappeared, but the 'Noveau Grand-Être Suprême,' a gigantic fétich, turned out bran-new by M. Comte's own hands, reigned in his stead. 'Roi' also was not heard of; but in his place I found a minutely-defined social organization, which, if it ever came into practice, would exert a despotic authority such as no sultan has rivalled, and no Puritan presbytery in its palmy days could hope to excel. While, as for the 'culte systématique de l'humanité,' I, in my blindness, could not distinguish it from sheer Popery, with

¹ Philosophie Positive, vol. ii. pp. 14, 15.

² Ibid. vol. ii. p. 268.

M. Comte in the chair of St. Peter, and the names of most of the saints changed."¹

There are, however, to be two forms of worship, the one private, the other public. The special object of the former is woman, because she is the most perfect representative of humanity. As "Mother, she excites veneration; as wife, affection; and as daughter, kindness." To excite these sentiments, ideal woman is to be worshipped. Humanity, or the memory of great men, is the object for public worship, regarding which minute details are given. The new religion is to have ten sacraments, a peculiar architecture, and an extended hierarchy, under the control of one absolute High Priest. Such is the system which Comte was allowed to believe would supersede the gospel of Jesus Christ. It has already almost passed away. Among the advanced men of science in England there is scarcely one so poor as to do it reverence.²

E. Scientific Materialism.

Leading Principles.

The leading principles of the modern scientific form of Materialism are embraced, by some at least, who do not consider themselves Materialists. They, however, adopt the language of the system, and avow principles which, in their generally accepted meaning, constitute what in the history of human thought is known as Materialism.

The most important of these principles are the following, many of which, however, are not peculiar to the system.

1. Matter and force are inseparable. Wherever there is matter there is force, and wherever there is force there is matter. This proposition, at least in the first instance, is to be understood only of physical force.

¹ Lay Sermons, etc., p. 164.

² Professor Huxley says: "For these sixteen years, it has been a periodical source of irritation to me to find M. Comte put forward as a representative of scientific thought; and to observe that writers whose philosophy had its legitimate parent in Hume, or in themselves, were labelled 'Comtists,' or 'Positivists,' by public writers, even in spite of vehement protests to the contrary. It has cost Mr. Mill hard rubbings to get that label off; and I watch Mr. Spencer, as one regards a good man struggling with adversity, still engaged in eluding its adhesiveness, and ready to tear away skin and all, rather than let it stick. My own turn might come next; and, therefore, when an eminent prelate the other day gave currency and authority to the popular confusion, I took an opportunity of incidentally revindicating Hume's property in the so-called 'New Philosophy,' and at the same time of repudiating Comtism on my own behalf." — Ut supra, p. 165. The mistake complained of is a very natural one, as Comte and Hume have so much in common. Professor Huxley's quotation from Faust is in point here:—

"Ungefähr sagt das der Pfarrer auch Nur mit ein bisschen andern Worten."

2. All physical forces, such as light, heat, chemical affinities, electricity, magnetism, etc., etc., are convertible. Light may be converted into heat, and heat into light; either into electricity, and electricity into either; and so through the whole range. This is what is called the correlation of forces. Count Rumford, in a communication to the Royal Society of London, in 1798, satisfied that the heat generated in boring cannon could not be otherwise accounted for, advanced the doctrine that heat is a peculiar mode of motion. Since then the doctrine has been generalized, and it is now the commonly received opinion that all the physical forces are resolvable into motion. This generalization, however, is not accepted by all scientific men. They find it impossible to conceive how gravitation, which acts instantaneously at all distances, can be motion. It is simply a force which tends to produce motion.

3. This motion, however, is not of a fluid, or other, or any other imponderable substance peculiar to each particular kind of force. As sound consists in, or rather, is produced by the vibrations of the atmosphere, it was natural to assume that light was the undulation of one medium, heat of another, electricity of another. This theory is discarded. The motion intended is motion in the molecules of the matter affected. When iron is heated, nothing is added to it. There is no imponderable substance called caloric. All that occurs is, that the molecules of the iron are agitated in a particular way. If the iron be magnetized, it is only a different kind of motion imparted to its constituent atoms. So of all other kinds of force. When, however, light or heat is radiated from a distant object, the motion which constitutes these forces must be transmitted through some medium. For where there is motion, there must be something that moves. And, therefore, if heat be motion in the molecules of the sun, that heat could not reach us unless there was some material medium between us and the sun.

4. The physical forces are not only convertible one into any of the others, but they are quantitatively equivalent; that is, a given amount of heat will produce an amount of light or of electricity, or of any other force, which, if it could be utilized, would reproduce precisely that amount of heat. A cannon-ball, when it impinges on a target, produces heat enough to give it the velocity which it had at the moment of contact. A certain amount of light and heat derived from the sun is expended in the formation of a certain amount of wood or coal; that amount of wood or coal will furnish precisely the amount of light and heat which was expended in its production. Count Rumford experimented to determine the quan-

titive relation between motion and heat, and arrived at very nearly the same conclusion as that reached by Dr. Joule of Manchester, England, who found that one pound of matter, falling seven hundred and seventy-two feet, will produce heat enough to raise the temperature of a pound of water one degree of Fahrenheit. This is now received as the unit of force.

5. Force is indestructible. It is never increased or diminished. What is lost in one form is taken up in another. Forces are, therefore, indestructible, convertible, and inponderable agents. This correlation and conservation of forces is declared by Dr. Carpenter, the eminent physiologist, to be "now amongst the best established generalizations of physical science," and the greatest scientific triumph of the age; "thanks," as he says, "to the labors of Faraday, Grove, Joule, Thomson, and Tyndall, to say nothing of those of Helmholtz and other distinguished continental savans."¹

Correlation of the Physical and Vital Forces.

So long as this doctrine of the correlation of forces is confined to the department of physics, it is a purely scientific question, in which the theologian has no special interest. Unhappily it has not been thus confined. Dr. Carpenter, in the paper just quoted, says, "Every thoughtful physiologist must desire to see the same course of inquiry thoroughly pursued in regard to the phenomena of living bodies."² The first step in that direction, he adds, was taken by Dr. Mayer of Germany, in his remarkable treatise on "Organic Movement in its Relation to Material Changes."

There appear to be three forms of opinion among scientific men, of the "advanced" school, as to the relation between vital and physical forces. First, there are some, of whom Dr. Carpenter is one, who hold that the forces by which vital processes are carried on, are light, heat, electricity, and so forth, but that these are directed or controlled by a force of a different kind, called "a directing agency."

Dr. Carpenter's Theory.

Dr. Carpenter denies that there is any such thing as vitality, or vital force, or nisus formativus, or Bildungstrieb. Two germs may be selected between which neither the microscope nor chemical analysis can detect the slightest difference; yet one develops into a fish, another into a bird. Why is this? Dr. Carpenter answers because of a "directing agency" residing in the germ. His language is: "The prevalent opinion has until lately been, that this power is inherent in the germ; which has been supposed to derive from its parent not merely its material substance, but a nisus formativus, Bildungstrieb, or germ-force, in virtue of which it builds itself up into the likeness of its parent, and maintains itself in that likeness until the force is exhausted, and at the same time imparting a fraction of it to each of its progeny."¹ This opinion he rejects; but adds, "When we look carefully into the question, we find that what the germ really supplies, is not the force, but the directive agency; thus rather resembling the control exercised by the superintendent builder, who is charged with working out the design of the architect, than the bodily force of the workmen who labor under his guidance in the construction of the fabric."² The conclusion at which he arrives is "that the correlation between heat and the organizing force of plants is not less intimate than that which exists between heat and motion. The special attribute of the vegetable germ is its power of utilizing, after its own peculiar fashion, the heat which it receives, and of applying a constructive power to the building up of its fabric after its characteristic type."³

¹ See Correlation and Conservation of Forces. A collection of papers by distinguished scientific men. By Edward L. Youmans, M. D. New York, 1865, p. 405.

² Ibid. p. 405.

On this doctrine of Carpenter it may be remarked, (1.) That it seems to be self-contradictory. He denies to the germ a nisus formativus, or, Bildungstrieb, and attributes to it "a constructive power." What is the difference? The English phrase is a literal translation of the German word. (2.) He says that "heat and the organizing force of plants" are correlated, i. e., they are convertible one into the other and are quantitatively equivalent; and yet the relation between them is analogous to that between a superintending builder and the strength of the workmen. According to this, the physical strength of the hod-man is convertible into the intellect of the builder and is its quantitative equivalent. We do not see how this contradiction is to be avoided, unless he uses the phrases "constructive force," "organizing force," sometimes for the "directing agency" in the germ, and sometimes, for the physical forces which that agency controls. But if he distinguishes between the "directing agency" and "the organizing force," then there is no correlation between the physical force and "the vital activity of the germ."

¹ See Correlation and Conservation of Forces, p. 411.

² Ibid. p. 412.

³ Ibid. p. 119. Also, New Quarterly Journal of Science for 1864.

3. According not only to the common, but to the latest, opinion of physiologists, the germ supplies something more than "a directing agency" (which must itself be a force). It not only directs, but it effects, or produces changes. It is an operative force, acting not by, but against physical forces or chemical affinities; counter-acting them as long as it continues. As soon as the germ or plant or tissue dies, the physical forces obtain ascendancy and disintegration takes place. This Dr. Carpenter himself admits. The most marked characteristic, he says, which distinguishes "vital from every kind of physical activity," is, "the fact that a germ endowed with life, develops itself into an organism of a type resembling that of its parent; that this organism is the subject of incessant changes, which all tend, in the first place, to the evolution of its typical form; and subsequently to its maintenance in that form, notwithstanding the antagonism of chemical and physical agencies, which are continually tending to produce its disintegration; but that, as its term of existence is prolonged, its conservative power declines so as to become less and less able to resist these disintegrating forces, to which it finally succumbs, leaving the organism to be resolved by their agency into the components from which its materials were originally drawn."¹ This does not mean that chemical agencies have no part to act in the growth and development of plants and animals, but it certainly does mean that the vital force or life is an agency or power different from any kind of physical force. Life and physical force, therefore, are not identical. They are not correlated. The former is not a mere form of the latter.

One of the most eminent of living physiologists is Dr. John Marshall, and he, although far from belonging to the old school, distinctly takes the ground that there is a vital force which cannot be resolved into any of the physical forces operative in the external, inorganic world. He says:² "All the strictly physical processes within the body, whether chemical, mechanical, thermic, electric, or photic, are performed by modifications of the common force which produces similar phenomena in the inorganic world around us. There exists, however, in the living animal, as in the living vegetable organism, a special formative or organizing energy, evolving the perfect animal or plant from the primitive ovum or ovule, developing its various tissues and organs, and conserving them from the commencement to the termination of its individual existence. The influence of this force, moreover, extends from the parent to the offspring, generation after generation." This is the commonly received doctrine, that physical phenomena are to be referred to physical forces; vital phenomena to vital force; and mental phenomena to mind. The new doctrine, however, is that all phenomena are to be referred to physical forces, no other forces being either known or knowable.

¹ Youmans, p. 407.

² Outlines of Physiology, Smith's Philadelphia edition, 1868, p. 932.

The more advanced Opinions.

The second view adopted in reference to the relation of physical to vital force, is, that if there be any difference it cannot be known. Physical forces are known. They can be measured. They can not only be converted one into another, but can be proved to be quantitatively equivalent. If any other kind of force be assumed to account for vital phenomena, the assumption is gratuitous. It is taking for granted that something exists of which we know, and can know nothing. It must, therefore, lie beyond the sphere of science and is of no importance. Even Dr. Carpenter uses such language as this: "Another class of reasoners have cut the knot which they could not untie, by attributing all the actions of living bodies for which physics and chemistry cannot account, to a hypothetical 'vital principle'; a shadowy agency that does everything in its own way, but refuses to be made the subject of scientific examination; like the 'od-force,' or the 'spiritual power,' to which the lovers of the marvellous are so fond of attributing the mysterious movements of turning and tilting tables."¹ "If a man asks me," says Prof. Huxley, "what the politics of the inhabitants of the moon are, and I reply, that I do not know; that neither I, nor any one else, have any means of knowing; and that, under these circumstances, I decline to trouble myself about the subject at all, I do not think he has any right to call me a skeptic."² It is thus he banishes vitality from the sphere of science, because everything, except matter and its functions, belongs to the region of the unknown and the unknowable. Prof. Tyndall and Herbert Spencer take, at times, the same ground.

But, although such writers as Dr. Carpenter, in apparent contradiction to their own admissions, acknowledge the existence of "a directing agency" in the living germ, the majority of the writers of this school refuse to recognize any such agency or force as a scientific truth. The only difference between the second and third views on this general subject, above referred to, is, that according to the one, the assumption of vital as distinct from physical force, is regarded as gratuitous and unnecessary; according to the other, any such assumption is declared to be unphilosophical, and to be utterly discarded. The same writer sometimes takes one, and sometimes the other of these grounds.

¹ Youmans, p. 402.

² "Physical Basis of Life" in his Lay Sermons, p. 158.

The Argument for the Correlation of Physical and Vital Forces.

Thus Prof. Huxley, although a few years since a firm advocate of vital, as distinct from physical force, in his discourse on the "Physical Basis of Life," takes the opposite ground. The argument is this: the elements furnished by the mineral kingdom are taken up by the plant, and, under the influence of light and heat, transformed into organized matter. The products of vegetation, starch, sugar, fibrine, etc., are purely material. This is true even of protoplasm, or living matter, or the physical basis of life, as it is called, which is elaborated by the plant out of the lifeless materials furnished by the soil and the atmosphere. There is indeed a great difference between the products of vegetation and the lifeless elements out of which they are formed. But so there is between the elements of water and water itself. If an electric spark be passed through a volume of oxygen and hydrogen gas, it becomes water, which weighs precisely as much as the volume of the two gases of which it is composed. It is oxygen and hydrogen in combination, and nothing more. Yet the properties of the water are entirely different from those of the oxygen and hydrogen. In like manner there is a great difference between the properties of the carbonic acid, the water, and the ammonia, of which the plant is composed, and the living plant itself. But as it would be unphilosophical to assume the existence of an unknown something called aquosity to account for the difference between water and its elements, it is no less unphilosophical to assume the existence of an unknown something called vitality to account for the difference between it and the lifeless materials of which living matter is composed.

Animal Life.

In like manner all the phenomena of animal life are referred to the physical forces inseparable from the matter which composes the animal structure. It is true the functions of matter in the animal tissues are higher than in those of the plant. But the advocates of the theory under consideration, endeavor to reduce the difference between animal and vegetable life to a minimum. It is only the upper surface of the leaf which is susceptible of the peculiar effects of light. So it is only the optic nerve that is affected in a way which is necessary to vision. The sensitive plant contracts when touched; and so does the animal muscle when the proper stimulus, nervous or electric, is applied. In short, as all the operations of vegetable life are due to physical forces, so all the phenomena of animal life are due to the same causes.

On this subject Prof. Huxley says: "The matter of life is composed of ordinary matter, differing from it only in the manner in which its atoms are aggregated. It is built up of ordinary matter, and again resolved into ordinary matter when its work is done."¹ By protoplasm, or matter of life, he sometimes means matter which exhibits the phenomena of life; and sometimes, matter which having been elaborated by the plant or animal, is capable of supporting life. Hence he calls boiled mutton protoplasm.

The only difference between inorganic, lifeless matter, and living plants or animals, is in the manner in which their atoms are aggregated. "Carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, are all lifeless bodies. Of these, carbon and oxygen unite, in certain proportions, and under certain conditions, to give rise to carbonic acid; hydrogen and oxygen produce water; nitrogen and hydrogen give rise to ammonia. These new compounds, like the elementary bodies of which they are composed, are lifeless. But when they are brought together, under certain conditions they give rise to the still more complex body, protoplasm, and this protoplasm exhibits the phenomena of life. I see no break in this series of steps in molecular complication, and I am unable to understand why the language which is applicable to any one term of the series may not be used to any of the others. . . . When hydrogen and oxygen are mixed in a certain proportion, and an electric spark is passed through them, they disappear, and a quantity of water, equal in weight to the sum of their weights, appears in their place. There is not the slightest parity between the passive and active powers of the water and those of the oxygen and hydrogen which have given rise to it."² "What justification is there, then, for the assumption of the existence in the living matter of a something which has no representative, or correlative, in the not living matter which gave rise to it? What better philosophical status has 'vitality' than 'aquosity'? And why should 'vitality' hope for a better fate than the other 'itys' which have disappeared since Martinus Scriblerus accounted for the operation of the meat-jack by its inherent 'meat-roasting quality,' and scorned the materialism of those who explained the turning of the spit by a certain mechanism worked by the draught of the chimney? . . . If the properties of water may be properly said to result from the nature and disposition of its component molecules, I can find no intelligible ground for refusing to say that the properties of protoplasm result from the nature and disposition of its molecules."¹

¹ Lay Sermons, p. 144.

² Ibid. p. 149.

The doctrine, therefore, is, that carbonic acid, water, and ammonia, lifeless bodies, under certain conditions, become living matter, not in virtue of any new force or principle communicated to them, but solely in virtue of a different arrangement of their molecules. Of this living matter all plants and animals are composed, and to the properties or physical forces inherent in the matter of which they are composed, all the phenomena of vegetable and animal life are to be referred. "Protoplasm," says Prof. Huxley, "is the clay of the potter: which, bake it and paint it as he will, remains clay, separated by artifice and not by nature, from the commonest brick or sun-dried clod."² As the brick, no matter what its shape or color, can have no properties not inherent in the clay, so vegetable or animal organisms can have no properties which do not belong to protoplasm, which, in the last analysis, is nothing but carbonic acid, water, and ammonia.

Professor Huxley is not only a distinguished naturalist, but a popular lecturer and preacher of "Lay Sermons," and thus has become a representative man among the advocates of this new form of Materialism. He is, however, very far from standing alone. "Some of the most distinguished living physicists, chemists, and naturalists," says Dr. Beale, "have accepted this physical theory of life. They have taught that life is but a mode of ordinary force, and that the living thing differs from the non-living thing, not in quality, or essence, or kind, but merely in degree."³ "So long," says the same writer, "as the advocates of the physical doctrine of life contented themselves with ridiculing 'vitality' as a fiction and a myth, because it could not be made evident to the senses, measured or weighed, or proved scientifically to exist, their position was not easily assailed; but now when they assert dogmatically that vital force is only a form or mode of ordinary motion, they are bound to show that the assertion rests upon evidence, or it will be regarded by thoughtful men as one of a large number of fanciful hypotheses, advocated only by those who desire to swell the ranks of the teachers and expounders of dogmatic science, which, although pretentious and authoritative, must over be intolerant and unprogressive.”¹

¹ Lay Sermons, p. 151.

² Ibid. p. 142.

³ Protoplasm; or Life, Matter, and Mind, by Lionel S. Beale, M. B., F. R. S. Second edition, London, 1870, p. 3.

Mental Phenomena.

Not only are the operations of vegetable and animal life, according to the new doctrine, due to physical forces, but the same is true of all mental operations. If the argument from analogy is valid in the one case, it is valid in the other. If we must believe that the properties of protoplasm, or living matter, are to be referred to the mode in which its molecules are aggregated, because the properties of water are due to the peculiar aggregation of the atoms of which its elements, hydrogen and oxygen, are composed; then we must believe that all thought and feeling are due to the molecular composition and movements of the brain atoms. Accordingly, Professor Huxley, after saying that “vitality” has no better philosophical standing than “aquosity,” warns his readers that they cannot stop with that admission. “I bid you beware,” he says, “that in accepting these conclusions, you are placing your feet on the first rung of a ladder, which in most people’s estimation is the reverse of Jacob’s, and leads to the antipodes of heaven. It may seem a small thing to admit that the dull vital actions of a fungus or a foraminifer are the properties of their protoplasm, and are the direct results of the nature of the matter of which they are composed. But if, as I have endeavored to prove to you, their protoplasm is essentially identical with, and most readily converted into, that of any animal, I can discover no logical halting-place, between the admission that such is the case, and the further concession that all vital action may with equal propriety be said to be the result of the molecular forces of the protoplasm which displays it. And if so, it must be true, in the same sense and to the same extent, that the thoughts to which I am now giving utterance, and your thoughts regarding them, are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of our other vital phenomena.”² “Further,” he says, “I take it to be demonstrable that it is utterly impossible to prove that anything whatever may not be the effect of a material and necessary cause, and that human logic is equally incompetent to prove that any act is really spontaneous. A really spontaneous act is one which, by the assumption, has no cause [i. e. no material cause, for he admits no other]; and the attempt to prove such a negative as this is, on the face of the matter, absurd. And while it is thus a philosophical impossibility to demonstrate that any given phenomenon is not the effect of a material cause, any one who is acquainted with the history of science will admit that its progress has in all ages meant, and now more than ever means, the extension of the province of what we call matter and causation, and the concomitant gradual banishment from all regions of human thought of what we call spirit and spontaneity." ¹ "After all, what do we know of this terrible 'matter,' except as a name for the unknown and hypothetical cause of states of our own consciousness? And what do we know of that 'spirit' over whose threatened extinction by matter a great lamentation is arising, . . . except that it is also a name for an unknown and hypothetical cause or condition of states of consciousness? In other words, matter and spirit are but names for the imaginary substrata of groups of natural phenomena." ² "As surely as every future grows out of past and present, so will the physiology of the future gradually extend the realm of matter and law until it is co-extensive with knowledge, with feeling, and with action." ³ He cites the often-quoted exhortation of Hume, and enforces "the most wise advice" which it contains. "If we take in our hand," says Hume, "any volume of divinity or school-metaphysics, for instance; let us ask, does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or number? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact or existence? No. Commit it, then, to the flames; for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion." ⁴

¹ Protoplasm, p. 4.

² Lay Sermons, pp. 151, 152.

The history of human speculation does not furnish a more explicit avowal of Materialism than that contained in the above quotations. All known effects are ascribed to material causes. Spirit is declared to have only an imaginary existence. Spontaneity is pronounced an absurdity. Necessity is affirmed to be inexorable and universal. Yet Huxley says he is no Materialist. This in a sense is true. He is not a Materialist, because he believes in neither matter nor spirit. He avows himself a disciple of Hume, who taught that we know nothing but impressions and ideas. Substance, whether material or spiritual, efficiency, and God, are banished from the sphere of knowledge to that of "sophistry and illusion." He avows his fellowship with Herbert Spencer, the fundamental principle of whose "New Philosophy" is, that all we know, or can know, is, that force is and that it is persistent, while

¹ Lay Sermons, pp. 155, 156.

² Ibid. p. 157.

³ Ibid. p. 156.

⁴ Hume, Works, edit. Edinburgh, 1826, iv. p. 193.

force itself is absolutely inscrutable. This blots the soul and God out of existence, except as those words indicate an unknown force. But as he also holds that all forces are convertible, the distinction between material and mental forces, whether human or divine, is obliterated. He avails himself of the common assumption that his theory does not degrade spirit, but exalts matter. It is the verdict of history, however, as Julius Müller truly says, "That every attempt to spiritualize matter ends in materializing spirit." On this subject Spencer says: "Men who have not risen above that vulgar conception which unites with matter the contemptuous epithets 'gross' and 'brute,' may naturally feel dismay at the proposal to reduce the phenomena of life, of mind, and of society, to a level with those which they think so degraded. . . . The course proposed does not imply a degradation of the so-called higher, but an elevation of the so-called lower."¹ This at least is an avowal that the phenomena of life, mind, and society are to be referred to material or physical causes. This, indeed, he repeatedly asserts. After insisting on the transformation of physical forces into chemical, and these into vital, he adds, "Many will be alarmed by the assertion that the forces which we distinguish as mental, come within the same generalization. Yet there is no alternative but to make this concession."² . . . Any hesitation to admit that between the physical forces and the sensations there exists a correlation like that between the physical forces themselves, must disappear on remembering how the one correlation like the other, is not qualitative only, but quantitative."³ "Various classes of facts unite to prove that the law of metamorphosis, which holds among the physical forces, holds equally between them and the mental forces. . . . How this metamorphosis takes place — how a force existing as motion, light, or heat, can become a mode of consciousness," is mysterious; but he adds, it is not a greater mystery "than the transformations of physical forces into each other."⁴

Dr. Maudsley, a distinguished writer of the same school,⁵ says, "Few, if any, will now be found to deny that with each display of mental power there are correlative changes in the material substratum; that every phenomenon of mind is the result, as manifest energy, of some change, molecular, chemical, or vital, in the nervous elements of the brain." Again, he says,⁶ "With regard to the manifold phenomena of mind; by observation of them, and abstraction from the particular, we get the general conception, or

¹ First Principles, New York, 1869, p. 556.

² Ibid. p. 211.

³ Ibid. p. 212.

⁴ Ibid. p. 217.

⁵ Physiology and Pathology of Mind, Lond. 1868, p. 42.

⁶ Ibid. p. 43.

the essential idea of mind, an idea which has no more existence out of the mind, than any other abstract idea or general term. In virtue, however, of that powerful tendency in the human mind to make the reality conformable to the idea, a tendency which has been at the bottom of so much confusion in philosophy, this general conception has been converted into an objective entity, and allowed to tyrannize over the understanding. A metaphysical abstraction has been made into a spiritual entity and a complete barrier thereby interposed in the way of positive investigation."

The passages quoted above are a fair specimen of the kind of reasoning in which scientific men frequently indulge. In the first quotation, there are two clauses presented as equivalent, which are in fact essentially different; and substituting the one for the other is just a silent and subtle begging of the question. The first says that every mental act is attended by a molecular change in the brain. The other in effect says, the molecular change is the mental act. These two propositions are as different as day and night. The theory is that a certain kind of molecular motion in iron is heat; and a certain kind of molecular motion in the brain is thought. And all the proof, as far as the latter is concerned, is that the one attends the other. But the formation of an image on the retina attends sight, and yet does not prove that the image is our consciousness when we see.

Again, in the second passage, Dr. Maudsley says that "mind is an abstract idea," which has no existence outside "of the mind," i. e., outside of itself. An abstract idea has an abstract idea, which it makes into an objective entity. Men who deny the objective existence of mind, can no more think, speak, or write without recognizing its existence, than an idealist can act without recognizing the existence of the external world. Any theory which involves a denial of the laws of our nature is of necessity absurd.

The German Physicists.

As might be expected, the scientific men of the continent are more outspoken in their Materialism than those of England. A late German writer, Th. Otto Berger, Oberlehrer für Mathematik und Physik,¹ says: Materialism is the philosophy of the five senses, it admits nothing but on the testimony of sensation, and therefore denies the existence of the soul, of God, and of everything supersensuous. In its modern form, it teaches that as the material is alone true and real, it is uncreated and eternal. It always has been and always will be. It is indestructible, and, in its elements, unchangeable. Force is inseparable from matter. According to the theory no matter is without force, and no force is without matter. No force exists of itself; and, therefore, there is none to which the creation of matter is to be referred. The universe as it now is, is due to the gradual evolution of the two elements, matter and force; which evolution proceeds under the operation of fixed laws. The lower organisms are first formed; then the higher, until man appears. All life, whether animal, vegetable, or spiritual, is due to the working of physical and chemical forces in matter. As no power exists but in matter, there can be no divine Being with creative power nor any created human soul. Berger quotes Virchow as saying, "The scientific naturalist knows only bodies and the properties of bodies." All that is beyond them he pronounces "transcendental, and the transcendental is the chimerical." He also quotes B. C. Vogt, as saying, "We admit of no creator, either in the beginning, or in the course of the world's history; and regard the idea of a self-conscious, extramundane creator as ridiculous." Man, according to these writers, consists only of a material body; all mental acts and states are of the brain. When the body dies, the man ceases to exist. "The only immortality," says Moleschott, "is, that when the body is disintegrated, its ammonia, carbonic acid, and lime, serve to enrich the earth, and to nourish plants, which feed other generations of men."¹

¹ Evangelischer Glaube, römischer Irrglaube, und weltlicher Unglaube, Gotha, 1870.

F. Refutation.

As Materialism, in its modern form, in all that is essential to the theory, is the same that it was a thousand years ago, the old arguments against it are as available now as they ever were. Its fundamental affirmation is, that all the phenomena of the universe, physical, vital, and mental, are to be referred to unintelligent physical forces; and its fundamental negation is, that there is no such objective entity as mind or spirit. If, therefore, it can be shown that unintelligent force cannot account for all the phenomena of the universe; and that there is such an objective entity or substance, as mind, the theory is refuted. There are two methods of combatting any given theory. The one is the scientific, which calls in question the accuracy or the completeness of the data on which it is founded, or the validity of the inferences deduced from them. The other is the shorter and easier method of the reductio ad absurdum. The latter is just as legitimate and valid as the former. It is to be remembered that every theory includes two factors; facts and principles; or, facts and inferences drawn from them. The facts may be admitted, when the principles or inferences may be denied. Thus the facts on which Materialists insist may, for the most part at least, be acknowledged; while the sweeping inferences which they draw from them, in the eye of reason may not be worth a straw. All such inferences must be rejected whenever they conflict with any well-established truth, whether of intuition, experience, or of divine revelation.

¹ See Berger, i. iii. 5; part i. pp. 264 to 271.

Three general theories have been proposed to solve the great problem of the universe: the Materialistic, the Pantheistic, and the Theistic. According to the first all the phenomena of the universe are due to matter and its forces; according to the second, in its most rational form, all power, activity, and life, are the power, activity, and life of the one universal mind. The third, or Theistic theory, assumes the existence of an infinite, extramundane God, who created matter, endowed with forces, and finite minds gifted with intelligence and will; and that all the ordinary phenomena of the universe are proximately due to these physical and mental forces as constantly upheld and controlled by the omnipresent wisdom and power of God. It may be doubted whether any amount of argument can deepen the conviction that the Theistic solution of this great problem is the true one. It is seen to be true, because it is seen to be a solution. It satisfactorily accounts for all the facts of consciousness and observation. It satisfies the reason, the heart, and the conscience. It is in fact self-evidently true, in the sense that no man to whom it has been once proposed, can ever permanently shake off the conviction of its truth. The other theories are not solutions. They may account for some classes of facts, but not for others. Our present concern, however, is with Materialism.

Materialism contradicts the Facts of Consciousness.

1. The primary principle of all knowledge is the knowledge of self. This must be assumed. Unless we are we cannot know. This knowledge of self is a knowledge that we are something; a real existence; not merely a state or mode of something else; but that the self is a substance, a real, objective entity. It is, moreover, a knowledge not only that we are a substance, but also that we are an individual subsistence, which thinks, feels, and wills. Here, then, is mind, i. e., an individual, intelligent, voluntary agent, necessarily included in the first, and the most essential of all truths. If this be denied, then Hume is right, and we can know nothing. It is, moreover, included in this knowledge of the Self, that the body is not the Ego. Although the body is intimately, and even vitally united to the substance in which our personality resides, it is nevertheless objective to it. It is the organ which the Self uses, and by which it holds communion with the external world. That these are really facts of consciousness, and not merely dicta, or arbitrary assumptions, is clear because they are universally and of necessity recognized. They are imbedded in all human languages; they are involved in all expressions of human thought; they are of necessity assumed by those who theoretically deny them. The Materialist cannot think, or speak, or write, without assuming the existence of mind as distinct from matter, any more than the Idealist can live and act without assuming the existence of the external world.

Our knowledge of mind, therefore, as a thinking substance, is the first, and most certain, and the most indestructible of all forms of knowledge; because it is involved in self-knowledge, or self-consciousness, which is the indispensable condition of all knowledge. That which knows is, in the order of nature, before that which is known. It is impossible, therefore, that the Materialist can have any higher evidence of the existence of matter, or of force, than that which every man has, in his own consciousness, of the existence of mind. To deny the one is as unreasonable as to deny the other. Neither can be denied, except theoretically. As a matter of fact, every man believes in matter, and every man believes in mind. What are our sensations which are relied upon so confidently to give us knowledge of physical phenomena, but states of consciousness? If consciousness is to be trusted in reporting the testimony of the senses, why is it not to be trusted when it reports the facts of our interior life? If it is believed when it says there is something visible and tangible without us, why should it not be believed when it says there is something which thinks and wills within us? If unreliable in the one case, it is unreliable in the other; and if unreliable in either, the whole foundation of knowledge and of all faith is swept away. Confidence in the veracity of consciousness is our only security from the wildest, the most irrational, and the most degrading skepticism.

It may be said, however, that the Materialist does not deny that there is something within us that thinks and wills. He only says that that something is the brain. This, however, is to ignore one half of the testimony which consciousness really bears. It testifies not only that there are such sensations as those of sight and touch, but that there is a real objective substance which is tangible and visible. That is to say, we believe in virtue of the constitution of our nature, and therefore of necessity, when we see or touch, that the objects of our sense-perceptions have a real, objective existence. This every man believes, and cannot help believing. And in like manner, when he thinks, feels, or wills, he believes, in virtue of the constitution of his nature, and therefore by a like necessity, that he himself is an intelligent, feeling, and voluntary substance. That is, he believes that the Self is mind, or spirit, to which the body is objective, and therefore different from the Self. The belief in mind, therefore, is involved in the belief of self-existence. Consciousness gives us the assurance that the Self is an intelligent, voluntary agent, or spirit.

2. Another fact of consciousness which Materialism denies, either avowedly or by necessary implication, is the fact of free agency. This, indeed, is involved in what has already been said. Nevertheless there are those who admit the existence of mind who deny that man is a free agent. It needs no proof that consciousness attests that men have the power of self-determination. Every man knows this to be true with regard to himself. Every man recognizes the fact with regard to his fellow-men. This again is a conviction which no obduracy of the conscience, and no sophistry of argument can permanently obliterate from the human mind. This, however, Materialism denies. Physical forces act necessarily and uniformly. In referring all mental action to physical forces, Materialism cannot but exclude all freedom of action. There is no spontaneity in chemical affinity, in light, heat, or electricity; yet to these forces all vital and mental phenomena are referred. If thought be a certain kind of molecular motion of the brain, it is no more free than that other kind of molecular motion called heat. And this is the more obviously true, if they are correlative, the one being changed into the other. Accordingly Materialists, as a general thing, are avowed necessitarians. This is not only true of the Positivists, but the doctrine that human action is determined by necessary laws, is the foundation of their whole system of Social Science. And Professor Huxley, as we have seen, pronounces a spontaneous act, from the nature of the case, an absurdity. It is for him a causeless effect. Every man, therefore, who knows that he is a free agent, knows that Materialism cannot be true.

3. Materialism contradicts the facts of our moral and religious consciousness. Our moral perceptions are the clearest, the most certain, and the most authoritative of all of our cognitions. If a man is shut up to deny either the testimony of his senses or the truths of reason, on the one hand, or the testimony of his moral nature on the other, all experience shows that he will give up sense and reason, and bow to the authority of conscience. He cannot help it. No man can free himself from the sense of sin, or of accountability. These moral convictions involve in them, or, at least, necessitate the belief in a God to whom we must give an account. But Materialism, in banishing all mind in man, leaves nothing to be accountable; and in banishing all mind from the universe, leaves no Being to whom an account can be rendered. To substitute for an intelligent, extramundane, personal God, mere "inscrutable force," is a mockery, an insult. Our whole moral and religious nature declares any such theory to be false. It cannot be true unless our whole nature be a lie. And our nature cannot be a lie, unless, as Sir William Hamilton says, the whole universe be "a dream of a dream." To call upon men to worship gravitation, and sing hallelujahs to the whirlwind, is to call upon them to derationalize themselves. The attempt is as idle as it is foolish and wicked.

This argument from the facts of consciousness against Materialism, is met by the assertion that consciousness is not to be trusted. Dr. Mandsley devotes the greater part of the first chapter of his book on the "Physiology of the Mind," to the establishment of this point. He argues that self-consciousness is unreliable in the information which it does give, and incompetent to give any account of a large part of our mental activity. It gives no account of the mental phenomena of the infant, of the uncultivated adult, and of the insane; no account of the bodily conditions which underlie every mental manifestation; no account of the large field of unconscious mental action exhibited, not only in the unconscious assimilation of impressions, but in the registrations of ideas and of their associations, in their latent existence and influence when not active, and their recall into activity; and no account of the influence organically exerted on the brain by other organs of the body. That is, consciousness does not tell us all things, and sometimes tells us wrong. Cannot the same be said of the senses? Can they inform us of everything which goes on in the body? Do they not often deceive us? Are not the sensations of the delirious and the maniac altogether untrustworthy? Does it follow from this that our senses are never to be relied upon? What then becomes of the physical sciences, which are founded on the trustworthiness of the senses. The fact is that if the testimony of consciousness is not to be received as to our mental operations, it cannot be received as to our sensations. If we have no trustworthy evidence of the existence of mind, we have no valid evidence of the existence of matter; and there is no universe, no God. All is nothing.

Happily men cannot emancipate themselves from the laws of their nature. They cannot help believing the well-attested testimony of their senses, and they cannot help believing the testimony of consciousness as to their personal identity, and as to the real, objective existence of the soul as the subject of their thoughts, feelings, and volitions. As no man can refuse to believe that he has a body, so no man can refuse to believe that he has a soul, and that the two are distinct as the Self and the Not-Self.

Materialism contradicts the Truths of Reason.

1. It is intuitively true that every effect must have a cause. This does not mean merely that every effect must have an antecedent; or, as Hume says, that anything may be the cause of anything. Nor does it mean merely that every effect must have an efficient cause. But it means that the antecedent or cause of every effect must have that kind and degree of efficiency which will rationally account for the effect.

There are two general classes of effects with which we are familiar, and which are specifically different, and therefore must have specifically different causes. The one class consists of effects which do not, the other of those which do indicate design. In the latter we see evidence of a purpose, of foresight, of provision for the future, of adaptation, of choice, of spontaneity, as well as of power. In the former all these indications are absent. We see around us innumerable effects belonging to each of these classes. We see water constantly flowing from a higher to a lower level; vapor constantly ascending from the sea; heat producing expansion, cold contraction, water extinguishing fire, alkalis correcting acidity, etc., etc. On the other hand, the world is crowded with works of human intelligence; with statues, pictures, houses, ships, complicated machines for different purposes, with books, libraries, hospitals prepared for the wants of the sick, with institutions of learning, etc., etc. No man can help believing that these classes of effects are specifically different, nor can he help believing that they are due to causes specifically different. In other words, it is self-evident that an unintelligent cause cannot produce an intelligent effect; it cannot purpose, foresee, organize, or choose. Professor Joule may determine through what space a weight must fall to produce a given amount of heat; but can he tell how far it must fall to write a poem, or produce a Madonna? Such a cause has no tendency to produce such an effect. And to suppose it to operate from eternity, is only to multiply eternally, nothing by nothing, it is nothing still.

If every man recognizes the absurdity of referring all the works of human ingenuity and intellect to unintelligent, physical force, how much greater is the absurdity of referring to blind force the immeasurably more stupendous, complicated, and ordered works of God, everywhere indicative of purpose, foresight, and choice. Of this absurdity Materialism is guilty. It teaches, in its modern form, that to carbonic acid, water, and ammonia, with the molecular forces they contain, is the causal efficiency to which all organisms from the fungus to man, and all vital and mental phenomena, are to be referred. This is the doctrine elaborately proposed and defended in Professor Huxley's paper on the "Physical Basis of Life." That paper is devoted to establishing two propositions. The first is, "That all animal and vegetable organisms are essentially alike in power, in form, and in substance; and the second, That all vital and intellectual functions are the properties of the molecular dispositions and changes of the material basis (protoplasm) of which the various animals and vegetables consist."¹ He even intimates, after referring to a clock which marks the time, and the phases of the moon, as an illustration of the vital and intellectual phenomena of the universe, as produced by molecular motions and combinations, "that the existing world lay potentially in the cosmic vapor; and that a sufficient intelligence could, from a knowledge of the properties of the molecules of that vapor, have predicted, say the state of the Fauna of Britain in 1869, with as much certainty as one can say what will happen to the vapor of the breath in a cold winter's day."² On this it is obvious to remark, in the first place, that it is not one whit in advance of the theory of Epicurus propounded more than two thousand years ago. As the whole mass of thinking men have turned their backs on that theory from that day to this, it is not probable that the reassertion of it, however confidently made, will have much effect upon

¹ As regards Protoplasm in relation to Professor Huxley's Essay on the Physical Basis of Life, by James Hutchison Stirling, F. R. C. S., LL. D. Edit. New Haven, p. 15.

² See Life, Matter, and Mind, by Lionel S. Beale, M. B., F. R. S., London, 1870, p. 17. Dr. Beale quotes from a paper by Professor Huxley in the first number of the Academy, p. 13.

men who have either heads or hearts. In the second place, it gives no rational account of the origin of the universe, and of the wonders which it contains. It violates the fundamental intuitive truth that every effect must have an adequate cause, inasmuch as it refers intelligent effects to unintelligent causes; all the libraries in the world, for example, to "the properties of the molecules," of carbonic acid, water, and ammonia.

2. A second truth of Reason which Materialism contradicts is that an infinite succession of effects is as unthinkable as a self-supporting chain of an infinite number of links. The modern doctrine is that lifeless matter never becomes living except when brought into contact with previous living matter. It is the office of the living plant to take up the dead elements of the organic world and imbue them with life. The plant, therefore, must either precede protoplasm, which is impossible, as it is composed of protoplasm; or the protoplasm must precede the plant, which is equally impossible, because the plant alone, in the first instance, can make protoplasm; or there must be an infinite succession. That is, an infinite number of causeless effects, which is no less impossible. The doctrine of spontaneous generation, or of life originating out of dead matter, is repudiated by the most advanced advocates of the modern form of Materialism. Professor Huxley has done the cause of truth good service by his able refutation of that doctrine.¹ Whatever may be the ultimate decision of the question as to the origin of life, it is enough for the present that the modern advocates of Materialism admit that living matter can only come from matter already alive. This admission, it is now urged, is fatal to their theory, as it necessitates the assumption of an eternal effect. If dead matter can only be made alive by previous living matter, there must be a source of life outside of matter, or life never could have begun.

Materialism inconsistent with the Facts of Experience.

It is generally admitted that in nature, i. e., in the external world, there are four distinct spheres, or, as they are sometimes called, planes of existence. First, the common chemical compounds, which constitute the mineral kingdom; second, the vegetable kingdom; third, the irrational animal world; and fourth, Man. It is admitted that all the resources of science are incompetent to raise matter from one of these planes to another. The plant contains ingredients derived from the mineral kingdom, with something specifically different. The animal contains all that is in the plant, with something specifically different. Man contains all that enters into the constitution of the plant and animal, with something specifically different. The lifeless elements of the mineral kingdom, under "the influence of preëxistent living matter," and not otherwise, become living and life-supporting matter in the plant. The products of vegetable life, in like manner, become the matter of animal tissues and organs, but only under the influence of preëxisting living animal tissues. So, also, the products of the vegetable and animal kingdoms are received into the human system, and become connected with the functions and phenomena of the intellectual and moral life of man, but never otherwise than in the person of a man. This outstanding fact, vouched for by the whole history of our globe, proves that there is something in the plant which is not in lifeless matter; something in the animal which is not in the plant, and something in man which is not in the animal. To assume, with the Materialist, that the organizing life of the plant comes out of lifeless matter; that the sensitive and voluntary life of the animal comes out of the insensible and involuntary life of the plant; or that the rational, moral, and spiritual life of Man comes out of the constituents of the animal, is to assume as a fact something which all experience contradicts. We are not forgetful of the theories which refer these different grades or orders of existence to some process of natural development. We here, however, refer only to the outstanding fact of history, that, in the sphere of human experience, lifeless matter does not become organizing and living, in virtue of its own physical forces; nor the plant an animal; nor the animal a man from anything in the plant or animal, but only in virtue of an ab extra vital influence. It is indeed said that as the same chemical elements combined in one way, have certain properties; and when combined in another way, have other properties; so the same elements combined in one way in lifeless matter and in other ways, in plants, animals, and man, may account for all their distinctive characteristics. But it is to be remembered that the properties of chemical compounds, however varied, are chemical, and nothing more; whereas, in vital organisms the properties or phenomena are specifically different from mere chemical effects. They have no relation to each other, any more than gravity to beauty; and, therefore, the one cannot account for the other.

¹ See his Address as President of the British Association, reported in the London Athenæum, September 17th, 1870. The little that is necessary to say on the subject of spontaneous generation in such a work as this, is reserved until the question concerning the origin of man comes up for consideration.

Materialism is Atheistic.

Atheism is the denial of an extramundane personal God. In saying that Materialism is Atheism, it is not meant that all Materialists are atheists. Some, as for example, Dr. Priestley, confine the application of their principles to the existing order of things. They admit the being of God to whom they refer the creation of the world. The number, however, of such illogical Materialists is small. Leaving out of view these exceptional cases, the philosophers of this school may be divided into three classes, —

(1.) Avowed atheists. To this class belong the Epicureans; the French skeptics of the last century; the Positivists; and a large part of the physicists of the present generation, especially in Europe. (2.) Those who repudiate the charge of atheism, because they admit the necessary existence of an inscrutable force. But inscrutable force is not God. In rejecting the doctrine of an extramundane Spirit, self-conscious, intelligent, and voluntary, the First Cause of all things, they reject Theism; and the denial of Theism is Atheism. (3.) Those whose principles involve the denial of an extramundane God. To this class belong all those who deny the distinction between matter and mind; who deny the "supersensual," and "supernatural," who affirm that physical force is the only kind of force of which we have any knowledge; and who maintain that thought is in such a sense a product of the brain, that where there is no brain there can be no thought. Büchner, who although an avowed atheist, is, as to this point, a fair representative of the whole school, says that the fundamental principle (der oberste Grundsatz) of our philosophy is, "No matter without force; and no force without matter." "A spirit without a body," he adds, "is as unthinkable as electricity or magnetism without the matter of which they are affections."¹ This he makes the ground of his argument to prove the impossibility of the existence of the soul after death. The principle, if admitted, is equally conclusive against the existence of God. As Materialism leaves us no God to reverence and trust, no Being to whom we are responsible; and as it denies any conscious existence after death, it can be adopted only on the sacrifice of the higher attributes of our nature; and its whole tendency must be to demoralize and degrade.

The Correlation of Physical and Vital and Mental Forces.

Besides the considerations urged above against Materialism as a general theory, it may be proper to say a few words in reference to its modern scientific form. It is admitted that it is the province of scientific men to discuss scientific questions; and that much injury to the cause of truth has followed the attempts of men not devoted to such pursuits, undertaking to adjudicate in such cases. Physicists are wont to take high ground on this subject, and to warn off as intruders all metaphysicians and theologians, all who are devoted to the study of the supersensuous and the supernatural. They are not allowed to be heard on questions of science. The rule must work both ways. If metaphysicians and theologians must be silent on matters of science, then scientific men devoted to the study of the sensuous, are not entitled to be dictatorial in what regards the supersensuous. A man may be so habituated to deal with quantity and number, as to become incapable of appreciating beauty or moral truth. In like manner a man may be so devoted to the examination of what his senses reveal, as to come to believe that the sensible alone is true and real. The senses have their rights, and so have reason and conscience; and the votaries of sense are not entitled to claim the whole domain of knowledge as exclusively their own.

¹ Kraft und Stoff, Zehnte Auflage, Leipzig, 1869, p. 209.

While, therefore, it is conceded that it belongs specially to scientific men to deal with scientific subjects, yet other classes have some rights which are not to be denied. They have the right to judge for themselves on the validity of the arguments of scientific men; and they have the right to appeal from one scientific man to another, and from the few to the many. So far as the correlation of physical and vital forces is concerned, it is not only a new doctrine, but as yet is adopted only by "advanced thinkers," as they are called, and call themselves. Dr. H. B. Jones, F. R. S., one of the more modest advocates of the doctrine,¹ says, "We are only just entering upon the inquiry how far our ideas of conservation and correlation of energy can be extended to the biological sciences." And certain it is that the leading men of science, both in Europe and America, are firm believers in vital and mental forces, as distinct in kind, from all physical forces operative in the inorganic world.

The Arguments for such Correlation are Invalid.

The Argument from Analogy.

It has already been stated on the authority of the advocates of the theory, that their first and most important argument in its support is from analogy. The physical forces are all correlated; one is convertible into either of the others; all may be resolved into motion. This creates, as it is said, a strong presumption, that all force, whatever its phenomena, is essentially the same thing. If one kind of motion is heat, another electricity, another light, it is fair to infer that vitality is only another kind of motion, and thought and feeling another. As there is no reason for assuming a specific force for light, and another for heat, therefore it is unnecessary, and unphilosophical, to assume a specific kind of force to account for vital or mental phenomena. Prof. Barker of Yale College, says,¹ "To-day, as truly as seventy-five years ago when Humboldt wrote, the mysterious and awful phenomena of life, are commonly attributed to some controlling agent residing in the organism — to some independent presiding deity, holding it in absolute subjection." This presiding agent is called "vital fluid," "materia vitæ diffusa," "vital force." "All these names," he adds, "assume the existence of a material or immaterial something, more or less separable from the material body, and more or less identical with the mind or soul, which is the cause of the phenomena of living beings. But as science moved irresistibly onward, and it became evident that the forces of inorganic nature were neither deities nor imponderable fluids, separable from matter, but were simple affections of it, analogy demanded a like concession in behalf of vital force. From the notion that the effects of heat were due to an imponderable fluid called caloric, discovery passed to the conviction that heat was but a motion of material particles, and hence inseparable from matter; to a like assumption concerning vitality [namely, that it also is but a motion of material particles], it was now but a step. The more advanced thinkers in science of to-day, therefore, look upon the life of the living form as inseparable from its substance, and believe that the former is purely phenomenal, and only a manifestation of the latter. Denying the existence of a special vital force as such, they retain the term only to express the sum of the phenomena of living beings."

¹ Croonian Lectures, p. 66.

The argument from analogy is presented, as we have seen, in another form, by Huxley and others. The properties of water are very different from those of the hydrogen and oxygen of which it is composed. Yet no one supposes that those properties are due to anything else than the material composition of the water itself. So also the phenomena of living matter, and of the human brain, are very different from those of the elements which enter into their constitution; but this affords no presumption that there is any “vital force” or “mind” to account for this difference, any more than the peculiar properties of water justify the assumption of the existence of anything distinct from its material element. Vitality and mind, we are told, have no better philosophical status than aqueosity.

¹ Correlation of Vital and Physical Forces, p. 5.

Dr. Stirling¹ states the case thus: “If it is by its mere chemical and physical structure that water exhibits certain properties called aqueous, it is also by its mere chemical and physical structure that protoplasm exhibits certain properties called vital. All that is necessary in either case is, ‘under certain conditions,’ to bring the chemical constituents together. If water is a molecular complication, protoplasm is equally a molecular complication, and for the description of the one or the other, there is no change of language required. A new substance with new qualities results in precisely the same way here, as a new substance with new qualities there; and the derivative qualities are not more different from the primitive qualities in the one instance, than the derivative qualities are different from the primitive qualities in the other. Lastly, the modus operandi of preëxistent protoplasm is not more unintelligible than that of the electric spark. The conclusion is irresistible, then, that all protoplasm being reciprocally convertible, and consequently identical, the properties it displays, vitality and intellect included, are as much the result of molecular constitution, as those of water itself.” This analogy is two-fold; having reference to chemical composition on the one hand, and to the antecedent stimulus which determines it on the other. “As regards chemical composition, we are asked, by virtue of the analogy obtaining, to identify, as equally simple instances of it, protoplasm here and water there; and, as it regards the stimulus in question, we are asked to admit the action of the electric spark in the one case to be quite analogous to the action of preëxisting protoplasm in the other.”

In answer to this argument Dr. Stirling goes on to show that the analogy holds only as to chemical and physical properties. “One step farther and we see not only that protoplasm has, like water, a chemical and physical structure; but that, unlike water, it has also an organized or organic structure. Now this, on the part of protoplasm, is a possession in excess; and with relation to that excess there can be no grounds for analogy.” “Living pro-toplasm, namely, is identical with dead protoplasm," says Dr. Stirling, "only so far as its chemistry is concerned (if even so much as that); and it is quite evident, consequently, that difference between the two cannot depend on that in which they are identical—cannot depend on the chemistry. Life, then, is no affair of chemical and physical structure, and must find its explanation in something else. It is thus that, lifted high enough, the light of the analogy between water and protoplasm is seen to go out."¹ Water and its elements, hydrogen and oxygen, are as to the kind of power which they exhibit on a level. "But not so protoplasm, where, with preservation of the chemical and physical likeness there is the addition of the unlikeness of life, of organization, and of ideas. But the addition is a new world—a new and higher world, the world of a self-realizing thought, the world of an entelechy."² "There are certainly different states of water, as ice and steam; but the relation of the solid to the liquid, or of either to the vapor, surely offers no analogy to the relation of protoplasm dead to protoplasm alive. That relation is not an analogy but an antithesis, the antithesis of antitheses. In it, in fact, we are in the presence of the one incommunicable gulf—the gulf of all gulfs—that gulf which Mr. Huxley's protoplasm is as powerless to efface as any other material expedient that has ever been suggested since the eyes of men first looked into it—the mighty gulf between death and life."³

¹ As Regards Protoplasm in Relation to Professor Huxley's Essay on the Physical Basis of Life, by James Hutchison Stirling, F. R. C. S., LL. D. Edinburgh, Blackwood & Sons. Republished as one of the Yale University series, p. 39. This is considered to be the best refutation of the theory of the correlation of physical and vital force.

"The differences alluded to (they are, in order, organization and life, the objective idea—design, and the subjective idea—thought), it may be remarked, are admitted by those very Germans to whom protoplasm, name and thing, is due. They, the most advanced and innovating of them, directly avow that there is present in the cell 'an architectonic principle that has not yet been detected.' In pronouncing protoplasm capable of active or vital movements, they do by that refer, they admit also, to an immaterial force, and they ascribe the processes exhibited by protoplasm—in so many words—not to the molecules, but to organization and life."⁴

"Was it molecular powers that invented a respiration—that perforated the posterior ear to give a balance of air; that compensated the fenestra ovalis by a fenestra rotunda; that placed in the auricular sacs those otolithes, those express stones for hearing? Such machinery! The chordæ tendineæ are, to the valves of the heart, exactly adjusted check-strings; and the contractile columnæ carneæ are set in, under contraction and expansion, to equalize their length to their office. . . . Are we to conceive such machinery, such apparatus, such contrivances, merely molecular? Are molecules adequate to such things — molecules in their blind passivity, and dead, dull, insensibility? . . . Surely in the presence of these manifest ideas, it is impossible to attribute the single peculiar feature of protoplasm — its vitality, namely — to mere molecular chemistry. Protoplasm, it is true, breaks up into carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, as water does into hydrogen and oxygen; but the watch breaks similarly up into mere brass, and steel, and glass. The loose materials of the watch — even its chemical material if you will — replace its weight, quite as accurately as the constituents, carbon, etc., replace the weight of the protoplasm. But neither these nor those replace the vanished idea, which was alone the important element.”¹ There is, therefore, something in protoplasm which cannot be weighed or otherwise measured, and to which the vital phenomena are to be referred.

¹ As Regards Protoplasm, etc., pp. 41, 42. ² Ibid. p. 42. ³ Ibid. p. 42. ⁴ Ibid. p. 43.

If then the argument from analogy fails in its application to vital phenomena, there can be no pretence that it is valid in its application to the phenomena of mind. If we refuse to take the first step, even Professor Huxley cannot require us to take those which follow.

Further Arguments of the Materialists.

Besides the analogical argument, Materialists insist that there is direct evidence of the correlation of physical, with vital, and mental force. Let it be remembered what this means. Correlated forces are such as may be converted, the one into the other, and which are consequently in their nature identical. The thing, therefore, in this case, to be proved is that light, heat, etc., can be changed into life and thought, and that the latter are identical with the former, both classes being resolvable into motion of the molecules of matter.

The proof is substantially this. The animal body generates heat by the combustion of the carbon of the food which it receives, precisely as heat is produced by the combustion of carbon out of the body. And it has been experimentally proved that the quantity of heat produced in the body, is precisely the same, due allowances being made, as the same amount of carbon would produce if burnt out of the body. Vital heat, therefore, is identical with physical heat.

¹ As regards Protoplasm, etc., pp. 47, 48.

Again, muscular force is produced precisely in the same way as physical force. The potential energy of the fuel moves the steam-engine. Its work or power is measured and determined by the amount of power stored in the wood or coal consumed in its production. The source and measure of muscular power, are in like manner to be found in the food we eat. Its potential energy, derived from the sun as is the case with the potential energy of wood and coal, when liberated, produces its due amount, so much and no more, of muscular power. Muscular power, therefore, is as purely physical, produced in the same way, and measured by the same standard, as the power of the steam-engine.

In like manner, "nervous energy, or that form of force, which, on the one hand, stimulates a muscle to contract, and on the other, appears in forms called mental," is merely physical. It comes from the food we eat. It moves. The rate of its motion is determined to be ninety-seven feet in a second. Its effects are analogous to those of electricity. It is, therefore, for these and similar reasons, inferred that "nerve-force is a transmutated potential energy." This is no less true of nerve-force when manifested in the form of thought and feeling. Every external manifestation of thought-force, argues Professor Huxley, is a muscular one, and therefore analogous to other forces producing similar effects. Besides, it has been proved that every exercise of thought or feeling is attended by an evolution of heat, which shows that thought is resolved into heat. "Can we longer doubt, then, that the brain, too, is a machine for the conversion of energy? Can we longer refuse to believe that even thought is, in some mysterious way, correlated to the other natural forces? and this, even in face of the fact that it has never yet been measured?"¹

To unscientific men of ordinary intelligence, to men not devoted to the study of the sensuous, it is a matter of astonishment that such arguments should be regarded as valid. Admitting all the above facts, what do they prove? Admitting that animal heat is the same in source and nature with heat outside the body; admitting that muscular power is physical in its nature and mode of production; admitting that nerve-force is also physical; what then? Do these facts give any solution of the mysteries of life, of organization, alimentation, or reproduction? Do they in any measure account for the formation of the eye or ear; for the mutual relations and interdependence of the organs of the body?

¹ See Professor Barker's Lecture, above referred to, for a summary of these arguments, page 24.

Admitting these forces to be physical; who or what uses them? What guides their operation so as to answer a preconceived design? Admitting muscular power to be physical, what calls it into exercise at one time and not at another; beginning, continuing, or suspending it, at pleasure? It is plain that the facts adduced, are no solution either of vital or of voluntary phenomena. And when we come to thought, admitting that mental action is attended by a development of heat, does that prove that thought and heat are identical? When ashamed we blush, when afraid we become pale; do these facts prove that shame and fear and their bodily effects are one and the same thing? Does concomitancy prove identity? In proving the former, do you establish the latter? Do the facts adduced prove that shame is heat and heat shame, and that the one may be converted into the other? All the world knows that sorrow produces tears; but no one infers from this coincidence that sorrow and salt water are identical. Even Professor Tyndall, one of "the advanced thinkers," tells the Materialists, that when they have proved everything they claim to prove, they have proved nothing. They leave the connection between mind and body precisely where it was before.¹

Direct Arguments against the Theory of the Correlation of Physical, and Vital, and Mental Forces.

1. They are heterogeneous. All physical forces are alike. They all tend to produce motion. They all tend to equilibrium. They are all measurable, by weight, or velocity, or by their sensible effects. They are all unintelligent. They act by necessity, without choice, without reference to an end. In all these respects mental forces are directly the reverse. They do not produce motion, they only guide and control it. They resist a state of equilibrium. They counteract physical force. As soon as vitality is gone, the chemical forces come into play and the plant or animal decays. They cannot be measured. Forces which do not admit of measurement, do not admit of correlation, for correlation involves sameness in quantity. "Thought," says President Barnard, "cannot be a physical force, because thought admits of no measure. I think it will be conceded without controversy that there is no form of material substance, and no known force of a physical nature (and there are no other forces), of which we cannot in some form definitely express the quantity, by reference to some conventional measuring unit. . . . No such means of measuring mental action has been suggested. No such means can be conceived. . . . Now, I maintain that a thing which is unsusceptible of measure cannot be a quantity; and that a thing that is not even a quantity, cannot be a force."¹

¹ Athenæum for August 29, 1868, quoted in Hulsean Lectures for 1868; Appendix, Note A.

Again, vital and mental force act with intelligence, with forethought, with freedom, and with design. Wherever the intelligence may reside, it is perfectly evident that all vital operations are carried on in execution of a purpose. Heat and electricity can no more fashion an eye than brass and steel can make a watch, or pen and paper write a book. Intelligent force, therefore, differs in kind from unintelligent force. They are not only different, but contradictory; the affirmation of the one is the negation of the other.

Professor Joseph Henry.

Prof. Joseph Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute, is admitted to be one of the most eminent naturalists of the age; distinguished not only for the thoroughness of his researches, but for soundness of judgment, and for the rare gift of being able to appreciate different kinds of evidence. He admits the correlation of physical forces, but protests against the obliteration of the distinction between them and vitality and mind. "The body," he says, "has been called 'the house we live in,' but it may be more truly denominated the machine we employ, which, furnished with power, and all the appliances for its use, enables us to execute the intentions of our intelligence, to gratify our moral natures, and to commune with our fellow beings. This view of the nature of the body is the furthest removed possible from Materialism; it requires a separate thinking principle. To illustrate this, let us suppose a locomotive engine equipped with steam, water, fuel, — in short, with the potential energy necessary to the exhibition of immense mechanical power; the whole remains in a state of dynamic equilibrium, without motion, or signs of life or intelligence. Let the engineer now open a valve which is so poised as to move with the slightest touch, and almost with a volition, to let on the power to the piston; the machine now awakes, as it were, into life. It rushes forward with tremendous power; it stops instantly, it returns again, it may be, at the command of the master of the train; in short, it exhibits signs of life and intelligence. Its power is now controlled by mind, — it has, as it were, a soul within it.”¹ This illustration holds just so far as it was intended to hold. The intellect which controls the engine is not in it, nor is it affected by its changes. Nevertheless, in the body, as well as in the engine, the controlling intellect is equally distinct from the physical force, which both so wonderfully exhibit.

¹ The Recent Progress of Science, with an Examination of the asserted identity of the Mental Powers with Physical Forces. An Address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science. August, 1868. By Frederick A. P. Barnard, S. T. D., LL. D., pp. 41, 42.

In more direct reference to vitality, Professor Henry says: “Vitality gives startling evidence of the immediate presence of a direct, divine, and spiritual essence, operating with the ordinary forces of nature, but being in itself entirely distinct from them. This view of the subject is absolutely necessary in carrying out the mechanical theory of the equivalency of heat and the correlation of the ordinary physical forces. Among the latter vitality has no place, and knows no subjection to the laws by which they are governed.”²

Dr. Beale.

Dr. Beale³ is equally explicit. He constantly insists that what acts voluntarily, with choice to accomplish an end, cannot be physical; and that in vital and mental operations there is unquestionable evidence of such voluntary action. He says, “I regard ‘vitality’ as a power of a peculiar kind, exhibiting no analogy whatever to any known forces. It cannot be a property of matter, because it is in all respects essentially different in its actions from all acknowledged properties of matter. The vital property belongs to a different category altogether.”⁴ He argues also to prove that organization cannot be referred to physical force. “It cannot be maintained that the atoms arrange themselves, and devise what positions each is to take up, — and it would be yet more extravagant to attribute to ordinary force or energy, atomic rule and directive agency. We might as well try to make ourselves believe that the laboratory fire made and lighted itself, that the chemical compounds put themselves into the crucible, and the solutions betook themselves to the beakers in the proper order, and in the exact proportions required to form certain definite compounds. But while all will agree that it is absurd to ignore the chemist in the laboratory, many insist upon ignoring the presence of anything representing the chemist in the living matter which they call the ‘cell-laboratory.’ In the one case the chemist works and guides, but in

¹ Paper in the Agricultural Report, 1854-1855, p. 413.

² Page 411.

³ Protoplasm; or Life, Matter, and Mind. By Lionel S. Beale, M. B., F. R. S. Second Edition. London, J. Churchill & Sons, 1870. Dr. Beale is an authority in the department of Physiology. His book, How to work with the Microscope, has reached a fourth edition.

⁴ Page 103.

the other, it is maintained, the lifeless molecules of matter are themselves the active agents in developing vital phenomena. . . . No one has proved, and no one can prove, that mind and life are in any way related to chemistry and mechanics. . . . Neither can it be said that life works with physical and chemical forces, for there is no evidence that this is so. On the other hand it is quite certain that life overcomes, in some very remarkable and unknown manner, the influence of physical forces and chemical affinities." ¹ On a former page he had said, "In order to convince people that the actions of living beings are not due to any mysterious vitality or vital force or power, but are in fact physical and chemical in their nature, Professor Huxley gives to matter which is alive, to matter which is dead, and to matter which is completely changed by roasting or boiling, the very same name. The matter of sheep and mutton and man and lobster and egg is the same, and, according to Huxley, one may be transubstantiated into the other. But how? By 'subtle influences,' and 'under sundry circumstances,' answers this authority. And all these things alive, or dead, or roasted, he tells us are made of protoplasm, and this protoplasm is the physical basis of life, or the basis of physical life. But can this discoverer of 'subtle influences' afford to sneer at the fiction of vitality? By calling things which differ from one another in many qualities by the same name, Huxley seems to think he can annihilate distinctions, enforce identity, and sweep away the difficulties which have impeded the progress of previous philosophers in their search after unity. Plants, and worms, and men are all protoplasm, and protoplasm is albuminous matter, and albuminous matter consists of four elements, and these four elements possess certain properties, by which properties all differences between plants, and worms, and men, are to be accounted for. Although Huxley would probably admit that a worm was not a man, he would tell us that by 'subtle influences' the one thing might be easily converted into the other, and not by such nonsensical fictions as 'vitality,' which can neither be weighed, measured, nor conceived." ²

In the latter portion of his book Dr. Beale shows that the brain is not a gland to secrete thought as the liver does bile; nor is thought a function of the brain, nor the result of mechanical or chemical action; nor is the brain a voltaic battery giving shocks of thought, as Stuart Mill conjectures; but it is the organ of the mind, not for generating, but for expressing thought.

¹ Protoplasm, etc., pp. 116, 117.

² Ibid. p. 18.

Mr. Wallace.

To quote only one more authority, we refer to the eminent naturalist Wallace, the friend and associate of Darwin, and the zealous defender of his theory. "If," says he, "a material element, or a combination of a thousand material elements in a molecule, are alike unconscious, it is impossible for us to believe, that the mere addition of one, two, or a thousand other material elements to form a more complex molecule, could in any way tend to produce a self-conscious existence. To say that mind is a product or function of protoplasm, or of its molecular changes, is to use words to which we can attach no clear conception. You cannot have, in the whole, what does not exist in any of the parts; . . . either all matter is conscious, or consciousness is something distinct from matter; and in the latter case, its presence in material forms is a proof of the existence of conscious beings, outside of, and independent of, what we term matter."¹

Vital and Physical Forces not Convertible.

2. A second argument against the doctrine of the correlation of vital and physical forces is that in fact they are not convertible. Motion and heat are said to be correlated, because one can be changed into the other, measure for measure. But no one has ever changed death into life, dead matter into living matter. This Professor Huxley admits. If the simplest living cell once dies, all the science in the world cannot make it alive. What is dead can be made alive only by being taken up and assimilated by that which is still living. The life, therefore, is not due to the chemical properties of that which is dead. So far as chemistry is concerned, there is no known difference between protoplasm dead and protoplasm alive; and yet there is all the difference between them of life and death. That difference, therefore, is not chemical. Until scientific men can actually change heat and electricity into life, and go about raising the dead, men will be slow to believe that heat and life are identical; and until they can transmute physical force into intelligence and will, they cannot convert "thinkers" into Materialists.

3. Another argument against this theory is the inadequacy of the cause to the assumed effect. The doctrine is that the relation between correlated forces is quantitative; so much of the one will produce so much of the other. But we know that great mental agitation may be produced by the mere sight of certain objects, and that these mental states may call into action violent muscular force. According to the hypothesis, the impression on the nerves of sight or hearing is first transformed into mental force, and that again into muscular and molar energy. This, President Barnard, who presents this argument, pronounces to be absurd, "since it makes a small force equivalent to a large one."¹

¹ Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection. A series of Essays. By Alfred Russel Wallace, author of The Malay Archipelago, etc., etc. McMillan & Co., London, 1876, p. 365.

President Barnard further argues against this theory from the fact that the mental states produced by impressions on the senses are, at least in many cases, obviously due not to the physical impression, but to the idea therewith connected. If you insult a Frenchman in English, it produces no effect; if the insult be expressed in his own language, it rouses him to fury. The meaning of the words is not a physical force, and yet it is to the meaning the effect is due. Dr. Barnard says, "when it is demanded of us to pronounce as physicists that spiritual existence is an absurdity and religion a dream, it seems to me that no choice is left us but to proclaim our dissent, or to be understood by our silence to accept the doctrine as our own. When such is the alternative, for one I feel bound to speak, and to declare my conviction that as physicists we have nothing to do with mental philosophy; and that in endeavouring to reduce the phenomena of mind under the laws of matter, we wander beyond our depth, we establish nothing certain, we bring ridicule upon the name of positive science, and achieve but a single undeniable result, that of unsettling in the minds of multitudes convictions which form the basis of their chief happiness."²

4. Physicists cannot carry out their own theory. Even those least susceptible of the force of the supersensuous, are compelled to admit that there is more in mental and vital action than blind physical force can account for. Dr. Carpenter, as we have seen, assumes the presence of "a directive agency;" the Germans of an "architectonic principle" unknown, and uncorrelated, in living matter, to explain undeniable facts for which physical force furnishes no solution. Others, whose spiritual nature is not so entirely subjected to the sensible, break down entirely. Thus Professor Barker, of Yale College, after devoting his whole lecture to prove that vital force and even thought "are correlated to other natural forces" (i. e., identical with them), comes at the end to ask: "Is it only this? Is there not behind this material substance, a higher than molecular power in the thoughts which are immortalized in the poetry of a Milton or a Shakespeare, the art creations of a Michael Angelo or a Titian, the harmonies of a Mozart or a Beethoven? Is there really no immortal portion separable from this brain-tissue, though yet mysteriously united to it? In a word, does this curiously fashioned body inclose a soul, God-given, and to God returning? Here science veils her face, and bows in reverence before the Almighty. We have passed the boundaries by which physical science is inclosed. No crucible, no subtle magnetic needle can answer now our questions. No word but His who formed us can break the awful silence. In the presence of such a revelation science is dumb, and faith comes in joyfully to accept that higher truth which can never be the object of physical demonstration."¹

¹ Barnard's Address, p. 45.

² Ibid p. 49.

It thus appears, after all, that there is in man a soul; that the soul is not the body, nor a function of it; that it is the subject and agent of our thoughts, feelings, and volitions. But this is precisely the thing which the lecture is devoted to disproving. Thus Professor Barker's science gives up the ghost at the feet of his religion. It quenches its torch in the fountain of an order of truths higher than those which admit of "physical demonstration." The πρῶτον ψεῦδος of the whole theory is, that nothing is true which cannot be physically demonstrated; that is, which cannot be felt, weighed, or otherwise measured.

Wallace, the Naturalist.

A still more striking illustration of the insufficiency of materialistic principles is furnished by the distinguished naturalist, Alfred Russel Wallace, above quoted. After devoting his whole book to the defence of the doctrine of natural selection, which refers the origin of all species and genera of plants and animals to the blind operation of physical forces, he comes to the conclusion that there are no such forces; that all is "Mind." Matter has no existence. Matter is force, and force is mind; so that "the whole universe is not merely dependent on, but actually is the WILL of higher intelligences, or one Supreme Intelligence."² He holds that instead of admitting the existence of an unknown something called matter, and that mind is "another thing, either a product of this matter and its supposed inherent forces, or distinct from, and co-existent with it;" . . . it is a "far simpler and more consistent belief, that matter, as an entity distinct from force, does not exist; and that force is a product of MIND. Philosophy," he adds, "had long demonstrated our incapacity to prove the existence of matter, as usually conceived, while it admitted the demonstration to each of us of our own self-conscious, ideal existence. Science has now worked its way up to the same result, and this agreement between them should give us some confidence in their combined teaching."¹ Thus, by one step, the gulf between Materialism and idealistic pantheism is passed. This, at least, is a concession that physical forces cannot account for the phenomena of life and mind; and that is conceding that Materialism as a theory is false.

¹ Barker's Lecture, pp. 26, 27.

² Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection, p. 368.

The great mistake of Materialists is that they begin at the wrong end. They begin with blind, lifeless matter; and endeavor to deduce from it and its molecular changes, all the infinite marvels of organization, life, and intelligence which the universe exhibits. This is an attempt to make everything out of nothing. The human mind, in its normal state, always begins with God; who, as the Bible teaches us, is an Infinite Spirit, and therefore self-conscious, intelligent, and voluntary; the creator of all things; of matter with its properties, and of finite minds with their powers; and who controls all things by his ever present wisdom and might; so that all the intelligence indicated in unintelligent forces is only one form of the infinite intelligence of God. This is the solution of the problem of the universe given in the Scriptures; a solution which satisfies our whole nature, rational, moral, and religious.

All works on Psychology, and on the history of Philosophy, contain discussions on the principles of Materialism. Chapter iv. of Dr. Buchanan's able work, "Faith in God and Modern Atheism Compared," is devoted to the history and examination of that theory. See also chapter ii. of the Introduction to Professor Porter's elaborate work, "The Human Intellect." Professor Porter gives, on page 40, a copious account of the literature of the subject. In Herzog's "Real-Encyklopädie," article Materialismus, an account is given of the principal recent German works against the modern form of the doctrine.

Among the most important works on this subject, besides the writings of Comte and his English disciples, J. Stuart Mill, and H. G. Lewes, are Herbert Spencer's "First Principles of a New System of Philosophy," and his "Biology" in two volumes; Maudsley's "Physiology and Pathology of Mind;" Laycock (Professor in the University of Edinburgh), "Mind and Brain;" Huxley's "Discourse on the Physical Basis of Life;" his "Evidence of Man's Place in Nature;" and "Introduction to the Classification of Animals;" and his "Lay Sermons and Essays;" Professor Tyndall's "Essay on Heat;" "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces: A Series of Expositions, by Professor Grovo, Professor Helmholtz, Dr. Mayer, Dr. Faraday, Professor Liebig, and Dr. Carpenter; with an Introduction by Edward L. Youmans, M. D.;" Alexander Bain (Professor of Logic in the University of Aberdeen), "The Senses and the Intellect;" "The Emotions and the Will;" "Mental and Moral Science;" "Kraft und Stoff, von Ludwig Büchner, Zehnte Auflage. Leipzig, 1869." By the same author, "Die Stellung des Menschen in der Natur in Vergangenheit, Gegenwart und Zukunft. Oder Woher kommen wir? Wer sind wir? Wohin gehen wir? Leipzig, 1869." Also, "Sechs Vorlesungen über die Darwin'sche Theorie von der Verwandlung der Arten und die erste Entstehung der Organismenwelt. Leipzig, 1868."

¹ Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection, p. 389.

§ 5. Pantheism.

A. What Pantheism is.

If the etymology of the word Pantheism be allowed to determine its meaning, the answer to the question, What is Pantheism? is easy. The universe is God, and God is the universe. $\tau\acute{o} \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu \Theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota$. This is not only the signification of the word and the popular idea usually attached to it, but it is the formal definition often given of the term. Thus Wegscheider says, "Pantheismus [est] ca sententia, qua mundum non secretum a numine ac disparatum, sed ad ipsam Dei essentiam pertinere quidam opinati sunt."¹ This, however, is pronounced by the advocates of the doctrine to be a gross misrepresentation. The idea that the universe, as the aggregate of individual things, is God, is, they say, a form of thought, which the earliest philosophy of the East had surmounted. It might as well be said that the contents of a man's consciousness, at any one time, were the man himself; or that the waves of the ocean were the ocean itself. It is because so many Pantheists take the word in the sense above indicated, that they deny that they are Pantheists, and affirm their belief in the being of God. As the system which is properly designated Pantheism, does exclude the popular view of the subject, derived from the etymology of the word; and as it has been held in very different forms, it is not easy to give a concise and satisfactory answer to the question, What is Pantheism? The three principal forms in which the doctrine has been presented, are, (1.) That which ascribes to the Infinite and Universal Being, the attributes (to a certain extent at least) of both mind and matter, namely, thought and extension. (2.) That which ascribes to it only the attributes of matter, Materialistic Pantheism. (3.) That which ascribes to it only the attributes of spirit, Idealistic Pantheism.

¹ Institutiones Theologiae, fifth edit., Halle, 1826, p. 215.

General Principles of the System.

For the purpose of theological instruction it is sufficient to state what these several systems unite in denying, and what they substantially agree in affirming.

1. They deny all dualism in the universe. The essential distinction between matter and mind, between soul and body, between God and the world, between the Infinite and the Finite is repudiated. There is but one substance, but one real Being. Hence the doctrine is called Monism, or, the All One doctrine. "The idea," says Cousin,¹ "of the finite, of the infinite, and of their necessary connection as cause and effect, meet in every act of intelligence, nor is it possible to separate them from each other; though distinct, they are bound together, and constitute at once a triplicity and unity." "The first term (the infinite), though absolute, exists not absolutely in itself, but as an absolute cause which must pass into action, and manifest itself in the second (the finite). The finite cannot exist without the infinite, and the infinite can only be realized by developing itself in the finite."

All philosophy is founded, he says, on the ideas of "unity and multiplicity," "of substance and phenomenon." "Behold," he says, "all the propositions which we had enumerated reduced to a single one, as vast as reason and the possible, to the opposition of unity and plurality, of substance and phenomenon, of being and appearance, of identity and difference."² All men, he says, believe, "as it were, in a combination of phenomena which would cease to be at the moment in which the eternal substance should cease to sustain them; they believe, as it were, in the visible manifestation of a concealed principle which speaks to them under this cover, and which they adore in nature and in consciousness."³ "As God is made known only in so far as he is absolute cause, on this account, in my opinion, he cannot but produce, so that the creation ceases to be unintelligible, and God is no more without a world than a world without God.”¹ It is one of the most familiar aphorisms of the German philosophers, “Ohne Welt kein Gott; und ohne Gott keine Welt.”

¹ Psychology, by Henry, first edition, p. xviii.

² History of Philosophy, translated by Wight, N. Y. 1852, p. 78.

³ Ibid. p. 121.

Renan in his “Vie de Jésus,” understands by Pantheism, materialism, or the denial of a living God. This would exclude all the forms of the doctrines held by idealistic pantheists in all ages. Dr. Calderwood pronounces Sir William Hamilton’s doctrine of creation pantheistic, because it denies that the sum of existence can either be increased or diminished. Sir William Hamilton teaches that when we say God created the world out of nothing, we can only mean that “He evolves existence out of Himself.” Although all the forms of Pantheism are monistic, except Hylozoism, which is properly dualistic, yet the mere doctrine of the unity of substance does not constitute Pantheism. However objectionable the doctrine may be that everything that exists, even unorganized matter, is of the substance of God, it has been held by many Christian Theists. This does not necessarily involve the denial of the essential distinction between matter and mind.

2. However they differ as to the nature of the Infinite as such, whether it be matter or spirit; or that of which both thought and extension (potentially) can be predicated; or, whether it be thought itself, or force, or cause, or nothing, i. e., that of which nothing can be affirmed or denied; a simple unknown quantity; they all agree that it has no existence either before or out of the world. The world is, therefore, not only consubstantial, but co-eternal with God.

3. This of course precludes the idea of creation; except as an eternal and necessary process.

4. They deny that the Infinite and Absolute Being in itself has either intelligence, consciousness, or will. The Infinite comes into existence in the Finite. The whole life, consciousness, intelligence, and knowledge, at any time, of the former, is the life, consciousness, intelligence, and knowledge of the latter, i. e., of the world. “Omnes (mentes),” says Spinoza, “simul Dei æternum et infinitum intellectum constituunt.”² “God alone is, and out of Him is nothing.”³ “Seine Existenz als Wesen ist unser Denken von ihm; aber seine reale Existenz ist die Natur, zu welcher das einzelne Denkende als moment gehört.”⁴

¹ Psychology, fourth edition, N. Y. 1856, p. 447.

² Ethics, v. xl. schol., edit. Jena, 1803, p. 297.

³ Fichte, Von seligen Leben, p. 143, edit. Berlin, 1806.

⁴ Strauss, Dogmatik, i. p. 517.

5. Pantheism denies the personality of God. Personality as well as consciousness implies a distinction between the Self and the Not Self; and such distinction is a limitation inconsistent with the nature of the Infinite. God, therefore, is not a person who can say I, and who can be addressed as Thou. As He comes into existence, intelligence, and consciousness only in the world, He is a person only so far as He comprehends all personalities, and the consciousness of the sum of finite creatures constitutes the consciousness of God. "The true doctrine of Hegel on this subject," says Michelet,¹ "is not that God is a person as distinguished from other persons; neither is He simply the universal or absolute substance. He is the movement of the Absolute ever making itself subjective; and in the subjective first comes to objectivity or to true existence." "God," he adds, "according to Hegel, is the only true personal Being." "As God is eternal personality, so He eternally produces his other self, namely, Nature, in order to come to self-consciousness."

It follows of necessity from the doctrine, that God is the substance of which the universe is the phenomenon; that God has no existence but in the world; that the aggregate consciousness and life of the Finite is, for the time being, the whole consciousness and life of the Infinite; that the Infinite cannot be a person distinct from the world, to whom we can say, Thou. On this point Cousin says, "Take away my faculties, and the consciousness that attests them to me, and I am not for myself. It is the same with God; take away nature, and the soul, and every sign of God disappears."² What the soul would be without faculties and without consciousness, that is God without the universe. An unconscious God, without life, of whom nothing can be predicated but simple being, is not only not a person, but he is, for us, nothing.

6. Man is not an individual subsistence. He is but a moment in the life of God; a wave on the surface of the sea; a leaf which falls and is renewed year after year.

7. When the body, which makes the distinction of persons among men, perishes, personality ceases with it. There is no conscious existence for man after death. Schleiermacher, in his "Discourses," says, the piety in which he was nurtured in his youth, "remained with me when the God and immortality of my childhood disappeared from my doubting sight."³ On this avowal, Mr. Hunt, curate of St. Ives, Hunts, comments: "The 'God and immortality' of his childhood disappeared. The personal God whom the Moravians worshipped was exchanged for the impersonal Divinity of philosophy. Nor did this theology seem impious. No, it was the very essence of true religion." There is good reason to believe that with regard to the personal existence of the soul after death, Schleiermacher sacrificed his philosophy, as he certainly did in other points, to his religion. This, however, only the more clearly shows how inconsistent the pantheistic view of the nature of God is with the doctrine of conscious existence after death. The absorption of the soul in God, of the Finite into the Infinite, is the highest destiny that Pantheism can acknowledge for man.

¹ Geschichte der letzten Systeme der Philosophie in Deutschland, vol. ii. p. 647.

² Lectures on the True, the Beautiful, and the Good, trans. Wight, N. Y. 1854, p. 365.

³ Hunt's Essay on Pantheism, London, 1866, p. 312.

8. As man is only a mode of God's existence, his acts are the acts of God, and as the acts of God are necessary, it follows that there can be no freedom of the will in man. Spinoza says,¹ "Hinc sequitur mentem humanam partem esse infiniti intellectus Dei: ac proinde cum dicimus, mentem humanam hoc vel illud percipere, nihil aliud dicimus, quam quod Deus, non quatenus infinitus est, sed quatenus per naturam humanæ mentis explicatur, sive quatenus humanæ mentis essentiam constituit, hanc vel illam habeat ideam." "In mente nulla est absoluta sive libera voluntas. Mens certus et determinatus modus cogitandi est adeoque suarum actionum non potest esse causa libera."² "Eodem hoc modo demonstratur, in mente nullam dari facultatem absolutam intelligendi, cupiendi, amandi, etc."³

Consin says, "We are thus arrived then in the analysis of the me, by the way of psychology still, at a new aspect of ontology, at a substantial activity, anterior and superior to all phenomenal activity, which produces all the phenomena of activity, survives them all, and renews them all, immortal and inexhaustible, in the destruction of its temporary manifestations."⁴ Thus our activity is only a temporary manifestation of the activity of God. All our acts are his acts.⁵

Mr. Hunt, analyzing Spinoza's system, and using mainly his language on this point, says, "Spinoza ascribed to God a kind of freedom: a free necessity. But to created existences even this kind of freedom is denied. 'There is nothing contingent in the nature of beings; all things on the contrary are determined by the necessity of the Divine nature, to exist and to act, after a certain fashion.' 'Nature produced' is determined by 'nature produ-

¹ Ethics, part ii. prop. xi. coroll., vol. ii. p. 87, edit. Jena, 1803.

² Ibid. prop. xlviii. Demon. vol. ii. p. 121.

⁴ Elements of Psychology, translated by Henry, N. Y. 1856, p. 423.

⁵ Princeton Review, 1856, p. 368.

³ Ibid. Scholium.

cing. It does not act, it is acted upon. The soul of man is a Spiritual automaton. . . . There can be nothing arbitrary in the necessary developments of the Divine essence."¹

As Pantheism makes creation an eternal, necessary, and continuous evolution of the Infinite Being, all liberty of second causes is of necessity excluded. A distinction may be made between the necessity by which a stone falls to the ground, and the necessity by which a mind thinks; but the necessity is as absolute in the one case as in the other. Liberty in man is rational self-determination, that is, spontaneity determined by reason. But reason in man is impersonal, according to Pantheism. It is God as explicated in us. All the acts of the human mind are the acts of God as determined by the necessity of his nature. The same doctrine of fatalism is involved in the idea that history is merely the self-evolution of God. One idea, or phase of the Infinite Being, is exhibited by one age or nation, and a different one by another. But the whole is as much a necessary process of evolution as the growth of a plant.

Sir William Hamilton, therefore, says that Cousin destroys liberty by divorcing it from intelligence, and that his doctrine is inconsistent not only with Theism but with morality, which cannot be founded "on a liberty which at best only escapes necessity by taking refuge with chance."² And Morell, a enlogist of Cousin, says, that according to Cousin: "God is the ocean, we are but the waves; the ocean may be one individuality, and each wave another; but still they are essentially one and the same. We see not how Cousin's Theism can possibly be consistent with any idea of moral evil; neither do we see how, starting from such a dogma, he can ever vindicate and uphold his own theory of human liberty. On such Theistic principles, all sin must be simply defect, and all defect must be absolutely fatuitous."³

9. Pantheism in making man a mode of God's existence, and in denying all freedom of the will, and in teaching that all "phenomenal activity" is "a transient manifestation" of the activity of God, precludes the possibility of sin. This does not mean that there is in man no sentiment of approbation or disapprobation, no subjective difference between right and wrong. This would be as absurd as to say that there is no difference between pleasure and pain. But if God be at once God, nature, and humanity; if reason in us be God's reason; his intelligence our intelligence, his activity our activity; if God be the substance of which the world is the phenomenon ; if we are only moments in the life of God, then there can be nothing in us which is not in God. Evil is only limitation, or undeveloped good. One tree is larger and finer than another ; one mind is more vigorous than another ; one mode of action more pleasurable than another ; but all alike are modes of God's activity. Water is water, whether in the puddle or in the ocean ; and God is God, in Nero or St. John. Hegel says that sin is something unspeakably higher than the law-abiding motion of the planets, or the innocence of plants. That is, it is a higher manifestation of the life of God.

¹ Essay on Pantheism, p. 231.

² Hamilton's Discussions, p. 43.

³ History of Modern Philosophy, N. Y. 1848, p. 660.

Spinoza teaches that "sin is nothing positive. It exists for us but not for God. The same things which appear hateful in men are regarded with admiration in animals. . . . It follows then that sin, which only expresses an imperfection, cannot consist in anything which expresses a reality. We speak improperly, applying human language to what is above human language, when we say that we sin against God, or that men offend God."¹

It is the necessary consequence of the doctrine that God is the universal Being, that the more of being the more of God, and therefore the more of good. And consequently the less of being, the less of good. All limitation, therefore, is evil ; and evil is simply limitation of being. Spinoza² says, "Quo magis unusquisque — suum esse conservare conatur et potest, eo magis virtute præditus est ; contra quatenus unusquisque — suum esse conservare negligit, eatenus est impotens." In the demonstration of this proposition, he says, "Virtus est ipsa humana potentia,"³ making power and goodness identical. Professor Baur of Tübingen,⁴ says : "Evil is what is finite ; for the finite is negative ; the negation of the infinite."

It is only, as just said, another form of this doctrine that power, or strength, is in man the only good. This does not mean the strength to submit to injury ; the strength of self-sacrifice ; the strength to be humble and to resist evil passion ; but the power to carry out our own purposes in opposition to the will, interests, or happiness of others. That is, that might is right. The victor is always right, the vanquished is always wrong. This is only one manifestation of God, suppressing or superseding a less perfect manifestation. Spinoza's doctrine is, "To the pursuit of what is agreeable, and the hatred of the contrary, man is compelled by his nature, for 'every one desires or rejects by necessity, according to the laws of his nature, that which he judges good or bad.' To

¹ Hunt, p. 231.

² Ibid.

VOL. I.

³ Ethics, iv. prop. xx., vol. ii. p. 217, edit. Jena, 1803.

⁴ In the Tübingen Zeitschrift, 1834, Drittes Heft, p. 233.

follow this impulse is not only a necessity but it is the right and the duty of every man, and every one should be reckoned an enemy who wishes to hinder another in the gratification of the impulses of his nature. The measure of every one's right is his power. The best right is that of the strongest; and as the wise man has an absolute right to do all which reason dictates, or the right of living according to the laws of reason, so also the ignorant and foolish man has a right to live according to the laws of appetite."¹ A more immoral and demoralizing principle was never expressed in human language. To say that it is the duty of every man to seek his own gratification, to satisfy the impulses of his nature; that he is an enemy who attempts to hinder that gratification; that the only limit to such gratification is our power; that men have the right, if so inclined, to live according to the laws of appetite, is to say that there is no such thing as moral obligation; no such thing as right or wrong.

Cousin repeats ad nauseam the doctrine that might is right; that the strongest is always the best. "We usually see in success," he says, "only a triumph of force, . . . I hope I have shown that, inasmuch as there always must be a vanquished party, and inasmuch as the vanquished party is always that which ought to be vanquished, to accuse the vanquisher and to take part against victory, is to take part against humanity, and to complain of the progress of civilization. It is necessary to go further; it is necessary to prove that the vanquished party deserves to be vanquished; that the vanquishing party not only serves the cause of civilization, but that it is better, and more moral than the vanquished party." "Virtue and prosperity, misfortune and vice, are in necessary harmony." "Feebleness is a vice, and, therefore, it is always punished and beaten." "It is time," he says, "that philosophy of history put beneath its feet the declamations of philanthropy."² It must, of course, be true, if God is the life of the world, all power his power, every act his act, not only that there can be no sin, but that the most powerful are always morally (if that word has any meaning) the best; and that might is right. This is the theory on which hero worship is founded, not only among the heathen, but among Christians, so called, of our day.

10. Pantheism is self deification. If God comes to existence only in the world, and if everything that is, is a manifestation of God, it follows that (so far as this earth is concerned, and so far as pantheists allow or acknowledge) the soul of man is the highest form of the existence of God. As the souls of men differ very much one from another, one being much superior to others, the greater the man the more divine he is, i. e., the more does he represent God; the more of the divine essence does he reveal. The highest step of development is reached only by those who come to the consciousness of their identity with God. This is the precise doctrine of the Hindus, who teach that when a man is able to say, "I am Brahm," the moment of his absorption into the infinite Being has arrived. This is the ground on which the pantheistic philosophers rest their claim of preëminence; and the ground on which they concede the preëminence of Christ. He, more than any other man, saw into the depths of his own nature. He was able to say as no other man could say, "I and the Father are one." But the difference between Christ and other men is only one of degree. The human race is the incarnation of God, which is a process from eternity to eternity. "Mankind," says Strauss, "is the Godman; the key of a true Christology is, that the predicates which the Church gives to Christ, as an individual, belong to an idea, a generic whole."¹

¹ Hunt, p. 232.

² Cousin's History of Modern Philosophy, translated by Wight, New York, 1852, vol. i. pp. 186, 187, 189.

11. There is only one step further, and that is, the deification of evil. That step Pantheists do not hesitate to take; so far as evil exists it is as truly a manifestation of God as good. The wicked are only one form of the self-manifestation of God; sin is only one form of the activity of God. This dreadful doctrine is explicitly avowed.

Rosenkranz says,² "Die dritte Consequenz endlich ist die, dass Gott der Sohn auch als identisch gesetzt ist mit dem Subject, in welchem die religiöse Vorstellung den Ursprung des Bösen anschaut, mit dem Satan, Phosphoros, Lucifer. Diese Verschmelzung begründet sich darin, dass der Sohn innerhalb Gottes das Moment der Unterscheidung ist, in dem Unterschied aber die Möglichkeit der Entgegensetzung und Entzweiung angelegt ist. Der Sohn ist der selbstbewusste Gott." Such a sentence as the foregoing has never been written in English, and, we trust, never will be. The conclusion it avows, however, is unavoidable. If God be everything, and if there be a Satan, God must be Satan. Rosenkranz says, that the mind is horrified at such language, only because it does not recognize the intimate connection between good and evil; that evil is in good, and good in evil. Without evil there can be no good.

¹ Dogmatik, ii. p. 215.

² Encyclopædie, p. 51.

It is because of this deification of evil, that a recent German writer¹ said that this system should be called Pandiabolism instead of Pantheism. He, if we mistake not, is the author of the article in Hengstenberg's "Kirchen-Zeitung,"² in which it is said, "this is the true positive blasphemy of God — this veiled blasphemy — this diabolism of the deceitful angel of light — this speaking of reckless words, with which the man of sin sets himself in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. The Atheist cannot blaspheme with such power as this; his blasphemy is merely negative. He merely says: 'There is no God.' It is only out of Pantheism that a blasphemy can proceed, so wild, of such inspired mockery, so devoutly godless, so desperate in its love of the world, — a blasphemy so seductive, and so offensive that it may well call for the destruction of the world."

Pantheism, however, becomes all things to all men. To the pure it gives scope for a sentimental religious feeling which sees God in every thing and every thing in God. To the proud it is the source of intolerable arrogance and self-conceit. To the sensual it gives authority for every form of indulgence. The body being a mode of God's extension, according to Spinoza's theory, as the mind is a mode of the divine intelligence, the body has its divine rights as well as the soul. Even some of the most reputable of the Pantheistic school, do not hesitate to say in reference to the trammels of morality: "It is well that the rights of our sensual nature should, from time to time, be boldly asserted."³ This system, therefore, as even the moderate Tholuck says, "comes to the same result with the materialism of French encyclopedists, who mourned over mankind for having sacrificed the real pleasures of time for the imaginary pleasures of eternity, and the protracted enjoyments of life, for the momentary happiness of a peaceful death."

Pantheism, therefore, merges everything into God. The universe is the existence-form of God; that is, the universe is his existence. All reason is his reason; all activity is his activity; the consciousness of creatures, is all the consciousness God has of himself; good and evil, pain and pleasure, are phenomena of God; modes in which God reveals himself, the way in which He passes from Being into Existence. He is not, therefore, a person whom we can worship and in whom we can trust. He is only the substance of which the universe and all that it contains are the ever changing manifestation. Pantheism admits of no freedom, no responsibility, no conscious life after death. Cousin sums up the doctrine in this comprehensive paragraph: "The God of consciousness is not an abstract God, a solitary monarch exiled beyond the limits of creation, upon the desert throne of a silent eternity, and of an absolute existence which resembles even the negation of existence. He is a God at once true and real, at once substance and cause, always substance and always cause, being substance only in so far as He is cause, and cause only so far as He is substance, that is to say, being absolute cause, one and many, eternity and time, space and number, essence and life, indivisibility and totality, principle, end, and centre, at the summit of Being and at its lowest degree, infinite and finite together, triple, in a word, that is to say, at the same time God, nature, and humanity. In fact, if God be not everything, He is nothing."¹

¹ Leo, the historian, we believe.

² 1836, p. 575.

³ Bischer, quoted in Evangelische Kirchen-Zeitung, 1839, p. 31.

History of Pantheism.

Pantheism has proved itself to be the most persistent as well as the most wide-spread form of human thought relative to the origin and nature of the universe, and its relation to the Infinite Being, whose existence in some form seems to be a universal and necessary assumption. Pantheistic ideas underlie almost all the forms of religion which have existed in the world. Polytheism, which has been almost universal, has its origin in nature worship; and nature-worship rests on the assumption that Nature is God, or, the manifestation, or existence form of the infinite unknown. Of course it is only the briefest outline of the different forms of this portentous system of error, that can be given in these pages.

B. Brahminical Pantheism.

Ethnographically the Hindus belong to the same race as the Greeks, Romans, and other great European nations. In prehistoric periods one division of the great Aryan family spread itself westward over the territory which now constitutes Europe. Another division extended south and east and entered India, displacing almost entirely the original inhabitants of that large, diversified, and fertile region.

Long before Greece or Rome became cultivated communities, and when Europe was the home only of uncivilized barbarians, India was covered with rich and populous cities; the arts had reached the highest state of development; a literature and language which, in the judgment of scholars, rival those of Greece and Rome, had been produced, and systems of philosophy as profound, as subtle, and as diversified as the human mind ever elaborated, were already taught in her schools.

¹ Philosophical Fragments, Preface to First Edition. See History of Modern Philosophy, translated by Wight, N. Y. 1852, vol. i. pp. 112, 113.

The Hindus number nearly two hundred millions of souls. They are now, in the essential principles of their philosophy, their religion, and their social organization, what they were a thousand years before the birth of Christ. Never in the history of the world has a form of religious philosophy been so extensively embraced, so persistently adhered to, or so effective in moulding the character and determining the destiny of a people.

Few questions of the kind, therefore, are of deeper interest than what the true character of the Hindu religion actually is. The decision of that question is not free from difficulty; and it has, therefore, received very different answers. The difficulty in this case arises from various sources.

1. The religious books of the Hindus are not only written in Sanskrit, a language unintelligible, except to a small class of learned men, but they are exceedingly voluminous. The Vedas, the most ancient and authoritative, fill fourteen volumes folio. The Institutes of Menu, the Puranas, and the sacred poems, "Ramayana" and "Mahabhrata," are equally extensive. The former of these poems consists of a hundred thousand verses, and the latter of four hundred thousand, while the Æneid has only twelve thousand, and the Iliad twenty-four thousand. Sir William Jones said that the student of the Hindu literature and religion, found himself in the presence of infinity.

2. It is not only, however, the voluminousness of the authoritative sacred books, but the character of their contents, which creates the difficulty of getting a clear idea of the system which they teach. The Vedas consist mainly of hymns of various ages, interspersed with brief, obscure, philosophical or theological explanations and comments. The Puranas are filled with extravagant legends; which are to be interpreted historically, and which mythically, it is difficult to decide.

3. The spirit of exaggeration is so characteristic of the Hindu mind that statements meant to be understood literally shock the mind by their extravagance. Thus their books make the earth a circular plane one hundred and seventy millions of miles in diameter; they speak of mountains sixty miles high, and of periods of four thousand millions of millions of years.

The Religion of the Hindus not originally Monotheistic.

It is a common opinion that the Hindu religion was originally and for centuries monotheistic; that out of monotheism gradually rose the present complicated and monstrous polytheism, and that contemporaneously among the philosophical class, were developed the different forms of Pantheism. But this is contrary to well established facts, and is altogether unsatisfactory as a solution of the great problem of Hindu life.

It is indeed true, as we know from the Bible, that monotheism was the earliest form of religion among men. And it is also true in all probability that the Vedas, which are collections of ancient hymns, contain some which belong to the monotheistic period. Most of those, however, which appear to assume the existence of one God, are to be understood in a pantheistic and not in a theistic sense. These recognize one divine Being, but that one includes all the other forms of being. The history of religion shows that when monotheism failed among men because "they did not like to retain God in their knowledge," it was replaced by the worship of nature. This nature-worship assumed two forms. The different elements, as fire, air, and water, were personified, endowed with personal attributes and divine powers, giving rise to polytheism. Or nature as a whole was the object of worship, giving rise to Pantheism.

It is evident that among the highly intellectual Aryans who settled in India, between one and two thousand years before Christ, the pantheistic view had obtained the ascendancy, not as a philosophical theory merely, but as a religious doctrine. It became, and has continued until this day, the foundation of the religions, civil, and social life of the Hindu. It is this which gives it its paramount importance. It stands alone in history. In no other case, among no other people, has Pantheism become the controlling form of religious belief among the people, so as to determine their institutions and to mould their character. The Hindus, therefore, have an interest for Christians and for the religious philosopher which attaches to no other heathen nation. They show, and were doubtless intended to show, what are the legitimate effects of Pantheism. That doctrine has had dominant control for millenniums, over a highly cultivated and intelligent people, and in their character and state we see its proper fruits.

It was Pantheistic.

That the religion of the Hindus is fundamentally pantheistic, is evident —

1. From what their sacred writings teach of the Supreme Being. It is designated by a word in the neuter gender, Brahm. It is never addressed as a person. It is never worshipped. It has no attributes but such as may be predicated of space. It is said to be eternal, infinite, immutable. It is said to have continued for untold ages in the state of unintelligent, unconscious being. It comes to existence, to consciousness, and life, in the world. It unfolds itself through countless ages in all the forms of finite existence; and then by a like gradual process all things are resolved into unconscious being. The illustrations of the origin of the world commonly employed are sparks issuing from a burning mass; or, better, vapour rising from the ocean, condensing and falling back to the source whence it came. Being as such, or the Infinite, is, therefore, viewed in three aspects: as coming to existence, as developing itself in the world, as receiving everything back into the abyss of simple being. These different aspects are expressed by the words, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, to which our terms, Creator, Preserver, and Destroyer, answer very imperfectly.

We have here the constantly recurring pantheistic formula, Thesis, Analysis, Synthesis; Being, Development, Restoration. The Infinite, the Finite, and their Identity. The principal difference between the Brahminical system and the theories of the later pantheists, is that the latter make the universe co-eternal with God. The Infinite from eternity to eternity develops itself in the Finite. Whereas, according to the former, there was an inconceivably long period of repose antecedent to the process of development, and that process after millions of millions of ages, is to be followed by a like period of unconsciousness and rest.

Relation of Infinite Being to the World.

2. The relation of God to the world, or rather of the Infinite to the Finite, is the same in the Brahminical, as in other pantheistic systems. That relation has been already intimated. It is that of identity. The world is the existence-form of God. God is everything, good and evil; and everything is God. But in very different degrees. There is more of Being (i. e., of God) in a plant than in unorganized matter; more in an animal than in the plant; more in man than in either; more in one man, or race of men, than in another.

Relation of Pantheism to Polytheism.

3. The vast polytheistic system of the Hindus is founded on Pantheism and is its logical consequence. In the first place, as just remarked, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, commonly called the Hindu Trinity, are not persons, but personifications, or different aspects under which Infinite Being is to be regarded. In the second place, as the Infinite Being manifests itself in different degrees in different persons and things, anything extraordinary in nature, any remarkable man, is regarded as a special manifestation or embodiment of God. Hence the frequent avatars or incarnations of the Hindu mythology. In this way the gods may be, and have been indefinitely multiplied. Any person or thing, or quality, may be deified as a manifestation of infinite Being. In the third place, this accounts for the facts that the Hindu gods are regarded as destitute of moral excellence, and that even evil, as under the name of Kali, the goddess of cruelty and patroness of murderers, may be the special object of reverence. In the fourth place, no god, not even Brahma or Vishnu, is, according to the Hindu system, immortal. All gods and goddesses are at length to be merged in the abyss of infinite, unconscious Being.

Effect of Pantheism on Religion.

4. Pantheism, as it makes being, God, as it recognizes no attribute but power in the objects of worship, divorces morality from religion. It is not in the power of any system, however sincerely embraced, to reverse the laws of our nature. And, therefore, in despite of the prevalence of a doctrine which denies the possibility of either sin or virtue, and makes everything dependent on fate, or the power of arbitrary being, the people in various ways recognize the obligation of the moral law and the excellence of virtue. But this has nothing to do with their religion. The great object of all religious observances was final absorption in God; their proximate object was to propitiate some power by which the worshipper would be raised one or more steps toward the state in which that absorption is possible. On this point Professor Wilson says:¹ "Entire dependence upon Krishna, or any other favorite deity, not only obviates the necessity of virtue, but it sanctifies vice. Conduct is wholly immaterial. It matters not how atrocious a sinner a man may be, if he paints his face, his breast, his arms with certain sec-tarial marks ; or, which is better, if he brands his skin permanently with them with a hot iron stamp ; if he is constantly chanting hymns in honor of Vishnu, or, what is equally efficacious, if he spends hours in the simple reiteration of his name or names ; if he die with the word Hari, or Râma, or Krishna on his lips, and the thought of him in his mind, he may have lived a monster of iniquity, — he is certain of heaven.” “Certain of heaven,” is a Christian form of expression, and conveys an idea foreign to the Hindu mind. What such a worshipper hopes and expects is that when next born into this the world it may be in a higher state and so much the nearer his final absorption. As Professor Wilson is not only moderate, but almost apologetic in the account which he gives of the religion of the Hindus, the above quoted statement cannot be suspected of unfairness or exaggeration.

¹ Essays and Lectures chiefly on the Religion of the Hindus, vol. ii. p. 75; edit. London, 1862.

Character of the Hindu Worship.

The two leading characteristics of the Hindu worship are cruelty and indecency. And these are sufficiently accounted for by the Pantheism which underlies the whole system. Pantheism denies the distinction between virtue and vice ; it recognizes no attribute but power ; it deifies evil ; it “sanctifies vice ;” passion, sensual or malignant, is as much a mode of divine manifestation as the most heroic virtue. Indeed, there is no room for the idea of moral excellence. Hence the prescriptions of religion have reference almost exclusively to rites and ceremonies. The Brahmin when he rises must bathe in a certain way, stand in a certain posture, extend his fingers in a prescribed manner ; he must salute the rising sun, resting on one foot ; he must repeat certain words. When he eats, the dish must be placed according to rule ; he must make prescribed motions with his hands, and so on through the whole day. Every act is prescribed, everything is religious ; everything either defiles or purifies, ceremonially, but of moral defilement or purity there seems to be in their religion no recognition.

The Anthropology of the Hindus.

5. The anthropology of the Hindus proves the pantheistic character of their whole system. Man is only a part of God, a mode of his existence. He is compared to a portion of sea-water inclosed in a bottle and thrown into the ocean. The water in the bottle is the same in nature as that without. As soon as the bottle is broken the water within it is lost in the surrounding ocean. Another illustration of the destiny of the soul is that of a lump of salt thrown into the ocean, which immediately disappears. Its individuality is lost. This absorption of the soul is the highest beatification which Pantheism offers to its votaries. But this, in the case of the vast majority of men, can be attained only after a long process of transmigrations extending, it may be, through millions of years. If a man be faithful and punctilious in his religious observances, he comes into the world after death in a higher state. Thus, a Soudra may become a Brahmin. But if unfaithful, he will be born in a lower form, it may be, in that of a reptile. It is thus, by these alternations, that the wished for absorption in Brahm is ultimately attained. With regard to the sacred, or Brahminical caste, the process may be shorter. A Brahmin's life is divided, according to the Institutes of Menu, into four periods: childhood; student life; life as householder; and finally, the ascetic period. As soon as a Brahmin feels the approach of old age, he is directed to retire from the world; to live as a hermit; to subsist only on herbs; to deny himself all business and enjoyment, that by continued self-negation he may not only destroy the power of the body, and free himself from the influence of the things seen and temporal, but also lose the consciousness of his individuality, and be able at last to say, "I am Brahm," and then he is lost in the infinite.

The Hindu life is dominated by this doctrine of absorption in God after a long series of transmigrations, and by the division of the people into castes, which has in like manner its foundation in their theory of the relation of God to the world, or, of the Infinite to the Finite. The Brahminical, or sacred class, is a higher manifestation of God than the military class; the military, than the mercantile; the mercantile, than the servile. This is popularly expressed by saying that the first proceeds from the head, the second from the arms, the third from the body, and the fourth from the feet of Brahm. The member of one of the lower castes cannot pass into either of those above him, except that by merit (ritual observances) he may on his next birth into the world be advanced to a higher grade; and one of a higher caste, by neglect of the prescribed rule of living, may at his next birth find himself degraded into a lower caste, or even into a beast or a reptile. Hence the horror of losing caste, which places a man out of the line of advancement, and consigns him to an almost endless state of degradation.

The Effect of Pantheism on the Social Life of the Hindus.

6. The whole religious and social life of the Hindu is controlled by the radical principle that all things are God, or modes of his existence, and all destined to return to Him again. To a Hindu his individual existence is a burden. It is a fall from God. Hence to get back, to be lost in the Infinite, is the one great object of desire and effort. As this end is not to be attained by virtue, but by asceticism, by propitiation of the gods, their religion is simply a round of unmeaning ceremonies, or acts of self-denial, or self-torture. Their religion, therefore, tends to destroy all interest in the present life, which is regarded as a burden and degradation. It cuts the nerves of exertion. It presents no incentive to virtue. It promotes vice. It has all the effects of fatalism. The influence of the worship of deities without moral excellence, some of them monsters of iniquity; the belief that cruelty and obscenity are acceptable to these deities, and secure their favor, cannot be otherwise than debasing. The world, therefore, sees in India the practical working of Pantheism. The system has been in unrestricted operation, not as a philosophy, but as a practical religious belief, for thousands of years, and among a people belonging to the most favored of the various races of men, and the result is before our eyes.

"Greece and India," says Max Müller, "are, indeed, the two opposite poles in the historical development of the Aryan man. To the Greek, existence is full of life and reality; to the Hindu it is a dream, an illusion. . . . The Hindu enters this world as a stranger; all his thoughts are directed to another world; he takes no part even where he is driven to act; and when he sacrifices his life, it is but to be delivered from it. No wonder that a nation like the Indian cared so little for history; no wonder that social and political virtues were little cultivated, and the ideas of the useful and the beautiful scarcely known to them. With all this, however, they had what the Greek was as little capable of imagining as they were of realizing the elements of Grecian life. They shut their eyes to this world of outward seeming and activity, to open them full on the world of thought and rest. Their life was a yearning after eternity; their activity a struggle to return into that divine essence from which this life seemed to have severed them. Believing as they did in a divine and really existing eternal Being (τὸ ὅντως ὄν), they could not believe in the existence of this passing world. If the one existed, the other could only seem to exist; if they lived in the one, they could not live in the other. Their existence on earth was to them a problem, their eternal life a certainty. The highest object of their religion was to restore that bond by which their own self (âtman) was linked to the eternal Self (paramâtman); to recover that unity which had been clouded and obscured by the magical illusions of reality, by the so-called Mâyâ of creation."

¹ A History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, so far as it illustrates the Primitive Religion of the Brahmans, pp. 18, 19.

In order to show "How largely this idea of the Âtman, as the Divine Spirit, entered into the early religious and philosophical speculations of the Indians," he quotes from one of the Vedas a Dialogue in which, among other things, one of the speakers says: "Whosoever looks for this world, for the gods, for all beings, for this universe, elsewhere than in the Divine Spirit, should be abandoned by them all. This Brahmahood, this kshatra-power, this world, these gods, these beings, this universe, all is the Divine Spirit."¹ The illustrations used by the speaker to show the relation of the phenomenal universe to God, are derived from the sounds issuing from a drum or a lute, smoke rising from a fire, vapour from the sea. He adds, "It is with us, when we enter into the Divine Spirit, as if a lump of salt was thrown into the sea; it becomes dissolved into the water (from which it was produced), and is not to be taken out again. But wherever you take the water and taste it, it is salt. Thus is this great, endless, and boundless Being but one mass of knowledge. As the water becomes salt, and the salt becomes water again, thus has the Divine Spirit appeared from out the elements and disappears again into them. When we have passed away, there is no longer any name."²

There can therefore be no reasonable doubt that Pantheism lies at the foundation of all the religion of India. There is, indeed, the same difference between the present complex and corrupt polytheism of the Hindus and the teachings of the Vedas, that there is between the Roman Catholicism of our day and primitive Christianity. There is, however, this important distinction between the two cases. Popery is a perversion of Christianity by the introduction of incongruous elements derived from Jewish and heathen sources, whereas the religion of modern India is the legitimate and logical result of the principles of the earliest and purest of the Hindu sacred writings.

The most accessible sources of information on the literature and religion of India, are the writings of Sir William Jones ; the writings of Colebrooke ; the Journal of the Asiatic Society ; the works of Prof. Wilson of Oxford, specially his "Essays and Lectures on the Religion of the Hindus" ; Max Müller's work just quoted. Dr. Duff's "India and Indian Missions." The histories of India, by Macanlay, Elphinstone, etc.

¹ History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, etc., p. 23.

² Ibid. p. 24.

C. Grecian Pantheism.

The remark of Max Müller, that "Greece and India are the two opposite poles of the development of the Aryan man," is strikingly correct. The Greek believed in, and lived for the present and the visible ; the Indian believed in, and lived for the invisible and the future. Nevertheless there was a tendency in the higher minds among the Greeks to adopt the same speculative views as to God and the universe, the Infinite and the Finite, as prevailed in India. With the Greek, however, it was a matter of speculation ; with the Hindu, it was a practical religious belief.

Speaking in general terms, the different forms of Grecian philosophy are characterized by the effort to reduce all the forms of existence to unity ; to discover some one substance, principle, or power, to which all modes of manifestation of being could be referred. Sometimes this one substance was assumed to be material ; sometimes spiritual ; sometimes the obvious incompatibility between the phenomena of mind and those of matter, forced the admission of two eternal principles : the one active, the other passive ; the one spiritual, the other material. The fundamental principle or idea, therefore, of the Grecian philosophy was pantheistic, either in its materialistic, spiritualistic, or hylozoistic form.

The Ionic School.

The earliest school among the Greeks was the Ionic, represented by Thales the Milesian, Anaximander and Anaximenes also of Miletus, and Heraclitus of Ephesus. These philosophers flourished from about 600 to 500 B. C. They were all materialistic in their theories. With Thales the one primal universal substance was water ; with Anaximenes it was air ; with Heraclitus it was fire. "It was the endeavour of this oldest of the Ionic philosophies, to deduce the origin of all things from one simple radical cause, a cosmical substance, in itself unchangeable, but entering into the change of phenomena ; and this was why these philosophers had no room in their doctrine for gods, or transmundane beings, fashioning and ruling things at will; and, in fact, Aristotle also remarked of the old physiologists, that they had not distinguished the moving cause from matter."¹ Of Heraclitus, Dollinger, in his able work "The Gentile and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ," says he "meant by his 'fire,' an ethereal substance as primal matter, the all-pervading and animating soul of the universe; a matter which he conceived to be not merely actual fire, but caloric, and this being at the same time the only power at work in the world, all-creative and destructive in turns, was, to speak generally, the one real and veritable existence among all things. For everything had its origin only in the constant modification of this eternal and primal fire: the entire world was a fire dying out and rekindling itself in a fixed succession, while the other elements are but fire converted by condensation or rarefaction into a variety of forms. Thus the idea of a permanent being is a delusion; everything is in a state of perpetual flux, an eternal-going to be (Werden), and in this stream spirit is hurried along as well as body, swallowed up and born afresh. . . . Heraclitus, as any thorough-going Pantheist would, called the common soul of the world, the all-comprehending primal fire, Zeus; and the flux of perpetual change and tendency to be, into which it enters, he termed poetically Zeus playing by himself."²

Cousin says, "For the Ionic school in both its stages, there was no other God than nature. Pantheism is inherent in its system. What is Pantheism? It is the conception of the universe, τὸ πᾶν, as alone existing, as self-sufficient, and having its explanation in itself. All nascent philosophy is a philosophy of nature, and thus is inclined to Pantheism. The sensationalism of the Ionians of necessity took that form; and, to speak honestly, Pantheism is nothing but atheism."³

Cousin frames the definition of Pantheism so as to exclude his own system. With him the material universe alone is not God. He believes in "God, nature, and humanity." But these three are one. "If God," he says, "be not everything, He is nothing." This, however, is as truly Pantheism (although in a more philosophical form), as the Materialism of the Ionians.

The Eleatic School.

The Eleatic or Italian school, of which Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Zeno, are the principal representatives, was inclined to the other extreme of denying the very existence of matter. Of these philosophers, Cousin says, "They reduced everything to an existence absolute, which approached nearly to Nihilism, or the denial of all existence."¹ Of Xenophanes, born in Colophon 617 B. C., Dollinger² says, "With all his assertions of monotheistic sound, he was still a Pantheist, and, indeed, a material Pantheist, and is universally understood to be such by the ancients. Certainly there was present to his mind the idea of a being, one and spiritual, embracing the whole complement of existence and thought within himself; yet this being was in his view but the general nature-power; the unity of God was to him identical with the unity of the world, and this again but the manifestation of the invisible being, called God, and therefore also he explained it to be uncreate, everlasting, and imperishable." It is hard to see how this differs from the modern pantheistic doctrine, that God is the substance of which the world is the phenomenon; or why Xenophanes should be regarded as a materialist more than Schelling or Cousin.

¹ Dollinger, The Gentile and the Jew, translated by Darnell, London, 1862, vol. i. p. 250.

² Ibid. vol. i. p. 252.

³ Histoire Générale de la Philosophie, Paris, 1867, vol. i. p. 110.

Parmenides of Elea about 500 B. C. was more of an idealist. He attained to the idea of a pure and simple being in opposition to the material principle of the Ionic school. This "being," however, was not a "pure metaphysical idea, for," says Dollinger, "he so expressed himself as to seem to represent it at one time as corporeal, and extended in space, at another as thinking. 'To think, and the object of which the thought is, are one and the same,' was a saying of his. . . . There was no bridge for Parmenides that had led from this pure simple 'being' to the world of phenomena, of the manifold, and of motion; and therefore he denied the reality of all we see; the whole world of sense owed its existence only to the illusions of sense and the empty notions of mortal men built thereon."³ Thus Parmenides anticipated Schelling in teaching the identity of subject and object.

The Stoics.

The Stoics take their origin from Zeno of Cittium, in Cyprus (340–260 B. C.). Their doctrine has already been noticed under the head of Hylozoism. Dollinger, indeed, says, "The Stoic system is utter Materialism, built upon Heraclitic doctrine. It adopted corporeal causes only, and is only acquainted with two principles — matter, and an activity resident in matter, from eternity, as power, and giving it form. Everything real is body; there are no incorporeal things, as our abstractions, space, time, etc., have merely an existence in our thoughts; so all that really exists can only be known through the senses."¹ This judgment, however, is modified by what he says elsewhere. It is very plain that the later Stoics, especially among the Latins, as Seneca and Marcus Anrelinus, regarded the general principle which animated matter as having all the attributes of mind. On this point Dollinger says, "The two principles, matter and power, are to the Stoics but one and the same thing viewed in different relations. Matter required for its existence a principle of unity to give it form and keep it together; and this, the active element, is inconceivable without matter, as a subject in and on which it exists and dwells, and in which it works and moves. Thus, the positive element is matter; yet conceived without properties; the active one, running through and quickening all, is God in matter. But in truth, God and matter are identical; in other words, the Stoic doctrine is hylozoic Pantheism." "God is, therefore, the world-soul, and the world itself no aggregate of independent elements, but an organized, living being, whose complement and life is a single soul, or primal fire, exhibiting divers degrees of expansion and heat. . . . God, then, in his physical aspect, is the world-fire, or vital heat, all-penetrating, the one only cause of all life and all motion, and, at the same time, the necessity that rules in the world: but, on the other side, as the universal cause can only be a soul full of intelligence and wisdom, he is the world-intelligence, a blest being, and the author of the moral law, who is over occupied with the government of the world, although he is precisely this world itself."² "The one substance is God and nature together, of which all that comes into being, and ceases to be, all generation and dissolution, are mere modifications. Seneca explains Zeus or God's being at once the world and the world's soul by pointing to man, who feels himself to be a single being and yet again as one consisting of two substances, body and soul."³

¹ Histoire Generale de la Philosophie, Paris, 1867, vol. i. p. 116.

² The Gentile and the Jew, vol. i. p. 260.

³ Ibid. vol. i. p. 261.

The Stoics adopted the Hindu doctrine of the dissolution of all things, and the redevelopment of God in the world, after long successive periods. "In the great conflagration which takes place after the expiration of a world period or great year," all organized beings will be destroyed, all multiplicity and difference be lost in God's unity; which means, all will become ether again. But forthwith, like the phoenix recovering life from his own ashes, the formation of the world begins afresh; God transforms himself once more by a general renovation into a world, in which the same events, under similar circumstances, are again to be repeated down to the minutest detail. Many of these great catastrophes have already happened, and the process of burning by fire will follow again upon this regeneration, and so on ad infinitum.¹

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, vol. I. p. 349.

² Ibid. pp. 349-350.

³ Ibid. p. 350.

This system as well as every other form of Pantheism, excludes all moral freedom; everything is under the law of absolute necessity. It therefore precludes the idea of sin. "Acts of vice, Chrysippus said, are movements of universal nature, and in conformity with the divine intelligence. In the economy of the great world, evil is like chaff falling, — as unavoidable and worthless. Evil also was said by this school to do the service of making the good known, and yet at last all must resolve itself into God."²

Thus the Ionic, the Eleatic, and the Stoic forms of Grecian philosophy were in their fundamental principles pantheistic. The two great philosophic minds of Greece, and of the world, however, were Plato and Aristotle, the one the philosopher of the ideal world, and the other of the natural. The latter was the disciple of the former, although in most points of doctrine, or at least of method, his antagonist. It is only with the views of these mind-controlling men, concerning the nature of the supreme Being, and of his relation to the phenomenal world, that the theologian as such has anything to do. And this, unfortunately, with regard to both, is the point in regard to which their teachings are the most obscure.

Plato.

Plato united in his comprehensive intellect, and endeavoured to harmonize the elements of the different doctrines of his predecessors in the field of speculation. "The Socratic doctrine of the absolute good and beautiful, and of the Deity revealing himself to man as a kind Providence, formed the basis on which he started. As channels for the Heraclitic doctrine of the perpetual coming into being and flux of all things, together with the Eleatic one of the eternal immutability of the one and only Being, the dogma of Anaxagoras of a world-ruling spirit was serviceable to him, and with it he had the skill to connect the Pythagorean view of the universe, as an animated intelligent whole, in a spiritualized form."³ These are sufficiently incongruous materials. An intelligent Deity exercising a providential control over the world; the Heraclitic doctrine which involved the denial of all reality and resolved everything into a perpetual flow of phenomena; the Eleatic doctrine of a one and only Being; and the Pythagorean idea of the universe as an animated and intelligent whole. It was not possible but that first one, and then another of these elements should be made the more prominent, and consequently that the great philosopher should speak sometimes as a Theist and sometimes as a Pantheist. Neither was it possible that these incongruous elements should be moulded into a consistent system. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that Dollinger, one of the greatest admirers of Plato and one of the ablest exponents of his writings, should immediately add to the passage above quoted. "Plato never arrived at a finished system, rounded off and perfect in itself; nevertheless there is unmistakable evidence in his works of a continual progress, an effort after an increasing depth of foundation, and a stronger internal articulation, joined to a wonderful exuberance of ideas, often excessively bold."¹

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, vol. i. p. 351.

² Ibid. p. 351.

³ Ibid. p. 307.

Plato was not a Theist, in the ordinary and Christian sense of that word. He did not recognize the existence of an extramundane God, the creator, preserver, and governor of the world, on whom we are dependent and to whom we are responsible. With him God is not a person. As Anselm and the Realists generally admitted the existence of "rationality" as distinct from rational beings; a general principle which became individual and personal in angels and men; so Plato admitted the existence of an universal intelligence, or noûs, which becomes individualized in the different orders of intelligent beings, gods, demons, and men. God with him was an Idea; the Idea of the Good; which comprehended and gave unity to all other ideas.

Ideas.

What then were ideas in Plato's sense of the term? They were not mere thoughts, but the only real entities, of which the phenomenal and sensible are the representations or shadows. He illustrated their nature by supposing a man in a dark cave entirely ignorant of the external world, with a bright light shining behind him, while between him and the light there continually passes a procession of men, animals, trees, etc. The moving shadows of these things would be projected on the wall of the cavern, and the man would necessarily suppose that the shadows were the realities. These ideas are immutable and eternal, constituting the essence or real being of all phenomenal existence. "Plato teaches that for as many general signs of our conceptions as we have, there are so many really existing things, or Ideas, in the intelligible world corresponding: to man these are the only solid and worthy objects of thought and knowledge; for they are eternal and immutable, existing only in themselves, but separate from all things and individual, while their manifold copies, the things perceptible by sense, are ever fluctuating and transitory. Independent of time and space, as well as of our intellect and its conceptions, Ideas belong to a world of their own, of another sphere, transcending sense. They are not the thoughts of God, but the objects of his thought; and, according to them, He created the world in matter. They only and God are really existing beings; and therefore earthly things have but the shadow of an existence, and that only derived from a certain participation in the Ideas, their types."¹

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, p. 307.

The Relation of Ideas, in Plato's Philosophy, to God.

What is the relation of these ideas to God? This is the decisive question so far as the theology of Plato is concerned. Unfortunately it is not a question easily answered. It is a point about which the commentators differ; some saying that Plato leaves the matter undecided, sometimes identifying ideas with God, and at others representing them as distinct; others say that he clearly identifies ideas with God, or includes them in the divine essence; while others again understand him as making a marked distinction between God and the ideas after which the universe was moulded. It is not easy to reconcile what Dollinger says on this subject. In the passage above quoted he says that ideas are not the thoughts of God, but the objects of his thought. But on the same page² he says, "These Ideas are not to be conceived as beside and external to God. They are founded in God, and God is the all comprehensive Idea, embracing all partial archetypes in an unity." He had before said, that with Plato Ideas and God are the only "really existing beings." If this be so, and if God is "the all-comprehensive idea, embracing all others in unity," then God is the only really existing Being; and we have pure Pantheism. According to Cousin, Plato not only gave ideas a real and proper existence, but, "en dernière analyse il les place dans la raison divine, c'est la qu'elles existent substantiellement."³ Dollinger, in commenting on a passage in the Timæus, in which "God is styled the Father, who has begotten the world like a son, as an image of the eternal gods, i. e., ideas ;" says, "Had Plato really intended here to explain the idea of procreation as a communication of essence, he would have been a pure Pantheist."¹ Plato, however, he says² "is no Pantheist ; matter is, with him, entirely distinct from God ; still he has a pantheistical bias in his system ; for all that there is of intelligence in the world, down even to man, belongs, in his view, to the divine substance." Plato, therefore, escapes Pantheism only by admitting the eternity of matter ; but this eternal matter is as near nothing as possible. It is not corporeal. It is "something not yet entity."

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, vol. i. pp. 308 and 309.

² Ibid. p. 309.

³ Histoire Generale, vol. i. p. 137.

As Plato made ideas eternal and immutable ; as they were all included in the idea of God, i. e., in God ; and as they constitute the only really existing beings, all that is phenomenal or that affects the senses being mere shadows of the real, it can hardly be denied that his system in its essential character is really pantheistical. It is, however, an ideal Pantheism. It does not admit that matter or evil is a manifestation of God, or mode of his existence. Only what is good, is God ; but all that really is, is good.

The Cosmogony of Plato.

Plato's cosmogony and anthropology confirm this view of his theology. Nothing has ever been created. All that is, is eternal ; not indeed in form, but in substance. Matter, something material, has always existed. This in itself is lifeless, but it has "a soul," an unintelligent force by which chaotic or disorderly agitation or motion is produced. This unintelligent force God endowed with a portion of his own intelligence or voûs, and it becomes the world-soul, i. e., the Demiurgus, the formative principle of the world. God is not therefore himself even the framer of the world. This is the work of the Demiurgus. This world-soul pervades the visible universe, and constitutes one living, animated whole. This "world-soul" is individualized in star-gods, demons, and human souls. Thus Plato's system makes room for polytheism.

The Nature of the Soul.

The soul, according to this theory, consists of intelligence which is of the substance of God, and of elements derived from the world-soul as distinguished from the voûs which did not originally belong to it. All evil arises from the connection of the divine element in man with matter. The object of life is to counteract this evil influence by contemplation and communion with the ideal world. Plato taught the preëxistence as well as the immortality of the soul. Its state in the present stage of existence being determined by its course in its previous forms of being. It is, however, according to his common mode of representation, strictly immortal. "Plato's monotheistic conception of God," says Dollinger,¹ "is one of the most refined to which ante-Christian speculation attained; yet he contributed nothing whatever to the knowledge of the perfect, living, personality of God, and its absolute and unconditional liberty." His monotheism, it would seem, consisted in the acknowledgment of a universal intelligence which manifested itself as reason in all rational beings.

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, vol. i. p. 329.

² Ibid. p. 312.

Aristotle.

Aristotle, although the disciple, was the great opponent of Plato and his philosophy. He rejected Plato's doctrine of ideas as chimerical, as a hypothesis which was unnecessary and without evidence. In like manner he denied the existence of preëxistent matter out of which the world was fashioned. He believed the world to be eternal both in matter and form. It is, and there is no reason to doubt that it always has been and always will be. He admitted the existence of mind in man; and, therefore, assumed that there is an infinite intelligence, of which reason in man is a manifestation. But this infinite intelligence, which he called God, was pure intelligence, destitute of power and of will; neither the creator nor the framers of the world; unconscious, indeed, that the world exists; as it is occupied exclusively in thought of which it is itself the object. The world and God are coeternal; and yet, in a certain sense, God is the cause of the world. As a magnet acts on matter, or as the mere presence of a friend stirs the mind, so God unconsciously operates on matter, and awakens its dormant powers. As the universe is a cosmos, an ordered system; and as innumerable organized beings, vegetable and animal, exist in the world, Aristotle assumed that there are "forms" inherent in matter, which determine the nature of all such organizations. This is very much what in modern language would be called "vital force," "vitality," "vis formativa," "Bildungstrieb," or Agassiz's "immaterial principle," which is different in every distinct species, and which constitutes the difference between one species and another. The soul is the "forma" of the man. "It is the principle that gives form, motion, and development to the body, the entelechia of it; i. e., that substance, which only manifests itself in the body which is formed and penetrated by it, and continues energizing in it as the principle of life, determining and mastering matter. Thus, the body is nothing of itself; it is what it is, only through the soul, the nature and being of which it expresses, to which it stands in the relation of a medium in which the object, the soul, is realized; and so it cannot be imagined without the body, nor the body without it; one must be produced contemporaneously with the other.”¹ Of course there can be no immortality of the soul. As no plant is immortal, as the vital principle does not exist separately from the plant, so the soul has no existence separate from the body. The two begin and end together. “The really human in the soul, that which has come into being, must also pass away, the understanding even; only the divine reason is immortal; but, as the memory belongs to the sensitive soul, and individual thought depends on the understanding or passive nous only, all self-consciousness must cease with death.”² “Thus, then, Aristotle’s doctrine of the soul shows that his defect, as well as that of Plato, and indeed of all antiquity, was his imperfect acquaintance with the idea of personality; and on that head he cannot be acquitted of a pantheistic tendency.”³ “His God is not a really personal one, or is only an imperfect personality.”⁴ “The nous, or reason, allows souls, with their bodies, to sink back into nothingness, from which they severally issued. It alone exists on, ever the same and unalterable; for it is no other than the divine nous in individual existence, the divine intelligence enlightening the night of human understanding, and must be conceived just as much the prime mover of human discursive thought and knowledge, as of his will.”⁵

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, p. 329.

This brief review of the Grecian philosophy in its relation to theology, shows that in all its forms it was more or less pantheistic. This remark will not be recognized as correct by those, who with Cousin, limit the use of the word Pantheism to designate either the doctrine which makes the material universe God; or that which denies the existence of anything but matter and physical force, which is atheism; nor by those who take the word strictly as meaning the theory which admits of only one substance, which is the substance of God; and which consequently makes matter as much a mode of God’s existence as mind. Its correctness, however, will be admitted by those who mean by Pantheism the doctrine which makes all the intelligence in the world the intelligence of God, and all intellectual activity modes of the activity of God, and which necessarily precludes the possibility of human liberty and responsibility.

¹ The Gentile and the Jew, p. 333.

⁴ Ibid. p. 336.

² Ibid. p. 339.

⁵ Ibid. p. 339.

³ Ibid. p. 340.

The authorities on this subject are, so far as Plato and Aristotle are concerned, of course their own writings; with regard to those philosophers whose works are not preserved, or of which only fragments are extant, their systems are more or less fully detailed by the ancient writers, as Plutarch and Cicero. The general reader will find the information he needs in one or more of the numerous histories of philosophy; as those of Brucker, Ritter, Tenneman, and Cousin; among the latest and best of which is Dollinger's "The Gentile and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ," London, 1862.

D. Mediæval Pantheism.

The Neo-Platonists.

Pantheism, as it appeared in the Middle Ages, took its form and character from Neo-Platonism. This was an eclectic system in which the Eleatic doctrine of the unity of all being was combined with the Platonic doctrine concerning the phenomenal universe. The philosophers recognized as the representatives of this school are Plotinus (A. D. 205–270), Porphyry (born A. D. 233), Jamblichus in the fourth century, and Proclus in the fifth. Neo-Platonism was monism. It admitted of only one universal Being. This Being considered in itself was inconceivable and indescribable. It was revealed, or self-manifested in the world-soul, and world-reason, which constituted a trinity; one substance in different aspects or modes of manifestation. The world is therefore "the effluence of God," as fire emits heat. The soul of man is a mode of God's existence, a portion of his substance. Its destiny is absorption in the infinite Being. This was not to be attained by thought, or by meditation, but by ecstacy. This constituted the peculiar feature of the Neo-Platonic school. "Union with God" was to be attained by "a mystical self-destruction of the individual person (Ichheit)" in God.¹ Schwegler² says: "From the introduction of Christianity monism has been the character and the fundamental tendency of the whole modern philosophy." This remark, coming from an advocate of that theory, must be taken with no small amount of allowance. It is, however, true that almost all the great departures from the simplicity of the truth as revealed in the sacred Scriptures, have assumed more or less distinctly a pantheistic tendency.

¹ History of Philosophy. Translated from the German by Julius H. Seelye, p. 157.

² Ibid. p. 153.

John Scotus Erigena.

The most pronounced Pantheist among the schoolmen was John Scotus Erigena. Little is known of his origin or history. From his name Scotus and designation Erigena (son of Erin), it has been generally assumed that he was an Irishman. It is known that he enjoyed the protection and patronage of Charles the Bald of France, and that he taught in Paris and perhaps in England.

His principal work is that "De Divisione Naturæ." By nature he means all being. The fourfold divisions which he makes of nature, are only so many manifestations or aspects under which the one Being is revealed or is to be contemplated. Those divisions are: (1.) That which creates and is not created. (2.) That which creates and is created. (3.) That which does not create but is created. (4.) That which neither creates nor is created. "This division of nature," says Ritter,¹ "is made simply to show that all is God, since the four natures are only revelations of God."

Scotus agreed with most philosophers in making philosophy and religion identical, and in admitting no higher source of knowledge than human reason. "Conficitur," he says, "veram esse philosophiam veram religionem, conversimque veram religionem esse veram philosophiam."²

The leading principles of his philosophy are the following: (1.) The distinction with him between being and not-being, is not that between something and nothing, between substantial existence and non-existence, but between affirmation and negation. Whatever may be affirmed is; whatever is denied is not. (2.) All being consists in thought. Nothing is but as it exists in the mind and consciousness. (3.) With God, being, thought, and creating are identical. God's being consists in thinking, and his thoughts are things. In other words, the thought of God is the real being of all that is. (4.) Consequently the world is eternal. God and the world are identical. He is the "totum omnium."

His system is, therefore, a form of idealistic Pantheism. Ritter devotes the ninth book of his "Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie,"³ to the exposition of the philosophy of Scotus. The few following passages from the "De Divisione Naturæ," are sufficient to show the correctness of the above statement of his principles.

"Intellectus enim omnium in Deo essentia omnium est. Siquidem id ipsum est Deo cognoscere, priusquam fiunt, quæ facit, et facere, quæ cognoscit. Cognoscere ergo et facere Dei unum est.”¹ “Maximus ait: Quodeunque intellectus comprehendere potuerit, id ipsum fit.”² “Intellectus enim rerum veraciter ipsæ res sunt, dicente Sancto Dionysio, ‘Cognitio eorum, quæ sunt, ea, quæ sunt, est.’”³ “Homo est notio quædam intellectualis in mente divina æternaliter facta. Verissima et probatissima definitio hominis est ista: et non solum hominis, verum etiam omnium quæ in divina sapientia facta sunt.”⁴ Omnis visibilis et invisibilis creatura Theophaia, i. e., divina apparitio potest appellari.⁵ “Num negabis creatorem et creaturam unum esse?”⁶ “Creation [with Erigena] is nothing else than the Lord of creation; God in some ineffable manner created in the creation.”⁷

¹ Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie, vol. iii. p. 224.

² De Predest. cap. i. 1, Migne, Patr. vol. cxxii, p. 353, a.

³ Vol. iii. pp. 206-296.

Seotus translated the works of the so-called St. Dionysius, the Areopagite, and in so doing prepared the way for that form of mystical Pantheism which prevailed through the Church down to the period of the Reformation. The pseudo-Dionysius was a Neo-Platonist. His object was to give the doctrine of Plotinus a Christian aspect. He adopted the principle of the unity of all being. All creatures are of the essence of God. But instead of placing the self-manifestation of God in nature, in the world-soul, he placed it principally in the hierarchy of rational being, — cherubim, seraphim, thrones, principalities, and powers, and souls of men. The destiny of all rational creatures, is reunion with God; and this reunion, as the Neo-Platonists taught, was to be attained by ecstasy and the negation of Self. It was this system, which, in common with all other forms of Pantheism, precluded the idea of sin, which was reproduced by the leading mystics of the Middle Ages, and which, when it found its way among the people as it did with the Beghards and Brethren of the Free Spirit, produced, as substantially the same system has done in India, its legitimate fruits of evil. Of the mystical Pantheism of the Middle Ages, however, enough has already been said in the Introduction, in the chapter on Mysticism.

E. Modern Pantheism.

Spinoza.

The revival of Pantheism since the Reformation is principally due to Spinoza; he was born at Amsterdam in 1634, and died at Ghent in the forty-fourth year of his age. He was descended from a wealthy Jewish Portuguese family, and enjoyed the advantage of

¹ De Divisione Naturæ, II. 20; edit. Westphalia, 1838, p. 118.

² Ibid. I. 9, p. 9.

³ Ibid. II. 8, p. 95.

⁴ Ibid. IV. 7, p. 230.

⁵ Ibid. III. 19, p. 240.

⁶ Ibid. II. 2, p. 88.

⁷ Ritter, vol. III. p. 234.

a highly finished education. He early devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and was at first a disciple of Des Cartes. Leibnitz characterizes the system of Spinoza as Cartesianism run wild. Des Cartes distrusted the testimony of the senses. His starting-point was the consciousness of existence, "I think." In that proposition the existence of a thinking substance is necessarily included. The outward world produces impressions on this thinking substance. But after all, these sensations thus produced, are only states of self-consciousness. Self, therefore, and its varying states, are all of which we have direct knowledge. It is not all, however, that Des Cartes believed actually existed. He was a sincere Catholic, and died in communion with the Church. He acknowledged not only the existence of mind, but also of God and of matter. Our knowledge, however, of God and of matter as substances distinct from our minds, was arrived at by a process of reasoning. The validity of that process Spinoza denied. He admitted the existence of only one substance, and gave such a definition of the word as precluded the possibility of there being more substances than one. With him substance is that which exists of itself, of necessity, and is absolutely independent. There is, therefore, but one substance possible. We come, however, everywhere into contact with two classes of phenomena: those of thought and those of extension. Thought and extension, therefore, are the two attributes of the one infinite substance. Individual things are the modes under which the infinite substance is constantly manifested. In Spinoza's system there are the three radical ideas of substance, attribute, and mode. Of these that of substance alone has any reality. The other two are mere appearances. If we look at anything through a glass colored red the object will appear red; if the glass be blue, the object will appear blue; but the color is not really an attribute of the object. Thus substance (the one) appears to us under one aspect as thought and under another as extension. The difference is apparent and not real. The finite has therefore no real existence. The universe is sunk into the Infinite; and the Infinite is a substance of which nothing can be affirmed. Of the Infinite nothing can be denied, and therefore nothing can be affirmed for "omnis determinatio est negatio." The Infinite, therefore, is practically nothing.

A sufficient account of modern Pantheism in its general features, as represented by Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, and their successors and disciples, has been given already at the commencement of this chapter. More detailed information may be found in the numerous recent histories of philosophy, as those of Morell, Schweg-ler, Michelet, and Rosenkranz, and in Hunt's "History of Pantheism."

F. Conclusion.

The fact that Pantheism has so extensively prevailed in every age and in every part of the world, is a proof of its fascination and power. Apart from a divine revelation, it seems to have been regarded as the most probable solution of the great problem of the universe. Nevertheless it is so unsatisfactory, and does such violence to the laws of our nature, that it has never to any extent taken hold on the hearts of the people. India may be regarded as furnishing an exception to this remark. But even there, although Pantheism was the ground form of the popular religion, it had to resolve itself into polytheism in order to meet the necessities of the people. Men must have a personal god whom they can worship and to whom they can pray.

The most obvious remark to be made of the whole system is that it is a hypothesis. From its very nature it is incapable of proof. It is a mere theory assumed to account for the phenomena of the universe. If it did satisfactorily account for them, and did not contradict the teachings of the Bible, it might be safely admitted. But it is not only inconsistent with all that the Scriptures reveal concerning the nature of God and his relation to the world, but it contradicts the laws of belief which God has impressed on our nature, subverts the very foundation of religion and morality, and involves even the deification of sin.

Had we no divine revelation on the subject, Theism merely as a theory could not fail to secure the assent of every devout mind in preference to Pantheism. Theism supposes the existence of a personal, extramundane God, the creator and preserver of the universe; everywhere present in his wisdom and power, directing all events to the accomplishment of his infinitely wise designs. It supposes the material universe to be distinct from God, dependent on his will, upheld by his power, and pregnant with physical forces ever active under his control. It supposes that man is the creature of God, owing his existence to the will of God, created after his image, a free, rational, moral, and accountable agent, capable of knowing, loving, and worshipping God as a Spirit infinite in his being and perfections. Although this theory may have, for the reason, some problems, such as the origin and prevalence of evil, without a satisfactory solution, yet as it meets and satisfies all the demands of our nature, and solves the problem as to the origin and nature of the universe, it commends itself to the reason, the heart, and the conscience with a force which no sophistry of speculation can resist.

Pantheism, on the other hand, does violence to our nature, and contradicts the intuitive convictions of consciousness.

1. We are conscious that we are free agents. This is a truth which no man can deny with regard to himself, and which every man assumes with regard to others. This truth Pantheism denies. It makes our activity only a form of the activity of God, and assumes that his acts are determined by necessity as much as the development of a plant or animal.

2. It is intuitively certain that there is a real distinction between moral good and evil: that the one is that to which man is bound to be conformed, and the other that which he is bound to hate and to avoid; that the one deserves approbation, and that the other deserves disapprobation, and merits punishment. These are convictions which belong to the rational nature of man; and they cannot be destroyed without destroying his rationality. Pantheism, however, pronounces these convictions delusions; that there is no such thing as sin, in the sense above stated; that what we call sin is mere weakness; imperfect development, as unavoidable as feebleness in an infant. It goes further: it pronounces evil good. It makes the sinful acts and passions of men as much the acts and states of God as holy acts and holy feelings. There is no good but being; and the men of power are the men of being; and, therefore, the strongest are the best; the weak are to be despised; they deserved to be conquered and trodden under foot. Hence where Pantheism has become a religion the deities who represent evil are the most honoured and worshipped.

3. Pantheism not only destroys the foundation of morals, but it renders all rational religion impossible. Religion supposes a personal Being endowed not only with intelligence and power, but with moral excellence; and to be rational, that Being must be infinite in all his perfections. Pantheism, however, denies that an infinite Being can be a person; that it is intelligent, self-conscious, or possessed of moral attributes. It is just as impossible to worship such a Being as it is to worship the atmosphere, or the law of gravitation, or the axioms of Euclid.

4. It is no extravagance to say that Pantheism is the worst form of atheism. For mere atheism is negative. It neither deifies man nor evil. But Pantheism teaches that man, the human soul, is the highest form in which God exists; and that evil is as much a manifestation of God as good; Satan as the ever-blessed and adorable Redeemer. Beyond this it is impossible for the insanity of wickedness to go.

5. Man, according to this system, is no more immortal than the leaves of the forest, or the waves of the sea. We are transient forms of universal Being.

Our nature is indestructible; as it is impossible that we should not believe in our own individual existence, in our free agency, in our moral obligations; in our dependence and responsibility to a Being capable of knowing what we are and what we do, and of rewarding and punishing as He sees fit, so it is impossible that Pantheism should ever be more than a philosophical speculation, where the moral nature of man has once been developed by the knowledge of the living and true God.

CHAPTER IV.

THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

HAVING considered the arguments in favor of the doctrine that God is, and also the various systems opposed to Theism, we come now to consider the question, Can God be known? and if so, How? that is, How does the mind proceed in forming its idea of God, and, How do we know that God really is what we believe Him to be?

§ 1. God can be known.

It is the clear doctrine of the Scriptures that God can be known. Our Lord teaches that eternal life consists in the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, whom He hath sent. The Psalmist says, "In Judah is God known" (Ps. lxxvi. 1). Isaiah predicts, that "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord" (Is. xi. 9). Paul says even of the heathen, that they knew God, but did not like to retain that knowledge (Rom. i. 19, 20, 21, 28).

A. State of the Question.

It is, however, important distinctly to understand what is meant when it is said, God can be known.

1. This does not mean that we can know all that is true concerning God. There were some among the ancient philosophers who taught that the nature of God can be as fully understood and determined as any other object of knowledge. The modern speculative school teaches the same doctrine. Among the propositions laid down by Spinoza, we find the following: "Cognitio æternæ et infinitæ essentiæ Dei, quam unaquæque idea involvit, est adæquata et perfecta."¹ Hegel says, that God is, only so far as He is known. The sin against the Holy Ghost, according to Hegel, is to deny that He can be known.² Cousin holds the same doctrine. "God in fact," he says, "exists to us only in so far as He is known."³

According to Schelling, God is known in his own nature by direct intuition of the higher reason. He assumes that there is in man a power which transcends the limits of the ordinary consciousness (an Anschauungs Vermögen), which takes immediate cognizance of the Infinite. Hegel says that "Man knows God only so far as God knows Himself in man; this knowledge is God's self-consciousness, but likewise a knowledge of the same by man, and this knowledge of God by man is the knowledge of man by God."¹ Cousin finds this knowledge in the common consciousness of men. That consciousness includes the knowledge of the Infinite as well as of the finite. We know the one just as we know the other, and we cannot know the one without knowing the other. These philosophers all admit that we could not thus know God unless we were ourselves God. Self-knowledge, with them, is the knowledge of God. Reason in man, according to Cousin, does not belong to his individuality. It is infinite, impersonal, and divine. Our knowledge of God, therefore, is only God knowing Himself. Of course it is in no such sense as this that the Scriptures and the Church teach that God can be known.

¹ Ethics, ii. prop. xlv. edit. Jena, 1803, vol. ii. p. 119.

² See Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought, Boston, 1859, p. 301.

³ Sir William Hamilton's Discussions, p. 16. Princeton Review on Cousin's Philosophy, 1856.

God Inconceivable.

2. It is not held that God, properly speaking, can be conceived of; that is, we cannot form a mental image of God. "All conception," says Mr. Mansel,² "implies imagination." To have a valid conception of a horse, he adds, we must be able "to combine" the attributes which form "the definition of the animal" into "a representative image." Conception is defined by Taylor in the same manner, as "the forming or bringing an image or idea into the mind by an effort of the will." In this sense of the word it must be admitted that the Infinite is not an object of knowledge. We cannot form an image of infinite space, or of infinite duration, or of an infinite whole. To form an image is to limit, to circumscribe. But the infinite is that which is incapable of limitation. It is admitted, therefore, that the infinite God is inconceivable. We can form no representative image of Him in our minds. The word, however, is often, and perhaps commonly, used in a less restricted sense. To conceive is to think. A conception is therefore a thought, and not necessarily an image. To say, therefore, that God is conceivable, in common language, is merely to say that He is thinkable. That is, that the thought (or idea) of God involves no contradiction or impossibility. We cannot think of a round square, or that a part is equal to the whole. But we can think that God is infinite and eternal.

¹ Werke, xii. p. 496, edit. Berlin, 1840.

² Prolegomena Logica, edit. Boston, 1860, p. 34.

God Incomprehensible.

3. When it is said that God can be known, it is not meant that He can be comprehended. To comprehend is to have a complete and exhaustive knowledge of an object. It is to understand its nature and its relations. We cannot comprehend force, and specially vital force. We see its effect, but we cannot understand its nature or the mode in which it acts. It would be strange that we should know more of God than of ourselves, or of the most familiar objects of sense. God is past finding out. We cannot understand the Almighty unto perfection. To comprehend is (1.) To know the essence as well as the attributes of an object. (2.) It is to know not some only, but all of its attributes. (3.) To know the relation in which these attributes stand to each other and to the substance to which they belong. (4.) To know the relation in which the object known stands to all other objects. Such knowledge is clearly impossible in a creature, either of itself or of anything out of itself. It is, however, substantially thus that the transcendentalists claim to know God.

Our Knowledge of God Partial.

4. It is included in what has been said, that our knowledge of God is partial and inadequate. There is infinitely more in God than we have any idea of; and what we do know, we know imperfectly. We know that God knows; but there is much in his mode of knowing, and in its relation to its objects, which we cannot understand. We know that He acts; but we do not know how He acts, or the relation which his activity bears to time, or things out of Himself. We know that He feels; that He loves, pities, is merciful, is gracious; that He hates sin. But this emotional element of the divine nature is covered with an obscurity as great, but no greater, than that which rests over his thoughts or purposes. Here again our ignorance, or rather, the limitation of our knowledge concerning God, finds a parallel in our ignorance of ourself. There are potentialities in our nature of which, in our present state of existence, we have no idea. And even as to what we are now, we know but little. We know that we perceive, think, and act; we do not know how. It is perfectly inscrutable to us how the mind takes cognizance of matter; how the soul acts on the body, or the body on the mind. But because our knowledge of ourselves is thus partial and imperfect, no sane man would assert that we have no self-knowledge.

The common doctrine on this subject is clearly expressed by Des Cartes: ¹ "Sciri potest, Deum esse infinitum et omnipotentem, quanquam anima nostra, utpote finita, id nequeat comprehendere sive concipere; eodem nimirum modo, quo montem manibus tangere possumus, sed non ut arborem, aut aliam quampiam rem brachiis nostris non majoreon amplecti: comprehendere enim est cogitatione complecti; ad hoc autem, ut sciamus aliquid, sufficit, ut illud cogitatione attingamus."

Even Spinoza ² says: "Ad quæstionem tuam, an de Deo tam claram, quam de triangulo habeam ideam, respondeo affirmando. Non dico, me Deum omnino cognoscere; sed me quædam ejus attributa, non autem omnia, neque maximam intelligere partem, et certum est, plurimorum ignorantiam, quorundam eorum habere notitiam, non impedire. Quum Euclidis elementa addiscerem, primo tres trianguli angulos duobus rectis æquari intelligebam; hancque trianguli proprietatem clare percipiebam, licet multarum aliarum ignarus essem."

While, therefore, it is admitted not only that the infinite God is incomprehensible, and that our knowledge of Him is both partial and imperfect; that there is much in God which we do not know at all, and that what we do know, we know very imperfectly; nevertheless our knowledge, as far as it goes, is true knowledge. God really is what we believe Him to be, so far as our idea of Him is determined by the revelation which He has made of Himself in his works, in the constitution of our nature, in his word, and in the person of his Son. To know is simply to have such apprehensions of an object as conform to what that object really is. We know what the word Spirit means. We know what the words infinite, eternal, and immutable, mean. And, therefore, the sublime proposition, pregnant with more truth than was ever compressed in any other sentence, "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and immutable," conveys to the mind as distinct an idea, and as true (i. e., trustworthy) knowledge, as the proposition "The human soul is a finite spirit." In this sense God is an object of knowledge. He is not the unknown God, because He is infinite. Knowledge in Him does not cease to be knowledge because it is omniscience; power does not cease to be power because it is omnipotence; any more than space ceases to be space because it is infinite.

¹ Epistolæ, i., ex., edit. Amsterdam, 1682.

² Epistola lx. vol. i. p. 659, edit. Jena, 1802.

B. How do we know God?

How does the mind proceed in forming its idea of God? The older theologians answered this question by saying that it is by the way of negation, by the way of eminence, and by the way of causality. That is, we deny to God any limitation; we ascribe to Him every excellence in the highest degree; and we refer to Him as the great First Cause every attribute manifested in his works. We are the children of God, and, therefore, we are like Him. We are, therefore, authorized to ascribe to Him all the attributes of our own nature as rational creatures, without limitation, and to an infinite degree. If we are like God, God is like us. This is the fundamental principle of all religion. This is the principle which Paul assumed in his address to the Athenians (Acts xvii. 29): "Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." For the same reason we ought not to think that He is simple being, or a mere abstraction, a name for the moral order of the universe, or the unknown and unknowable cause of all things, — mere inscrutable force. If we are his children, He is our Father, whose image we bear, and of whose nature we partake. This, in the proper sense of the word, is Anthropomorphism, a word much abused, and often used in a bad sense to express the idea that God is altogether such a one as ourselves, a being of like limitations and passions. In the sense, however, just explained, it expresses the doctrine of the Church and of the great mass of mankind. Jacobi¹ well says: "We confess, therefore, to an Anthropomorphism inseparable from the conviction that man bears the image of God; and maintain that besides this Anthropomorphism, which has always been called Theism, is nothing but atheism or fetichism."

C. Proof that this Method is Trustworthy.

That this method of forming an idea of God is trustworthy, is proved, —

1. Because it is a law of nature. Even in the lowest form of fetichism the life of the worshipper is assumed to belong to the object which he worships. The power dreaded is assumed to possess attributes like our own. In like manner under all the forms of polytheism, the gods of the people have been intelligent personal agents. It is only in the schools of philosophy that we find a different method of forming an idea of the Godhead. They have substituted τὸ ὅν for ὁ ὢν, τὸ θεῖον for ὁ Θεός, τὸ ἀγαθόν for ὁ ἀγαθός. It is here as with regard to the knowledge of the external world. The mass of mankind believe that things are what they perceive them to be. This philosophers deny. They affirm that we do not perceive the things themselves, but certain ideas, species, or images of the things; that we have, and can have, no knowledge of what the things themselves really are. So they say we can have no knowledge of what God is; we only know that we are led to think of Him in a certain way, but we are not only not authorized to believe that our idea corresponds to the reality, but, say they, it is certain that God is not what we take Him to be. As the people are right in the one case, so are they in the other. In other words, our conviction that God is what He has revealed Himself to be, rests on the same foundation as our conviction that the external world is what we take it to be. That foundation is the veracity of consciousness, or the trustworthiness of the laws of belief which God has impressed upon our nature. "Invincibility of belief," according to Sir William Hamilton, "is convertible with the truth of belief,"¹ although, unhappily, on this subject, he did not adhere to his own principle, "That what is by nature necessarily believed to be, truly is."² No man has more nobly or more earnestly vindicated this doctrine, which is the foundation of all science and of all faith. "Consciousness," he says, "once convicted of falsehood, an unconditioned scepticism, in regard to the character of our intellectual being, is the melancholy but only rational result. Any conclusion may now with impunity be drawn against the hopes and the dignity of human nature. Our personality, our immateriality, our moral liberty, have no longer an argument for their defence. 'Man is the dream of a shadow.' God is the dream of that dream."³ The only question, therefore, is, Are we invincibly led to think of God as possessing the attributes of our rational nature? This cannot be denied; for universality proves invincibility of belief. And it is a historical fact that men have universally thus thought of God. Even Mr. Mansel⁴ exclaims against the transcendentalists, "Fools, to dream that man can escape from himself, that human reason can draw aught but a human portrait of God." True, he denies the correctness of that portrait; or, at least, he asserts that we cannot know whether it is correct or not. But this

¹ "Von den göttlichen Dingen," Werke, iii. pp. 423, 423, edit. Leipzig, 1816.

¹ Philosophy, edit. Wight, New York, 1854, p. 233.

² Ibid. p. 226.

³ Ibid. p. 234.

⁴ Limits of Religious Thought, edit. Boston, 1859, pp. 56, 57.

is not now the question. He admits that we are forced by the constitution of our nature thus to think of God. And by the fundamental principle of all true philosophy, what we are forced to believe must be true. It is true, therefore, that God really is what we take Him to be, when we ascribe to Him the perfections of our own nature, without limitation, and to an infinite degree.

Our Moral Nature demands this Idea of God.

2. It has already been shown, when speaking of the moral argument for the existence of God, that all men are conscious of their accountability to a being superior to themselves, who knows what they are and what they do, and who has the will and purpose to reward or punish men according to their works. The God, therefore, who is revealed to us in our nature, is a God who knows, and wills, and acts; who rewards and punishes. That is, He is a person; an intelligent, voluntary agent, endowed with moral attributes. This revelation of God must be true. It must make known to us what God really is, or our nature is a lie. All this Mr. Mansel, who holds that God cannot be known, admits. He admits that a sense of dependence on a superior power is "a fact of the inner consciousness;" that this superior power is "not an inexorable fate, or immutable law, but a Being having at least so far the attributes of personality, that He can show favour or sovereignty to those dependent upon Him, and can be regarded by them with the feelings of hope, and fear, and reverence, and gratitude."¹ No man, however, is, or can be grateful to the sun, or to the atmosphere, or to unintelligent force. Gratitude is a tribute of a person to a person. Again, the same author admits that "the moral reason, or will, or conscience of man, call it by what name we please, can have no authority save as implanted in him by some higher spiritual Being, as a law emanating from a law-giver."² "We are thus compelled," he says, "by the consciousness of moral obligation, to assume the existence of a moral [and of course of a personal] Deity, and to regard the absolute standard of right and wrong as constituted by the nature of that Deity."³ Our argument from these facts is, that if our moral nature compels us to believe that God is a person, He must be a person, and consequently that we arrive at a true knowledge of God by attributing to Him the perfections of our own nature.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, etc., p. 120.

³ Ibid. p. 122.

² Ibid. p. 121.

Our Religious Nature makes the same Demand.

3. The argument from our religious, as distinct from our moral nature, is essentially the same. Morality is not all of religion. The one is as much a law and necessity of our nature as the other. To worship, in the religious sense of the word, is to ascribe infinite perfection to its object. It is to express to that object our acknowledgments for the blessings we enjoy, and to seek their continuance ; it is to confess, and praise, and pray, and to adore. We cannot worship the law of gravity, or unconscious force, or the mere order of the universe. Our religious nature, in demanding an object of supreme reverence, love, and confidence, demands a personal God, a God clothed with the attributes of a nature like our own ; who can hear our confessions, praises, and prayers ; who can love, and be loved ; who can supply our wants, and fill all our capacities for good. Thus again it appears that unless our whole nature is a contradiction and a falsehood, we arrive at a true knowledge of God when we ascribe to Him the perfections of our own nature.

Mr. Mansel admits that our nature does demand a personal and moral Deity ; but, he says, " the very conception of a moral nature is in itself the conception of a limit, for morality is the compliance with a law ; and a law, whether imposed from within or from without, can only be conceived to operate by limiting the range of possible actions."¹ In like manner he says, " The only human conception of personality is that of limitation." Therefore, if God be infinite, he can neither be a person, nor possess moral attributes. This is the argument of Strauss, and of all other pantheists, against the doctrine of a personal God. Mr. Mansel admits the force of the argument, and says we must renounce all hope of knowing what God is, and be content with " regulative knowledge," which teaches not what God really is, but what He wills us to think Him to be. We are thus forbidden to trust to our necessary beliefs. We must not regard as true what God by the constitution of our nature forces us to believe. This is to subvert all philosophy and all religion, and to destroy the difference between the rational and the irrational. Why is this contradiction between reason and conscience, between our rational and moral nature, assumed to exist ? Simply because philosophers choose to give such a definition of morality and personality that neither can be predicated of an infinite Being. It is not true that either morality or personality imply any limitation inconsistent with absolute perfection. We do not limit God when we say He cannot be irrational as well as rational, unconscious as well as conscious, finite as well as infinite, evil as well as good. The only limitation admitted is the negation of imperfection. Reason is not limited when we say it cannot be unreason; or spirit, when we say that it is not matter; or light, when we say it is not darkness; or space, when we say it is not time. We do not, therefore, limit the Infinite, when we exalt Him in our conceptions, from the unconscious to the conscious, from the unintelligent to the intelligent, from an impersonal something to the absolutely perfect personal Jehovah. All these difficulties arise from confounding the ideas of infinite and all.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, etc., p. 127.

4. The fourth argument on this subject is, that if we are not justified in referring to God the attributes of our own nature, then we have no God. The only alternative is anthropomorphism (in this sense) or Atheism. An unknown God, a God of whose nature and of whose relation to us we know nothing, to us is nothing. It is a historical fact that those who reject this method of forming our idea of God, who deny that we are to refer to Him the perfections of our own nature, have become atheists. They take the word "spirit," and strip from it consciousness, intelligence, will, and morality; and the residue, which is blank nothing, they call God. Hamilton and Mansel take refuge from this dreadful conclusion in faith. They say that reason forbids the ascription of these, or of any other attributes, to the Infinite and Absolute, but that faith protests against this conclusion of the reason. Such protest, however, is of no account, unless it be rational. When Kant proved that there was no rational evidence of the existence of God, and fell back from the speculative to the practical reason (i. e., from reason to faith), his followers universally gave up all faith in a personal God. No man can believe in the impossible. And if reason pronounces that it is impossible that the Infinite should be a person, faith in His personality is an impossibility. This Mr. Mansel does not admit. For while he says that it is a contradiction to affirm the Infinite to be a person, or to possess moral attributes, he nevertheless says that, "Anthropomorphism is the indispensable condition of all human theology;"¹ and he quotes from Kant² this passage: "We may confidently challenge all natural theology to name a single distinctive attribute of the Deity, whether denoting intelligence or will, which, apart from anthropomorphism, is anything more than a mere word, to which not the slightest notion can be attached, which can serve to extend our theoretical knowledge." It is greatly to be lamented that men should teach that the only way in which it is possible for us to form an idea of God, leads to no true knowledge. It does not teach us what God is, but what we are forced against reason to think He is.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, etc., p. 261.

² "Kritik der Praktischen Vernunft." Works, edit. Rosenkranz, vol. viii. p. 282.

Argument from the Revelation of God in Nature.

5. A fifth argument is from the fact that the works of God manifest a nature like our own. It is a sound principle that we must refer to a cause the attributes necessary to account for its effects. If the effects manifest intelligence, will, power, and moral excellence, these attributes must belong to the cause. As, therefore, the works of God are a revelation of all these attributes on a most stupendous scale, they must belong to God in an infinite degree. This is only saying that the revelation made of God in the external world agrees with the revelation which He has made of himself in the constitution of our own nature. In other words, it proves that the image of himself which He has enstamped on our nature is a true likeness.

Argument from Scriptures.

6. The Scriptures declare God to be just what we are led to think He is, when we ascribe to Him the perfections of our own nature in an infinite degree. We are self-conscious, so is God. We are spirits, so is He. We are voluntary agents, so is God. We have a moral nature, miserably defaced indeed, God has moral excellence in infinite perfection. We are persons, so is God. All this the Scriptures declare to be true. The great primal revelation of God is as the "I am," the personal God. All the names and titles given to Him; all the attributes ascribed to Him; all the works attributed to Him, are revelations of what He truly is. He is the Elohim, the Mighty One, the Holy One, the Omnipresent Spirit; He is the creator, the preserver, the governor of all things. He is our Father. He is the hearer of prayer; the giver of all good. He feeds the young ravens. He clothes the flowers of the field. He is Love. He so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him might not perish but have everlasting life. He is merciful, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth. He is a present help in every time of need; a refuge, a high tower, an exceeding great reward. The relations in which, according to the Scriptures, we stand to God, are such as we can sustain only to a being who is like ourselves. He is our ruler, and father, with whom we can commune. His favour is our life, his loving-kindness better than life. This sublime revelation of God in his own nature and in his relation to us is not a delusion. It is not mere regulative truth, or it would be a deceit and mockery. It makes God known to us as He really is. We therefore know God, although no creature can understand the Almighty unto perfection.

Argument from the Manifestation of God in Christ.

7. Finally, God has revealed Himself in the person of his Son. No man knoweth the Father but the Son; and he to whom the Son shall reveal Him. Jesus Christ is the true God. The revelation which He made of Himself was the manifestation of God. He and the Father are one. The words of Christ were the words of God. The works of Christ were the works of God. The love, mercy, tenderness, the forgiving grace, as well as the holiness, the severity and power manifested by Christ, were all manifestations of what God truly is. We see, therefore, as with our own eyes, what God is. We know that although infinite and absolute, He can think, act, and will; that He can love and hate; that He can hear prayer and forgive sin; that we can have fellowship with Him, as one person can commune with another. Philosophy must veil her face in the presence of Jesus Christ, as God manifest in the flesh. She may not presume in that presence to say that God is not, and is not known to be, what Christ himself most clearly was. This doctrine that God is the object of certain and true knowledge lies at the foundation of all religion, and therefore must never be given up.

§ 2. God cannot be fully known.

The modern German philosophers take the ground that all science, all true philosophy, must be founded on the knowledge of being, and not of phenomena. They reject the authority of the senses and of consciousness, and teach that it is only by the immediate cognition of the Absolute that we arrive at any true or certain knowledge. God, or rather, the Infinite, can be as thoroughly known and comprehended as the simplest object of sense or of consciousness; that He is, only so far as He is known.

It would seem impossible that the presumption of men should be so extreme that such a creature as man should pretend to understand the Almighty to perfection, when in fact he cannot understand himself or the simplest objects with which he is in daily contact. The assumption is that being, as such, Infinite and Absolute Being, can be known; that is, that we can determine what it is, and the necessary laws by which it is developed into the phenomenal world. This knowledge is attained à priori; not by any induction or deduction from our own nature or the facts of experience, but by an immediate act of cognition, which transcends all consciousness. The great service rendered by Sir William Hamilton and Mr. Mansel to the cause of truth was to demonstrate the utter futility of this pretended philosophy of the Infinite, on the principles of its advocates. To the common mind it needed no refutation, being intuitively seen to be impossible and absurd.

Sir William Hamilton's Argument.

Hamilton shows, in the first place, that the immediate intuition of Schelling, which Hegel ridiculed as a mere imagination, the dialectics of Hegel, which Schelling pronounced a mere play of words, and the impersonal reason of Cousin which enters into our consciousness but not into our personality, utterly fail to give us a knowledge of the Infinite. "Existence," he says, "is revealed to us only under specific modifications, and these are known only under the conditions of our faculties of knowledge. Things in themselves, matter, mind, God, all in short that is not finite, relative, and phenomenal, as bearing no analogy to our faculties, is beyond the verge of our knowledge."¹ In what sense Hamilton places God "beyond the verge of our knowledge" will be seen in the sequel. It is, however, self-evident that our knowledge must be limited by our faculties of knowing. Other animals may have senses which we do not possess. It is utterly impossible that we should have the kind of knowledge due to the exercise of those senses. It is probable that there are faculties dormant in our nature which are not called into activity in our present state of being. It is clear that we cannot now attain the knowledge which those faculties may hereafter enable us to attain. It is just as plain that we cannot cognize the Infinite, in the sense of these philosophers, as that we cannot see a spirit, or guide ourselves in space, as does the carrier-pigeon or the migrating salmon.

Only the Infinite can know the Infinite.

2. In the second place, it is admitted that none but the Infinite can know the Infinite, and to know God in this sense, it is admitted that we must be God. "Schelling claimed for the mind of man, what Kant had demonstrated to be impossible, a faculty of intellectual intuition which is apart from sense, above consciousness, and released from the laws of the understanding, and which comprehends the absolute by becoming the absolute, and thus knows God by being God."¹ This assumption that man is God, shocks the reason and common sense of men as well as outrages their religious and moral convictions.

¹ Discussions, p. 23.

3. In the third place, Hamilton and Mansel demonstrate that, assuming the definitions of the Absolute and Infinite given by the transcendentalists, the most contradictory conclusions may logically be deduced from them. "There are three terms familiar as household words in the vocabulary of philosophy, which must be taken into account in every system of metaphysical theology. To conceive the Deity as He is, we must conceive him as First Cause, as absolute, and as infinite. By First Cause, is meant that which produces all things, and is itself produced of none. By the Absolute, is meant that which exists in and by itself, having no necessary relation to any other being. By the Infinite, is meant that which is free from all possible limitation; that than which a greater is inconceivable, and which, consequently, can receive no additional attribute or mode of existence which it had not from all eternity."²

According to these definitions, in the sense in which they are intended to be taken, it follows:—

1. That the Infinite and Absolute must include the sum of all being. For "that which is conceived as absolute and infinite must be conceived as containing within itself the sum, not only of all actual, but of all possible modes of being. For if any actual mode can be denied of it, it is related to that mode and limited by it; and if any possible mode can be denied of it, it is capable of becoming more than it now is, and such a capability is a limitation."³

2. If the Absolute and Infinite be as above defined, it cannot be the object of knowledge. To know is to limit. It is to distinguish the object of knowledge from other objects. We cannot conceive, says Hamilton, of an absolute whole; i. e., of a whole so great that we cannot conceive of it as a part of a greater whole. We cannot conceive of an infinite line, or of infinite space, or of infinite duration. We may as well think without thought, as to assign any limit beyond which there can be no extension, no space, no duration. "Goad imagination to the utmost, it still sinks paralyzed within the bounds of time."⁴ It follows, therefore, from the very nature of knowledge, according to Hamilton, that the Infinite and Absolute cannot be known.

¹ Progress of Philosophy, by S. Tyler, LL.D., p. 200.

³ Mansel, p. 75.

² Mansel, p. 75.

⁴ Hamilton's Discussions, p. 35.

The Infinite cannot Know.

3. It also follows from these premises, that the Infinite cannot know. All knowledge is limitation and difference. It supposes a distinction between subject and object, between the knower and what is known, inconsistent with the idea of the Absolute.

4. It follows also that the Absolute cannot be conscious, for consciousness involves a distinction between the self and the not-self. It is knowledge of ourselves as distinct from what is not ourselves. Even if conscious only of itself, there is the same distinction between subject and object; the self as subject and a mode of the self as the object of consciousness. "The almost unanimous voice of philosophy," says Mansel, "in pronouncing that the Absolute is both one and simple must be accepted as the voice of reason also, so far as reason has any voice in the matter." "The conception of an absolute and infinite consciousness contradicts itself."¹

The Absolute cannot be Cause.

5. It is equally clear that the Absolute and Infinite cannot be cause. Causation implies relation; the relation of efficiency to the effect. It also implies change; change from inaction to activity. It moreover implies succession, and succession implies existence in time. "A thing existing absolutely (i. e., not under relation)," says Hamilton, "and a thing existing absolutely as a cause, are contradictory." He quotes Schelling² as saying, "He would deviate wide as the poles from the idea of the Absolute, who would think of defining its nature by the notion of activity." "But he who would define the Absolute by the notion of a cause," he adds, "would deviate still more widely from its nature, inasmuch as the notion of a cause involves not only the notion of a determination to activity, but of a determination to a particular, nay a dependent, kind of activity."³ "The three conceptions, the Cause, the Absolute, the Infinite, all equally indispensable, do they not," asks Mr. Mansel,⁴ "imply contradiction to each other, when viewed in conjunction, as attributes of one and the same Being? A cause cannot, as such, be absolute: the Absolute cannot, as such, be cause."

6. According to the laws of our reason and consciousness, there can be no duration without succession, but succession as implying change cannot be predicated of the Absolute and Infinite, and yet without succession there can be no thought or consciousness; and, therefore, to say that God is eternal is to deny that He has either thought or consciousness.

¹ Mansel, pp. 78, 79.² Bruno, p. 171.³ Discussions, p. 40.⁴ Mansel, p. 77.

7. Again, "Benevolence, holiness, justice, wisdom," says Mansel, "can be conceived by us only as existing in a benevolent and holy and just and wise being, who is not identical with any one of his attributes, but the common subject of them all; in one word, in a person. But personality, as we conceive it, is essentially a limitation and a relation. — To speak of an absolute and infinite person, is simply to use language to which, however true it may be in a superhuman sense, no mode of human thought can possibly attach itself."¹

The Conclusion to which Hamilton's Argument leads.

What then is the result of the whole matter? It is, that if the definitions of the Absolute and Infinite adopted by transcendentalists be admitted, the laws of reason lead us into a labyrinth of contradictions. If their idea of an infinite and absolute Being be correct, then it must include all being actual and possible; it can neither know nor be the object of knowledge; it cannot be conscious, or cause, or a person, or the subject of any moral attribute. Hamilton infers from all this, that a philosophy of the Absolute is a sheer impossibility; that the Absolute, from its nature and from the necessary limits of human thought, is unknowable, and consequently that the stupendous systems of pantheistic atheism which had been erected on the contrary assumption, must fall to the ground. Those systems have indeed already fallen by their own weight. Although only a few years ago they claimed the homage of the intellectual world and boasted of immutability, they have at the present time scarcely a living advocate.

Unhappily, however, Hamilton, like Samson, is involved in the ruin which he created. In overthrowing pantheism he overthrows Theism. All that he says of the Absolute as unknowable, he affirms to be true of God. All the contradictions which attend the assumption of an absolute and infinite being as the ground of philosophy, he says attend the assumption of an infinite God.

§ 3. Hamilton's Doctrine.

A. God an Object of Faith, but not of Knowledge.

The sense in which Hamilton and his followers represent God as unknowable, has been a matter of dispute. When he says that we can know that God is, but not what He is, he says only what had been said a hundred times before. Plato had said that the search after God was difficult, and that when He is found, it is impossible to declare his nature. Philo still more explicitly teaches that the divine essence is without qualities or attributes, and as we know nothing of any essence but by its distinguishing attributes, God in his own nature is altogether unknowable.¹ This is repeated continually by the Greek and Latin fathers; who, however, in most cases at least, meant nothing more than that God is incomprehensible. Others again, in asserting the incapacity of man to know God, refer to his spiritual blindness occasioned by sin. Therefore, while they deny that God can be known by the unregenerate, they affirm that He is known by those to whom the Son has revealed Him. In like manner although the Apostle asserts that even the heathen know God, he elsewhere speaks of a kind of knowledge due to the saving illumination of the Holy Spirit. It is in the sense that God is past finding out that the devout Pascal says,² "We know there is an infinite, but we are ignorant of its nature. . . . We may well know that there is a God, without knowing what He is." And even John Owen says, "All the rational conceptions of the minds of men are swallowed up and lost, when they would exercise themselves directly on that which is absolute, immense, eternal, and infinite. When we say it is so, we know not what we say, but only that it is not otherwise. What we deny of God we know in some measure—but what we affirm we know not; only we declare what we believe and adore."³ Professor Tyler adds, that while the philosophy of Hamilton "confines our knowledge to the conditioned [the finite], it leaves faith free about the unconditioned [the infinite]; indeed constrains us to believe in it by the highest law of our intelligence."

¹ Mansel, pp. 102, 103.

Although Hamilton often uses the same language when speaking of God as unknowable, as that employed by others, his meaning is very different. He really teaches an ignorance of God destructive of all rational religion, because inconsistent with the possibility of faith.

Different Kinds of Ignorance.

There are different kinds of ignorance. First, there is the ignorance of the idiot, which is blank vacuity. In him the statement of a proposition awakens no mental action whatever. Secondly, there is the ignorance of a blind man, of colour. He does not know what colour is; but he knows there is something which answers to that word and which produces a certain effect on the eyes of those who see. He may even understand the laws by which the production of colour is determined. A blind man has written a treatise on optics. Thirdly, there is the ignorance under which the mind labors when it can prove contradictory propositions concerning the same object, as that the same figure is both square and round. And fourthly, there is the ignorance of imperfect knowledge. Paul speaks of knowing what passes knowledge.

¹ Strauss, Dogmatik, i. p. 527.

² Pensées, partie II. art. III. 5.

³ Tyler's Progress of Philosophy, second edit. p. 147.

Our ignorance of God, according to Hamilton, is neither the ignorance of the idiot nor of imperfect knowledge, but it is analogous to the ignorance of a blind man of colours, and more definitely, the ignorance we labor under with regard to any object of which we can prove contradictions.

Proof that Hamilton Denies that we can Know God.

That this view of his doctrine is correct is proved, (1.) Because he asserts in such broad terms that God cannot be known; that He is not only inconceivable, but incogitable. (2.) Because, he says, that we know that God is not, and cannot be, what we think He is. It is not merely that we cannot determine with certainty that our idea of God is correct, but we know that it is not correct. "To think that God is, as we can think Him to be," he says, "is blasphemy. The last and highest consecration of all true religion, must be an altar, Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ, 'To the unknown and unknowable God.'"¹ (3.) Because both he and Mansel continually assert that the Infinite cannot be a person; cannot know; cannot be cause; cannot be conscious; cannot be the subject of any moral attributes. To think of God as infinite, and to think of Him as a person is an impossibility. (4.) The illustrations which these writers employ determine clearly their meaning. Our ignorance of God is compared to our incapacity to conceive of two straight lines inclosing a portion of space; or to think "a circular parallelogram." It is not merely that we cannot understand such a figure, but we see that, in the nature of things, any such figure is impossible. So we not only cannot understand how God can be absolute and yet a person, but we see that an absolute person is as much a contradiction as a square circle. (5.) Accordingly Herbert Spencer and others, in carrying out Hamilton's principles, come to the conclusion not only that we cannot know God, but that it is impossible that a personal God should exist. There can be no such being.

¹ Discussions, p. 22.

Hamilton's Doctrine of God as an object of Faith.

Hamilton and Mansel, however, are not only Theists, but Christians. They believe in God, and they believe in the Scriptures as a divine revelation. They endeavor to avoid what seem to be the inevitable consequences of their doctrine, by adopting two principles: first, that the unthinkable is possible, and, therefore, may be believed. By the unthinkable is meant that which the laws of reason force us to regard as self-contradictory. On this subject Mansel says: "It is our duty to think of God as personal, and it is our duty to believe that He is infinite. It is true that we cannot reconcile these two representations with each other; as our conception of personality involves attributes apparently contradictory to the notion of infinity. But it does not follow that this contradiction exists anywhere but in our own minds: it does not follow that it implies any impossibility in the absolute nature of God. . . . It proves that there are limits to man's power of thought; and it proves no more."¹ The conclusion is, that as whatever is possible is credible, therefore, as it is possible that God though infinite may be a person, his personality may be rationally believed.

The Unthinkable, or Impossible, cannot be an object of Faith.

On this it may be remarked, —

1. That there is a great difference between the irreconcilable and the self-contradictory. In the one case the difficulty arises, or may arise, out of our ignorance or mental weakness; in the other, it arises out of the nature of the things themselves. Many things are irreconcilable to a child which are not so to a man. Many things are irreconcilable to one man and not to another; to men and not to angels. But the self-contradictory is impossible, and is seen to be so by all orders of mind. That two and two should make twenty, or that the same figure should be a square and a circle, is just as irreconcilable to an angel as to a child. What is self-contradictory cannot possibly be true. Now, according to Hamilton and Mansel, infinity and personality are not only irreconcilable, but contradictory. The one affirms what the other denies. According to their doctrine the Infinite cannot be a person, and a person cannot be infinite, any more than the Infinite can be finite, or the finite infinite. The one of necessity excludes the other. If you affirm the one, you deny the other. There is a great difference between not seeing how a thing is, and clearly seeing that it cannot be. Hamilton and Mansel constantly assert that an absolute person is a contradiction in terms. And so it is, if their definition of the absolute be correct ; and if a contradiction, it is impossible.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, p. 106.

2. If to our reason the personality of an infinite God be a contradiction, then it is impossible rationally to believe that He is a person. It is in vain to say that the contradiction is only in our mind. So is faith in our mind. It is impossible for one and the same mind to see a thing to be false, and believe it to be true. For the reason to see that a thing is a contradiction, is to see it to be false ; and to see it to be false, and to believe it to be true, is a contradiction in terms. Even if to other and higher minds the contradiction does not exist, so long as it exists in the view of any particular mind, for that mind faith in its truth is an impossibility.

It may be said that a man's reason may convince him that the external world does not really exist, while his senses force him to believe in its reality. So reason may pronounce the personality of God a contradiction, and conscience force us to believe that He is a person. This is to confound consecutive with contemporaneous states of mind. It is possible for a man to be an idealist in his study, and a realist out of doors. But he cannot be an idealist and a realist at one and the same time. The mind is a unit. A man's reason is the man himself ; so is his conscience, and so are all his other faculties. It is the one substantive self that thinks and believes. To assume, therefore, that by necessity he must think one way and believe another ; that the laws of his reason force him to regard as false what his conscience or senses force him to regard as true, is to destroy his rationality. It is also to impugn the wisdom and goodness of our Creator, for it supposes Him to have put one part of our constitution in conflict with another ; to have placed us under guides who alternately force us to move in opposite directions. It even places this contradiction in God himself. For what reason, in its legitimate exercise, says, God says ; and what conscience, in its legitimate exercise, says, God says. If, therefore, reason says that God is not a person, and conscience says that He is, then — with reverence be it spoken — God contradicts Himself.

Knowledge essential to Faith.

It is one of the distinguishing doctrines of Protestants that knowledge is essential to faith. This is clearly the doctrine of Scripture. How can they believe on Him of whom they have not heard ? is the pertinent and instructive query of the Apostle. Faith includes the affirmation of the mind that a thing is true and trustworthy. But it is impossible for the mind to affirm anything of that of which it knows nothing. Romanists indeed say that if a man believes that the Church teaches the truth, then he believes all the Church teaches, although ignorant of its doctrines. It might as well be said that because a child has confidence in his father, therefore he knows all his father knows. Truth must be communicated to the mind, and seen to be possible, before, on any evidence, it can be believed. If, therefore, we cannot know God, we cannot believe in Him.

B. Regulative Knowledge.

The second principle which Hamilton and Mansel adopt to save themselves from scepticism is that of regulative knowledge. We are bound to believe that God is what the Scriptures and our moral nature declare Him to be. This revelation, however, does not teach us what God really is, but merely what He wills us to believe concerning Him. Our senses, they say, tell us that things around us are, but not what they are. We can, however, safely act on the assumption that they really are what they appear to be. Our senses, therefore, give only regulative knowledge; i. e., knowledge sufficient to regulate our active life. So we do not, and cannot, know what God really is; but the representations contained in the Scriptures are sufficient to regulate our moral and religious life. We can safely act on the assumption that He really is what we are thus led to think Him to be, although we know that such is not the fact.

We must be "content," says Mansel,¹ "with those regulative ideas of the Deity, which are sufficient to guide our practice, but not to satisfy our intellect,—which tell us not what God is in Himself, but how He wills that we should think of Him." "Though this kind of knowledge," says Hampden,² "is abundantly instructive to us in point of sentiment and action; teaches us, that is, both how to feel, and how to act towards God;—for it is the language that we understand, the language formed by our own experience and practice;—it is altogether inadequate in point of science." Regulative knowledge, therefore, is that which is designed to regulate our character and practice. It need not be true. Nay, it may be, and is demonstrably false; for Hamilton says it is blasphemy to think that God really is what we take Him to be.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, p. 132.

² Bampton Lectures, 1832, p. 54.

Objections to the Doctrine of Regulative Knowledge.

1. The first remark on this doctrine of regulative knowledge is, that it is self-contradictory. Regulative truth is truth designed to accomplish a given end. Design, however, is the intelligent and voluntary adaptation of means to an end; and the intelligent adaptation of means to an end, is a personal act. Unless, therefore, God be really a person, there can be no such thing as regulative knowledge. Mr. Mansell says, we cannot know what God is in Himself, "but only how He wills that we should think of Him." Here "will" is attributed to God; and the personal pronouns are used, and must be used in the very statement of the doctrine. That is, we must assume that God is really (and not merely in our subjective apprehensions) a person, in order to believe in regulative knowledge, which form of knowledge supposes that He is not, or may not be a person. This is a contradiction.

2. Regulative knowledge is, from the nature of the case, powerless, unless its subjects regard it as well founded. Some parents educate their children in the use of fictions and fairy tales; but belief in the truth of these is essential to their effect. So long as the world believed in ghosts and witches, the belief had power. As soon as men were satisfied that there were no such real existences, their power was gone. Had the philosophers convinced the Greeks that their gods were not real persons, there would have been an end to their mythology. And if Hamilton and his disciples can convince the world that the Infinite cannot be a person, the regulative influence of Theism is gone. Men cannot be influenced by representations which they know are not conformed to the truth.

3. This theory is highly derogatory to God. It supposes Him to propose to influence his creatures by false representations; revealing Himself as Father, Governor, and Judge, when there is no objective truth to answer to these representations. And worse than this, as remarked above, it supposes Him to have so constituted our nature as to force us to believe what is not true. We are constrained by the laws of our rational and moral being to think of God as having a nature like our own, and yet we are told it is blasphemy so to regard Him. The theory supposes a conflict between reason and conscience, — between our rational and moral nature. The latter forcing us to believe that God is a person, and the former declaring personality and deity to be contradictory ideas. We do not forget that Mr. Mansel says that the incogitable may be real, that the contradiction is in our own minds, and not necessarily in the nature of things. But this amounts to nothing; for he says continually that the Absolute cannot be a person, cannot be a cause, cannot be conscious, cannot either know or be known. He says, "A thing — an object — an attribute — a person — or any other term signifying one out of many possible objects of consciousness, is by that very relation necessarily declared to be finite."¹ That is, if God be a person, He is of necessity finite. Here the personality of God is said not only to be incogitable, or inconceivable, but impossible. And this is the real doctrine of his book. It must be so. It is intuitively true that the whole cannot be a part of itself; and if the Infinite be "the All," then it cannot be one out of many. If men adopt the principles of pantheists, they cannot consistently avoid their conclusions. Hamilton teaches not merely that God may not be what we think Him to be, but that He cannot so be; that we are ignorant what He is; that He is to us an unknown God. If God, by the laws of our reason, thus forces us to deny his personality, and by the laws of our moral nature makes it not only a duty, but a necessity to believe in his personality, then our nature is chaotic. Man, in that case, is not the noble creature that was formed in the image of God.

4. This doctrine of regulative knowledge destroys the authority of the Scriptures. If all that the Bible teaches concerning the nature of God and concerning his relation to the world, reveals no objective truth, gives us no knowledge of what God really is, then what it teaches concerning the person, offices, and work of Christ, may all be unreal, and there may be no such person and no such Saviour.

C. Objections to the whole Theory.

1. The first and most obvious fallacy in the theory of Hamilton and Mansel, as it appears to us, lies in their definition of the Absolute and Infinite, or in the language of Hamilton, the Unconditioned. By the Absolute they mean that which exists in and of itself, and out of all relation. The Infinite is that, than which nothing greater can be conceived or is possible; which includes all actual and all possible modes of being. Mansel subscribes to the dictum of Hegel that the Absolute must include all modes of being, good as well as evil. In like manner the Infinite must be All. For if any other being exists, the Infinite must of necessity be limited, and, therefore, is no longer infinite.

These definitions determine everything. If the Absolute be that which is incapable of all relation, then it must be alone ; nothing but the Absolute can be actual or possible. Then it can neither know nor be known. And if the Infinite be all, then again there can be no finite. Then it is just as certain that the Absolute and Infinite cannot be cause, or conscious, or a person, as that a square cannot be a circle, or the whole a part of itself. When a definition leads to contradictions and absurdities, when it leads to conclusions which are inconsistent with the laws of our nature, and when it subverts all that consciousness, common sense, and the Bible declare to be true, the only rational inference is that the definition is wrong. This inference we have the right to draw in the present case. The very fact that the definitions of the Absolute and Infinite which Hamilton and Mansel have adopted from the transcendentalists, lead to all the fearful conclusions which they draw from them, is proof enough that they must be wrong. They are founded upon purely speculative à priori grounds. They can have no authority. For if, as these philosophers say, the Absolute and Infinite cannot be known, how can it be defined ? Neither the etymology nor the usage of the words in question justifies the above given definitions of them. Absolute (ab and solvo) means, free, unrestrained, independent ; as when we speak of an absolute monarch or absolute promise ; or, unlimited, as when we speak of absolute space. The word is also used in the sense of finished, or perfect. An absolute being is one that is free, unlimited, independent, and perfect. God is absolute, because He is not dependent for his existence, nature, attributes, or acts, on any other being. He is unlimited, by anything out of Himself or independent of his will. But this does not imply that He is the only being ; nor that in order to be absolute He must be dead, unconscious, or without thought or will. Much less does the word infinite, as applied to God, imply that He must include all forms of being. Space may be infinite without being duration, and duration may be infinite without being space. An infinite spirit does not include material forms of existence, any more than an infinite line is an infinite surface or an infinite solid. When it is said that anything is infinite, all that is properly meant is that no limit is assignable or possible to it as such. An infinite line is that to which no limit can be assigned as a line ; infinite space is that to which no limit can be assigned as space ; an infinite spirit is a spirit which is unlimited in all the attributes of a spirit. It is a great mistake to assume that the infinite must be all. Infinite power is not all power, but simply power to whose efficiency no limitation can be assigned :

and infinite knowledge is not all knowledge, but simply knowledge to the extent of which no limit is possible. So too an infinite substance is not all substance, but a substance which is not excluded from any portion of space by other substances, or limited in the manifestation of any of its attributes or functions by anything out of itself. God, therefore, may be a Spirit infinite, eternal, and immutable in his being and perfections, without being matter, and sin, and misery.

It may be said that as infinite space must include all space, so an infinite being must of necessity include all modes of being. This, however, is a mere play on words. Infinite is sometimes inclusive of all, not from the meaning of the word, but from the nature of the subject of which infinitude is predicated. Infinite space must include all space, because space is in its nature one. But an infinite line does not include all lines, because there may be any number of lines; and an infinite being is not all being, because there may be any number of beings.

It must excite the wonder and indignation of ordinary men to see the fundamental truths of religion and morality endangered or subverted out of deference to the assumption that the Absolute must be unrelated.

Wrong Definition of Knowledge.

2. The second fallacy involved in Hamilton's theory concerns his idea of knowledge. When it is said that God is unknowable, everything depends on what is meant by knowledge. With him to know is to understand, to have a distinct conception, or mental image. This is evident from his using interchangeably the words unthinkable, unknowable, and inconceivable. Thus on a single page¹ Mansel uses the phrases that of which "we do not and cannot think," that "which we cannot conceive," and "that which we are unable to comprehend," as meaning one and the same thing. This is also proved from the manner in which other words and phrases are employed; for example, the Infinite, the Absolute, an absolute beginning, an absolute whole, an absolute part, any increase or diminution of the complement of being. The only sense, however, in which these things are unthinkable, is, that we cannot form a mental image of them. A distinguished German professor, when anything was said to which he could not assent, was accustomed to spread out his hands and close his eyes and say, "Ich kann gar keine Anschauung davon machen." I cannot see it with my mind's eye, I cannot make an image of it. This seems to be a materialistic way of looking at things. The same may be said of cause, substance, and soul, of none of which can we frame a mental image; yet they are not unthinkable. A thing is unthinkable only when it is seen to be impossible, or when we can attach no meaning to the words, or proposition, in which it is stated. This impossibility of intelligent thought may arise from our weakness. The problems of the higher mathematics are unthinkable to a child. Or, the impossibility may arise from the nature of the thing itself. That a triangle should have four sides, or a circle be a square, is absolutely unthinkable. But in neither of these senses is the Infinite unthinkable. It is not impossible, for Hamilton and Mansel both admit that God is in fact infinite; nor is that proposition unintelligible. It conveys a perfectly clear and distinct idea to the mind. When the mind affirms to itself that space is infinite, i. e., that it cannot be limited, it knows what it means just as well as when it says that two and two are four. Neither is an absolute beginning unthinkable. If, indeed, by absolute beginning is meant uncaused beginning, the coming into existence of something out of nothing, and produced by nothing, then it is impossible and therefore incogitable. But the dictum is applied to a creation ex nihilo, which is declared to be unthinkable. This, however, is denied. We will to move a limb, and it moves. God said, Let there be light, and light was. The one event is just as intelligible as the other. In neither case can we comprehend the nexus between the antecedent and the consequent, between the volition and the effect; but as facts they are equally thinkable and knowable.

It is not possible to give the evidence scattered through the writings of Hamilton and Mansel, that they use the word "to know" in the sense of comprehending, or, forming a mental image of the object known. Mansel¹ quotes the following sentence from Dr. McCosh's work on the "Method of the Divine Government," namely, "The mind seeks in vain to embrace the infinite in a positive image, but is constrained to believe, when its efforts fail, that there is a something to which no limits can be put." This sentence Mansel says may be accepted "by the most uncompromising adherent" of Sir W. Hamilton's doctrine, that the infinite is unthinkable and unknowable. To know, therefore, according to Hamilton and Mansel, is to form a mental image of; and as we cannot form such an image of God, God cannot be known. Mansel is disposed to think that this reduces the controversy to a matter of words. And Dr. Tyler, in his able exposition of Hamilton's philosophy, says,¹ "So it be admitted, as it must, that all our intelligence of God is by analogy, it matters but little, practically, whether the conviction be called knowledge, belief, or faith." It is, however, very far from being a dispute about words. For Hamilton constantly asserts that God is not, and cannot be, what we think He is. Then we have no God. For what is God as infinite, if as Mansel says, "The Infinite, if it is to be conceived at all, must be conceived as potentially everything and actually nothing."²

¹ Page 280.

What is meant by Knowledge.

Knowledge is the perception of truth. Whatever the mind perceives, whether intuitively or discursively, to be true, that it knows. We have immediate knowledge of all the facts of consciousness; and with regard to other matters, some we can demonstrate, some we can prove analogically, some we must admit or involve ourselves in contradictions and absurdities. Whatever process the mind may institute, if it arrives at a clear perception that a thing is, then that thing is an object of knowledge. It is thus we know the objects with which heaven and earth are crowded. It is thus we know our fellow men. With regard to anything without us, when our ideas, or convictions concerning it, correspond to what the thing really is, then we know it. How do we know that our nearest friend has a soul, and that that soul has intelligence, moral excellence, and power? We cannot see or feel it. We cannot form a mental image of it. It is mysterious and incomprehensible. Yet we know that it is, and what it is, just as certainly as we know that we ourselves are, and what we are. In the same way we know that God is, and what He is. We know that He is a spirit, that He has intelligence, moral excellence, and power to an infinite degree. We know that He can love, pity, and pardon; that He can hear and answer prayer. We know God in the same sense and just as certainly as we know our father or mother. And no man can take this knowledge from us, or persuade us that it is not knowledge, but a mere irrational belief.

Hamilton's Doctrine Leads to Scepticism.

3. The principles on which Hamilton and Mansel deny that God can be known, logically lead to scepticism. Hamilton has indeed rendered invaluable service to the cause of truth by his defence of what is, perhaps, infelicitously called the "Philosophy of Common Sense." The principles of that philosophy are: (1.) That what is given in consciousness is undoubtedly true. (2.) That whatever the laws of our nature force us to believe, must be accepted as true. (3.) That this principle applies to all the elements of our nature, to the senses, the reason, and the conscience. We cannot rationally or consistently with our allegiance to God, deny what our senses, reason, or conscience pronounce to be true. (4.) Neither the individual man, nor the cause of truth, however, is to be left to the mercy of what any one may choose to say reason or conscience teaches. Nothing is to be accepted as the authoritative judgment of either reason or conscience, which does not bear the criteria of universality and necessity.

¹ See Progress of Philosophy, by Samuel Tyler, LL.D., p. 207.

² Limits of Religious Thought, p. 94.

Hamilton has drawn from the stores of his erudition, in this department perhaps unexampled, proof that these principles have been recognized by the leading philosophic minds in all ages. He himself sustains them with earnestness as the safeguards of truth. He impressively asserts that if consciousness once be convicted of falsehood, all is lost; we have then no resting place for either science or religion; that absolute scepticism follows, if it be denied that necessity and universality of belief are not decisive proof of the truth of what is thus believed. Even Stuart Mill admits that "whatever is known to us by consciousness, is known beyond possibility of question."¹ Mr. Mansel tells us that it is from consciousness we get our idea of substance, of personality, of cause, of right and wrong, in short of everything which lies at the foundation of knowledge and religion; and therefore if consciousness deceive us we have nothing to depend upon. Mansel thus expounds the famous aphorism of Des Cartes, "Cogito ergo sum," i. e., "I, who see, and hear, and think, and feel, am the one continuous self, whose existence gives unity and connection to the whole. Personality comprises all that we know of that which exists; relation to personality comprises all that we know of that which seems to exist."² "Consciousness," he says, "gives us the knowledge of substance. We are a substantive existence."³ "I exist as I am conscious of existing; and conscious self is itself the Ding an sich, the standard by which all representations of personality must be judged, and from which our notion of reality, as distinguished from appearance, is originally derived."⁴ Hamilton

¹ Logic, Introduction, p. 4, edit. N. Y. 1846.

² Limits of Religious Thought, p. 105.

³ Ibid. p. 288.

⁴ Ibid. p. 291.

and Mansel therefore teach that the veracity of consciousness is the foundation of all knowledge, and that the denial of that veracity inevitably leads to absolute scepticism. Nevertheless they teach that our senses deceive us; that reason deceives us; that conscience deceives us; that is, that our sensuous, rational, and moral consciousness are alike deceptive and unreliable.

Our senses give us the knowledge of the external world. They teach us that things are, and what they are. It is admitted that the universal and irresistible belief of men, as that belief is determined by their sense and consciousness, is that things really are what to our senses they appear to be. Philosophers tell us this is a delusion. Kant says that they certainly are not what we take them to be. Mansel says this is going rather too far. We cannot know, indeed, what they are, but it is possible that they are in fact what they appear to be. In either case they are to us an unknown quantity, and the senses deceive us. They assume to teach more than they have a right to teach, and we are bound to believe them.

Kant teaches that our reason, that the necessary laws of thought which govern our mental operations, lead to absolute contradictions. In this Hamilton and Mansel fully agree with him. They tell us that reason teaches that the Absolute must be all things actual and possible; that there cannot be an absolute or infinite person, or cause; that being and not-being are identical; that the infinite is "potentially all things and actually nothing." These and similar contradictions are said to be inevitable results of all attempts to know God as an Absolute and Infinite Being. "The conception of the Absolute and Infinite, from whatever side we view it, appears encompassed with contradictions. There is a contradiction in supposing such an object to exist, whether alone or in conjunction with others; and there is a contradiction in supposing it not to exist. There is a contradiction in conceiving it as one, and there is a contradiction in conceiving it as many. There is a contradiction in conceiving it as personal; and there is a contradiction in conceiving it as impersonal. It cannot without contradiction be represented as active; nor, without equal contradiction, be represented as inactive. It cannot be conceived as the sum of all existence; nor yet can it be conceived of as a part only of that sum."¹ Yet all this we are called upon to believe; for it is our duty, he says, to believe that God is infinite and absolute. That is, we are bound to believe what our rational consciousness pronounces to be contradictory and impossible.

¹ Limits of Religious Thought, p. 85.

Conscience, or our moral consciousness, is no less deceptive. Mr. Mansel admits that we are conscious of dependence and of moral obligation; that this involves what he calls "the consciousness of God," i. e., that we stand in the relation to God of one spirit to another spirit, of one person to another person; a person so superior to us as to have rightfully supreme authority over us, and who has all the power and all the moral perfections which enter into our idea of God. But all this is a delusion. It is a delusion, because what our moral consciousness thus teaches involves all the contradictions and absurdities above mentioned; because it is said to teach not what God is, but only what it is desirable that we should think He is; and because we are told that it is blasphemy to think that He is what we take Him to be.

The theory, therefore, of Hamilton and Mansel as to the knowledge of God is suicidal. It is inconsistent with the veracity of consciousness, which is the fundamental principle of their philosophy. The theory is an incongruous combination of sceptical principles with orthodox faith, the anti-theistic principles of Kant with Theism. One or the other must be given up. We cannot believe in a personal God, if an infinite person be a contradiction and absurdity.

God has not so constituted our nature as to make it of necessity deceptive. The senses, reason, and conscience, within their appropriate spheres, and in their normal exercise, are trustworthy guides. They teach us real, and not merely apparent or regulative truth. Their combined spheres comprehend all the relations in which we, as rational creatures, stand to the external world, to our fellow-men, and to God. Were it not for the disturbing element of sin, we know not that man, in full communion with his Maker, whose favour is light and life, would have needed any other guides. But man is not in his original and normal state. In apostatizing from God, man fell into a state of darkness and confusion. Reason and conscience are no longer adequate guides as to "the things of God." Of fallen men, the Apostle says: "That when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools; and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things" (Rom. i. 21-23); or, worse yet, into an absolute and infinite being, without consciousness, intelligence, or moral character; a being which is potentially all things, and actually nothing. It is true, therefore, as the same Apostle tells us, that the world by wisdom knows not God. It is true in a still higher sense, as the Lord himself says, that no man “knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him.” (Matt. xi. 27.)

Necessity of a Supernatural Revelation.

We need, therefore, a divine supernatural revelation. Of this revelation, it is to be remarked, first, that it gives us real knowledge. It teaches us what God really is; what sin is; what the law is; what Christ and the plan of salvation through Him are; and what is to be the state of the soul after death. The knowledge thus communicated is real, in the sense that the ideas which we are thus led to form of the things revealed conform to what those things really are. God and Christ, holiness and sin, heaven and hell, really are what the Bible declares them to be. Sir William Hamilton¹ divides the objects of knowledge into two classes: those derived from within, from the intelligence; and those derived from experience. The latter are of two kinds: what we know from our own experience, and what we know from the experience of others, authenticated to us by adequate testimony. In the generally received sense of the word this is true knowledge. No man hesitates to say that he knows that there was such a man as Washington, or such an event as the American Revolution. If the testimony of men can give us clear and certain knowledge of facts beyond our experience, surely the testimony of God is greater. What He reveals is made known. We apprehend it as it truly is. The conviction that what God reveals is made known in its true nature, is the very essence of faith in the divine testimony. We are certain, therefore, that our ideas of God, founded on the testimony of his Word, correspond to what He really is, and constitute true knowledge. It is also to be remembered that while the testimony of men is to the mind, the testimony of God is not only to, but also within the mind. It illuminates and informs; so that the testimony of God is called the demonstration of the Spirit.

The second remark concerning the revelation contained in the Scriptures is, that while it makes known truths far above the reach of sense or reason, it reveals nothing which contradicts either. It harmonizes with our whole nature. It supplements all our other knowledge, and authenticates itself by harmonizing the testimony of enlightened consciousness with the testimony of God in his Word.

¹ Lectures on Logic. Lecture 32d.

The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is, that we know God in the same sense in which we know ourselves and things out of ourselves. We have the same conviction that God is, and that He is, in Himself, and independently of our thought of Him, what we take Him to be. Our subjective idea corresponds to the objective reality. This knowledge of God is the foundation of all religion; and therefore to deny that God can be known, is really to deny that rational religion is possible. In other words, it makes religion a mere sentiment, or blind feeling, instead of its being what the Apostle declares it to be, a λογικὴ λατρεία, a rational service; the homage of the reason as well as of the heart and life. "Our knowledge of God," says Hase, "developed and enlightened by the Scriptures, answers to what God really is, for He cannot deceive us as to his own nature."¹

¹ See on this subject, Sir William Hamilton's Discussions on Philosophy and Literature; Hamilton's Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic, edited by Rev. Henry L. Mansel and John Veitch, M. A.; Philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, arranged and edited by O. W. Wight, translator of Cousin's History of Modern Philosophy; The Limits of Religious Thought, eight lectures on the Bampton Foundation, by Henry Longueville Mansel, B. D.; Calderwood's Philosophy of the Infinite; Dr. McCosh's works on the Method of the Divine Government; The Intuitions of the Mind; Defence of Fundamental Truths; Princeton Review, April, 1862, Philosophy of the Absolute, an article by Dr. Charles W. Shields; October, 1861, Review of Dr. Hicok's Rational Psychology, by Dr. Stephen Alexander; and A Philosophical Confession of Faith, by the same writer, a very able and concise statement of fundamental principles, in the number for July, 1867, of the same journal. See also Mill's Review of Hamilton's Philosophy, and the admirable work of Professor Noah Porter, of New Haven, on the Human Intellect, part fourth, chap. viii.

CHAPTER V.

NATURE AND ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

§ 1. Definitions of God.

THE question whether God can be defined, depends for its answer on what is meant by definition. Cicero¹ says, "Est definitio, earum rerum, quæ sunt ejus rei propriæ, quam definire volumus, brevis et circumscripta quædam explicatio." In this sense God cannot be defined. No creature, much less man, can know all that is proper to God; and, therefore, no creature can give an exhaustive statement of all that God is.

To define, however, is simply to bound, to separate, or distinguish; so that the thing defined may be discriminated from all other things. This may be done (1.) By stating its characteristics. (2.) By stating its genus and its specific difference. (3.) By analyzing the idea as it lies in our minds. (4.) By an explanation of the term or name by which it is denoted. All these methods amount to much the same thing. When we say we can define God, all that is meant is, that we can analyze the idea of God as it lies in our mind; or, that we can state the class of beings to which He belongs, and the attributes by which He is distinguished from all other beings. Thus, in the simple definition, God is ens perfectissimum, the word ens designates Him as a being, not an idea, but as that which has real, objective existence; and absolute perfection distinguishes Him from all other beings. The objection to this and most other definitions of God is, that they do not bring out with sufficient fulness the contents of the idea. This objection bears against such definitions as the following: Ens absolutum, the self-existent, independent being; and that by Calovius, "Deus est essentia spiritualis infinita;" and Reinhard's² "Deus est, Natura necessaria, a mundo diversa, summas complexa perfectiones et ipsius mundi causa;" or Baumgarten's "Spiritus perfectissimus, rationem sui ipsius rerumque contingentium omnium seu mundi continens;" or, that of Morus, "Spiritus perfectissimus, conditor, conservator, et gubernator mundi." Probably the best definition of God ever penned by man, is that given in the "Westminster Catechism": "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." This is a true definition; for it states the class of beings to which God is to be referred. He is a Spirit; and He is distinguished from all other spirits in that He is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being and perfections. It is also a complete definition, in so far as it is an exhaustive statement of the contents of our idea of God.

¹ De Oratore, i. 42, 189, edit. Leipzig, 1850, p. 84.

² Dogmatik, p. 92.

In what sense, however, are these terms used? What is meant by the words "being," and "perfections," or "attributes" of God? In what relation do his attributes stand to his essence and to each other? These are questions on which theologians, especially during the scholastic period, expended much time and labor.

Being of God.

By being is here meant that which has a real, substantive existence. It is equivalent to substance, or essence. It is opposed to what is merely thought, and to a mere force or power. We get this idea, in the first place, from consciousness. We are conscious of self as the subject of the thoughts, feelings, and volitions, which are its varying states and acts. This consciousness of substance is involved in that of personal identity. In the second place, a law of our reason constrains us to believe that there is something which underlies the phenomena of matter and mind, of which those phenomena are the manifestation. It is impossible for us to think of thought and feeling, unless there be something that thinks and feels. It is no less impossible to think of action, unless there be something that acts; or of motion, unless there be something that moves. To assume, therefore, that mind is only a series of acts and states, and that matter is nothing but force, is to assume that nothing (nonentity) can produce effects.

God, therefore, is in his nature a substance, or essence, which is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable; the common subject of all divine perfections, and the common agent of all divine acts. This is as far as we can go, or need to go. We have no definite idea of substance, whether of matter or mind, as distinct from its attributes. The two are inseparable. In knowing the one we know the other. We cannot know hardness except as we know something hard. We have, therefore, the same knowledge of the essence of God, as we have of the substance of the soul. All we have to do in reference to the divine essence, as a Spirit, is to deny of it, as we do of our own spiritual essence, what belongs to material substances ; and to affirm of it, that in itself and its attributes it is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable. When, therefore, we say there is a God, we do not assert merely that there is in our minds the idea of an infinite Spirit ; but that, entirely independent of our idea of Him, such a Being really exists. Augustine¹ says, “ Deus est quædam substantia ; nam quod nulla substantia est, nihil omnino est. Substantia ergo aliquid esse est.”

If, therefore, a divine essence, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, exists, this essence existed before and independent of the world. It follows also that the essence of God is distinct from the world. The Scriptural doctrine of God is consequently opposed to the several forms of error already mentioned ; to Hylozoism, which assumes that God, like man, is a composite being, the world being to Him what the body is to us ; to Materialism, which denies the existence of any spiritual substance, and affirms that the material alone is real ; to extreme Idealism, which denies not only the reality of the internal world, but all real objective existence, and affirms that the subjective alone is real ; to Pantheism, which either makes the world the existence form of God, or, denying the reality of the world, makes God the only real existence. That is, it either makes nature God, or, denying nature, makes God everything.

§ 2. Divine Attributes.

To the divine essence, which in itself is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, belong certain perfections revealed to us in the constitution of our nature and in the word of God. These divine perfections are called attributes as essential to the nature of a divine Being, and necessarily involved in our idea of God. The older theologians distinguished the attributes of God, (1.) From predicates which refer to God in the concrete, and indicate his relation to his creatures, as creator, preserver, ruler, etc. (2.) From properties, which are technically the distinguishing characteristics of the several persons of the Trinity. There are certain acts or relations peculiar or proper to the Father, others to the Son, and others to the Spirit. And (3.) From accidents or qualities which may or may not belong to a substance, which may be acquired or lost. Thus holiness was not an attribute of the nature of Adam, but an accident, something which he might lose and still remain a man ; whereas intelligence was an attribute, because the loss of intelligence involves the loss of humanity.

¹ Enarratio in Psalmum, lxxviii. 1. 5, edit. Benedictines, vol. iv. p. 983 c.

The perfections of God, therefore, are attributes, without which He would cease to be God.

Relation of the Attributes to the Essence of God.

In attempting to explain the relation in which the attributes of God stand to his essence and to each other, there are two extremes to be avoided. First, we must not represent God as a composite being, composed of different elements; and, secondly, we must not confound the attributes, making them all mean the same thing, which is equivalent to denying them all together. The Realists of the Middle Ages tended to the former of these extremes, and the Nominalists to the other. Realists held that general terms express not merely thoughts, or abstract conceptions in our minds, but real or substantive, objective existence. And hence they were disposed to represent the divine attributes as differing from each other realiter, as one res or thing differs from another. The Nominalists, on the other hand, said general terms are mere words answering to abstractions formed by the mind. And consequently when we speak of different attributes in God, we only use different words for one and the same thing. Occam, Biel, and other Nominalists, therefore, taught that "Attributa divina nec rei, nec rationis distinctione, inter se aut ab essentia divina distingui; sed omnem distinctionem esse solum in nominibus." The Lutheran and Reformed theologians tended much more to the latter of these extremes than to the former. They generally taught, in the first place, that the unity and simplicity of the divine essence precludes not only all physical composition of constituent elements, or of matter and form, or of subject and accidents; but also all metaphysical distinction as of act and power, essence and existence, nature and personality; and even of logical difference, as genus and specific difference.

In the second place, the theologians were accustomed to say that the attributes of God differ from his essence non re, sed ratione. This is explained by saying that things differ ex natura rei, when they are essentially different as soul and body; while a difference ex ratione is merely a difference in us, i. e., in our conceptions, i. e., "quod distincte solum concipitur, cum in re ipsa distinctum non sit." Hence the divine attributes are defined as "conceptus essentiae divinæ inadequatæ, ex parte rei ipsam essentiam involventes, eandemque intrinsicè denominantes." Aquinas says, "Dens est unus re et plures ratione, quia intellectus noster ita multipliciter apprehendit Deum, sicuti res multipliciter ipsum representant." The language of the Lutheran theologian Quenstedt¹ exhibits the usual mode of representing this subject: "Si proprie et accurate loqui velimus, Deus nullas habet proprietates, sed mera et simplicissima est essentia quæ nec realem differentiam nec ullam vel rerum vel modorum admittit compositionem. Quia vero simplicissimam Dei essentiam uno adequato conceptu adequate concipere non possumus, ideo inadequatis et distinctis conceptibus, inadequate essentiam divinam representantibus, eam apprehendimus, quos inadequatos conceptus, qui a parte rei essentiæ divinæ identificantur, et a nobis per modum affectionum apprehenduntur, attributa vocamus." And again, "Attributa divina a parte rei et in se non multa sunt, sed ut ipsa essentia divina, ita et attributa, quæ cum illa identificantur, simplicissima unitas sunt; multa vero dicuntur (1.) συγκαταβατικῶς, ad nostrum concipiendi modum, . . . (2.) ἐνεργητικῶς, in ordine ad effecta."² The favorite illustration to explain what was meant by this unity of the divine attributes, was drawn from the sun. His ray, by one and the same power (as was then assumed) illuminates, warms, and produces chemical changes, not from any diversity in it, but from diversity in the nature of the objects on which it operates. The force is the same; the effects are different. The meaning of these theologians is further determined by their denying that the relation of attribute and essence in God is analogous to the relation of intelligence and will to the essence of the soul in man; and also by the frequently recurring declaration, borrowed from the schoolmen, that God is actus purus. Schleiermacher goes still further in the same direction. With him the divine attributes are mere Beziehungen, or relations of God to us. He commonly resolves them into mere causality. Thus he defines the holiness of God to be that causality in Him which produces conscience in us.

Divine Attributes.

A third and less objectionable way of representing the matter is adopted by those who say with Hollazius: "Attributa divina ab essentia divina et a se invicem, distinguuntur non nominaliter neque realiter sed formaliter, secundum nostrum concipiendi modum, non sine certo distinctionis fundamento."³ This is very different from saying that they differ ratione tantum. Turretin says the attributes are to be distinguished not realiter, but virtualiter; that is, there is a real foundation in the divine nature for the several attributes ascribed to Him.

¹ Theologia, part 1. cap. viii. § 2, edit. Leipzig, 1715, p. 426.

² Ibid. 11. cap. viii. § 2, p. 426.

³ Examen Theologicum, edit. Leipzig, 1763, p. 235.

It is evident that this question of the relation of the divine attributes to the divine essence merges itself into the general question of the relation between attributes and substance. It is also evident that this is a subject about which one man knows just as much as another; because all that can be known about it is given immediately in consciousness.

This subject has already been referred to. We are conscious of ourselves as a thinking substance. That is, we are conscious that that which is ourselves has identity, continuance, and power. We are further conscious that the substance self thinks, wills, and feels. Intelligence, will, and sensibility, are its functions, or attributes, and consequently the attributes of a spirit. These are the ways in which a spirit acts. Anything which does not thus act, which has not these functions or attributes, is not a spirit. If you take from a spirit its intelligence, will, and sensibility, nothing remains; its substance is gone; at least it ceases to be a spirit. Substance and attributes are inseparable. The one is known in the other. A substance without attributes is nothing, i. e., no real existence. What is true of spiritual substances is true of matter. Matter, without the essential properties of matter, is a contradiction.

We know, therefore, from consciousness, as far as it can be known, the relation between substance and its attributes. And all that can be done, or need be done, is to deny or correct the false representations which are so often made on the subject.

The Divine Attributes do not differ merely in our Conceptions.

To say, as the schoolmen, and so many even of Protestant theologians, ancient and modern, were accustomed to say, that the divine attributes differ only in name, or in our conceptions, or in their effects, is to destroy all true knowledge of God. Thus even Augustine confounds knowledge and power, when he says,¹ "Nos ista, quæ fecisti videmus quia sunt: tu autem quia vides ea, sunt." So Scotus Erigena² says, "Non aliud est ei videre, aliud facere; sed visio illius voluntas ejus est, et voluntas operatio." Thomas Aquinas³ says the same thing: "Deus per intellectum suum causat res, cum suum esse sit suum intelligere." And again, "Scientia (Dei) causat res; nostra vero causatur rebus et dependat ab eis." Even Mr. Mansel,⁴ to aggravate our ignorance of God, speaks of Him as "an intellect whose thought creates its own object." It is

¹ Confessiones, XIII. XXXVIII. 53, edit. Benedictines, vol. i. p. 410 b.

² De Divisione Nature, III. 29, edit. Westphalia, 1838, p. 264.

³ Summa, I. XIV. 8, edit. Cologne, 1640, p. 30.

⁴ Limits, p. 195.

obvious that, according to this view, God is simply a force of which we know nothing but its effects. If in God eternity is identical with knowledge, knowledge with power, power with ubiquity, and ubiquity with holiness, we are using words without meaning when we attribute any perfection to God. We must, therefore, either give up the attempt to determine the divine attributes from our speculative idea of an infinite essence, or renounce all knowledge of God, and all faith in the revelation of Himself, which He has made in the constitution of our nature, in the external world, and in his Word. Knowledge is no more identical with power in God than it is in us. Thought in Him is no more creative than is thought in us. Otherwise creation is eternal, and God creates everything — all the thoughts, feelings, and volitions of his creatures, good and evil; and God is the only real agent, and the only real being in the universe. According to this doctrine, also, there can be no difference between the actual and the possible, for the one as well as the other is always present to the divine mind. It would also follow that the creation must be infinite, or God finite. For if knowledge is causative, God creates all He knows, and you must limit his knowledge if you limit creation. It need hardly be remarked that this doctrine is derogatory to God. It is not only a much higher idea, but one essential to personality, that there should be a real distinction between the divine attributes. That which from its nature and by necessity does all that it can do, is a force, and not a person. It can have no will. The doctrine in question, therefore, is essentially pantheistic. "However much," says Martensen, "we must guard our idea of God from being degraded by anything that is merely human, from all false Anthropomorphism, yet we can find in Nominalism only the denial of God as He is revealed in the Scriptures. It is the denial of the very essence of faith, if it is only in our thoughts that God is holy and righteous, and not in his own nature; if it is we who so address Him, and not He who so reveals Himself. We teach, therefore, with the Realists (of one class), that the attributes of God are objectively true as revealed, and therefore have their ground in the divine essence." There is a kind of Realism, as Martensen admits, which is as destructive of the true idea of God as the Nominalism which makes his attributes differ only in name. It grants, indeed, objective reality to our ideas; but these ideas, according to it, have no real subject. "The idea of omnipotence, righteousness, and holiness," he says, "is a mere blind thought, if there be not an omnipotent, righteous, and holy One."¹

¹ Dogmatik, p. 113.

The Divine Attributes not to be resolved into Causality.

It amounts to much the same doctrine, to resolve all the attributes of God into causality. It was a principle with some of the schoolmen, "Affectus in Deo denotat effectum." This was so applied as to limit our knowledge of God to the fact that God is the cause of certain effects. Thus, when we say God is just, we mean nothing more than that He causes misery to follow sin; when we say He is holy, it only means that He is the cause of conscience in us. As a tree is not sweet, because its fruit is luscious, so God is not holy, He is only the cause of holiness. Against this application of the principle, Aquinas himself protested, declaring, "Cum igitur dicitur, Deus est bonus; non est sensus, Deus est causa bonitatis; vel Deus non est malus. Sed est sensus: Id, quod bonitatem dicimus in creaturis, præexistit in Deo; et hoc quidem secundum modum altiorem. Unde ex hoc non sequitur, quod Deo competat esse bonum, in quantum causat bonitatem; sed potius e converso, quia est bonus, bonitatem rebus diffundit."¹ And the Lutheran theologian, Quenstedt, says, "Dicunt nonnulli, ideo Deum dici justum, sanctum, misericordem, veracem, etc., non quod revera sit talis, sed quod duntaxat sanctitatis, justitiæ, misericordiæ, veritatis, etc., causa sit et auctor in aliis. Sed si Deus non est vere misericors, neque vere perfectus, vere sanctus, etc., sed causa tantum misericordiæ et sanctitatis in aliis, ita etiam et nos pariter juberemur esse non vere misericordes, non vere perfecti, etc., sed sanctitatis saltem et misericordiæ in aliis auctores."²

The Divine Attributes differ Virtualiter.

Theologians, to avoid the blank ignorance of God which must follow from the extreme view of the simplicity of his essence, which requires us to assume that the divine attributes differ only in our conceptions, or as expressing the diverse effects of the activity of God, made a distinction between the ratio rationantis and the ratio rationatæ. That is, the reason as determining, and the reason as determined. The attributes, they say, differ not re, but ratione; not in our subjective reason only; but there is in God a reason why we think of Him as possessing these diverse perfections. This idea, as before stated, was often expressed by saying that the divine attributes differ neither realiter, nor nominaliter, but virtualiter. If this be understood to mean that the divine perfections are really what the Bible declares them to be; that God truly thinks, feels, and acts; that He is truly wise, just, and good; that He is truly omnipotent, and voluntary, acting or not acting, as He sees fit; that He can hear and answer prayer; it may be admitted. But we are not to give up the conviction that God is really in Himself what He reveals Himself to be, to satisfy any metaphysical speculations as to the difference between essence and attribute in an infinite Being. The attributes of God, therefore, are not merely different conceptions in our minds, but different modes in which God reveals Himself to his creatures (or to Himself); just as our several faculties are different modes in which the inscrutable substance self reveals itself in our consciousness and acts. It is an old saying, "Qualis homo, talis Deus." And Clemens Alexandrinus¹ says, "If any one knows himself, he will know God." And Leibnitz expresses the same great truth when he says,² "The perfections of God are those of our own souls, but He possesses them without limit. He is an ocean of which we have only received a few drops. There is in us something of power, something of knowledge, something of goodness; but these attributes are in entirety in Him." There is indeed danger in either extreme; danger of degrading God in our thoughts, by reducing Him to the standard of our nature, and danger of denying Him as He is revealed. In our day, and among educated men, and especially among students of philosophy, the latter danger is by far the greater of the two. We should remember that we lose God, when we lose our confidence in saying Thou! to Him, with the assurance of being heard and helped.

¹ Summa, i. xlii. 2, edit. Cologne, 1640, p. 28.

² Theologia, i. viii. § ii. 2, p. 431.

§ 3. Classification of the Divine Attributes.

On few subjects have greater thought and labor been expended than on this. Perhaps, however, the benefit has not been commensurate with the labor. The object of classification is order, and the object of order is clearness. So far as this end is secured, it is a good. But the great diversity of the methods which have been proposed, is evidence that no one method of arrangement has such advantages as to secure for it general recognition.

1. Some, as has been seen, preclude all necessity of a classification of the attributes, by reducing them all to unity, or regarding them as different phases under which we contemplate the Supreme Being as the ground of all things. With them the whole discussion of the divine attributes is an analysis of the idea of the Infinite and Absolute.

¹ Pedagogus, III. i, edit. Cologne, 1688, p. 214 a.

² "Théodicée," Preface, Works, p. 469, edit. Berlin, 1840.

2. Others arrange the attributes according to the mode in which we arrive at the knowledge of them. We form our idea of God, it is said, (1.) By the way of causation; that is, by referring to Him as the great first cause every virtue manifested by the effects which He produces. (2.) By the way of negation; that is, by denying to Him the limitations and imperfections which belong to his creatures. (3.) By the way of eminence, in exalting to an infinite degree or without limit the perfections which belong to an infinite Being. If this is so, the attributes conceived of by one of these methods belong to one class, and those conceived of, or of which we attain the knowledge by another method, belong to another class. This principle of classification is perhaps the one most generally adopted. It gives rise, however, really but to two classes, namely, the positive and negative, i. e., those in which something is affirmed, and those in which something is denied concerning God. To the negative class are commonly referred simplicity, infinity, eternity, immutability; to the positive class, power, knowledge, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth. Instead of calling the one class negative and the other positive, they are often distinguished as absolute and relative. By an absolute attribute is meant one which belongs to God, considered in Himself, and which implies no relation to other beings; by a relative attribute is meant one which implies relation to an object. They are also distinguished as immanent and transient, as communicable and incommunicable. These terms are used interchangeably. They do not express different modes of classification, but are different modes of designating the same classification. Negative, absolute, immanent, and incommunicable, are designations of one class; and positive, relative, transitive, and communicable, are designations of the other class.

3. A third principle of classification is derived from the constitution of our own nature. In man there is the substance or essence of the soul, the intellect, and the will. Hence, it is said, we can most naturally arrange the attributes of God under three heads. First, those pertaining to his essence; second, those referring to his intellect; and third, those referring to his will, the word "will" being taken in its most comprehensive sense.

4. Others again seek the principle of classification in the nature of the attributes themselves. Some include the idea of moral excellence, and others do not. Hence they are distinguished as natural and moral. The word natural, however, is ambiguous. Taking it in the sense of what constitutes or pertains to the nature, the holiness and justice of God are as much natural as his power or knowledge. And on the other hand, God is infinite and eternal in his moral perfections, although infinity and eternity are not distinctively moral perfections. In the common and familiar sense of the word natural, the terms natural and moral express a real distinction.

5. Schleiermacher's method is, of course, peculiar. It is based on the characteristic principle of his system, that all religion is founded on a sense of dependence, and all theology consists in what that sense of dependence teaches us. He does not treat of the divine attributes in any one place, but here and there, as they come up according to his plan. Our sense of dependence does not awaken in our consciousness a feeling of opposition to God's eternity, omnipotence, omnipresence, or omniscience. These, therefore, are treated of in one place. But we, as dependent creatures, are conscious of opposition to God's holiness and righteousness. These, therefore, belong to another head. And as this opposition is removed through Christ, we are brought into relation to God's grace or love, and to his wisdom. These form a third class.

That so many different principles of classification have been adopted, and that each of those principles is carried out in so many different ways, shows the uncertainty and difficulty attending the whole subject. It is proposed in what follows to accept the guidance of the answer given in the "Westminster Catechism," to the question, What is God? It is assumed in that answer that God is a self-existent and necessary Being; and it is affirmed of Him, I. That He is a Spirit. II. That as such He is infinite, eternal, and immutable. III. That He is infinite, eternal, and immutable, (1.) In his being. (2.) In all that belongs to his intelligence, namely, in his knowledge and wisdom. (3.) In all that belongs to his will, namely, his power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth. Whatever speculative objections may be made to this plan, it has the advantage of being simple and familiar.

§ 4. Spirituality of God.

A. The Meaning of the Word "Spirit."

The fundamental principle of interpretation of all writings, sacred or profane, is that words are to be understood in their historical sense; that is, in the sense in which it can be historically proved that they were used by their authors and intended to be understood by those to whom they were addressed. The object of language is the communication of thought. Unless words are taken in the sense in which those who employ them know they will be understood, they fail of their design. The sacred writings being the words of God to man, we are bound to take them in the sense in which those to whom they were originally addressed must inevitably have taken them. What is the meaning of the word "spirit?" or rather, What is the usus loquendi of the Hebrew and Greek words to which our word "spirit" corresponds? In answering this question, we learn what our Lord meant when he said God is a Spirit. Originally the words רוח and πνεῦμα meant the moving air, especially the breath, as in the phrase πνεῦμα βίου; then any invisible power; then the human soul. In saying, therefore, that God is a Spirit, our Lord authorizes us to believe that whatever is essential to the idea of a spirit, as learned from our own consciousness, is to be referred to God as determining his nature. On this subject consciousness teaches, and has taught all men, —

1. That the soul is a substance; that our thoughts and feelings have a common ground, of which they are the varying states or acts. Substance is that which has an objective existence, and has permanence and power. Even Kant says: "Wo Handlung, mithin Thätigkeit und Kraft ist, da ist auch Substanz," where operation, and consequently activity and power are, there is substance.¹ This is not only the common conviction of men, but it is admitted by the vast majority of philosophers. As before remarked, that there should be action without something acting, is as unthinkable as that there should be motion without something moving.

2. Consciousness teaches that the soul is an individual subsistence. This is included in the consciousness of the unity, identity, and permanence of the soul. It is not that we are conscious simply of certain states of the soul, from which we infer its substance and subsistence; but that such are the contents of the knowledge given to us in the consciousness of self. Des Cartes' famous aphorism, Cogito ergo sum, is not a syllogism. It does not mean that existence is inferred from the consciousness of thought; but that the consciousness of thought involves the consciousness of existence. Des Cartes himself so understood the matter, for he says: "Cum advertimus nos esse res cogitantes, prima quædam notio est quæ ex nullo syllogismo concluditur; neque etiam cum quis dicit 'Ego cogito, ergo sum, sive existo,' existentiam ex cogitatione per syllogismum deducit, sed tanquam rem per se notam simpliciter intuitu agnoscit."² Mansel says: "Whatever may be the variety of the phenomena of consciousness, sensations by this or that organ, volitions, thoughts, imaginations, of all we are immediately conscious as affections of one and the same self. It is not by any after-effort of reflection that I combine together sight and hearing, thought and volition, into a factitious unity or compounded whole : in each case I am immediately conscious of myself seeing and hearing, willing and thinking. This self-personality, like all other simple and immediate presentations, is indefinable ; but it is so because it is superior to definition.”¹ This individual subsistence is thus involved in the consciousness of self, because in self-consciousness we distinguish ourselves from all that is not ourselves.

¹ Werke, edit. Leipzig, 1838, vol. ii. p. 173.

² Meditationes de Prima Philosophia, Responsio ad Secundas Objectiones, III., edit. Amsterdam, 1685. p. 74.

3. As power of some kind belongs to every substance, the power which belongs to spirit, to the substance self, is that of thought, feeling, and volition. All this is given in the simplest form of consciousness. We are not more certain that we exist, than that we think, feel, and will. We know ourselves only as thus thinking, feeling, and willing, and we therefore are sure that these powers or faculties are the essential attributes of a spirit, and must belong to every spirit.

4. Consciousness also informs us of the unity or simplicity of the soul. It is not compounded of different elements. It is composed of substance and form. It is a simple substance endowed with certain attributes. It is incapable of separation or division.

5. In being conscious of our individual subsistence, we are conscious of personality. Every individual subsistence is not a person. But every individual subsistence which thinks and feels, and has the power of self-determination, is a person ; and, therefore, the consciousness of our subsistence, and of the powers of thought and volition, is the consciousness of personality.

6. We are also conscious of being moral agents, susceptible of moral character, and the subjects of moral obligation.

7. It need not be added that every spirit must possess self-consciousness. This is involved in all that has been said. Without self-consciousness we should be a mere power in nature. This is the very ground of our being, and is necessarily involved in the idea of self as a real existence.

It is impossible, therefore, to overestimate the importance of the truth contained in the simple proposition, God is a Spirit. It is involved in that proposition that God is immaterial. None of the properties of matter can be predicated of Him. He is not extended or divisible, or compounded, or visible, or tangible. He has neither bulk nor form. The Bible everywhere recognizes as true the intuitive convictions of men. One of those convictions is that spirit is not matter, or matter spirit ; that different and incompatible attributes cannot belong to the same substance. In revealing, therefore, to us that God is a Spirit, it reveals to us that no attribute of matter can be predicated of the divine essence. The realistic dualism which lies at the bottom of all human convictions, underlies also all the revelations of the Bible.

¹ Prolegomena Logica, Boston, 1860, p. 123. See also Dr. McCosh's Intuitions of the Mind, p. 148.

B. Consequences of the Spirituality of God.

If God be a spirit, it follows of necessity that He is a person — a self-conscious, intelligent, voluntary agent. As all this is involved in our consciousness of ourselves as spirit, it must all be true of God, or God is of a lower order of being than man.

It follows also that God is a simple Being, not only as not composed of different elements, but also as not admitting of the distinction between substance and accidents. Nothing can either be added to, or taken from God. In this view the simplicity, as well as the other attributes of God, are of a higher order than the corresponding attributes of our spiritual nature. The soul of man is a simple substance ; but it is subject to change. It can gain and lose knowledge, holiness, and power. These are in this view accidents in our substance. But in God they are attributes, essential and immutable.

Finally, it follows from God's being a spirit, that He is a moral as well as an intelligent Being. It is involved in the very nature of rational voluntary being, that it should be conformed to the rule of right, which in the case of God is his own infinite reason. These are primary truths, which are not to be sacrificed to any speculative objections. It is vain to tell us that an infinite spirit cannot be a person, because personality implies self-consciousness, and self-consciousness implies the distinction between the self and the not-self, and this is a limitation. It is equally vain to say that God cannot have moral excellence, because moral goodness implies conformity to law, and conformity to law again is inconsistent with the idea of an absolute Being. These are empty speculations ; and even if incapable of a satisfactory solution, would afford no rational ground for rejecting the intuitive truths of reason and conscience. There are mysteries enough in our nature, and yet no sane man denies his own personal existence and moral accountability. And he is worse than insane who is beguiled by such sophistries into renouncing his faith in God as a personal spirit and a loving Father.

The Scriptures confirm these Views.

It need hardly be remarked that the Scriptures everywhere represent God as possessing all the above-mentioned attributes of a spirit. On this foundation all religion rests; all intercourse with God, all worship, all prayer, all confidence in God as preserver, benefactor, and redeemer. The God of the Bible is a person. He spoke to Adam. He revealed himself to Noah. He entered into covenant with Abraham. He conversed with Moses, as a friend with friend. He everywhere uses the personal pronouns. He says, "I am," that "is my name." I am the Lord your God. I am merciful and gracious. Call upon me, and I will answer you. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. O thou that hearest prayer, to thee shall all flesh come. Our Lord has put into our lips words which reveal that God is a spirit, and all that being a spirit implies, when He teaches us to say: "Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done." Everywhere the God of the Bible is contrasted with the gods of the heathen, as a God who sees, hears, and loves. These are not regulative, they are real truths. God does not mock us when He thus presents Himself to us as a personal Being with whom we can have intercourse, and who is everywhere present to help and save. "To human reason," says Mansel, "the personal and the infinite stand out in apparently irreconcilable antagonism; and the recognition of the one in a religious system almost inevitably involves the sacrifice of the other."¹ This cannot be so. According to the Bible, and according to the dictates of our own nature, of reason as well as of conscience, God is a spirit, and being a spirit is of necessity a person; a Being who can say I, and to whom we can say Thou.

§ 5. Infinity.

Although God reveals Himself as a personal Being capable of fellowship with man, whom we can worship and love, and to whom we can pray with the assurance of being heard and answered; nevertheless He fills heaven and earth; He is exalted above all we can know or think. He is infinite in his being and perfections. The ideas with which we are most familiar are often those of which we are the least able to give an intelligent account. Space, time, and infinity, are among the most difficult problems of human thought. What is space? is a question which has never been satisfactorily answered. Some say it is nothing; where nothing is, space is not ; it is "negation defined by boundary lines ;" others, with Kant and Hamilton, say that it is "a condition of thought," "the subjective condition of sensibility ;" others that it is an attribute or accident of God ; others that it is that in which real existences can act and move. Notwithstanding these conflicting statements of philosophers, and the real obscurity of the subject, every man knows clearly and definitely what the word "space" means, although no man may be able to define it satisfactorily. It is much the same with the idea of infinity. If men would be content to leave the word in its integrity, as simply expressing what does not admit of limitation, there would be no danger in speculating about its nature. But in all ages wrong views of what the infinite is, have led to fatal errors in philosophy and religion. Without attempting to detail the speculations of philosophers on this subject, we shall simply endeavor to state what is meant when it is said that God is infinite in his being and perfections.

¹ Limits, p. 148.

The Idea of Infinity not merely Negative.

Being, in this connection, is that which is or exists. The being of God is his essence or substance, of which his perfections are the essential attributes or modes of manifestation. When it is said that God is infinite as to his being, what is meant is, that no limitation can be assigned to his essence. It is often said that our idea of the infinite is merely negative. There is a sense in which this may be true, but there is a sense in which it is not true. It is true that the form of the proposition is negative when we say that no limit can be assigned to space, or possible duration, or to the being of God. But it implies the affirmation that the object of which infinity is predicated is illimitable. It is as much a positive idea which we express when we say a thing is infinite as when we say that it is finite. We cannot, indeed, form a conception or mental image of an infinite object, but the word nevertheless expresses a positive judgment of the mind. Sir William Hamilton and others, when they say that the infinite is a mere negation, mean that it implies a negation of all thought. That is, we mean nothing when we say that a thing is infinite. As we know nothing of the inhabitants of the other planets of our system, if such there be, or of the mode in which angels and disembodied spirits take cognizance of material objects, our ideas on such subjects are purely negative, or blank ignorance. "The infinite," Mansel says, "is not a positive object of human thought."¹ Every man, however, knows that the propositions "Space is infinite," and "Space is finite," express different and equally definite thoughts. When, therefore, we say that God is infinite, we mean something; we express a great and positive truth.

¹ Prolegomena Logica, Boston, 1860, p. 52.

A. The Infinite not the All.

The infinite, although illimitable and incapable of increase, is not necessarily all. An infinite body must include all bodies, infinite space all portions of space, and infinite duration all periods of duration. Hence Mr. Mansel says that an infinite being must of necessity include within itself all actual and all possible forms or modes of being. So said Spinoza, many of the schoolmen, and even many Christian theologians. The sense in which Spinoza and Mansel make this assertion is the fundamental principle of Pantheism. Mr. Mansel, as we have seen, escapes that conclusion by appealing to faith, and teaching that we are constrained to believe what reason pronounces to be impossible, which itself is an impossibility. The sense in which theologians teach that an infinite being must comprehend within it all being, is, that in the infinite is the cause or ground of all that is actual or possible. Thus Howe¹ says, "Necessary being must include all being." But he immediately adds, not in the same way, "It comprehends all being, besides what itself is, as having had, within the compass of its productive power, whatsoever hath actually sprung from it; and having within the compass of the same power, whatsoever is still possible to be produced." This, however, is not the proper meaning of the words, nor is it the sense in which they are generally used. What the words mean, and what they are generally intended to mean by those who use them is, that there is only one being in the universe; that the finite is merely the modus existendi, or manifestation of the Infinite. Thus Cousin says, God must be "infinite and finite together, . . . at the summit of being and at its humblest degree . . . ; at once God, nature, and humanity."² Even some of the Remonstrants regard this as the necessary consequence of the doctrine of the infinitude of the divine essence. Episcopius³ says, "Si essentia Dei sic immensa est, tum intelligi non potest quomodo et ubi aliqua creata essentia esse possit. Essentia enim creata non est essentia divina; ergo aut est extra essentiam divinam, aut, si non est extra eam, est ipsa essentia illa, et sic omnia sunt Deus et divina essentia." "God is infinite," says Jacob Böhme, "for God is all." This, says Strauss,⁴ is exactly the doctrine of the modern philosophy.

¹ "Living Temple," Works, London, 1724, vol. i. p. 70.

² History of Modern Philosophy, translated by Wight. New York, 1852, vol. i. p. 113.

³ Institutiones Theologicæ, iv. li. 13, edit. Amsterdam, 1550, vol. i. p. 294.

⁴ Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 556

It has already been remarked in a previous chapter, in reference to this mode of reasoning, that it proceeds on a wrong idea of the infinite. A thing may be infinite in its own nature without precluding the possibility of the existence of things of a different nature. An infinite spirit does not forbid the assumption of the existence of matter. There may even be many infinities of the same kind, as we can imagine any number of infinite lines. The infinite, therefore, is not all. An infinite spirit is a spirit to whose attributes as a spirit no limits can be set. It no more precludes the existence of other spirits than infinite goodness precludes the existence of finite goodness, or infinite power the existence of finite power. God is infinite in being because no limit can be assigned to his perfections, and because He is present in all portions of space. A being is said to be present wherever it perceives and acts. As God perceives and acts everywhere, He is everywhere present. This, however, does not preclude the presence of other beings. A multitude of men even may perceive and act at the same time and place. Besides, we have very little knowledge of the relation which spirit bears to space. We know that bodies occupy portions of space to the exclusion of other bodies; but we do not know that spirits may not coexist in the same portion of space. A legion of demons dwelt in one man.

B. Infinitude of God in relation to Space.

The infinitude of God, so far as space is concerned, includes his immensity and his omnipresence. These are not different attributes, but one and the same attribute, viewed under different aspects. His immensity is the infinitude of his being, viewed as belonging to his nature from eternity. He fills immensity with his presence. His omnipresence is the infinitude of his being, viewed in relation to his creatures. He is equally present with all his creatures, at all times, and in all places. He is not far from any one of us. "The Lord is in this place," may be said with equal truth and confidence, everywhere. Theologians are accustomed to distinguish three modes of presence in space. Bodies are in space circumscriptively. They are bounded by it. Spirits are in space definitively. They have an ubi. They are not everywhere, but only somewhere. God is in space repletively. He fills all space. In other words, the limitations of space have no reference to Him. He is not absent from any portion of space, nor more present in one portion than in another. This of course is not to be understood of extension or diffusion. Extension is a property of matter, and cannot be predicated of God. If extended, He would be capable of division and separation; and part of God would be here, and part elsewhere. Nor is this omnipresence to be understood as a mere presence in knowledge and power. It is an omnipresence of the divine essence. Otherwise the essence of God would be limited. The doctrine, therefore, taught by the older Socinians that the essence of God is confined to heaven (wherever that may be), and that He is elsewhere only as to his knowledge and efficiency, is inconsistent with the divine perfections and with the representations of Scripture. As God acts everywhere, He is present everywhere; for, as the theologians say, a being can no more act where he is not than when he is not.

The older and later theologians agree in this view of the divine immensity and omnipresence. Augustine¹ says God is not to be regarded as everywhere diffused, as the air or the light: "Sed in solo cœlo totus, et in sola terra totus, et in cœlo et in terra totus, et nullo contentus loco, sed in seipso ubique totus." Thomas Aquinas says,² Deus "est in omnibus per potentiam, in quantum omnia ejus potestati subduntur; est per præsentiam in omnibus, in quantum omnia nuda sunt et aperta oculis ejus. Est in omnibus per essentiam in quantum adest omnibus ut causa essendi sicut dictum est." Quenstedt says,³ "Est Deus ubique illocaliter, impartibiliter, efficaciter; non definitive ut spiritus, non circumscriptive ut corpora, sed repletive citra sui multiplicationem, extensionem, divisionem, inclusionem, aut commixtionem more modoque divino incomprehensibili." The Bible teaches the infinitude of God, as involving his immensity and omnipresence, in the clearest terms. He is said to fill all in all, i. e., the universe in all its parts. (Eph. i. 23.) "Am I a God at hand, saith the Lord, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord." (Jer. xxiii. 23, 24.) "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." (Ps. cxxxix. 7-12.) It is "*in Him we (i. e., all creatures) live, and move, and have our being.*" (Acts xvii. 28.) Everywhere in the Old and in the New Testament, God is represented as a spiritual Being, without form, invisible, whom no man hath seen or can see; dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, and full of glory; as not only the creator, and preserver, but as the governor of all things; as everywhere present, and everywhere imparting life, and securing order; present in every blade of grass, yet guiding Arcturus in his course, marshalling the stars as a host, calling them by their names; present also in every human soul, giving it understanding, endowing it with gifts, working in it both to will and to do. The human heart is in his hands; and He turneth it even as the rivers of water are turned. Wherever, throughout the universe, there is evidence of mind in material causes, there, according to the Scriptures, is God, controlling and guiding those causes to the accomplishment of his wise designs. He is in all, and over all things; yet essentially different from all, being over all, independent, and infinitely exalted. This immensity and omnipresence of God, therefore, is the ubiquity of the divine essence, and consequently of the divine power, wisdom, and goodness. As the birds in the air and the fish in the sea, so also are we always surrounded and sustained by God. It is thus that He is infinite in his being, without absorbing all created beings into his own essence, but sustaining all in their individual subsistence, and in the exercise of their own powers.

¹ De Præsentia Dei seu Epistola CLXXXVII. iv. 14, edit. Benedictines, vol. ii. p. 1023, d.

² Summa, i. viii. 3, edit. Cologne, 1640, p. 16.

³ Theologia, i. viii. § 1, p. 413.

§ 6. Eternity.

A. Scriptural Doctrine.

The infinitude of God relatively to space, is his immensity or omnipresence; relatively to duration, it is his eternity. As He is free from all the limitations of space, so He is exalted above all the limitations of time. As He is not more in one place than in another, but is everywhere equally present, so He does not exist during one period of duration more than another. With Him there is no distinction between the present, past, and future; but all things are equally and always present to Him. With Him duration is an eternal now. This is the popular and the Scriptural view of God's eternity. "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." (Ps. xc. 2.) "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end." (Ps. cii. 25-27.) He is "The high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity." (Is. lvii. 15.) "I am the first and I am the last; and besides me there is no God." (Is. xlv. 6.) "A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past." (Ps. xc. 4.) "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." (2 Pet. iii. 8.) He is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." (Heb. xiii. 8.) God is He "which is [ever is], and which was, and which is to come." (Rev. i. 4.) Throughout the Bible He is called the eternal or everlasting God; who only hath immortality. The primal revelation of Himself to his covenant people was as the "I am."

What is taught in these and similar passages, is, first, that God is without beginning of years or end of days. He is, and always has been, and always will be; and secondly, that to Him there is neither past nor future; that the past and the future are always and equally present to Him.

B. Philosophical View.

These are Scriptural facts, and necessarily follow from the nature of God as self-existent, infinite, and immutable. With these representations the teaching of theologians for the most part agrees. Thus Augustine says: "Fuisse et futurum esse non est in ea [scil. vita divina], sed esse solum, quoniam æterna est: nam fuisse et futurum esse non est æternum."¹ "Nec tu tempore tempora præcedis, alioquin non omnia tempora præcederes sed præcedis omnia præterita celsitudine semper præsentis æternitatis; et superas omnia futura, quia illa futura sunt et cum venerint præterita erunt; tu autem idem ipse es, et anni tui non deficient."² Aquinas, to the same effect says, "Æternitas est tota simul."³ Or, as the schoolmen generally were accustomed to say, "In æternitate est unicum instans semper præsens et persistens;" or, as they otherwise expressed it, "Eternitas est interminabilis vitæ simul et perfecta possessio." The same view of this attribute is given by the later theologians. Thus Quenstedt says, "Æternitas Dei est duratio vel permanentia essentiæ divinæ interminabilis, sine principio et fine carens, et indivisibilis, omnem omnino successionem excludens."⁴

The only thing open to question in these statements is, the denial of all succession in the divine consciousness. Our idea of

¹ Confessiones, ix. x. 24, edit. Benedictines, vol. I. p. 283, c.

² Ibid. xi. xiii. 16, p. 333, a.

³ Summa, I. x. 4, edit. Cologne, 1640, p. 16.

⁴ Theologia, v. viii. § 1. xvii. p. 413.

eternity is arrived at from our idea of time. We are conscious of existence in space, and we are conscious of protracted or continuous existence. The ideas of space and duration are necessarily given in the consciousness of continuous existence. We see also that events succeed each other, that their occurrence is separated by a longer or shorter period of duration, just as bodies are separated by a greater or less interval in space. We therefore know, from consciousness or from experience, of no kind of duration which is not successive. Instead of saying, as is commonly done, that time is duration measured by succession, which supposes that duration is antecedent to that by which it is measured, and independent of it, it is maintained by some that duration without succession is inconceivable and impossible. As space is defined to be "negation betwixt the boundary-lines of form," so time is said to be "the negation betwixt the boundary-points of motion." Or, in other words, time is "the interval which a body in motion marks in its transit from one point of space to another."¹ Hence, if there be no bodies having form, there is no space; and if there is no motion, there is no time. "If all things were annihilated, time as well as space must be annihilated; for time is dependent on space. If all things were annihilated, there could be no transition, no succession of one object with respect to another; for there would be no object in being,—all would be perfect emptiness, nothingness, non-being-ness. Under an entire annihilation, there could be neither space nor time."² The same writer³ elsewhere says, "Were the earth, as well as the other globes of space, annihilated, much more would time be annihilated therewith."⁴ All this, however, is to be understood, it is said, of "objective time, that is, of time as dependent upon created material conditions."⁵ As objective timelessness follows from the annihilation of material existences, so timelessness as regards thinking personalities is conceivable only on the destruction of thought. "We have seen that there can be a state of timelessness for material creation, only by destroying its operation, that is, its attribute of motion: precisely in analogy therewith, there can be a state of timelessness for intellectual creation, only by destroying the laws of intellect, that is, its operation of thinking."⁶ If, therefore, God be a person, or a thinking Being, He cannot be

¹ Jamieson, p. 199.

² Ibid. p. 163.

³ Rev. George Jamieson, M. A., one of the ministers of the parish of Old Machar, Aberdeen. The Essentials of Philosophy, wherein its constituent Principles are traced throughout the various Departments of Science with analytical Structures on the Views of some of our leading Philosophers.

⁴ Ibid. p. 200.

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ Ibid.

timeless ; there must be succession ; one thought or state must follow another. To deny this, it is said, is to deny the personality of God. The dictum, therefore, of the schoolmen, and of the theologians, that eternity precludes succession — that it is a persistent, unmoving Now — is according to this repudiated.

There are, however, two senses in which succession is denied to God. The first has reference to external events. They are ever present to the mind of God. He views them in all their relations, whether causal or chronological. He sees how they succeed each other in time, as we see a passing pageant, all of which we may take in in one view. In this there is perhaps nothing which absolutely transcends our comprehension. The second aspect of the subject concerns the relation of succession to the thoughts and acts of God. When we are ignorant, it is wise to be silent. We have no right to affirm or deny, when we cannot know what our affirmation or denial may involve or imply. We know that God is constantly producing new effects, effects which succeed each other in time ; but we do not know that these effects are due to successive exercises of the divine efficiency. It is, indeed, incomprehensible to us how it should be otherwise. The miracles of Christ were due to the immediate exercise of the divine efficiency. We utter words to which we can attach no meaning, when we say that these effects were due, not to a contemporaneous act or volition of the divine mind, but to an eternal act, if such a phrase be not a solecism. In like manner we are confounded when we are told that our prayers are not heard and answered in time — that God is timeless — that what He does in hearing and answering prayer, and in his daily providence, He does from eternity. It is certain that God is subject to all the limitations of personality, if there be any. But as such limitations are the conditions of his being a person and not a mere involuntary force, they are the conditions of his infinite perfection. As constant thought and activity are involved in the very nature of a spirit, these must belong to God ; and so far as thinking and acting involve succession, succession must belong to God. There are mysteries connected with chronological succession, in our nature, which we cannot explain. We know that in dreams months may be compressed into moments, and moments extended to months, so far as our consciousness is concerned. We know that it often happens to those near death, that all the past becomes instantly present. Had God so constituted us that memory was as vivid as present consciousness, there would to us be no past, so far as our personal existence is concerned. It is not impossible that, hereafter, memory may become a consciousness of the past; that all we ever thought, felt, or did, may be ever present to the mind; that everything written on that tablet is indelible. Persons who, by long residence in foreign countries, have entirely lost all knowledge of their native language, have been known to speak it fluently, and understand it perfectly, when they came to die. Still more wonderful is the fact that uneducated persons, hearing passages read in an unknown language (Greek or Hebrew, for example), have, years after, when in an abnormal, nervous state, repeated those passages correctly, without understanding their meaning. If unable to comprehend ourselves, we should not pretend to be able to comprehend God. Whether we can understand how there can be succession in the thoughts of Him who inhabits eternity or not, we are not to deny that God is an intelligent Being, that He actually thinks and feels, in order to get over the difficulty. God is a person, and all that personality implies must be true of Him.

Modern Philosophical Views.

The modern philosophy teaches that "Die Ewigkeit ist die Einheit in dem Unterschiede der Zeitmomente — Ewigkeit und Zeit verhalten sich wie die Substanz und deren Accidentien."¹ That is, Eternity is the unity underlying the successive moments of time, as substance is the unity underlying the accidents which are its manifestations. Schleiermacher's illustration is borrowed from our consciousness. We are conscious of an abiding, unchanging self, which is the subject of our ever changing thoughts and feelings. By the eternity of God, therefore, is meant nothing more than that He is the ground-being of which the universe is the ever changing phenomenon. The eternity of God is only one phase of his universal causality. "Unter der Ewigkeit Gottes verstehen wir die mit allem Zeitlichen auch die Zeit selbst bedingende schlechthin zeitlose Ursächlichkeit Gottes."² To attain this philosophical view of eternity, we must accept the philosophical view of the nature of God upon which it is founded, namely, that God is merely the designation of that unknown and unknowable something of which all other things are the manifestations. To give up the living, personal God of the Bible and of the heart, is an awful sacrifice to specious, logical consistency. We believe what we cannot understand. We believe what the Bible teaches as facts; that God always is, was, and ever will be, immutably the same; that all things are ever present to his view; that with Him there is neither past nor future; but nevertheless that He is not a stagnant ocean, but ever living, ever thinking, ever acting, and ever suiting his action to the exigencies of his creatures, and to the accomplishment of his infinitely wise designs. Whether we can harmonize these facts or not, is a matter of minor importance. We are constantly called upon to believe that things are, without being able to tell how they are, or even how they can be.

¹ Strauss, Dogmatik, i. p. 561.

² Christliche Glaube, i. § 52, Werke, edit. Berlin, 1842, vol. iii. p. 268.

§ 7. Immutability.

The immutability of God is intimately connected with his immensity and eternity, and is frequently included with them in the Scriptural statements concerning his nature. Thus, when it is said, He is the First and the Last; the Alpha and Omega, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; or when in contrast with the ever changing and perishing world, it is said: "They shall be changed, but thou art the same;" it is not his eternity more than his immutability that is brought into view. As an infinite and absolute Being, self-existent and absolutely independent, God is exalted above all the causes of and even above the possibility of change. Infinite space and infinite duration cannot change. They must ever be what they are. So God is absolutely immutable in his essence and attributes. He can neither increase nor decrease. He is subject to no process of development, or of self-evolution. His knowledge and power can never be greater or less. He can never be wiser or holier, or more righteous or more merciful than He ever has been and ever must be. He is no less immutable in his plans and purposes. Infinite in wisdom, there can be no error in their conception; infinite in power, there can be no failure in their accomplishment. He is "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." (James i. 17.) "God is not a man that He should lie; neither the son of man that He should repent; hath He said and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?" (Num. xxiii. 19.) "I am the LORD, I change not." (Mal. iii. 6.) "The counsel of the LORD standeth forever; the thoughts of his heart to all generations." (Ps. xxxiii. 11.) "There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless, the counsel of the LORD, that shall stand." (Prov. xix. 21.) "The LORD of Hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand." (Is. xiv. 24.) "I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." (Is. xlv. 9, 10.) Those passages of Scripture in which God is said to repent, are to be interpreted on the same principle as those in which He is said to ride upon the wings of the wind, or to walk through the earth. These create no difficulty.

Philosophical Statement.

Theologians, in their attempts to state, in philosophical language, the doctrine of the Bible on the unchangeableness of God, are apt to confound immutability with immobility. In denying that God can change, they seem to deny that He can act. Augustine says, on this subject: "Non invenies in Deo aliquid mutabilitatis; non aliquid, quod aliter nunc sit, aliter paulo ante fuerit. Nam ubi invenis aliter et aliter, facta est ibi quædam mors: mors enim est, non esse quod fuit."¹ Quesnstedt uses language still more open to objection, when he says that the immutability of God is "Perpetua essentiæ divinæ et omnium ejus perfectionum identitas, negans omnem omnino motum cum physicum, tum ethicum."² Turretin is more cautious, and yet perhaps goes too far. He says: "Potestas variandi ætus suos, non est principium mutabilitatis in se, sed tantum in objectis suis; nisi intelligatur de variatione internorum suorum actuum, quos voluntas perfecta non variat, sed imperfecta tantum."³ The clause italicized in the above quotation assumes a knowledge of the nature of God to which man has no legitimate claim. It is in vain for us to presume to understand the Almighty to perfection. We know that God is immutable in his being, his perfections, and his purposes; and we know that He is perpetually active. And, therefore, activity and immutability must be compatible; and no explanation of the latter inconsistent with the former ought to be admitted.

The Absolute Attributes of God not inconsistent with Personality.

These attributes of infinity, eternity, and immutability, are freely admitted by the modern philosophy to belong to the absolute Being. But it is maintained that such a Being cannot be a person. Personality implies self-consciousness. Self-consciousness necessarily implies limitation, a distinction between the self and the not-self. Ohne Du kein Ich, — unless there be something objective and independent to which we stand opposed, as subject and object, there can be no consciousness of self. But nothing can be thus objective and independent in relation to the Absolute; and, therefore, the Absolute cannot have any consciousness of self, and consequently cannot be a personal Being. We have already seen (chap. iv.) that this objection is founded on an arbitrary definition of the Infinite and Absolute. It assumes that the Infinite must be all, and that the Absolute must be alone, without relation to anything out of itself. It is here only necessary to remark, in reference to the objection, (1.) That it may be admitted as a fact that the slumbering consciousness of self in the human soul is awakened and developed by contact with what is not only external to itself but also independent of it. But God is not subject to that law. He is eternally perfect and immutable; having in Himself the plenitude of life. There is, therefore, no analogy between the cases, and no ground for inferring in this case that what is true in us, who begin life as an undeveloped germ, must be true in relation to God. (2.) In the second place, we have no right to assume that even with regard to a finite intelligence created in the perfection of its being, self-consciousness is dependent on what is independent of itself. Such a being would of necessity be conscious of its own thoughts and feelings; for thought is a state of consciousness in an intelligent being. If God, therefore, can make an intelligent being in the perfection of its limited nature, it would be self-conscious even were it left alone in the universe. (3.) Admitting it to be true that "without a Thou there can be no I," we know that, according to the Scriptures and the faith of the Church universal, there are in the unity of the Godhead three distinct persons, the Father, the Son, and the Spirit; so that from eternity the Father can say I, and the Son Thou.

¹ In Joannis Evangelium Tractatus, xxiii. 9, edit. Benedictines, vol. iii. p. 1952, b, c.

² Theologia, i. viii. § 1. xx. p. 414.

³ Locus III. xi. 9, edit. Edinburgh, 1847, vol. i. p. 186.

We must abide by the teachings of Scripture, and refuse to subordinate their authority and the intuitive convictions of our moral and religious nature to the arbitrary definitions of any philosophical system. The Bible everywhere teaches that God is an absolute Being, in the sense of being self-existent, necessary, independent, immutable, eternal, and without limitation or necessary relation to anything out of Himself. It teaches moreover that He is infinite; not in the sense of including all being, all power, all knowledge in Himself, to the exclusion of all other intelligent agents; but in the sense that no limit can be assigned to his being or perfections, other than that which arises out of his own perfection itself. He would cease to be infinite could He be unwise or untrue. It is to be remembered that God is infinite and absolute as a spirit, and a spirit from its nature is living, active, intelligent, self-conscious, and personal.

§ 8. Knowledge.

A. Its Nature.

By knowledge is meant the intellectual apprehension of truth. It supposes a subject and object; an intelligent subject that apprehends, and something true that is apprehended.

So far as we are concerned, knowledge is either intuitive or discursive. Our senses give us immediate knowledge of their appropriate objects; the understanding perceives intuitively primary truths; our moral and æsthetic nature gives us the immediate cognition of things right or wrong, and beautiful or deformed. Most of our knowledge, however, is derived ab extra, by instruction, observation, comparison, deduction, etc. In all cases there is the distinction between the mind which perceives and the object which is perceived.

Such being the nature of knowledge, can there be knowledge in God? Can there be this distinction between subject and object in an absolute and infinite Being? Not only are the wicked and the worldly disposed to think that God cannot know; that either He is too exalted to take cognizance of earthly things; or that it is impossible even for an infinite mind to embrace the universe and all its perpetual changes in his mental vision; but the possibility of knowledge, in the ordinary and proper sense of the word, is expressly denied to God by a large class of philosophers, and virtually even by many theologians of the highest rank in the history of the Church.

The Pantheistic Theory precludes the possibility of Knowledge in God.

1. As, according to the pantheistic theory, the universe is the existence form of God, as the infinite comes to intelligent consciousness and life only in the finite, there is and can be no knowledge in the infinite as distinguished from the finite. God lives only so far as finite beings live; He thinks and knows only so far as they think and know. Omniscience is only the sum or aggregate of the intelligence of the transient forms of finite beings. All this, as even Hamilton and Mansel admit, necessarily flows from the idea of an absolute Being which precludes the possibility of any such conditions or relations as are involved in consciousness or intelligence. Strauss therefore says:¹ "Not in Himself, but in finite intelligences is God omniscient, which together constitute the fulness or completeness of all the possible forms or degrees of knowledge." And Spinoza says:² "Intellectus et voluntas, qui Dei essentiam constituerent, a nostro intellectu et voluntate toto cœlo differe deberent, nec in ulla re, præterquam in nomine, convenire possent; non aliter scilicet, quam inter se conveniunt canis, signum cœleste, et canis, animal latrans." This subject was considered in the chapter on Pantheism.

Knowledge and Power not to be confounded.

2. The possibility of knowledge in God is virtually denied by those who deny any distinction between knowledge and power. Knowledge, which is power, ceases to be knowledge; and therefore if omniscience is only a different name for omnipotence, it ceases to be a distinct attribute of God. It makes little difference whether we expressly deny a given perfection to God, or whether we so determine it as to make it mean nothing distinctive. It is deeply to be regretted that not only the Fathers, but also the Lutheran and Reformed theologians, after renouncing the authority of the schoolmen, almost immediately yielded themselves to their speculations. Instead of determining the nature of the divine attributes from the representations of Scripture and from the constitution of man as the image of God, and from the necessities of our moral and religious nature, they allowed themselves to be controlled by à priori speculations as to the nature of the infinite and absolute. Even Augustine, as before stated, says: "Nos ista, quæ fecisti videmus, quia sunt: tu autem quia vides ea, sunt."³ And Scotus Erigena says,⁴ "Voluntas illius et visio et essentia unum est."⁵ . . . "Visio Dei totius universitatis est conditio. Non enim aliud est ei videre, aliud facere; sed visio illius voluntas ejus est, et voluntas operatio." Thomas Aquinas also says,⁶ "Deus per intellectum suum causat res, cum suum esse sit suum intelligere. Unde necesse est, quod sua scientia sit causa rerum."

The Lutheran and Reformed theologians represent God as simplicissima simplicitas, admitting of no distinction between faculty and act, or between one attribute and another. Thus Gerhard

¹ Dogmatik, i. p. 575.

² Ethices, t. xvii. Scholium, edit. Jena, 1803, vol. ii. p. 53.

³ Confessiones, xiii. xxxviii. 53, edit. Benédicines, vol. i. p. 410, b.

⁴ De Divisione Nature, iii. 17, p. 235.

⁵ Ibid. 29, p. 264.

⁶ Summa, i. xiv. 2, edit. Cologne, 1640, p. 36.

says: "Deus est ipsum esse subsistens, omnibus modis indeterminatum."¹ "Solut Deus summe simplex est, ut nec actus et potentia, nec esse et essentia compositio ipsi competat."² "Essentia, bonitas, potentia, sapientia, justitia, et reliqua attributa omnia sunt in Deo realiter unum."³ He also says: "In Deo idem est esse et intelligere et velle." In like manner the Reformed theologian Heidegger⁴ says: "Voluntas ab intellectu non differt, quia intelligendo vult et volendo intelligit. Intelligere et velle ejus idemque perpetuus indivisus actus." This does not mean simply that in an intelligent being, every act of the will is an intelligent act. He knows while he wills, and knows what he wills. The meaning is, that knowledge and power in God are identical. To know a thing is, and to will it, are the same undivided and perpetual act. From this it would seem to follow, that as God knows from eternity He creates from eternity; and that "all He knows, is." We are thus led, by these speculations, into pantheistical views of the nature of God and of his relation to the world.

This mode of representation is carried still further by the modern philosophical theologians. With Schleiermacher, all the attributes of God are virtually merged into the idea of causality. With him God is ens summum prima causa.⁵ He says that God's thinking and willing are the same, and that his omnipotence and omniscience are identical. When we say that He is omnipotent, we only mean that He is the cause of all that is. And when we say that He is omniscient, we only mean that He is an intelligent cause. His power and knowledge are limited to the actual. The possible is nothing; it is the object neither of knowledge nor of power. "Gott," says Schleiermacher, "weiss Alles was ist; und Alles ist, was Gott weiss und dieses beides ist nicht zweierlei sondern einerlei, weil sein Wissen und sein allmächtiges Wollen eines und dasselbe ist," i. e., God knows all that is, and all is that God knows. God, therefore, is limited to the world, which is the phenomenon of which He is the substance.

Another philosophical view of this subject, adopted even by those who repudiate the pantheistic system and maintain that God and the world are distinct, is, that as God is immanent in the world, there is in Him no difference between self-consciousness and world-consciousness, as they express it, i. e., between God's knowledge of Himself and his knowledge of the world. They therefore

¹ Tom. i. loc. iii. cap. vi. § 43, p. 106, edit. Tübingen, 1762.

² Ibid. cap. x. § 80, p. 119.

³ Ibid. chap. vii. § 47, p. 108.

⁴ Corpus Theologiae Christianae, Tiguri, 1732.

⁵ Christliche Glaube, i. § 55, Werke, edit. Berlin, 1842, vol. iii. p. 295.

define omniscience by saying, "Insofern Gott gedacht wird als die Welt mit seinem Bewusstseyn umfassend, nennen wir ihn den Allwissenden."¹ That is, "So far as we conceive of God as embracing the world in his consciousness, we call him omniscient." Whatever such language may mean to those who use it, to the ordinary mind it conveys the revolting idea that all the sins of men enter into the consciousness of God.

The Doctrine of the Scriptures on this Subject.

The Scriptural view of this subject, which distinguishes the attributes in God as distinct, and assumes that knowledge in Him, in its essential nature, is what knowledge is in us, does not conflict with the unity and simplicity of God as a spiritual being. There is a sensu in which knowledge and power, intellect and will, may be said to be identical in man. They are not different substances. They are different modos in which the life or activity of the soul manifests itself. So in God when we conceive of Him as a spirit, we do not think of Him as a compound being, but as manifesting his infinite life and activity, in knowing, willing, and doing. What, therefore, we must hold fast to, if we would hold fast to God, is, that knowledge in God is knowledge, and not power or eternity; that it is what knowledge is in us, not indeed in its modos and objects, but in its essential nature. We must remove from our conceptions of the divine attributes all the limitations and imperfections which belong to the corresponding attributes in us; but we are not to destroy their nature. And in determining what is, and what is not, consistent with the nature of God as an infinitely perfect being, we are to be controlled by the teachings of the Scriptures, and by the necessities (or laws) of our moral and religious nature, and not by our speculative notions of the Infinite and Absolute. God, therefore, does and can know in the ordinary and proper sense of that word. He is an ever present eye, to which all things are perfectly revealed. "All things," says the Apostle, "are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." (Heb. iv. 13.) "The darkness and the light are both alike" to Him. (Ps. cxxxix. 12.) "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" (Ps. xciv. 9.) "O Lord thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my down-sitting and my up-rising, thou understandest my thought afar off." (Ps. cxxxix. 1, 2.) "The eyes of the LORD are in every place, beholding the evil and the good."

¹ Bruch, Die Lehre von den göttlichen Eigenschaften, p. 162.

(Prov. xv. 3.) "Hell and destruction are before the Lord: how much more then the hearts of the children of men?" (Prov. xv. 11.) "Great is our Lord and of great power: his understanding is infinite." (Ps. cxlvii. 5.) "O house of Israel, . . . I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them." (Ezek. xi. 5.) "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." (Acts. xv. 18.) "The very hairs of your head are all numbered." (Matt. x. 30.)

This knowledge of God is not only all-comprehending, but it is intuitive and immutable. He knows all things as they are, being as being, phenomena as phenomena, the possible as possible, the actual as actual, the necessary as necessary, the free as free, the past as past, the present as present, the future as future. Although all things are ever present in his view, yet He sees them as successive in time. The vast procession of events, thoughts, feelings, and acts, stands open to his view.

This infinite knowledge of God is not only clearly and constantly asserted in Scripture, but is also obviously included in the idea of an absolutely perfect being. Such a being cannot be ignorant of anything; his knowledge can neither be increased nor diminished. The omniscience of God follows also from his omnipresence. As God fills heaven and earth, all things are transacted in his presence. He knows our thoughts far better than they are known to ourselves. This plenitude of divine knowledge is taken for granted in all acts of worship. We pray to a God who, we believe, knows our state and wants, who hears what we say, and who is able to meet all our necessities. Unless God were thus omniscient, He could not judge the world in righteousness. Faith in this attribute in its integrity is, therefore, essential even to natural religion.

B. The Objects of Divine Knowledge.

Various distinctions are made by theologians as to the objects of the divine knowledge.

1. God is said to know Himself and all things out of Himself. This is the foundation of the distinction between the scientia necessaria and the scientia libera. God knows Himself by the necessity of his nature; but as everything out of Himself depends for its existence or occurrence upon his will, his knowledge of each thing as an actual occurrence is suspended on his will, and in that sense is free. Creation not being necessary, it depended on the will of God whether the universe as an object of knowledge should exist or not. This distinction is not of much importance. And it is liable to the objection that it makes the knowledge of God dependent. Being the cause of all things, God knows everything by knowing Himself; all things possible, by the knowledge of his power, and all things actual, by the knowledge of his own purposes.

2. This distinction between the possible and actual, is the foundation of the distinction between the knowledge of simple intelligence and the knowledge of vision. The former is founded on God's power, and the latter upon his will. This only means that, in virtue of his omniscient intelligence, He knows whatever infinite power can effect; and that from the consciousness of his own purposes, He knows what He has determined to effect or to permit to occur. This is a distinction which the modern philosophical theologians ignore. Nothing, according to their philosophy is possible, but the actual. All that can be, either is, or is to be. This follows from the idea of God as mere cause. He produces all that can be; and there is in Him no causality for what does not exist.

The Actual and the Possible.

It seems to be an inconsistency in those orthodox theologians who deny the distinction in God between knowledge and power, to admit, as they all do, the distinction between the actual and possible. For if God creates by thinking or knowing, if in Him, as they say, intelligere et facere idem est, then all He knows must be, and must be as soon as He knows or thinks it, i. e., from eternity. If, however, we retain the Scriptural idea of God as a spirit, who can do more than He does; if we ascribe to Him what we know to be a perfection in ourselves, namely, that our power exceeds our acts, that a faculty and the exercise of that faculty are not identical, then we can understand how God can know the possible as well as the actual. God is not limited to the universe, which of necessity is finite. God has not exhausted Himself in determining to cause the present order of things to be.

C. Scientia Media.

Intermediate between things possible and actual, some theologians assume a third class of events, namely, the conditionally future. They do not actually occur, but they would occur provided something else should occur. Had Christ come a thousand years sooner than the date of his actual advent, the whole history of the world would have been different. This is a popular mode of regarding the concatenation of events. It is constantly said, that if Cromwell had been permitted to leave England; or, if Napoleon had failed to escape from Elba, the state of Europe would have been very different from what it is at present. God, it is assumed, knows what would have been the sequence of events on any or every possible hypothesis. It is therefore said that there must be in God, besides the knowledge of simple intelligence by which He knows the possible, and the knowledge of vision by which He knows the actual, a scientia media, by which He knows the conditionally future. Illustrations of this form of knowledge, it is thought, are found in Scripture. In 1 Samuel xxiii. 11, it is said that David inquired of the Lord whether the men of Keilah would deliver him, should he remain among them, into the hands of Saul; and was answered that they would. Here, it is argued, the event was not merely possible, but conditionally certain. If David remained in Keilah, he certainly would have been delivered up. Thus our Lord said, that if his mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, the people of those cities would have repented. Here again is declared what would have happened, if something else had happened.

The Origin of this Distinction.

This distinction was introduced into theology by the Jesuit theologians Fonseca and Molina; by the latter in his work "De Concordia Providentiæ et Gratiæ Divinæ cum Libero Arbitrio Hominis." Their object was to reconcile the foreordination of God with the freedom of man, and to explain the reason why some, and not others, were elected to eternal life. God foresaw who would repent and believe, if they received the knowledge of the Gospel and the gift of the Spirit, and these He elected to salvation. This theory of a scientia media was, for a like purpose, adopted by the Lutheran and Remonstrant theologians, but was strenuously opposed by the Reformed or Augustinians. (1.) Because all events are included under the categories of the actual and possible; and, therefore, there is no room for such a class as events conditionally future. It is only possible, and not certain, how men would act under certain conditions, if their conduct be not predetermined, either by the purpose of God, or by their own decision already formed. Besides, it is the fundamental principle of the theologians who adopt this theory, or at least of many of them, that a free act must from its nature be uncertain as to its occurrence. A free agent, it is said, can always act contrary to any amount of influence brought to bear upon him, consistent with his free agency. But if free acts must be uncertain, they cannot be foreseen as certain under any conditions. (2.) The futurity of events, according to the Scriptures, depends on the foreordination of God, who foreordains whatever comes to pass. There is no certainty, therefore, which does not depend on the divine purpose. (3.) The kind of knowledge which this theory supposes cannot belong to God, because it is inferential. It is deduced from a consideration of second causes and their influence, and therefore is inconsistent with the perfection of God, whose knowledge is not discursive, but independent and intuitive. (4.) This theory is inconsistent with the Scriptural doctrine of God's providential government, as it assumes that the free acts of men are not under his control. (5.) It is contrary to the Scriptural doctrine, inasmuch as it supposes that election to salvation depends on the foresight of faith and repentance, whereas it depends on the good pleasure of God. (6.) The examples quoted from the Bible do not prove that there is a scientia media in God. The answer of God to David, about the men of Keilah, was simply a revelation of the purpose which they had already formed. Our Lord's declaration concerning Tyre and Sidon was only a figurative mode of stating the fact that the men of his generation were more hardened than the inhabitants of those ancient cities. It is not denied that God knows all events in all possible combinations and connections, but as nothing is certain but what He ordains to effect or permit, there can be no class of events conditionally future, and therefore there can be no scientia media. By conditionally future is meant what is suspended on a condition undetermined by God.

D. Foreknowledge.

Among the objects of the divine knowledge are the free acts of men. The Scriptures abundantly teach that such acts are fore-known. Such knowledge is involved in the prediction of events which either concern the free acts of men, or are dependent on them. If God be ignorant of how free agents will act, his knowledge must be limited, and it must be constantly increasing, which is altogether inconsistent with the true idea of his nature. His government of the world also, in that case, must be precarious, dependent, as it would then be on the unforeseen conduct of men. The Church, therefore, in obedience to the Scriptures, has, almost with one voice, professed faith in God's foreknowledge of the free acts of his creatures.

The Socinians, however, and some of the Remonstrants, unable to reconcile this foreknowledge with human liberty, deny that free acts can be foreknown. As the omnipotence of God is his ability to do whatever is possible, so his omniscience is his knowledge of everything knowable. But as free acts are in their nature uncertain, as they may or may not be, they cannot be known before they occur. Such is the argument of Socinus. This whole difficulty arises out of the assumption that contingency is essential to free agency. If an act may be certain as to its occurrence, and yet free as to the mode of its occurrence, the difficulty vanishes. That free acts may be absolutely certain, is plain, because they have in a multitude of cases been predicted. It was certain that the acts of Christ would be holy, yet they were free. The continued holiness of the saints in heaven is certain, and yet they are perfectly free. The foreknowledge of God is inconsistent with a false theory of free agency, but not with the true doctrine on that subject.

After Augustine, the common way of meeting the difficulty of reconciling foreknowledge with liberty, was to represent it as merely subjective. The distinction between knowledge and foreknowledge is only in us. There is no such difference in God. "Quid est præscientia," asks Augustine, "nisi scientia futurorum? Quid autem futurum est Deo, qui omnia supergreditur tempora? Si enim scientia Dei res ipsas habet, non sunt ei futuræ, sed præsentēs, ac per hoc non jam præscientia, sed tantum scientia dici potest."¹

E. The Wisdom of God.

Wisdom and knowledge are intimately related. The former is manifested in the selection of proper ends, and of proper means for the accomplishment of those ends. As there is abundant evidence of design in the works of nature, so all the works of God declare his wisdom. They show, from the most minute to the greatest, the most wonderful adaptation of means to accomplish the high end of the good of his creatures and the manifestation of his own glory. So also, in the whole course of history, we see evidence of the controlling power of God making all things work together for the best interests of his people, and the promotion of his kingdom upon earth. It is, however, in the work of redemption that this divine attribute is specially revealed. It is by the Church, that God has determined to manifest, through all ages, to principalities and powers, his manifold wisdom.

Of course those who deny final causes deny that there is any such attribute as wisdom in God. It is also said that the use of means to attain an end is a manifestation of weakness. It is further urged that it is derogatory to God, as it supposes that He needs or desires what He does not possess. Even Schleiermacher says: "Bei Gott is Allwissenheit und Weisheit so gänzlich einerlei, dass die Unterscheidung keinen Werth hat, die Weisheit wäre nichts als auch wider absolute Lebendigkeit der Allmacht, also Alwissenheit." Wisdom is omniscience, omniscience is omnipotence, omnipotence is simply causality of all that is. Thus God sinks into the mere cause or ground of all things. It is not thus the Scriptures speak. We are called on to worship, "The only wise God." "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all," is the devout exclamation of the Psalmist. (Ps. civ. 24.) And in contemplation of the work of redemption the Apostle exclaims, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" (Rom. xi. 33.)

¹ De Diversis Questionibus ad Simplicianum, II. ii. 2, edit. Benedictines, vol. vi. p. 195, a. Compare also what he says on this subject, De Civitate Dei, XI. xxi.; Ibid. vol. vii. p. 461.

§ 9. The Will of God.

A. The Meaning of the Term.

If God is a spirit He must possess all the essential attributes of a spirit. Those attributes, according to the classification adopted by the older philosophers and theologians, fall under the heads of intelligence and will. To the former, are referred knowledge and wisdom; to the latter, the power of self-determination, efficiency (in the case of God, omnipotence), and all moral attributes. In this wide sense of the word, the will of God includes: (1.) The will in the narrow sense of the word. (2.) His power. (3.) His love and all his moral perfections. In our day, generally but not always, the word "will" is limited to the faculty of self-determination. And even the older theologians in treating of the will of God treat only of his decrees or purposes. In their definitions, however, they take the word in its wide sense. Thus Calovius¹ says, "Voluntas Dei est, qua Deus tendit in bonum ab intellectu cognitum."² And Quenstedt defines it as "ipsa Dei essentia cum connotatione inclinationis ad bonum concepta."³ Turretin says, the object of the intellect is the true; the object of the will, the good. Hence it is said, that God wills Himself necessarily, and all things out of Himself freely. Although the word seems to be taken in different senses in the same sentence, God's willing Himself means that He takes complacency in his own infinite excellence; his willing things out of Himself, means his purpose that they should exist. Although the theologians start with the wide definition of the word, yet in the prosecution of the subject they regard the will as simply the faculty of self-determination, and the determinations themselves. That is, the power to will, and volitions or purposes. It is altogether better to confine the word to this its proper meaning, and not make it include all the forms of feeling involving approbation or delight.

¹ Systemation Theologia, vol. ii. p. 439.

² See Strauss, Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 579.

³ Theologia, i. viii. § 1, xxvii. p. 418.

God then as a spirit is a voluntary agent. We are authorized to ascribe to Him the power of self-determination. This the Bible everywhere does. From the beginning to the end, it speaks of the will of God, of his decrees, purposes, counsels, and commands. The will is not only an essential attribute of our spiritual being, but it is the necessary condition of our personality. Without the power of rational self-determination we should be as much a mere force as electricity, or magnetism, or the principle of vegetable life. It is, therefore, to degrade God below the sphere of being which we ourselves occupy, as rational creatures, to deny to Him the power of self-determination; of acting or not acting, according to his own good pleasure.

B. The Freedom of the Divine Will.

The will of God is free in the highest sense of the word. An agent is said to be free, (1.) When he is at liberty to act or not to act, according to his good pleasure. This is liberty in acting. (2.) He is free as to his volitions, when they are determined by his own sense of what is wise, right, or desirable.

Freedom is more than spontaneity. Tho affections are spontaneous, but are not free. Loving and hating, delighting in and abhorring, do not depend upon the will.

God is free in acting, as in creating and preserving, because these acts do not arise from the necessity of his nature. He was free to create or not create; to continue the universe in existence or to cause it to cease to be. He is free also in keeping his promises, because his purpose so to do is determined by his own infinite goodness. It is indeed inconceivable that God should violate his word. But this only proves that moral certainty may be as inexorable as necessity.

C. The Decretive and Preceptive Will of God.

The decretive will of God concerns his purposes, and relates to the futuration of events. The preceptive will relates to the rule of duty for his rational creatures. He decrees whatever he purposes to effect or to permit. He prescribes, according to his own will, what his creatures should do, or abstain from doing. The decretive and preceptive will of God can never be in conflict. God never decrees to do, or to cause others to do, what He forbids. He may, as we see He does, decree to permit what He forbids. He permits men to sin, although sin is forbidden. This is more scholastically expressed by the theologians by saying, A positive decretive will cannot consist with a negative preceptive will; i. e., God cannot decree to make men sin. But a negative decretive will may consist with an affirmative preceptive will; e. g., God may command men to repent and believe, and yet, for wise reasons, abstain from giving them repentance.

The distinction between voluntas beneplaciti et signi, as those terms are commonly used, is the same as that between the decretive and preceptive will of God. The one referring to his decrees, founded on his good pleasure; the other to his commands, founded on what He approves or disapproves.

By the secret will of God, is meant his purposes, as still hidden in his own mind; by his revealed will, his precepts and his purposes, as far as they are made known to his creatures.

D. Antecedent and Consequent Will.

These terms, as used by Augustinians, have reference to the relation of the decrees to each other. In the order of nature the end precedes the means, and the purpose of the former is antecedent to the purpose of the latter. Thus it is said, that God by an antecedent will, determined on the manifestation of his glory; and by a consequent will, determined on the creation of the world as a means to that end.

By Lutherans and Remonstrants these terms are used in a very different sense. According to their views, God by an antecedent will determined to save all men; but, foreseeing that all would not repent and believe, by a subsequent will He determined to save those whom he foresaw would believe. That is, He first purposed one thing and then another.

E. Absolute and Conditional Will.

These terms, when employed by Augustinians, have reference not so much to the purposes of God, as to the events which are decreed. The event, but not the purpose of God, is conditional. A man reaps, if he sows. He is saved, if he believes. His reaping and salvation are conditional events. But the purpose of God is absolute. If He purposes that a man shall reap, He purposes that he shall sow; if He purposes that he shall be saved, He purposes that he shall believe. Anti-Augustinians, on the other hand, regard the purposes of God as conditional. He purposes the salvation of a man, if he believes. But whether he believes or not, is left undetermined; so that the purpose of God is suspended on a condition not under his control, or, at least, undecided. A father may purpose to give an estate to his son, if he be obedient; but whether the son will fulfil the condition is undetermined, and therefore the purpose of the father is undecided. It is, however, manifestly inconsistent with the perfection of God, that He should first will one thing and then another; nor can his purposes be dependent on the uncertainty of human conduct or events. These are questions, however, which belong to the consideration of the doctrine of decrees. They are mentioned here because these distinctions occur in all discussions concerning the Divine Will, with which the student of theology should be familiar.

In this place it is sufficient to remark, that the Greek word θέλω, and the corresponding English verb, to will, sometimes express feeling, and sometimes a purpose. Thus in Matt. xxvii. 48, the words εἰ θέλει αὐτόν are correctly rendered, "if he delight in him." Comp. Ps. xxii. 8. It is in this sense the word is used, when it is said that God wills all men to be saved. He cannot be said to purpose or determine upon any event which is not to come to pass. A judge may will the happiness of a man whom he sentences to death. He may will him not to suffer when he wills him to suffer. The infelicity in such forms of expression is that the word "will" is used in different senses. In one part of the sentence it means desire, and in the other purpose. It is perfectly consistent, therefore, that God, as a benevolent Being, should desire the happiness of all men, while he purposes to save only his own people.

F. The Will of God as the Ground of Moral Obligation.

The question on this subject is, Whether things are right or wrong, simply because God commands or forbids them? Or, does He command or forbid them, because they are right or wrong for some other reason than his will? According to some, the only reason that a thing is right, and therefore obligatory, is, that it tends to promote the greatest happiness, or the greatest good of the universe. According to others, a thing is right which tends to promote our own happiness; and for that reason, and for that reason alone, it is obligatory. If vice would make us happier than virtue, we should be bound to be vicious. It is a more decorous mode of expressing substantially the same theory, to say that the ground of moral obligation is a regard to the dignity of our own nature. It makes little difference whether it be our own dignity, or our own happiness, which we are bound to regard. It is self, in either case, to whom our whole allegiance is due. Others, again, place the ground of moral obligation in the fitness of things, which they exalt above God. There is, they affirm, an eternal and necessary difference between right and wrong, to which God, it is said, is as much bound to be conformed as are his rational creatures.

The common doctrine of Christians on this subject is, that the will of God is the ultimate ground of moral obligation to all rational creatures. No higher reason can be assigned why anything is right than that God commands it. This means, (1.) That the divine will is the only rule for deciding what is right and what is wrong. (2.) That his will is that which binds us, or that to which we are bound to be conformed. By the word "will" is not meant any arbitrary purpose, so that it were conceivable that God should will right to be wrong, or wrong right. The will of God is the expression or revelation of his nature, or is determined by it; so that his will, as revealed, makes known to us what infinite wisdom and goodness demand. Sometimes things are right simply because God has commanded them; as circumcision, and other ritual institutions were to the Jews. Other things are right because of the present constitution of things which God has ordained; such as the duties relating to property, and the permanent relations of society. Others, again, are right because they are demanded by the immutable excellence of God. In all cases, however, so far as we are concerned, it is his will that binds us, and constitutes the difference between right and wrong; his will, that is, as the expression of his infinite perfection. So that the ultimate foundation of moral obligation is the nature of God.

§ 10. The Power of God.

A. The Nature of Power, or, The Origin of the Idea.

We get the idea of power from our own consciousness. That is, we are conscious of the ability of producing effects. Power in man is confined within very narrow limits. We can change the current of our thoughts, or fix our attention on a particular object, and we can move the voluntary muscles of our body. Beyond this our direct power does not extend. It is from this small measure of efficiency that all the stores of human knowledge and all the wonders of human art are derived. It is only our thoughts, volitions, and purposes, together with certain acts of the body, that are immediately subject to the will. For all other effects we must avail ourselves of the use of means. We cannot will a book, a picture, or a house into existence. The production of such effects requires protracted labor and the use of diverse appliances.

B. Omnipotence.

It is by removing all the limitations of power, as it exists in us, that we rise to the idea of the omnipotence of God. We do not thus, however, lose the idea itself. Almighty power does not cease to be power. We can do very little. God can do whatever He wills. We, beyond very narrow limits, must use means to accomplish our ends. With God means are unnecessary. He wills, and it is done. He said, Let there be light; and there was light. He, by a volition created the heavens and the earth. At the volition of Christ, the winds ceased, and there was a great calm. By an act of the will He healed the sick, opened the eyes of the blind, and raised the dead. This simple idea of the omnipotence of God, that He can do without effort, and by a volition, whatever He wills, is the highest conceivable idea of power, and is that which is clearly presented in the Scriptures. In Gen. xvii. 1, it is said, "I am the Almighty God." The prophet Jeremiah exclaims, "Ah Lord God! behold thou hast made the heavens and the earth by thy great power, and stretched out arm; and there is nothing too hard for thee." (Jer. xxxii. 17.) God is said to have created all things by the breath of his mouth, and to uphold the universe by a word. Our Lord says, "With God all things are possible." (Matt. xix. 26.) The Psalmist long before had said, "Our God is in the heavens; He hath done whatsoever He pleased." (Ps. cxv. 3.) And again, "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did He in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places." (Ps. cxxxv. 6.) The Lord God omnipotent reigneth, and doeth his pleasure among the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth, is the tribute of adoration which the Scriptures everywhere render unto God, and the truth which they everywhere present as the ground of confidence to his people. This is all we know, and all we need to know on this subject; and here we might rest satisfied, were it not for the vain attempts of theologians to reconcile these simple and sublime truths of the Bible with their philosophical speculations.

C. The Negation of Power.

The sensuous school of philosophers deny that there is any real efficiency or power in existence. Their principle is, that all knowledge is derived from the senses; and consequently, that, as we cannot know anything of which the senses do not take cognizance, it is unphilosophical or unreasonable to admit the existence of anything else. Our senses, however, do not take cognizance of efficiency. It cannot be felt, or seen, or heard, or tasted. Therefore it does not exist. A cause is not that to which an effect is due, but simply that which uniformly precedes it. All we can know, and all we can rationally believe, is the facts which affect our senses, and the order of their sequence; which order, being uniform and necessary, has the character of law. This is the doctrine of causation proposed by Hume, Kant, Brown, Mill, and virtually by Sir William Hamilton; and it is this principle which lies at the foundation of the Positive Philosophy of Comte. Of course, if there be no such thing as power, there is no such attribute in God as omnipotence.

It is sufficient to say, in this connection, in reference to this theory, (1.) That it is contrary to every man's consciousness. We are conscious of power, i. e., of the ability to produce effects. And consciousness has the same authority, to say the least, when it concerns what is within, as when it concerns what affects the senses. We are not more certain that our hand moves, than we are that we have the power to move, or not to move it, at pleasure. (2.) This theory contradicts the intuitive and indestructible convictions of the human mind. No man believes, or can believe really and permanently, that any change or effect can occur without an efficient cause. The fact that one event follows another, is not the ultimate fact. It is intuitively certain that there must be an adequate reason for that sequence. Such is the universal judgment of mankind. (3.) The argument, if valid against the reality of power, is valid against the existence of substance, of mind, and of God. This is admitted by the consistent advocates of the principle in question. Substance, mind, and God, are as little under the cognizance of the senses as power; and, therefore, if nothing is to be admitted but on the testimony of the senses, the existence of substance, mind, and God, must be denied. This principle, therefore, cannot be admitted without doing violence to our whole rational, moral, and religious nature. In other words, it cannot be admitted at all ; for men cannot, permanently, either believe or act contrary to the laws of their nature.

D. Absolute Power.

By absolute power, as understood by the schoolmen and some of the later philosophers, is meant power free from all the restraints of reason and morality. According to this doctrine, contradictions, absurdities, and immoralities, are all within the compass of the divine power. Nay, it is said that God can annihilate Himself. On this subject Des Cartes says, Deus "non voluit tres angulos trianguli æquales esse duobus rectis, quia cognovit aliter fieri non posse. Sed contra . . . quia voluit tres angulos trianguli necessario æquales esse duobus rectis, idcirco jam hoc verum est, et fieri aliter non potest, atque ita de reliquis." ¹ This "summa indifferentia," he says, "in Deo, summum est ejus omnipotentiae argumentum." ²

It is, however, involved in the very idea of power, that it has reference to the production of possible effects. It is no more a limitation of power that it cannot effect the impossible, than it is of reason that it cannot comprehend the absurd, or of infinite goodness that it cannot do wrong. It is contrary to its nature. Instead of exalting, it degrades God, to suppose that He can be other than He is, or that He can act contrary to infinite wisdom and love. When, therefore, it is said that God is omnipotent because He can do whatever He wills, it is to be remembered that his will is determined by his nature. It is certainly no limitation to perfection to say that it cannot be imperfect.

In this view of the omnipotence of God, the great body of the theologians, especially among the Reformed, agree. Thus Zwingli ³ says : "Summa potentia non est nisi omnia possit, quantum ad legitimum posse attinet : nam malum facere aut se ipsum deponere aut in se converti hostiliter aut sibi ipsi contrarium esse posse impotentia est, non potentia." Musculus, ⁴ "Deus omnipotens, quia potest quæ vult, quæque ejus veritati, justitiæ conveniunt." Keckermann, ⁵ "Absolute possibilia sunt, quæ nec Dei naturæ, nec aliarum rerum extra se essentiae contradicunt." ⁶ This scholastic doctrine of absolute power Calvin ⁷ stigmatizes as profane, "quod . . . merito detestabile nobis esse debet."

¹ Meditationes. Responsiones Sextæ, vi. edit. Amsterdam, 1685, p. 160.

² Ibid. p. 161.

³ De Providentia Dei, Epilogus. Opera, edit. Turici, 1841, vol. iv. p. 138.

⁴ Musculus, p. 139.

⁵ Keckermann, p. 103.

⁶ See Schweizer's Glaubenslehre der Reformirten Kirche, i. p. 261.

⁷ Institutio, iii. xxiii. 2, edit. Berlin, 1834, part ii. p. 148.

Potentia Absoluta and Potentia Ordinata.

There is a sense of the terms in which absolute power is generally recognized among theologians. A distinction is commonly made between the potentia absoluta and the potentia ordinata of God. By the latter is meant the efficiency of God, as exercised uniformly in the ordered operation of second causes; by the former, his efficiency, as exercised without the intervention of second causes. Creation, miracles, immediate revelation, inspiration, and regeneration, are to be referred to the potentia absoluta of God; all his works of providence to his potentia ordinata. This distinction is important, as it draws the line between the natural and supernatural, between what is due to the operation of natural causes, sustained and guided by the providential efficiency of God, and what is due to the immediate exercise of his power. This distinction, indeed, is rejected by the modern philosophy. God in creating and sustaining the world, does it as a whole. Nothing is isolated. There is no individual act, but only a general efficiency on the part of God; and, consequently, no particular event can be referred to his absolute power or immediate agency. Everything is natural. There can be no miracle, and no special providence.¹

E. Confounding Will and Power.

Another perversion of the Scriptural doctrine on this subject is, that which denies any distinction between will and power, or faculty and act, in God. It is said that it is unphilosophical to say that God can do anything. We use the word "can" only in reference to difficulty to be overcome. When nothing stands in the way, when all opposition is precluded, then we no longer say, we can. It is, therefore, inconsistent with the nature of an absolute Being to say that He is able to do this or that.² It is further denied that willing can be ascribed to God, if any difference be assumed between willing and doing. The ordinary definition of omnipotence, Potest quod vult, is to be rejected. It is admitted, that the distinction between will and power is unavoidable, if we determine the nature of God from the analogy of our constitution. As will and power are distinct in us, we are disposed to think they are distinct in Him. But this method of determining the attributes of God leads to the destruction of the true idea of an absolute being. In such a being, no such distinction can be admitted; and therefore, in relation to God there can be no distinction between the actual and the possible. Nothing is possible but the actual; and all that is possible becomes actual. Strauss¹ says, after Schleiermacher,² that by the omnipotence of God is to be understood "not only that all that is has its causality in God, but that everything is and occurs for which any causality in God exists." Bruch³ says, that by the omnipotence of God is meant nothing more than that He is the original ground and cause of all things. He quotes Nitsch⁴ as saying, that "The idea of omnipotence is the repetition and application of the idea of God as creator of heaven and earth." Nitsch, however, does not understand the passage in the sense put upon it; for he adds, in his note commenting on the dictum of Abelard, "Deus non potest facere aliquid præter ea quæ facit," that, if this means that the actual exhausts the resources of God, it is to be rejected. The words of Abelard, nevertheless, correctly express the doctrine of the modern German school of theologians on this subject. Schleiermacher's language on this point is explicit and comprehensive. "Alles ist ganz durch die göttliche Allmacht und ganz durch den Naturzusammenhang, nicht aber darf die erstere als Ergänzung der letztern angesehen werden. Die Gesamtheit des endlichen Seins ist als vollkommene Darstellung der Allmacht zu denken, so dass alles wirklich ist und geschieht, wozu eine Productivität in Gott ist. Damit fällt weg die Differenz des Wirklichen und Möglichen, des absoluten und hypothetischen Wollens oder Könnens Gottes; denn dies führt auf einen wirksamen und unwirksamen Willen und letzterer kann bei Gott unmöglich statt finden; so wenig als Können und Wollen getrennt sein können." That is, "Everything is entirely through the divine omnipotence, and everything is through the course of nature. The former, however, must not be regarded as supplementary to the latter. The aggregate of finite things is the complete revelation of God's omnipotence, so that everything is and occurs for which there is a productivity in God. Thus the difference between the actual and the possible, between the absolute and hypothetical willing and power of God, disappears, because this implies an operative and inoperative will, but the latter is impossible in God; just as little as willing and power can be separated."⁵ This passage is quoted by Schweizer,⁶ who adopts the views which it presents.

¹ Strauss, i. p. 592. Schleiermacher, i. § 54. Werke, edit. Berlin, 1842, vol. iii. p. 285.

² Bruch, p. 155.

¹ Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 587.

² Glaubenslehre, I. § 54.

³ Die Lehre von den göttlichen Eigenschaften, p. 154.

⁴ Christliche Lehre, p. 160.

⁵ Gess, Uebersicht über das System Schleiermacher's, p. 88.

⁶ Glaubenslehre, I. p. 263.

This Doctrine Destroys our Knowledge of God.

In reference to this doctrine, it may be remarked, —

1. That it utterly confounds all our ideas of God. It renders all knowledge of Him impossible. If will and power are identical, then those words lose for us their meaning. We cannot know what God is, if this doctrine be true; and if we know not what He is, we cannot rationally worship, love, or trust Him.

2. The doctrine effectually destroys the personality of God. A person is a self-conscious, self-determining being. But in denying will to God, self-determination, and consequently personality, is denied to Him. This consequence is admitted by the advocates of this doctrine. "If in God," says Strauss, "willing and power are identical, then there can be no freedom of the will in God, in the sense of the Church theologians, who hold that it was possible for God not to create the world, or to have created it other than it is. If there be no ability in God to do what He does not do, there can be no freedom of will or power of choice." "Mit diesem Können fällt auch die Freiheit im Sinne eines Wahlvermögens hinweg."¹ This, however, it is said, is not the doctrine of fate; for fate supposes an ab extra necessity to which God is subject. If it does not teach fate, it at least teaches inexorable necessity. Spinoza says, "Ea res libera dicetur, quæ ex sola suæ naturæ necessitate existit et a se sola ad agendum determinatur. Necessaria autem, vel potius coacta quæ ab alio determinatur ad existendum et operandum certa ac determinata ratione."² And again,³ "Deum nullo modo fato subijcio, sed omnia inevitabili necessitate ex Dei natura sequi concipio." In this sense the sun is free in shining. It shines from the necessity of its nature. We think from a like necessity; but we can think of one thing or another, changing the current of our thoughts at pleasure. And thus we are free in exercising the power of thought. This freedom is denied to God. He can think only in one way. And all his thoughts are creative. He does, therefore, what He does, from a necessity of his nature, and does all He is able to do. God, according to this doctrine, is not a personal Being.

3. The Scriptures constantly represent God as able to do whatever He wills. They recognize the distinction between the actual and the possible; between ability and act; between what God does, and what He is able to do. With Him all things are possible. He is able of stones to raise up children unto Abraham. He can send me, says our Lord, twelve legions of angels.

¹ Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 587.

² Ethics, i. def. vii, edit. Jena, 1803, vol. ii. p. 36.

³ Epistola xxiii. Ibid. vol. i. 513.

4. As this is the doctrine of the Bible, it is the instinctive judgment of the human mind. It is a perfection in us, that we can do far more than we actually accomplish. With us the actual is not the measure of the possible.

5. It is, therefore, a limitation of God, a denial of his omnipotence, to say that He can do only what He actually brings to pass. There is infinitely more in God than simple causality of the actual.

It is consequently an erroneous definition of omnipotence to call it All-power, meaning thereby that all the efficiency in the universe is the efficiency of God; which is not only a pantheistic doctrine, but it makes the finite the measure of the infinite.

§ 11. Holiness of God.

This is a general term for the moral excellence of God. In 1 Sam. ii. 2, it is said, "There is none holy as the LORD;" no other Being absolutely pure, and free from all limitation in his moral perfection. "Thou Holy One of Israel," is the form of address which the Spirit puts into the lips of the people of God. "Exalt the LORD our God, and worship at his holy hill; for the LORD our God is Holy." (Ps. xcix. 9.) "Holy and reverend is his name." (Ps. cxi. 9.) "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity." (Hab. i. 13.) "Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for Thou only art Holy." (Rev. xv. 4.) Holiness, on the one hand, implies entire freedom from moral evil; and, upon the other, absolute moral perfection. Freedom from impurity is the primary idea of the word. To sanctify is to cleanse; to be holy, is to be clean. Infinite purity, even more than infinite knowledge or infinite power, is the object of reverence. Hence the Hebrew word קדוש, as used in Scripture, is often equivalent to venerandus. "The Holy One of Israel," is He who is to be feared and adored. Seraphim round about the throne who cry day and night, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of hosts, give expression to the feelings of all unfallen rational creatures in view of the infinite purity of God. They are the representatives of the whole universe, in offering this perpetual homage to the divine holiness. It is because of his holiness, that God is a consuming fire. And it was a view of his holiness which led the prophet to exclaim, "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the king, the LORD of hosts." (Is. vi. 5.)

It is in their application to the moral attributes of God, that the two methods of determining his nature come most directly into conflict. If we allow ourselves to be determined in answering the question, What is God? by the teachings of his Word, and the constitution of our own nature; if we refer to Him, in an infinite degree, every good we find in ourselves, then we can have no hesitation in believing that He is holy, just, and good. But if the philosophical notion of the absolute and infinite is to decide every question concerning the divine nature, then we must give up all confidence in our apprehensions of God, as an object of knowledge. This Strauss, the most candid of the recent philosophical theologians, frankly admits. He says: "The ideas of the absolute and of the holy are incompatible. He who holds to the former must give up the latter, since holiness implies relation; and, on the other hand, he who holds fast the idea of God as holy, must renounce the idea of his being absolute; for the idea of absolute is inconsistent with the slightest possibility of its being other than it is. The impossibility of referring moral attributes to God had been admitted by some of the fathers of the Church."¹

The Reasons urged for denying Moral Attributes to God.

The grounds on which it is denied that moral attributes can be predicated of God, are such as these: —

1. To assume that God can delight in good, and hate evil, takes for granted that He is susceptible of impression ab extra, which is inconsistent with his nature.

2. It is said that moral excellence implies subjection to a moral law. But an absolute and infinite Being cannot be thus subject to law. It is true that God is not subject to any law out of Himself. He is exlex, absolutely independent. He is a law unto Himself. The conformity of his will to reason is no subjection. It is only the harmony of his nature. God's being holy, implies nothing more than that He is not in conflict with Himself. On this point even the rationalistic theologian Wegscheider says: "Minime Deus cogitandus est tanquam pendens ex lege ethica vel eidem subiectus tanquam potestati cuidam alienæ; sed Deus sanctus ipsa ea lex est, natura quidam hypostatica indutus." ¹

¹ "So wollen also die Begriffe des Absoluten und des Heiligen nicht zusammengehen; sondern wer das Absolute festhält, der löst die Heiligkeit auf, welche nur an einem in Relation gestellten Wesen etwas ist; und wer es umgekehrt mit der Heiligkeit ernstlich nimmt, der tritt der Idee der Absolutheit zu nahe, welche durch den leisesten Schatten der Möglichkeit, anders zu sein als sie ist, verunreinigt wird. Diese Einsicht in die Unanwendbarkeit moralischer Attribute auf Gott hatten schon einzelne Kirchenväter erkannt." — Dogmatik, vol. i. p. 595.

3. It is said that moral excellence must be free. A moral agent, to be holy, must voluntarily do right. But this implies that he is able to do wrong. There must, therefore, be at least a metaphysical possibility of God's being evil, or He cannot be good. But all possibility of the Absolute being other than it is, is inconsistent with its nature. To this it may be answered that the ideas of liberty and necessity are indeed antagonistic; but that liberty and absolute certainty are perfectly compatible. That an infinitely wise Being will not act irrationally, is as absolutely certain as that the self-contradictory cannot be true. The one is as inconceivable as the other. It is just as impossible that an infinitely holy Being should be unholy as that light should be darkness. The impossibility, however, is of a different kind. The former is what Augustine calls the felix necessitas boni, which is the highest idea of freedom.

4. Strauss says that those who attribute moral perfections to God, forget that a purely spiritual Being can have nothing of what we call reason, wisdom, goodness, wrath, righteousness, etc. "Strictly speaking," he adds "the ascription of moral attributes to God supposes that He is material; and the most abstract theological ideas on the subject are really founded on Materialism." This is founded on the assumption that spirit is impersonal, a generic force, which becomes individual and personal only by union with a material organization, just as the Realists define man to be generic humanity, individualized and rendered personal by union with a given corporeal organization.

It is surely most unreasonable to sacrifice to such speculations all religion, and all confidence in the intuitive judgments of the human mind, as well as all faith in God and in the Bible.

It is scarcely less destructive of the true doctrine, to define holiness in God as the causality of conscience in us. That we are moral beings is not admitted to be a proof that God has moral attributes. That the sun produces cheerfulness in us is no proof that the sun is cheerful. But if we know nothing of God except that He is the cause of all things, He is to us only an inscrutable force, and not a Father, and not a God.

¹ Institutiones, p. 273.

§ 12. *Justice.*A. Meaning of the Word.

The word justice, or righteousness, is used in Scripture sometimes in a wider and sometimes in a more restricted sense. In theology, it is often distinguished as justitia interna, or moral excellence, and justitia externa, or rectitude of conduct. In Hebrew צִדִּיק means, in a physical sense, straight; and in a moral sense, right, what is as it should be. And יָשָׁר means rightness, that which satisfies the demands of rectitude or law. The Greek word δίκαιος has the physical sense of equal; and the moral sense of, conformed to what is right; and δίκαιοσύνη is either that which divides equally, i. e., equity in the moral sense, or that which satisfies the demands of right. The Latin justus and justitia are commonly used in the wide sense for what is right, or as it should be. Cicero¹ defines justitia as “animi affectio summi cuique tribuens.” This definition he elsewhere amplifies, saying: “Justitia erga Deos religio, erga parentas pietas, creditis in rebus fides, in moderatione animadvertendi lenitas, amicitia in benevolentia nominatur.”²

When we regard God as the author of our moral nature, we conceive of Him as holy; when we regard Him in his dealings with his rational creatures, we conceive of Him as righteous. He is a righteous ruler; all his laws are holy, just, and good. In his moral government He faithfully adheres to those laws. He is impartial and uniform in their execution. As a judge he renders unto every man according to his works. He neither condemns the innocent, nor clears the guilty; neither does He ever punish with undue severity. Hence the justice of God is distinguished as rectoral, or that which is concerned in the imposition of righteous laws and in their impartial execution; and distributive, or that which is manifested in the righteous distribution of rewards and punishment. The Bible constantly represents God as a righteous ruler and a just judge. These two aspects of his character, or of our relation to Him, are not carefully distinguished. We have the assurance which runs through the Scriptures, that “The judge of all the earth” must “do right.” (Gen. xviii. 25.) “God is a righteous judge.” (Ps. vii. 11, marginal reading.) “He shall judge the world with righteousness.” (Ps. xevi. 13.) “Clouds and darkness are round about Him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." (Ps. xcvi. 2.) Notwithstanding all the apparent inequalities in the distribution of his favours; notwithstanding the prosperity of the wicked and the afflictions of the righteous, the conviction is everywhere expressed that God is just; that somehow and somewhere He will vindicate his dealings with men, and show that He is righteous in all his ways and holy in all his works.

¹ De Finibus, v. 23, 65, edit. Leipzig, 1850, p. 1042.

² Partitiones Oratoriæ, 22, 78, edit. ut sup. p. 194.

B. Justice in its Relation to Sin.

As the sense of guilt is universal among men, and as the manifestations of sin are so constant and pervading, it is mainly in its relation to sin that the justice of God is revealed. Hence many theologians define the justice of God as that attribute of his nature which is manifested in the punishment of sin. Goodness, it is said, is manifested in bestowing good, and justice in the infliction of punishment. Schleiermacher says, "Justice is that causality in God which connects suffering with actual sin."¹ Schweitzer says, "We know God as just only through the punishment of sin." Hegel says, "The manifestation of the nothingness of the finite as power, is justice." This is the philosophical statement of the principle that "Might is Right," a principle which underlies the morals and religion of the modern philosophy.

C. The Reformation of the Offender is not the Primary Object of Punishment.

As the justice of God is specially manifested in the punishment of sin, it is of primary importance to determine why sin is punished.

One prevalent theory on this subject is, that the only legitimate end of punishment is the reformation of the offender.

It is of course to be admitted, that the good of the offender is often the ground or reason why evil is inflicted. A father chastises a child in love, and for its good. And God, our heavenly Father, brings suffering upon his children for their edification. But evil inflicted for the benefit of the sufferer, is chastisement, and not punishment. Punishment, properly speaking, is evil inflicted in satisfaction of justice.

That the good of the sufferer is not the primary end of the infliction of punishment, is proved:—

1. Because the punishment of the wicked is always, in the Scriptures, referred to the anger of God, and the chastisement of his people to his love. The cases, therefore, are not analogous. This difference of representation is designed to teach us that the wicked and the good do not stand in the same relation to God, as objects of benevolence; but that the one He punishes to testify his disapprobation and satisfy his justice, and the other He chastises to bring them nearer to Himself.

¹ Christliche Glaube, § 84, Works Berlin, 1843, vol. iv. p. 465.

2. In many cases the nature of the punishment precludes the possibility of the good of the offender being the ground of its infliction. The deluge, the destruction of the cities of the plain, and the overthrow of Jerusalem, were certainly not designed for the benefit of the men who suffered from those desolating inflictions. Much less can it be assumed that the punishment of the fallen angels, and of the finally impenitent, is intended to be reformatory.

3. Scripture and experience both teach that suffering, when of the nature of punishment, has no tendency to reform. When suffering is seen to come from a father's hand, and to be a manifestation of love, it has a sanctifying power; but when it comes from the hand of God, as a judge and an avenger, and is the expression of displeasure and a proof of our alienation from God, its tendency is to harden and to exasperate. Hence the Apostle says, that so long as men are under condemnation, they bring forth fruit unto sin; and that, only when reconciled to God and assured of his love, do they bring forth fruit unto God. The great New Testament prophet, in his vision of the world of woe, represents the lost as gnawing their tongues with pain and blaspheming God. The denunciation of punishment is addressed to fear, but fear is not the principle of genuine obedience.

4. On this subject, appeal may be fairly made to the common consciousness of men. Such is our moral hebetude that it is only glaring offences which awaken our moral sensibilities, and reveal their true nature. When any great crime is committed, there is an instinctive and universal demand for the punishment of the criminal. No man can pretend that the desire for his reformation is the feeling which prompts that demand. That is not so much as thought of. It is the instinctive judgment of the mind that he ought to suffer. It is not benevolence towards him which calls for the infliction of punishment.

D. The Prevention of Crime is not the Primary End of Punishment.

The doctrine that the only legitimate end of punishment is the prevention of crime, has had great prevalence in the Church and the world. It is the common doctrine of jurists. It is, of course, to be conceded that the good of society and of the moral government of God, is one important end of punishment in all governments, human or divine. It is, however, rather an important collateral effect of the administration of justice, than its immediate design. The doctrine in question merges justice into benevolence. According to this way of thinking, it is only because God has a view to the happiness of his rational creatures, that He visits sin with punishment. This doctrine was adopted by some of the early fathers. In answer to the objection that the Bible represented God as a vindictive being, because it speaks of his anger and of his determination to punish, they said that He punished only out of benevolence. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus¹ says, "Men ask how God can be good and kind if He is angry and punishes? They should remember that punishment is for the good of the offender and for the prevention of evil." And Tertullian² says: "Omne hoc justitiæ opus proeuratio bonitatis est." Origen,³ also to the same effect, says: "Ex quibus omnibus constat, unum eundemque esse justum et bonum legis et evangeliorum Deum, et benefacere eum justitia et eum bonitate punire."

Many later theologians take the same view. Leibnitz defines justice to be benevolence guided by wisdom. Wolf, who modified the whole system of theology in accordance with the philosophy of Leibnitz, adopted the same view. So did Stapfer,⁴ who says: "Quando Deus ejusmodi malum triste ex peccato necessario sequens creaturæ accidere sinit, . . . dicitur peccatorem punire, et hoc sensu ipsi tribuitur justitia vindicativa. In justitia punitiva bonitas eum sapientia administratur.⁵ Notio justitiæ resolvitur in notionem sapientiæ et bonitatis." Grotius, the jurist, makes this idea of justice the fundamental principle of his great work, "De Satisfactione Christi."

The Optimist Theory.

In this country the same view has been extensively adopted, and made, as it must of necessity be, the controlling principle of those systems of theology in which it is incorporated. It is assumed that happiness is the greatest good; and hence that the pur-

¹ Pædagogus, l. viii; edit. Cologne, 1688, p. 114, c. and p. 115.

² Adversus Marcionem, II. 10; edit. Basel, 1562, p. 179, seu II. 13; edit. Leipzig, 1841, iii. p. 90. Bibliotheca, Gersdorf, vol. vi.

³ De Principiis, II. v. 3; edit. Paris, 1733, vol. i. p. 83, a.

⁴ Institutiones, i. 153; edit. Tiguri, 1743, p. 154.

⁵ Ibid. i. 154.

pose and desire to promote happiness is the sum of all virtue. From this it follows, that this world, the work of a God of infinite benevolence, wisdom, and power, must be the best possible world for the production of happiness; and, therefore, the permission of sin, and its punishment, must be referred to the benevolence of God. They are the necessary means for securing the greatest amount of happiness. If happiness be not the greatest good; if holiness be a higher end than happiness; if expediency be not the ground and measure of moral obligation, it is obvious that this whole structure collapses.

Proof of the Scriptural Doctrine.

It is admitted that happiness is promoted by justice, and therefore that it is contrary to a wise benevolence that men should be allowed to sin with impunity. But justice cannot properly be merged into benevolence. And that the promotion of happiness by the prevention of crime is not the primary end of the infliction of punishment, is evident, —

1. From the testimony of every man's consciousness. Every man knows that benevolence and justice, as revealed in his own consciousness, are different sentiments. The one prompts to the promotion of happiness, the other involves the instinctive judgment, that a criminal ought to suffer for his crime. We do not stop to ask, or to think, what may be the collateral effect on others of the infliction of punishment. Anterior to such reflection, and independent of it, is the intuitive perception, that sin should be punished, for its own sake, or on account of its inherent ill-desert. These instinctive moral judgments are as clear and as trustworthy revelations of the nature of God as can possibly be made. They force conviction in spite of all speculative sophistries. Every man knows the righteous judgment of God, that those who sin are worthy of death. If justice and benevolence are distinct in us, they are distinct in God. If we, in obedience to the nature which He has given us, intuitively perceive or judge that sin ought to be punished for its own sake, and irrespective of the good effect punishment may have on others, then such also is the judgment of God. This is the principle which underlies and determines all our ideas of the Supreme Being. If moral perfection be not in Him what it is in us, then He is to us an unknown something, and we use words without meaning when we speak of Him as holy, just, and good.

Argument from the Religious Experience of Believers.

2. This sense of justice, which is indestructible in the nature of man, and which, in common with reason and conscience, has survived the Fall, is not only revealed in the ordinary experience of men, but still more distinctly in their religious consciousness. What is commonly called "conviction of sin," is only a modification, and higher form, of those inward experiences which are common to all men. All men know that they are sinners. They all know that sin, as related to the justice of God, is guilt, that which ought to be punished; and that, as related to his holiness, it renders us polluted and offensive in his sight. They also know, intuitively, that God is just as well as holy; and, therefore, that his moral perfection calls for the punishment of sin, by the same necessity by which He disapproves of and hates it. Under the pressure of these convictions, and the consciousness of their utter inability either to satisfy divine justice, or to free themselves from the defilement and power of sin, men either tremble in the constant looking for of judgment, or they look out of themselves for help. When, under either the common or saving operations of the Spirit of God, these sentiments are deepened, then their nature is more clearly revealed. A man, when thus convinced of sin, sees that not only would it be right that he should be punished, but that the justice, or moral excellence of God, demands his punishment. It is not that he ought to suffer for the good of others, or to sustain the moral government of God, but that he, as a sinner and for his sins, ought to suffer. Were he the only creature in the universe, this conviction would be the same, both in nature and degree. Such is the experience of men under the conviction of sin, as recorded in the Scriptures and in the history of the Church. In many cases criminals under the pressure of these feelings have delivered themselves to the officers of justice to be punished. More frequently they resort to self-inflicted tortures to satisfy the clamors of conscience. We have, therefore, an inward revelation, which can neither be suppressed nor perverted, that justice is not benevolence.

The Sense of Justice not due to Christian Culture.

3. That this sense of justice is not due to Christian culture, or to the influence of peculiar forms of doctrine, but belongs to the common consciousness of men, is plain. (a.) Because it is impressed upon all human languages as far as known or cultivated. All languages have different words for justice and benevolence.

There could not be this difference in the words, if the sentiments themselves were not different. Every one knows that when we say a man is just, we mean one thing; and when we say he is benevolent, we mean another thing. (b.) All history as it records the workings of human nature, reveals this innate sense of justice. We everywhere hear men calling for the punishment of offenders, or denouncing those who allow them to escape with impunity. No mass of men ever witness a flagrant act of cruelty or wrong without an irrepressible manifestation of indignation. The voice of nature, which in such cases is the voice of God, demands the punishment of the wrong-doer. (c.) In all religions which reveal the inward convictions of men, there are expiatory rites. Every sacrifice for sin, the smoke from every altar, which has been going up through all ages and from every part of the world, are so many attestations to the truth of reason and of Scripture, that there is such an attribute as justice in God, distinct from his benevolence.

Argument from the Holiness of God.

4. The truth of this doctrine may also be inferred from the holiness of God. If He is infinitely pure, his nature must be opposed to all sin; and as his acts are determined by his nature, his disapprobation of sin must manifest itself in his acts. But the disfavour of God, the manifestation of his disapprobation, is death, as his favour is life. It cannot be that this essential opposition between holiness and sin should be dependent for its manifestation on the mere ab extra consideration that evil would result from sin being allowed to go unpunished. It might as well be said that we should feel no aversion to pain, unless aware that it weakened our constitution. We do not approve of holiness simply because it tends to produce happiness; neither do we disapprove of sin simply because it tends to produce misery. It is inevitable, therefore, that the perfection of the infinitely holy God should manifest its opposition to sin, without waiting to judge of the consequences of the expression of this divine repugnance.

5. The doctrine that the prevention of crime is the only legitimate end of punishment, or that there is no such attribute in God as justice, as distinguished from benevolence, rests on the assumption, before remarked upon, that all virtue consists in benevolence; which again rests on the assumption that happiness is the highest good; which makes expediency the ground of moral obligation, and the rule of moral conduct. It is indeed a solecism to use the word moral in such connections, for, on this theory, the word has no meaning. A thing may be wise or unwise, expedient or inexpedient, but in no other sense right or wrong. Wrong becomes right, and right becomes wrong, as the greater amount of happiness flows from the one or from the other. As this utilitarian theory of morals has been banished from the schools of philosophy, it should be banished from systems of theology.

Argument from the Connection between Sin and Misery.

6. The inseparable connection between sin and misery is a revelation of the justice of God. That holiness promotes happiness is a revelation of the relation in which God stands to holiness; and that sin produces misery is no less a revelation of the relation in which He stands to moral evil. This constitution of things depending on the nature and will of God, proves that sin is evil in its own nature, and is punished for its own sake. The law of God which includes a penalty as well as precepts, is in both a revelation of the nature of God. If the precepts manifest his holiness, the penalty as clearly manifests his justice. If the one is immutable, so also is the other. The wages of sin is death. Death is what is due to it in justice, and what without injustice cannot be withheld from it. If the prevention of crime were the primary end of punishment, then if the punishment of the innocent, the execution, for example, of the wife and children of a murderer, would have a greater restraining influence than the punishment of the guilty murderer, their execution would be just. But this would shock the moral sense of men.

Argument from the Scriptural Doctrines of Satisfaction and Justification.

7. The Scriptural doctrines of satisfaction and justification rest on the principle that God is immutably just, i. e., that his moral excellence, in the case of sin, demands punishment, or expiation. The Bible clearly teaches the necessity of satisfaction to justice in order to the forgiveness of sin. Christ was set forth as a propitiation, in order that God might be just in justifying the ungodly. This assumes that it would be unjust, i. e., contrary to moral rectitude, to pardon the guilty without such a propitiation. This necessity for a satisfaction is never referred to expediency or to governmental considerations. If sin could have been pardoned, without a satisfaction, the Apostle says, Christ is dead in vain. (Gal. ii. 21.) If there could have been a law which could have given life, salvation would have been by the law. (Gal. iii. 21.)

Moreover, if there is no such attribute in God as justice, as distinguished from benevolence, then there can be no such thing as justification. There may be pardon, as the act of a sovereign remitting a penalty and restoring an offender to favour; but no such thing as justification, as an act of a judge proceeding according to law and pronouncing the demands of justice satisfied. The Scriptures, however, according to the almost unanimous judgment of the Church, pronounce that justification is more than an act of executive clemency. Conscience is not satisfied with mere forgiveness. It is essential to peace with God, that the soul should see that justice is satisfied. This is the reason why the death of Christ, why his blood, is so inexpressibly precious in the eyes of his people. All the experience of the saints is a protest against the principle that expiation is unnecessary, that sin can be pardoned without a satisfaction of justice.

Paul's Argument.

The whole argument of the Apostle in his Epistle to the Romans is founded on the principle that justice is a divine attribute distinct from benevolence. His argument is: God is just. All men are sinners. All, therefore, are guilty, i. e., under condemnation. Therefore no man can be justified, i. e., pronounced not guilty, on the ground of his character or conduct. Sinners cannot satisfy justice. But what they could not do, Christ, the Eternal Son of God, clothed in our nature, has done for them. He has brought in everlasting righteousness, which meets all the demands of the law. All those who renounce their own righteousness, and trust to the righteousness of Christ, God justifies and saves. This is the gospel as preached by Paul. It all rests on the assumption that God is just.

The doctrine of the vindictory justice, which has this clear evidence of its truth, in the moral nature of man, in the religious experience of believers, and in the teaching and doctrines of the Scriptures, has ever been considered as a turning point in theology.

E. Philosophical Views of the Nature of Justice.

The teachings of the Scriptures, and the faith of the Church, so far as the divine attributes are concerned, are founded on the assumption that God is a personal Being. It is involved in that assumption, not only that He possesses intelligence and moral character, but that he thinks, feels, wills, and acts. It is, moreover, involved in the idea of personality, that thinking, feeling, willing, and acting in God, are, in all that is essential, analogous to what those terms signify in us. The modern philosophy, however, teaches that, if God be an absolute Being, thinking, feeling, willing, and acting are inconsistent with his nature. Hence, —

1. Some teach that God is only the original ground of being, having in Himself no distinctive attributes. What we call the attributes of God are only the attributes of finite creatures having the ground of their being in God. That they are intelligent, moral, voluntary agents, is no proof that the same is true of God. That the sun produces the sensation of heat in us is no proof that it experiences the same sensation. The attributes of God, therefore, are only different aspects of the causality in Him which produces different effects. Justice, then, is not an attribute of God; it is only the causality to which the connection between sin and suffering is to be referred.

2. Others, while insisting that personality, and all that it involves, are incompatible with the idea of an absolute Being, still maintain that we are constrained, and bound, to believe in the personality of God, on the authority of the Bible and of our own moral nature. But the Bible reveals, it is said, not absolute, but only regulative truth; not what He is, but what it is expedient for us to think He is. Justice in God, then, is for us what generosity in a fairy is for nursery children.

3. Others again, while they admit personality in God, make it a personality which precludes all willing, and all acting, except in the form of law, or general, uniform efficiency. Justice in God, therefore, is only a name for one form, or one mode, of the manifestation of the power of God. As it is to be referred to his ordination, or to his nature, that fire burns and acids corrode, so it is to be referred to his general efficiency that sin produces misery. There is no special intervention of God, when fire burns; and there is no special decision, or judgment on his part, when a sinner is punished. Punishment is not the execution of a sentence pronounced by an intelligent being on the merits of the case, but the operation of a general law. Bruch (Professor of Theology in the Theological Seminary in Strasbourg) is a representative of this mode of thinking. He professes Theism, or faith in a personal God, but he teaches that the attributes of God are nothing else (als die Modalitäten seiner ewigen Wirksamkeit) "than the modes of his constant efficiency." Since among men justice is exercised in a succession of special acts, it is erroneously inferred that there is a like succession of acts of the will of God by which He approves or condemns. The great difficulty, he says, arises from judging of God after the analogy of our own nature. He admits that the Bible does this; that it constantly speaks of God as a righteous judge, administering justice according to his will. In this case, however, he adds, it is important to separate the real truth from the imperfection of its Scriptural form. Penalties are not evils inflicted by a special act of the divine will, but the natural consequences of sin, which cannot fail to manifest themselves. There is an organic connection between sin and evil. All the activity or agency of God is in the form of laws having their foundation in his nature. Thus justice is simply that law, or uniform mode of divine operation, by which sin is made its own punishment.¹ Hence there is no distinction between natural and positive inflictions; the deluge was either no punishment, or it was the natural consequence of the sins of the antediluvians. Hence, there is no such thing as forgiveness. The only possible way to remove the suffering is to remove the sin. But how is the sin of theft or murder to be removed? We can understand how pride or envy may be subdued and the suffering they occasion be escaped: but how can a past act be removed? A man hardened in sin suffers little or nothing for a special offence; the morally refined suffer indescribably. Thus, according to this theory, the better a man is, the more severely he is punished for his sin. Strauss is consistent enough to carry the principle out, and discard altogether the ideas of reward and punishment, as belonging to a low form of thought. He quotes and adopts the dictum of Spinoza: "Beatitudo non est virtutis præmium, sed ipsa virtus."

4. Scarcely distinguished from the doctrine last mentioned, is that presented by Dr. John Young.² His doctrine is that there are certain eternal and immutable laws arising out of the nature of things, independent of the will or nature of God, to which He is as much subject as his creatures. One of these laws is, that virtue produces happiness, and vice misery. The one is, therefore, rewarded, and the other punished, by the necessary and immutable operation of that law, and not by the will of God. God, therefore, ceases to be the ruler of the world. He is Himself subordinate to eternal and necessary laws. That this doctrine is at variance with the whole tenor of the Bible cannot be doubted. It is no less opposed to the dictates of our own moral and religious nature. It is revealed in that nature that we are subject, not to necessary and self-acting laws, but to an intelligent, personal God, to whom we are accountable for our character and conduct, and who rewards and punishes his creatures according to their works.

¹ See the section on the "Gerechtigkeit Gottes" in Bruch's Lehre von den Göttlichen Eigenschaften, pp. 275-296.

² Light and Life of Men.

As a philosophical theory, this doctrine is much below the standard of the German theologians. For they, as far as they are Theists, admit that these immutable laws are determined by the nature of God, and are the uniform modes of his operation. Indeed, as God and his creatures exhaust the whole category of being, the "nature of things," apart from the nature of God and of his creatures, seems to be a phrase without meaning. It is tantamount to the "nature of nonentity."

§ 13. The Goodness of God.

A. The Scriptural Doctrine.

Goodness, in the Scriptural sense of the term, includes benevolence, love, mercy, and grace. By benevolence is meant the disposition to promote happiness; all sensitive creatures are its objects. Love includes complacency, desire, and delight, and has rational beings for its objects. Mercy is kindness exercised towards the miserable, and includes pity, compassion, forbearance, and gentleness, which the Scriptures so abundantly ascribe to God. Grace is love exercised towards the unworthy. The love of a holy God to sinners is the most mysterious attribute of the divine nature. The manifestation of this attribute for the admiration and beatification of all intelligent creatures, is declared to be the special design of redemption. God saves sinners, we are told, "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us, through Christ Jesus." (Eph. ii. 7.) This is the burden of that Epistle.

As all the modifications of goodness above mentioned are found even in our dilapidated nature, and commend themselves to our moral approbation, we know they must exist in God without measure and without end. In him they are infinite, eternal, and immutable.

Benevolence.

The goodness of God in the form of benevolence is revealed in the whole constitution of nature. As the universe teems with life, it teems also with enjoyment. There are no devices in nature for the promotion of pain for its own sake; whereas the manifestations of design for the production of happiness are beyond computation. The manifestation of the goodness of God in the form of love, and specially of love to the undeserving, is, as just stated, the great end of the work of redemption. "God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John iii. 16.) "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." (1 John iv. 10.) The Apostle prays that believers might be able to comprehend the height and depth, the length and breadth, of that love which passes knowledge. (Eph. iii. 19.)

Love.

Love in us includes complacency and delight in its object, with the desire of possession and communion. The schoolmen, and often the philosophical theologians, tell us that there is no feeling in God. This, they say, would imply passivity, or susceptibility of impression from without, which it is assumed is incompatible with the nature of God. "We must exclude," says Bruch,¹ "passivity from the idea of love, as it exists in God. For God cannot be the subject of passivity in any form. Besides, if God experienced complacency in intelligent beings, He would be dependent on them; which is inconsistent with his nature as an Absolute Being." Love, therefore, he defines as that attribute of God which secures the development of the rational universe; or, as Schleiermacher expresses it, "It is that attribute in virtue of which God communicates Himself."² According to the philosophers, the Infinite develops itself in the finite; this fact, in theological language, is due to love. The only point of analogy between love in us and love in the Absolute and Infinite, is self-communication. Love in us leads to self-revelation and communion; in point of fact the Infinite is revealed and developed in the universe, and specially in humanity. Bruch admits that this doctrine is in real contradiction to the representations of God in the Old Testament, and in apparent contradiction to those of the New Testament. If love in God is only a name for that which accounts for the rational universe; if God is love, simply because He develops himself in thinking and conscious beings, then the word has for us no definite meaning; it reveals to us nothing concerning the real nature of God. Here again we have to choose between a mere philosophical speculation and the clear testimony of the Bible, and of our own moral and religious nature. Love of necessity involves feeling, and if there be no feeling in God, there can be no love. That He produces happiness is no proof of love. The earth does that unconsciously and without design. Men often render others happy from vanity, from fear, or from caprice. Unless the production of happiness can be referred, not only to a conscious intention, but to a purpose dictated by kind feeling, it is no proof of benevolence. And unless the children of God are the objects of his complacency and delight, they are not the objects of his love. He may be cold, insensible, indifferent, or even unconscious; He ceases to be God in the sense of the Bible, and in the sense in which we need a God, unless He can love as well as know and act. The philosophical objection against ascribing feeling to God, bears, as we have seen, with equal force against the ascription to Him of knowledge or will. If that objection be valid, He becomes to us simply an unknown cause, what men of science call force; that to which all phenomena are to be referred, but of which we know nothing. We must adhere to the truth in its Scriptural form, or we lose it altogether. We must believe that God is love in the sense in which that word comes home to every human heart. The Scriptures do not mock us when they say, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the LORD pitieth them that fear Him." (Ps. ciii. 13.) He meant what He said when He proclaimed Himself as "The LORD, the LORD God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth." (Ex. xxxiv. 6.) "Beloved," says the Apostle, "let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God loved us, we ought also to love one another." (1 John iv. 7-11.) The word love has the same sense throughout this passage. God is love; and love in Him is, in all that is essential to its nature, what love is in us. Herein we do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

¹ Eigenschriften, page 240.

² Christliche Glaube, § 166; Works, Berlin, 1843, vol. iv. p. 513.

B. The Existence of Evil.

How can the existence of evil, physical and moral, be reconciled with the benevolence and holiness of a God infinite in his wisdom and power? This is the question which has exercised the reason and tried the faith of men in all ages of the world. Such is the distance between God and man, such the feebleness of our powers, and such the limited range of our vision, it might seem reasonable to leave this question to be answered by God himself. If a child cannot rationally sit in judgment on the conduct of his parents, nor a peasant comprehend the affairs of an empire, we certainly are not competent to call God to account, or to ask of Him the reason of his ways. We might rest satisfied with the assurance that the Judge of all the earth must do right. These considerations, however, have not availed to prevent speculation on this subject. The existence of evil is constantly brought forward by sceptics as an argument against religion; and it is constantly in the minds of believers as a difficulty and a doubt. While it is our duty to obey the injunction, "Be still and know that I am God," it is no less our duty to protest against those solutions of this great problem which either destroy the nature of sin or the nature of God.

Theories which involve the Denial of Sin.

Most of the theories proposed to account for the existence of evil, come under one or the other of the three following classes: First, those which really or virtually deny the existence of evil in the world. What we call evil is distinguished as physical and moral, pain and sin. There is some plausibility in the argument to prove that pain is not necessarily an evil. It is necessary to the safety of sentient creatures. But pain exists far beyond the bounds of this necessity. Such is the amount and variety of suffering in the world, of the just and of the unjust, of infants and of adults, that no philosophy can smother the conviction that the misery which weighs so heavily on the children of men, is an appalling evil. There is no such trial to our faith, as to see an infant suffering excruciating pain. If, however, pain could be removed from the category of evil, sin is not so easily disposed of. The world lies in wickedness. The history of man is, to a large degree, the history of sin. If God be holy, wise, and omnipotent, how can we account for this widely extended and long-continued prevalence of sin?

One solution is sought in the denial that sin is an evil. In other words, it is denied that there is any such thing as sin. What we so regard is, as some maintain, nothing more than limitation of being. To be free from sin, we must be free from limitation, i. e., infinite. It is not an evil that one tree is smaller, less beautiful, or less valuable than others; or that a plant has not the sensitive life of an animal; or that all animals have not the rational powers of man. As in a forest, we see trees of every shape and size, perfectly and imperfectly developed, and this diversity is itself a good; so among men there are some more, and some less conformed to the ideal standard of reason and right, but this is not an evil. It is only diversity of development; the manifold forms of an endless life.

Others say that what we call sin is the necessary condition of virtue. There can be no action without reaction; no strength without obstacles to be overcome; no pleasure without pain; and no virtue without vice. Moral goodness is mastery over moral evil. There cannot be one without the other. All would be dead and motionless, a stagnant sea, were it not for this antagonism.

Others again say that sin has only a subjective reality. It is analogous to pain. Some things affect us agreeably, others disagreeably; some excite self-approbation, some disapprobation. But that is simply our own concern. God no more participates in our judgments than He does in our sensations.

Others do not so expressly deny the existence of sin. They admit that it is not only evil to us, but that it involves guilt in the sight of God, and therefore should be punished. Nevertheless, they represent it as arising necessarily out of the constitution of our nature. All creatures are subject to the law of development — to a "Werden." Perfection is a goal to be reached by a gradual process. This law controls every sphere of life, vegetable, animal, intellectual, and moral. Every plant is developed from a seed. Our bodies begin in a germ; infancy is feeble and suffering. Our minds are subject to the same law. They are, of necessity, open to error. Our moral life is not an exception to this rule. Moral beings, at least those constituted as we are, cannot avoid sin. It is incident to their nature and condition. It is to be outlived and overcome. If the world be so constituted and so directed that there is a continued progress toward perfection; if all evil, and especially all sin, be eliminated by this progress, the wisdom, goodness, and holiness of God will be thereby vindicated. Bruch¹ asks, "Why has God (der heilige Urgeist) brought men into the world with only the potentiality of freedom (which with him includes perfection), and not with the actuality, but left that perfection to be attained by a long process of development? The only answer to that question," he says, is, "that development lies in the very nature of the finite. It must strive toward perfection by an endless process, without ever reaching it in its fulness. We might as well ask why God has ordained that the tree should be developed from a germ? or why the earth itself has passed through so many periods of change, ever from a lower to a higher state? or why the universe is made up of things finite, and is itself finite?" He adds the further consideration, "that God, with the possibility of sin, has provided redemption by which it is to be overcome, banished, and swallowed up." "The annihilation of sin is the design of the whole work of redemption. 'The Son of Man is come that He might destroy the works of the devil.' (1 John iii. 8.) Sin, however, will disappear only when not the individual alone, but when the whole race of man has reached the goal of its destination, — and when," he asks, "will this happen?"¹ That question he leaves unanswered. On a following page, however, he quotes Klaiber² as saying: "Divine revelation gives the only possible and satisfactory answer to the question, how the existence of sin can be reconciled with the holiness of God, an answer which satisfies not only our pious feelings, but our anthropological and theological speculations, in that it makes known the truth that God determined on the creation of beings, who, as free agents, were subject to the possibility of sin, and who were through their own fault sunk in evil, in connection with redemption; so that sin is only a transient, vanishing phenomenon in the development of finite beings. This is the great idea which pervades the whole of revelation; yea, which is its essence and its goal."

¹ Eigenschaften, p. 255.

It is obvious that all theories which make sin a necessary evil, destroy its nature as revealed in Scripture, and in our own consciousness.

Sin considered as the Necessary Means of the Greatest Good.

A much more plausible theory, belonging to the class of those which virtually, although not professedly, destroy the nature of sin, is that which regards it as the necessary means of the greatest good. Sin, in itself, is an evil; relatively, it is a good. The universe is better with it than without it. In itself, it is an evil that the smaller animals should be devoured by the larger; but as this is necessary to prevent the undue development of animal life, and as it ministers to the higher forms thereof, it becomes a benevolent arrangement. The amputation of a limb is an evil; but if necessary to save life, it is a good. Wars are dreadful evils, yet the world is indebted to wars for the preservation of civil and religious liberty, for which they are a small price. Better have war than lose the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Thus, if sin be the necessary means of the greatest good, it ceases to be an evil, on the whole, and it is perfectly consistent with the benevolence of God to permit its occurrence. This has been a favorite method of solving the problem of evil in all ages. This is the idea which Leibnitz wrought out so elaborately in his "Théodicée." It has been adopted by many theologians who do not carry it on to its legitimate consequences. Thus Twisten¹ says: "If the world be absolutely dependent on the most perfect Being; if it be the work of the highest love, power, and wisdom; and if it be constantly controlled and governed by God, it must be absolutely perfect." Hence even sin, although like pain an evil in itself, must on the whole be a good. It is a necessary element in a perfect world. Twisten, therefore, says,² "If the world, with the sin and misery which it contains, produces a greater amount of good, and reveals the divine power and love more fully than could otherwise be possible, then the consistency of the existence of evil with the universal causality (or government) of God is thereby vindicated." The word good in this connection, according to the common doctrine of optimists, does not mean moral good, but happiness. The principle on which this theory is founded was propounded in a posthumous treatise of President Edwards, in which he taught that virtue consists in the love of being. This principle was adopted and carried out by Drs. Hopkins and Emmons in their systems of theology, which for many years had great influence in this country.

¹ Eigenschaften, pp. 269, 270.

² Von der Sünde und Erlösung, p. 21, Stud. der Ev. Geistl. Württembergs, vol. ii. part 2, Stuttgart, 1835.

Objections to this Theory.

Plausible as this theory is, it is liable to many objections.

1. In the first place, we have no right to limit the infinite God. To say that this is the best possible world, is to say that God can make nothing greater or better; which, unless the world be infinite, is to say that God is finite. It is enough for us to believe that the world with its finite results, is what God in his wisdom saw fit to call into existence; but that it is the best He could make, is a gratuitous and derogatory assumption.

2. It is unscriptural, and contrary to our moral reason, to make happiness the end of creation. The Bible declares the glory of God, an infinitely higher end, to be the final cause for which all things exist. It is the instinctive judgment of men, that holiness or moral excellence is a greater good than happiness. But, on this theory, holiness has no value except as a means of producing happiness. This cannot be believed, except under a protest from our moral nature. The theory in question, therefore, solves the problem of evil by denying its existence. Nothing is an evil which tends to the greatest happiness. Sin is the necessary means of the greatest good, and therefore is not an evil.

¹ Dogmatik, ii. p. 121.

² Ibid. p. 130.

The Doctrine that God cannot prevent Sin in a Moral System.

The second general method of reconciling the existence of sin with the benevolence and holiness of God, is, not to deny that sin, even all things considered, is an evil ; but to affirm that God cannot prevent all sin, or even the present amount of sin, in a moral system. It assumes that certainty is inconsistent with free agency. Any kind or degree of influence which renders it certain how a free agent will act, destroys his liberty in acting. He must always be able to act contrary to any degree of influence brought to bear upon him, or he ceases to be free. God, therefore, of necessity limits Himself when He creates free agents. They are beyond his absolute control. He may argue and persuade, but He cannot govern.

This doctrine that God cannot effectually control the acts of free agents without destroying their liberty, is so contrary to the Scriptures, that it has never been adopted by any organized portion of the Christian Church. Some theologians avail themselves of it for an emergency, when treating of this subject, although it is utterly at variance with their general scheme. Twisten, for example, who, as we have seen, in one place teaches that God voluntarily permits sin as the necessary means of the greatest good, in another place ¹ says that He cannot prevent it in a moral system. “Mit der Freiheit,” he says, “war die Möglichkeit des Misbrauchs gegeben ; ohne jene zu vernichten, konnte Gott diesen nicht verhindern.” That is, without destroying liberty, God cannot prevent its abuse. If this be so, then God cannot govern free agents. He cannot secure the accomplishment of his purposes, or the fulfilment of his promises. There is no security for the triumph of good in the universe. Angels and saints in heaven may all sin, and evil become dominant and universal. On this theory, all prayer that God would change our own hearts, or the hearts of others, becomes irrational. All this is so contrary to the teaching of the Bible, which everywhere asserts the sovereignty and supremacy of God, declaring that the hearts of men are in his hand, and that He turns them as the rivers of water; that He makes his people willing in the day of his power, working in them to will and to do, according to his good pleasure; it is so inconsistent with the promise to give repentance and faith, with the assertion of his power to change the heart; it is so incompatible with the hopes and confidence of the believer, that God can keep him from falling; and so subversive of the idea of God as presented in the Bible and revealed in our nature, that the Church has, almost with one accord, preferred to leave the mystery of evil unexplained, rather than to seek its solution in a principle which undermines the foundation of all religion.

¹ Dogmatik, ii. p. 137.

The Scriptural Doctrine.

The third method of dealing with this question is to rest satisfied with the simple statements of the Bible. The Scriptures teach, (1.) That the glory of God is the end to which the promotion of holiness, and the production of happiness, and all other ends are subordinate. (2.) That, therefore, the self-manifestation of God, the revelation of his infinite perfection, being the highest conceivable, or possible good, is the ultimate end of all his works in creation, providence, and redemption. (3.) As sentient creatures are necessary for the manifestation of God's benevolence, so there could be no manifestation of his mercy without misery, or of his grace and justice, if there were no sin. As the heavens declare the glory of God, so He has devised the plan of redemption, "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God." (Eph. iii. 10.) The knowledge of God is eternal life. It is for creatures the highest good. And the promotion of that knowledge, the manifestation of the manifold perfections of the infinite God, is the highest end of all his works. This is declared by the Apostle to be the end contemplated, both in the punishment of sinners and in the salvation of believers. It is an end to which, he says, no man can rationally object. "What if God, willing to shew his wrath (or justice), and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that He might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had afore prepared unto glory." (Rom. ix. 22, 23.) Sin, therefore, according the Scriptures, is permitted, that the justice of God may be known in its punishment, and his grace in its forgiveness. And the universe, without the knowledge of these attributes, would be like the earth without the light of the sun.

The glory of God being the great end of all things, we are not obliged to assume that this is the best possible world for the production of happiness, or even for securing the greatest degree of holiness among rational creatures. It is wisely adapted for the end for which it was designed, namely, the manifestation of the manifold perfections of God. That God, in revealing Himself, does promote the highest good of his creatures, consistent with the promotion of his own glory, may be admitted. But to reverse this order, to make the good of the creature the highest end, is to pervert and subvert the whole scheme; it is to put the means for the end, to subordinate God to the universe, the Infinite to the finite. This putting the creature in the place of the Creator, disturbs our moral and religious sentiments and convictions, as well as our intellectual apprehensions of God, and of his relation to the universe.

The older theologians almost unanimously make the glory of God the ultimate, and the good of the creature the subordinate end of all things. Twisten, indeed, says¹ it makes no difference whether we say God proposes his own glory as the ultimate end, and, for that purpose, determined to produce the highest degree of good; or that He purposed the highest good of his creatures, whence the manifestation of his glory flows as a consequence. It, however, makes all the difference in the world, whether the Creator be subordinate to the creature, or the creature to the Creator; whether the end be the means, or the means the end. There is a great difference whether the earth or the sun be assumed as the centre of our solar system. If we make the earth the centre, our astronomy will be in confusion. And if we make the creature, and not God, the end of all things, our theology and religion will in like manner be perverted. It may, in conclusion, be safely asserted that a universe constructed for the purpose of making God known, is a far better universe than one designed for the production of happiness.

§ 14. The Truth of God.

Truth, is a word of frequent occurrence and of wide signification in the Bible. The primary meaning of the Greek word ἀλήθεια (from ἀ and λήθω) is openness; what is not concealed. But in the Hebrew, and therefore in the Bible, the primary idea of truth is, that which sustains, which does not fail, or disappoint our expectations. The true, therefore, is, (1.) That which is real, as opposed to that which is fictitious or imaginary. Jehovah is the true God, because He is really God, while the gods of the heathen are vanity and nothing, mere imaginary beings, having neither existence nor attributes. (2.) The true is that which completely comes up to its idea, or to what it purports to be. A true man is a man in whom the idea of manhood is fully realized. The true God is He in whom is found all that Godhead imports. (3.) The true is that in which the reality exactly corresponds to the manifestation. God is true, because He really is what He declares Himself to be; because He is what He commands us to believe Him to be; and because all his declarations correspond to what really is. (4.) The true is that which can be depended upon, which does not fail, or change, or disappoint. In this sense also God is true as He is immutable and faithful. His promise cannot fail; his word never disappoints. His word abideth forever. When our Lord says, "Thy word is truth," He says that all that God has revealed may be confided in as exactly corresponding to what really is, or is to be. His word can never fail, though heaven and earth pass away.

¹ Dogmatik, vol. ii. p. 89.

The truth of God, therefore, is the foundation of all religion. It is the ground of our assurance, that what He has revealed of Himself and of his will, in his works and in the Scriptures, may be relied upon. He certainly is, and wills, and will do, whatever He has thus made known. It is no less the foundation of all knowledge. That our senses do not deceive us; that consciousness is trustworthy in what it teaches; that anything is what it appears to us to be; that our existence is not a delusive dream, has no other foundation than the truth of God. In this sense, all knowledge is founded on faith, i. e., the belief that God is true.

The theologians are accustomed to say: (1.) "Veritas Dei in essentia, est convenientia omnium eorum, quæ ad naturam perfectissimi pertinent eamque totam constituunt; qua ratione Deus verus opponitur fictis et commentitiis." (Jer. x. 8, 10, 11; John v. 20, 21.) (2.) "Veritas Dei in intellectu, est convenientia cogitationum cum objecto." . . . (Job xi. 7; Acts xv. 18.) (3.) "Veritas Dei in voluntate est convenientia decreti ac propositi efficacis cujusque cum rationibus in intellectu probe cognitis et judicatis." (Rom. xi. 33.) (4.) "Veritas Dei in factis, est convenientia actionum cum proposito." (Ps. xxv. 10,) (5.) "Veritas Dei in dictis, quæ singulatim vocari solet veracitas, est convenientia verborum omnium cum recta cogitatione animique sententia, et efficaci voluntatis proposito." (Num. xxiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29; Tit. i. 2; Heb. vi. 18.) "Hæc cernitur (a), in doctrinis (Is. xvii.

17) ; (b), in prædictionibus, promissionibus, ut et comminationibus. (Num. xxiii. 19.)”¹

To the same effect the Reformed theologian Endemann, says, “Veracitas Deo duplici sensu recte adscribitur, (1.) Quatenus nunquam errat, quia est omniscius, nunquam errorem aliis significat, quia id repugnat bonitati ejus. . . . (2.) Quatenus Deus ea actu sentit, quæ verbis vol factis entibus intelligentibus significat. Deus actionibus et sermonibus suis eum intendit finem, ut sibi homines credant, confidant, etc., quem finem everteret si semel a veritate discederet. Scriptura docet idem scil. quod Deus . . . [est] verax, immunis ab omni errore et mendacio. . . . Fidelis est Deus, quatenus ingenue aliquid promittit ; atque promissum certissimo complet. . . . Severitatem Deo tribuimus quatenus comminationes suas implet.”²

The philosophical theologians virtually deny that there is any such attribute in God as truth. They say that what is intended by that term is only the uniformity of law. The efficiency of God is always exercised in such a way that we may confide in the regular sequence of events. In this respect it may be said that God is true. Bruch³ admits “That this idea arises necessarily out of our religious consciousness, inasmuch as we embrace with full confidence what we regard as a divine revelation, and are persuaded that God in due time will fulfil whatever He has purposed, promised, or threatened. This confidence is in the strongest terms often expressed in the sacred writings, and is the source of the firm faith by which the Christian receives the revelation made in Christ ; and of the unshaken confidence with which he anticipates the fulfilment of the divine promises.” Nevertheless, although this idea of the truth of God has its foundation in our own nature, and is so clearly recognized in Scripture, and although it enters so deeply into the religious experience and hopes of the believer, it is a delusion. There is no such attribute in God. It is unphilosophical, and therefore impossible that there should be the distinction, which must then be assumed, between purpose and act in the divine mind. The ascription of truth or veracity to God rests, says Bruch, “on the assumption of a distinction in Him between thought and its manifestation, between his promises and threatenings, and their accomplishment, which not only destroys the unity of the divine essence, but reduces Him to the limitations and changes of time.

¹ Hollaz, Examen Theologicum, edit. Leipzig, 1763, pp. 243, 244.

² Compendium Theologicum, I. § 33; edit. Hanovæ, 1777, pp. 97, 99.

³ Eigenschaften, p. 250.

. . . . As the ascription of veracity to God arises out of what we observe in ourselves, it bears the impress of anthropomorphism, and has no claim to scientific recognition."¹ He further objects to the ascription of truth to God, in the ordinary sense of that term, because God works uniformly according to law, and therefore, "properly speaking, there can be no such thing as promises or threatenings with Him."² The idea is, that as God has established certain physical laws, and if men comply with them they are well, if they violate them, they suffer for it; so there are laws which determine the well-being of rational creatures: if we observe those laws, we are happy; if we disregard them, we are miserable. God has nothing to do with it, except as He established those laws and carries them out. The philosophical idea, therefore, of the truth of God, is the immutability of law, physical and moral. This view is still more definitely presented by Schweizer.³ God from the beginning to the end of the world is one and the same causality; this, in reference to the moral world, is his truth, veracitas, fidelitas, in so far as the later revelations, or manifestations of this causality, correspond to what the earlier manifestations would lead us to expect. God, according to this view, is not so much a person, as a name for the moral order of the universe. There is, of course, some truth in this mode of representation. The laws of God, by which He governs his creatures, rational and irrational, are uniform. It is true that a man reaps what he sows; that he receives here and hereafter the natural consequences of his conduct. If he sows to the flesh, he reaps corruption; if he sows to the spirit, he reaps life everlasting. But these laws are administered by a personal God, who, as He controls physical laws so as to produce plenty or famine, health or pestilence, as to Him seems fit, so also He controls all the laws which determine the well-being of the souls of men, so as to accomplish his designs and to secure the fulfilment of his promises and threatenings. The laws of a well-ordered human government are uniform and impartial, but that is not inconsistent with their human administration.

It is a great mercy that, at least in some cases, those whose philosophy forbids their believing in the personality of God, believe in the personality of Christ, whom they regard as a man invested with all the attributes of the Godhead, and whom they love and worship accordingly.

¹ Eigenschaften, p. 250.

² Glaubenslehre, vol. i. p. 443.

³ Ibid., p. 252.

§ 15. Sovereignty.

Sovereignty is not a property of the divine nature, but a prerogative arising out of the perfections of the Supreme Being. If God be a Spirit, and therefore a person, infinite, eternal, and immutable in his being and perfections, the Creator and Preserver of the universe, He is of right its absolute sovereign. Infinite wisdom, goodness, and power, with the right of possession, which belongs to God in all his creatures, are the immutable foundation of his dominion. "Our God is in the heavens; He hath done whatsoever He pleased." (Ps. cxv. 3.) "All the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dan. iv. 35.) "All that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine." (1 Chron. xxix. 11.) "The earth is the LORD's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein." (Ps. xxiv. 1.) "Thine is the kingdom, O LORD, and thou art exalted as head above all." (1 Chron. xxix. 11.) "Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine." (Ez. xviii. 4.) "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioned it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?" (Is. xlv. 9.) "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" (Matt. xx. 15.) He "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." (Eph. i. 11.) "Of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." (Rom. xi. 36.)

From these and similar passages of Scriptures it is plain, (1.) That the sovereignty of God is universal. It extends over all his creatures from the highest to the lowest. (2.) That it is absolute. There is no limit to be placed to his authority. He doeth his pleasure in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. (3.) It is immutable. It can neither be ignored nor rejected. It binds all creatures, as inexorably as physical laws bind the material universe.

This sovereignty is exercised, (1.) In establishing the laws, physical and moral, by which all creatures are to be governed. (2.) In determining the nature and powers of the different orders of created beings, and in assigning each its appropriate sphere. (3.) In appointing to each individual his position and lot. It is the Lord who fixes the bounds of our habitation. Our times are in his hands. He determines when, where, and under what circumstances each individual of our race is to be born, live, and die. Nations, no less than individuals, are thus in the hands of God, who assigns them their heritage in the earth, and controls their destiny. (4.) God is no less sovereign in the distribution of his favours. He does what He wills with his own. He gives to some riches, to others, honour; to others, health; while others are poor, unknown, or the victims of disease. To some, the light of the gospel is sent; others are left in darkness. Some are brought through faith unto salvation; others perish in unbelief. To the question, Why is this? the only answer is that given by our Lord. "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

Although this sovereignty is thus universal and absolute, it is the sovereignty of wisdom, holiness, and love. The authority of God is limited by nothing out of Himself, but it is controlled, in all its manifestations, by his infinite perfections. If a man is free and exalted, in proportion as he is governed by enlightened reason and a pure conscience, so is he supremely blessed who cheerfully submits to be governed by the infinite reason and holiness of God. This sovereignty of God is the ground of peace and confidence to all his people. They rejoice that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth; that neither necessity, nor chance, nor the folly of man, nor the malice of Satan controls the sequence of events and all their issues. Infinite wisdom, love, and power, belong to Him, our great God and Saviour, into whose hands all power in heaven and earth has been committed.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TRINITY.

§ 1. Preliminary Remarks.

THE doctrine of the Trinity is peculiar to the religion of the Bible. The Triad of the ancient world is only a philosophical statement of the pantheistic theory which underlies all the religions of antiquity. With the Hindus, simple, undeveloped, primal being, without consciousness or attributes, is called Brahm. This being, as unfolding itself in the actual world, is Vishnu; as returning into the abyss of unconscious being, it is Shiva. In Buddhism we find essentially the same ideas, in a more dualistic form. Buddhism makes more of a distinction between God, or the spiritual principle of all things, and nature. The soul of man is a part, or an existence-form, of this spiritual essence, whose destiny is, that it may be freed from nature and lost in the infinite unknown. In Platonism, also, we find a notional Trinity. Simple being ($\tau\acute{o} \delta\upsilon$) has its λόγος, the complex of its ideas, the reality in all that is phenomenal and changing. In all these systems, whether ancient or modern, there is a Thesis, Antithesis, and Synthesis; the Infinite becomes finite, and the finite returns to the Infinite. It is obvious, therefore, that these trinitarian formulas have no analogy with the Scriptural doctrine of the Trinity, and serve neither to explain nor to confirm it.

The design of all the revelations contained in the Word of God is the salvation of men. Truth is in order to holiness. God does not make known his being and attributes to teach men science, but to bring them to the saving knowledge of Himself. The doctrines of the Bible are, therefore, intimately connected with religion, or the life of God in the soul. They determine the religious experience of believers, and are presupposed in that experience. This is specially true of the doctrine of the Trinity. It is a great mistake to regard that doctrine as a mere speculative or abstract truth, concerning the constitution of the Godhead, with which we have no practical concern, or which we are required to believe simply because it is revealed. On the contrary, it underlies the whole plan of salvation, and determines the character of the religion (in the subjective sense of that word) of all true Christians. It is the unconscious, or unformed faith, even of those of God's people who are unable to understand the term by which it is expressed. They all believe in God, the Creator and Preserver against whom they have sinned, whose justice they know they cannot satisfy, and whose image they cannot restore to their apostate nature. They, therefore, as of necessity, believe in a divine Redeemer and a divine Sanctifier. They have, as it were, the factors of the doctrine of the Trinity in their own religious convictions. No mere speculative doctrine, especially no doctrine so mysterious and so out of analogy with all other objects of human knowledge, as that of the Trinity, could ever have held the abiding control over the faith of the Church, which this doctrine has maintained. It is not, therefore, by any arbitrary decision, nor from any bigoted adherence to hereditary beliefs, that the Church has always refused to recognize as Christians those who reject this doctrine. This judgment is only the expression of the deep conviction that Antitrinitarians must adopt a radically and practically different system of religion from that on which the Church builds her hopes. It is not too much to say with Meyer,¹ that "the Trinity is the point in which all Christian ideas and interests unite; at once the beginning and the end of all insight into Christianity." ✓

This great article of the Christian faith may be regarded under three different aspects: (1.) The Biblical form of the doctrine. (2.) The ecclesiastical form, or the mode in which the statements of the Bible have been explained in the symbols of the Church and the writings of theologians. (3.) Its philosophical form, or the attempts which have been made to illustrate, or to prove, the doctrine on philosophical principles. It is only the doctrine as presented in the Bible, which binds the faith and conscience of the people of God.

§ 2. Biblical Form of the Doctrine.

A. What that Form is.

The form in which this doctrine lies in the Bible, and in which it enters into the faith of the Church universal, includes substantially the following particulars.

1. There is one only living and true God, or divine Being. The religion of the Bible stands opposed not only to Atheism, but to all forms of polytheism. The Scriptures everywhere assert that

¹ Lehre von der Trinität, vol. i. p. 42.

Jehovah alone is God. (Dent. vi. 4.) "The Lord our God is one Lord." "I am the first, and I am the last; and besides me there is no God." (Is. xlv. 6.) "Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well." (James ii. 19.) The Decalogue, which is the foundation of the moral and religious code of Christianity, as well as of Judaism, has as its first and greatest commandment, "Thou shalt have no other God before me." No doctrine, therefore, can possibly be true which contradicts this primary truth of natural as well as of revealed religion.

2. In the Bible all divine titles and attributes are ascribed equally to the Father, Son, and Spirit. The same divine worship is rendered to them. The one is as much the object of adoration, love, confidence, and devotion as the other. It is not more evident that the Father is God, than that the Son is God; nor is the deity of the Father and Son more clearly revealed than that of the Spirit.

3. The terms Father, Son, and Spirit do not express different relations of God to his creatures. They are not analogous to the terms Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, which do express such relations. The Scriptural facts are, (a.) The Father says I; the Son says I; the Spirit says I. (b.) The Father says Thou to the Son, and the Son says Thou to the Father; and in like manner the Father and the Son use the pronouns He and Him in reference to the Spirit. (c.) The Father loves the Son; the Son loves the Father; the Spirit testifies of the Son. The Father, Son, and Spirit are severally subject and object. They act and are acted upon, or are the objects of action. Nothing is added to these facts when it is said that the Father, Son, and Spirit are distinct persons; for a person is an intelligent subject who can say I, who can be addressed as Thou, and who can act and can be the object of action. The summation of the above facts is expressed in the proposition, The one divine Being subsists in three persons, Father, Son, and Spirit. This proposition adds nothing to the facts themselves; for the facts are, (1.) That there is one divine Being. (2.) The Father, Son, and Spirit are divine. (3.) The Father, Son, and Spirit are, in the sense just stated, distinct persons. (4.) Attributes being inseparable from substance, the Scriptures, in saying that the Father, Son, and Spirit possess the same attributes, say they are the same in substance; and, if the same in substance, they are equal in power and glory.

4. Notwithstanding that the Father, Son, and Spirit are the same in substance, and equal in power and glory, it is no less true, according to the Scriptures, (a.) That the Father is first, the Son second, and the Spirit third. (b.) The Son is of the Father (ἐκ θεοῦ, the λόγος, ἐκδὸν, ἀπαύγασμα, τοῦ θεοῦ); and the Spirit is of the Father and of the Son. (c.) The Father sends the Son, and the Father and Son send the Spirit. (d.) The Father operates through the Son, and the Father and Son operate through the Spirit. The converse of these statements is never found. The Son is never said to send the Father, nor to operate through Him; nor is the Spirit ever said to send the Father, or the Son, or to operate through them. The facts contained in this paragraph are summed up in the proposition: In the Holy Trinity there is a subordination of the Persons as to the mode of subsistence and operation. This proposition again adds nothing to the facts themselves.

